So Jimmie sat on the ground close by and looked at Mr. Frog, and Mr. Frog in turn looked at him. Pretty soon a little red bug flew down and lit on the lettuce near Mr. Frog's nose. Jimmie saw something flash out of Mr. Frog's mouth and back again "quick as a wink." And Mr. Red Bug was not on the lettuce leaf any more.

Jimmie was sure Mr. Red Bug didn't fly away, but he wasn't sure about what had happened.

He thought, "I'll watch Mr. Frog better next time." And again a bug stopped close to Mr. Frog, and again something jumped from Mr. Frog's mouth and back, and Mr. Bug was gone. And this time Jimmie was sure that little Mr. Bug had gone into big Mr. Frog's mouth.

Before his mother called him to supper, Jimmie had seen Mr. Frog catch twenty-seven bugs. He asked his father how Mr. Frog could catch bugs so well, and was told that he had a long, slender tongue with a sticky end, and when he flipped it against a bug Mr. Bug would just stick on and go back into Mr. Frog's big stomach.

"Mr. Frog's a good fellow to have in your garden, son, and you had better take care of him," said Jimmie's father.

And Jimmie said: "Yes, sir; I sure will. I'm going to be partners with Mr. Frog."—Child's Gem.

Sam—What's d' matter with you and Chloe?

Susan—Matter 'nough. She insulted my friend, Mr. Jackson, what called on me las' night.

"Insulted Mr. Jackson, did she?"

"Dat's what she done. She asked me who dat 'ere nocturnal visitor was?"—Yonkers Statesman.

"Elsie," said the mother of a small miss, "you'll have to be broken of the habit of sniffling at the table."

"Hadn't I better be mended, mamma?" queried Elsie.

Little William had had hard work keeping awake one Sunday at church, and later on, being asked how he liked the sermon, he replied: "Well, the beginning was good, and so was the end, but there was too much middle."

A little chap residing on the south side was amusing himself one evening by copying the names of the former presidents. After reading them over an idea suddenly entered his small head. "Why, papa," he exclaimed, "ever so many of the presidents were named after streets in Chicago!"

Tommie—Gee! It's orful quiet over ter our house.

Sammie—What's th' matter? Somebody sick?

Tommie—No; ma's went away and took the phonograph with her!—Yonkers Statesman.

"Do you believe in ghosts?" asked the man who resents all superstition.

"No, suh," answered Mr. Erastus Pinkley. "An' all I's hopin' is dat dem ghos'es will lemme stay dat way 'stid o' comin' around' tryin' to convince me."—Washington Star.

From the Colleges.

The Bible College of Missouri, Columbia, Mo., is a vigorous and growing institution in affiliation with the University of Missouri. It is, however, neither a "Bible Chair" nor an "Annex" of the University of Missouri. It is a College, officially distinct from every other institution. It enjoys the following advantages:

1. An admirable location in the very center of the most numerous brotherhood in any state in the Union.

2. An equally admirable location with reference to the campus and buildings of the University of Missouri.

3. A thorough biblical curriculum for students preparing for the ministry, for missions, and for other departments of Christian work.

4. An interchange of credits with the University of Missouri—ministerial students taking work in the University, and university students taking work in the Bible College. In preseribed courses the University of Missouri gives to its students full credit toward the A. B. degree for hours taken in the Bible College.

5. The intellectual atmosphere and the inspiration of a great and growing university with its expert teachers, its many departments, its libraries, gymnasiums, and varied Christian activities.

6. No tuitions are charged either in the University or the Bible College.

During the last year above ten per cent of the students in the Arts Department of the University of Missouri took work in the Bible College, and received credits toward their A. B. degree. The influence of the work of the Bible College is felt in university circles, and is recognized and gladly acknowledged by the University authorities. It is a leaven that permeates.

The work of the Bible College is recognized as being altogether helpful and constructive. The greatest reward of its teachers comes in the many assurances from their students of the spiritual and intellectual help they receive.

W. J. Lhamon, Dean.

COTNER UNIVERSITY.

The prospects of this institution are encouraging. The indications are that the attendance will be increased and the coming year will be the most prosperous of all. The department of education, with its close touch with the education of teachers is growing in interest. The new six-year course, by which both the Arts and Medieal degrees are secured, promises to be an attraction to those desiring medical training together with a thorough general culture. The department of music, both vocal and instrumental, is being strengthened. The new gymnasium under the management of Coach Stevens, is a new attraction to physical training. On every hand vigor and hopefulness are apparent. Fall semester opens September 7.

W. C. Aylsworth.

The Pastors' College claims to present the ly system of prompt relief for the present nful need of preachers now before the otherhood. It proposes to take 500 brethof only moderate edueation, to give them wledge and practice during a single school year, then to have them take our smaller churches where they will have time for study, during the next three years, under the direction of the college. It is a suggestion that will appeal to those who have the heart to preach, who wish to feel that they have been educated for it, and who have not the time to take the regular course in college. Our personal acquaintance with the president, George Thom Smith, justifies us in saying that he will not be content without good, solid, conscientious work in the school room.

EUREKA COLLEGE BOOSTERS' CLUB.

The prospects of Eureka College for the coming year are by far the best than for many years past. The correspondence indicates a large increase of students. There are many reasons for this, one of the most potent ones has been the formation and work of the new student organization which was formed at the elose of last year. The primary work of the Boosters' Club is the enlarging of the student body and for this purpose almost all the students pledged themselves to do their utmost to return and bring another student with them. The officers of the society are daily receiving encouraging letters from students who have secured the promise of one or more new students and are working for more.

If the students themselves realize the value of increased opportunities of Christian education, the Christian churches of Illinois should bestir themselves to provide the means of attaining it by loyally supporting Eureka College.

An exceptionally large number of ministerial students are expected this fall. If any churches within reasonable distance of Eureka are in need of student preaching, mutual benefit may be secured by writing to Eureka College.

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF CATHOLIC SOCIETIES.

Joseph A. Serena.

The recent meeting in Boston of the American Federation of Catholic Societies ought to be full of interest to every Protestant in the country because of the issues raised and the positions assumed. At a time like this, when there seems to be a concerted movement on the part of a large body of the Anglican church to go back to Rome, it is worth while to read the position the Roman church assumes toward present-day problems.

This gathering was the seventh national convention of the kind and was attended by delegates from all parts of the country. Mr. Edward Feeney, of Brooklyn, the national president, in his opening address outlined the issues and aims of the Federation, saying:

This Federation will attack the evil of divorce as a crime against society, and we shall enter our protest against the general disruption of the family by law, for the family is the unit upon which governments are founded. Federation will advocate the cause of Catholic education, that religious and secular instruction shall go hand in hand.

We shall reiterate our warning against the dangers of Socialism. Socialism and infidelity have throttled France, the eldest daughter of the church. It would not have been so had there been a Catholic federation of societies in France built on the lines of the great German Central Verein.

Federation will appeal for a clean press, pure literature, proper observance of the Sabbath day, honest government, decent citizenship, the relation of labor and the church, the protection of Catholic interests and in general endeavor to elevate the moral tone of our people and promote the love of God and our country.

In the opening sermon, preached by Archbishop O'Connell, of Boston, in the cathedral, the issues were most clearly outlined. Throughout the convention the point of attack was upon one or the other of the foes the archbishop mentioned, Protestantism and Paganism, including in the former the New Theology, with it resultant evils, and in the latter "Socialism."

The two foes which face today the cross of Christ, still raised aloft by his church as the tree of eternal life, are first, the last remnants of that negation once called Protestantism and now styling itself "The New Religion," and secondly, the same eternal energy, paganism, which the apostles faced from the first day when to the gentile world they preached Christ crucified. And the Catholic church today remains the only reliable moral force upon which all order and law and authority can depend.

There is not a condition existing today in the world, civilized or uncivilized, which the church of Christ has not faced 100 times before and settled with the same identical principle. The student of philosophy knows that truth is always truth and the only originality in the moral order is immorality; and yet we are expected seriously to listen to this talk about growth of truth and new religion.

If one can bring himself to the point of granting the arrogant position of the Roman church he cannot but admire this keen characterization of Protestantism:

I dare say that the Catholic church alone must soon be recognized as the only bulwark

TRIED TO FORCE IT.

Thought System Would Soon Tolerate Coffee.

A Boston lady tried to convince herself that she could get used to coffee, and finally found it was the stronger. She writes:

"When a child, being delicate and nervous, I was not allowed coffee. But since reaching womanhood I began its use, and as the habit grew on me, I frequently endeavored to break myself of it, because of its evident bad effects.

"With me the most noticeable effect of drinking coffee was palpitation of the heart. This was at times truly alarming, and my face would flush uncomfortably and maintain its vivid hue for some time.

"I argued that my system would soon accustom itself to coffee, and continued to use it, although I had a suspicion that it was affecting my eye-sight also. The kidneys early showed effects of coffee, as I found by leaving it off for a few days, when the trouble abated.

"Finally a friend called my attention to Postum. At first I did not like it, but when made right—boiled 15 minutes until dark and rich—I soon found Postum was just what I wanted. No flushing of the face, no palpitation, no discomfort or inconvenience after drinking it.

"Of course all this was not felt in a week or two weeks, but within that time I can truthfully say a marked difference had taken place and a great deal of my nervousness had vanished.

"At present time my health is excellent, due to a continued use of Postum, with a general observance of proper hygiene. Of nothing am I more convinced than that if I had continued drinking coffee, I should be today little less than a nervous wreck, and possibly blind."

"There's a Reason."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

against the prevalent social evils which seem even now to threaten the life of the nation. She is today the only moral body which gives indication of growing vitality and increasing vigor. The Catholic church has but just begun to manifest in this young land the undying vitality with which Christ endowed her. The leaders of Protestantism are now proclaiming that unless all signs fail their churches may soon close their doors. The principle of private judgment and the so-called "higher criticism" have done their havoc.

The Bible, which half a century ago was a fetish, is today a fable, and whatever there was of simple faith in the supernatural is fast being dried up in the hearts of those whose ancestors made faith alone the only condition of eternal salvation.

The tide which four centuries ago started with the rebellion of Luther against his ecclesiastical superiors has gone on mounting until rebellion succeeding rebellion has submerged those who caused it and has left in its wake utter ruin of the supernatural.

Regarding the school question he had some very plain things to say, and he said them. Forty years ago this church compelled the subject of religion to be omitted in our public schools. Now it decries the godless public school, pointing with Pharisaical pride to its parochial school system. When, in our schools we attempt to right the error, the Catholics come again with an attack upon a "pagan substitute for Christianity." Verily the issue seems to be Catholicism or nothing. But hear the archbishop:

> Lack of religious influence in early years in the home and school has begun already to bear fruit in every phase of our national life.

We Catholics have pointed it out like many another danger for a century past. We have done our duty to our own under circumstances which have proved our sincerity. While our people are among the poorest of this country in material goods and least able to bear new burdens, they have erected at the cost of millions and millions of dollars, schools and institutions wherein their children might be taught that there is a God to whom all men must be responsible, that moral law emanating from that God binds them during all their lives, that all authority is from God, that civil rulers are sacred in that authority, that the law of the land is to be obeyed under penalty of God's displeasure, that rights of property are sacred, and all those other inviolable principles of right and duty which stand for order in the world and the peace of humanity.

While doing for the children of the nation what the nation itself cannot do, we have been burdened with a double taxation, which is nothing short of outrageous tyranny.

I call upon this federation and upon every Christian in the land to oppose with all his influence the latest attempt of an infidel propaganda to thrust into the schools what appears on the surface to be an innocent system of ethical culture, but which in reality is only another clever ruse to substitute a pagan philosophy for Christianity.

If this meeting of the federation will have accomplished only this one great achievement —arousing the whole American people to a knowledge of the awful dangers which the nation must eventually face if this system of irreligious or unreligious training of the young continues it will have done something. Christian in the land to oppose with all his to gain the eternal gratitude of all true patriots.

Regarding modernism nothing was said. The outsider was left to infer that in the great Catholic church no questionings ever come, that it is the same "yesterday, today and forever." But, like some other religious bodies, it is best seen from afar. Notwithstanding its form and power, we have reason to believe that it is feeling the general effect of the unrest of the religious world. In fact, the very pressure of a "federation" of Catholic societies signifies that some need from without imperatively calls for a closer organization for protection.

The next gathering will be held in Pittsburg in August, 1909.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The Foreign Society has just received $800 from a sister in the state of Washington. She is three score and ten. Her chief desire is that her money may be used for the spread of the Gospel.

The officers of the Foreign Society will hold a conference with some twenty-five of its missionaries in Cincinnati, September 1-3.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twenty-four days of August amounted to $16,594. This amount was received from 543 sources, or in this number of gifts. This is a gain of 144 gifts for the corresponding time one year ago.

The churches on the Pacific coast are being greatly stirred by the visit of Dr. and Mrs. Dye. The Southern California convention voted to raise $12,500 for another new station far up on the great Bosira River in the Congo. They follow the example of the Northern California brethren, who are raising $10,000 for a new station on the same river. The Oregon brethren started the ball rolling by pledging $15,000 for a mission steamboat for the Congo.

M. D. Clubb, of Pomona, California, writes that the day spent with them by Dr. Dye, of Africa, was one of the greatest in their experience. They gave a thank offering of $230, to be used in sending Mr. and Mrs. Moon, of Oregon, out to the Congo as missionaries. Then G. H. Waters and wife of the congregation decided to take Mrs. Moon as their personal Living-Link. These good people also support a missionary under the C. W. B. M. The people of the middle states will have to step lively to keep up with the missionary pace being set by our California brethren.

J. H. Wenz, of Sacramento, California, is the Chairman of the Centennial Committee for Foreign Missions in Northern California, the special object of which is to raise a special fund of $10,000. The Northern California brethren will be glad to co-operate with him heartily.

A friend in Southern California pledged $600 for the support of Mrs. E. R. Moon, who expects to go to Africa as a missionary of the Foreign Society. This makes another "Living Link" for California.

The church at Covina, Cal., W. G. Conley, minister, will support E. R. Moon as their "Living Link" in Africa. This is a bold step for this splendid church.

The church at Pasadena, Cal., has raised a special fund of $230 toward the outfit of E. R. Moon, who expects soon to depart for work in Africa.

W. G. Conley, Covina, Cal., has been appointed Chairman of the Centennial Committee for Southern California, the special object of which is to raise a Centennial Fund of $12,500 for Foreign Missions in that region. This is a splendid undertaking, and under the inspiring and wise management of Brother Conley, we have no doubt of success.

E. W. Thornton's Bible Class, numbering thirty, of Long Beach, Cal., have pledged themselves for a "Living Link" in the Foreign Society. We congratulate Brother Thornton and his splendid class upon this bold step. There are hundreds of other Sunday schools who ought to undertake some larger and more definite things for the furtherance of the gospel.

A LIFT IN A TIME OF GREAT NEED.

Jesse B. Haston.

What a hand to hand struggle we do have in a city like Denver! Twenty months ago, I came to Denver and found the East Side Church meeting in a dark, unpleasant hall, where it had worshipped nearly ten years. To secure a building was looked upon as a well-nigh impossible task. We went to work. I determined that we should locate and build in a first-class locality. We found the site at Thirtieth avenue and Williams street. The price was $2,100. How could we buy it? After a stiff course in the art of real estate dealing, we traded for the chosen site some property we had down near the railroad shops, and paid $600 on the difference. This left us $600 still in debt on the lots. It seemed to me that the raising of this first installment had well-nigh exhausted the money ability of the congregation. But the resources of a wise faith are surprising. To pay this balance on the lots, we next searched for and found sale for one and a quarter of the four lots, which left us 70x125 feet on an elegant corner and paid for. Now for the building. We planned a $20,000 structure; raised $500 and went to work on the basement. August came. Excavations were made and basement walls built. One thousand dollars had been collected. The folks said that the congregation had surely expended its financial energy. We stopped work and took four months to raise $400 debt on the work thus far done. The panic came. Winter was upon us. To stay in the old hall meant further expense, delay and stagnation. What should be done? To be able to use a promised loan it was necessary to raise $3,000 more, to complete the first section of the building. Now—what can possibly be done?

NIGHT NURSE.

Kept in Perfect Trim by Right Food.

Nursing the sick is often very burdensome to the nurse.

Night nursing is liable to be even more exhausting from the fact that the demands of the system for sleep are more urgent during the night hours.

A Va. lady, called on to act as night nurse in the family, found the greatest support from the use of Grape-Nuts food. She says:

"Our acquaintance with Grape-Nuts began eight years ago. We bought the first package sold in this place, and although we began as skeptics we became converts to its striking food value.

"I used Grape-Nuts first, to sustain me when doing night nursing for a member of the family. I ate a teaspoonful at a time, and by slowly chewing it, I was able to keep awake and felt no fatigue.

"Soon I grew to like Grape-Nuts very much and after our patient recovered I was surprised to find that I was not at all 'worn out' on account of broken rest. My nerves were strong and steady and my digestion was fine. This was the more surprising because I had always suffered with weak nerves and indigestion. My experience was so satisfactory that other members of the family took up Grape-Nuts with like results." "There's a Reason."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

We turned to that great repository of a great people's business-like faith, The Extension Society. The Board seemed willing to do any reasonable thing I asked to help us into our new quarters. It granted us $1,500, and we fitted up the basement section for worship. It is comfortable, roomy, will seat over three hundred, and is our own.

EAST SIDE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, DENVER, COLO.

We are hilariously happy! The congregation is taking on growth.

The accompanying cut shows the building as it will appear. Spanish mission in style, solid, enduring, to be the proud but humble instrument for saving the souls of a city now growing by leaps and bounds.

On opening day, money sufficient was pledged to wipe out this loan by the end of the year, by which time we shall be erecting the superstructure.

Hic Fabula Docet.

A STRENUOUS TRIP.

Dr. Royal J. Dye and his wife have just completed their trip to the Pacific Coast. It was indeed a strenuous one, but great things are the results. Writing under date of August 17, he says:

"Some things have greatly encouraged us, others have disappointed us, and we are sorry that we have not been able to produce more immediate results. We sympathize with you all in the office as we have never done before. We thought we knew, but we only guessed at it.

"The good fellowship all along the line has heartened us much and we shall go back to our beloved Bolengi with a new courage, feeling that the great brotherhood understands and feels and is backing the work. It will be an encouraging message to send to the Congo and a stimulating report to take back to the Bolengi Church.

"It has been hard work, but it has been worth while. We enjoy talking to interested people. We did not get much time to visit or to see the sights. The business of our King was too pressing. We trust it will count for larger things in the years to come. God grant that they do not forget it.

"Yours in his glad service,

"ROYAL J. DYE."

CHURCH ADDITIONS.

Suwanee, Ga.—An eleven days' meeting in Hopewell Church, Gwinnett county, closed August 19, with one baptism. C. R. Miller was the preacher. There was considerable petty opposition by other religious bodies. E. Everett Hollingworth, minister.

A consecrated man is needed for the field at Conyers, Ga. E. Everett Hollingworth, who has been there for over two years, will take up the work at Fitzgerald, Ga., where the two congregations (First and Central) have united.

PASTORS' COLLEGE, Champaign, Illinois.

Students cannot enter at any old time; boys, not at all.

For these classes:

(a) Those whose limited education prevents them from entering college.
(b) Those who are too old to spend several years in school.
(c) Those who began to preach with inadequate preparation.
(d) Those who want the best, regardless of cost.

Only one year in college walls, then three years daily study while in an active pastorate.

We conquer our huge bashfulness to cite the fact that this system of ministerial training is the most original, most economical, most dynamic, most fascinating, most practical in reach of the American student. We are looking for the man who has the acumen to recognize the best, the independence to reject the mouldy or fantastic, the conservative wisdom to appreciate a system that is neck and neck with the twentieth century yet holds the truth as expressed by Jesus, for he will have the insight to prize the vigorous, enthusiastic, creative years saved by this course and the vim and nerve to grasp it promptly. We want 500 of him, or her.

Our class in "Learning How to Think" is a pioneer. No other theological school has it. The obligation, the tools, the methods, the materials, the tests of high thinking; how to attain increased power of thought; the art of study; the Carlylean method of reading; the training of the imagination for those who wish to soar, form a mental gymnastic, increasing mental ability to a degree not suspected. But that is but one morsel in the superb menu. Entrance in early September only. Send for catalogue. Quick.

REPRESENTATIVES WANTED,

HIRAM COLLEGE, Hiram, Ohio.

From a student's symposium in the Hiram College Advance.

WHY CHOOSE HIRAM?

1. Because there you will receive the individual attention from instructors which is the unsolved problem of the large college.
2. Because intellectually, morally and socially you will rank yourself. Wealth or poverty, social condition at home or "previous condition of servitude" will neither help nor hinder.
3. Because there you may learn to think for yourself, without throwing away faith and belief.
4. Because coming in contact with Hiram's world-wide interests you will grow.
5. Because on graduation you will have a diploma that counts for something in the world of action.

The Home-Coming issue of the "Advance," containing the above symposium entire, the inaugural address of President Bates, a poem by Jessie Brown Pounds, articles by Judge F. A. Henry and Profs. E. B. Wakefield, B. S. Dean and G. H. Colton, and many other things of interest, also catalog and full information, sent free on application to J. O. Newcomb, Secretary, Hiram, Ohio. SPECIAL TELEGRAM.

Christian Century, 235 E. 40th St.:—

Dedicated new and remodelled church here in my old home town where my parents and relatives are members. Morning and afternoon services in the grove. Undoubtedly the greatest throng that ever assembled for a religious service in Butler. Dedicatory service in the new church at night. Raised $66 more than the indebtedness. S. B. Braden, our pastor here, is doing good work. Butler is also the home of Brother Sturgis and Brother Haley, two of our best singing evangelists. They assisted in the music yesterday. We had eleven confessions at the night services.

WITH THE WORKERS.

In a contest between Hopewell, Reese and Bethel Bible schools, in Georgia, for three months, Bethel finished with the greatest attendance and Reese with the largest amount of offerings.

NOTICE.

After four years' ministry with the church of Edinburg, Indiana, I have resigned my work there to enter the evangelistic field. This pastorate has been the most pleasant and happy experience in all my ministerial career. This church is blessed with one of the best official boards in the Brotherhood and the congregation as a whole will be difficult to equal. They are blessed with the good things of this life and know how to dispense them to the one who ministers to them. I am open for evangelistic dates after September, my first meeting being Milan, Mo., during this month. Churches desiring my services can address me 705 Conn St., Lawrence, Kans.

WHARTON MEMORIAL HOME.

September 1, 1909, nas been decided on as the date for the opening of the Wharton Memorial Home at Hiram, O. One of the most serious trials of our missionaries will be relieved by this provision of a home where their children can be cared for in this country during school age. The F. C. M. S. nas planned this home, profiting by the experience of other foreign missionary societies which have long had similar homes. It is a most commendable undertaking and merits the support of the entire brotherhood.

Special Excursion to New Orleans

INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONVENTION CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA

The Illinois Central Railroad has been selected as the official route by Illinois Disciples and the company has provided special train service at a rate of twenty-seven dollars ($27.00) for the round trip. This splendid service and the low rate secured should and undoubtedly will induce a great many of the Brotherhood to attend this splendid convention. The city of New Orleans is almost an ideal place to visit. Its beauty, its countless attractions, its old landmarks and buildings re-calling an historic past—New Orleans and this international convention will surely make an irresistible appeal to many hundreds in the churches of Christ. Some churches will appreciate the wisdom of sending their pastors at their expense, and many pastors will feel compelled to go at any cost.

The excursion tickets permit a stopover at Vicksburg and the National Military Park, together with a ride of one hundred miles on the Mississippi River between Vicksburg and Natchez, including meals and berth on the steamer, at an additional cost of $3.50.

Special train will leave Chicago at 6:00 p. m., Wednesday, October 7, and arrive at New Orleans at 8:15 p. m. the next day. An attractive folder has been issued by the Illinois Central Railroad and can be obtained free by application to any of the passenger agents or to Mr. R. J. Carmichael, city ticket office, 117 Adams street, Chicago.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

GOLDEN ROD

When fades the cardinal-flower, whose heart-red bloom
Glows like a living coal upon the green
Of the midsummer shadows—then how bright,
How deepening bright, like mountain flame, doth burn
The golden-rod upon a thousand hills!
This is the autumn's flower, and to my soul
A token fresh of beauty and of life
And life's supreme delight.

When I am gone
Something of me I would might subtly pass
Into these flowers twain of all the year;
So that my spirit send a sudden stir
Into the hearts of those who love these hills,
These woods, these waves and meadows by the sea.

JUDGE CHARLES J. SCOFIELD

Altar Stairs

By JUDGE, CHARLES J. SCOFIELD, Author of A Subtle Adversary. Square 12mo., cloth. Beautifully designed cover, back and side title stamped in gold. Illustrated, $1.20.

A splendid book for young or old. Just the kind of a story that creates a taste for good reading. No better book can be found to put in the hands of young people. It would make a splendid Birthday or Christmas Gift. Read what those say who have read it.

The story will not only entertain all readers, but will also impart many valuable moral lessons. This is an age of story reading and the attention of the young especially, should be called to such books of fiction as "Altar Stairs."

W. G. WALTERS, Bluefield, W. Va.

If one begins this story, he will not put it down until the very satisfactory end is finished.

CHRISTIAN OBSERVER, Louisville, Ky.

It is a strong book and worthy of unqualified endorsement.

RELIGIOUS TELESCOPE,

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith

By HERBERT L. WILLETT, Author of The Ruling Quality, etc. Post 8vo. cloth. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top. Illustrated, 75 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. Its fascination holds the reader's attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished. Read what the reviewers say.

More of such books are needed just now among those who are pleading the restoration of Apostolic Christianity.

JAMES C. CREEL,
Plattsburg, Mo.

It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of the truer life, possible only to him who has tarried praverfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher.

J. E. CHASE.

It is a good book and every Christian ought to read it.

L. V. BARBREE,
Terre Haute, Ind.

his volume presents a comprehensive view of the subjects, though the author disclaims completeness.

CHRISTIAN MESSENGER, Toronto.

Professor Willett's work is a new study of the old truths. The author's style is becoming more and more finished; his vocabulary is wonderful, and his earnestness is stamped on every page.

The Illinois Convention

A Feast of Fellowship.

The Disciples of Illinois have met once again in annual session, heard reports of the year, planned new work for the future, informed and refreshed each soul present concerning the great field and our obligation to evangelize it, and adjourned with "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," sung not by the lips only but echoing in the heart of every delegate.

The convention gathered in a tremulous state of mind. Chicago was an untried hostess. Whether our small membership in the great city could make the delegates comfortable or not was a matter of doubt both in her own mind and that of the delegates. Besides, for weeks the public press had been laying serious heresy at the door of him who was to preside at the convention. A certain denominational paper had been striving to inflame the brotherhood of the state even to the point of deposing him from office. A few hotheads on both sides may have wished to see such an issue joined. But the great body of sensible and intelligent Disciples were determined that our Illinois convention should not be made an arbiter of doctrine. No convention ever worked with greater harmony. The business was dispatched with facility. The addresses were broad-visioned, uplifting and every way adequate. The uniform courtesy of Dr. Willett, the president, in manner of presiding and in appointment of committees was only matched by the fairness and good spirit of all who spoke from the floor.

The hospitality of Chicago brethren was as simple and cordial as it could be in a small town, and there was room and to spare. The Y. M. C. A. building proved just the right place to hold the meetings. It was central and easily accessible. With its splendid auditorium, conference room and capacious lobbies at our disposal, all the functions of the gatherings were well served. The banquet at the Auditorium hotel on Tuesday night brought nearly 200 men of the convention together in the fellowship of the highest ideals and most important interests of the kingdom of God.

The program was an agreeable disappointment. On its face it looked to many below standard. But as it moved from number to number some happy surprises emerged. Chicago auditors had the pleasure of hearing for the first time a number of the capable men of the state who are well known in their own section. Among these is Rev. John I. Gunn, of Arcola, who spoke on Wednesday night on "Facing the Facts." He began with a tired audience. His subject lent itself admirably to a most technical and dry treatment. But he made every hearer "sit up and take notice" for nearly an hour while he covered the whole field of Illinois missions to be spread out before us. His view was broad and sympathetic. His presentation forceful and appealing. He showed himself to be a man of fine imagination and common sense. Excepting the president's address, probably no feature of the convention was so favorably commented upon as the address of Mr. Gunn.

On Thursday noon, Rev. W. W. Sniff, of Paris, Ill., spoke on "The Glorious Gospel." Mr. Sniff is an honest speaker. He uses no "methods." He simply stands before his audience and talks quietly and earnestly about the things that his heart believes. His address was a review of the things commonly believed among us and among all evangelical Christians. Starting with the glorious facts of the New Testament record he enumerated the outstanding features of Christianity, concluding with the glorious consummation for the church and the individual soul which the gospel offers. It was rather significant that Mr. Sniff's selection of facts upon which the glorious gospel rests included mainly, if not only, the miraculous facts. We watched in vain for him to place a moral fact in the foundation he was laying and this, it seems to us, betrays the weakness of the structure. Christianity has miracles in it, but it does not rest on miracles. The moral facts upon which Christianity rests may be miraculous, but their glory is not that they are miraculous, but that they are, first, facts, and secondly, moral. We do not wish, however, to intrude a criticism here, but simply to suggest a method for another speech in the same theme.

In two able addresses Rev. W. F. Shaw, of Chicago, and Rev. S. S. Laflin, of Stanford, contrasted the city and country churches with their problems and possibilities. Mr. Shaw, one of the most devoted pastors in Chicago, has lived here long enough to know whereof he speaks. His address glistened with important facts which proved instructive to Chicago hearers as well as the down state brethren. Mr. Laflin believes in the country church. His sarcastic thrusts at the city church and the educated preacher were taken good naturedly by every one when it was remembered that he goes soon to take an editorial position on the Christian Standard.

President R. E. Hieronymus, of Eureka College, read a thoughtful and well prepared paper on the educational problem in general and especially among the Disciples. He contended earnestly for the small college, if you do not lay two great stress on the "small." The obligation of such a college to produce character as well as learning in its students was the cardinal point of his paper. The report of Mr. H. H. Peters, Endowment Secretary for Eureka, showed that one hundred supporters had been found to stand under the endowment campaign for five years. Mr. Peters hopes henceforth to give himself to the business of raising a quarter of a million dollars for endowment purposes.

The Sunday school session on Thursday evening proved enjoyable. After a spiritual address by Rev. W. B. Clemmer, of Rock Island, Mr. W. C. Pierce, of Chicago, spoke on the Teacher Training movement. Mr. Pierce had some good illustrations and stories with which to light up his points and he held everybody's interest. Mr. Clarence L. Depew, of Jacksonville, the state Sunday-school superintendent, presided at this meeting and received a fine token of appreciation from Mr. Pierce and the audience.

On Friday morning Rev. F. W. Emerson, of Freeport, spoke on the Prohibition question, Dr. Royal J. Dye rehearsed his thrilling story of the Bolengi mission in Africa, and Dr. W: T. Moore, of Columbia, Mo., spoke on "Education and Our Plea." Dr. Moore's presence throughout the convention was an inspiration and his superb address at the close was heartily received. He found three stages in the Genesis creation narrative—creation, chaos and reconstruction. In a figure he transferred these stages to the history of the Disciples of Christ. We have passed through the periods of creation and chaos, and are now in the re-construction period. The primary need of this period is light. "Let there be light!" is the divine fiat for our day as well as for the ancient enterprise. We have no fear of scholarship. Let the truth be known. The Disciples of Christ should be the last to throttle our educated men. Education can proceed only in the atmosphere of liberty. Light and liberty must go together. The Disciples of today should guard jealously the freedom won at so great pains by our fathers. But greater than light or liberty is love. Standing upon its lofty height the differences of opinion and creed fade out. A plea was then made on behalf of Bethany College, for which Dr. Moore, as chairman of a committee, is striving to raise an endowment of a half million dollars.

The registration committee reported 301 visitors from out of the city with an estimate of fifty others whose names were not registered. The convention of next year will be in Eureka and will have Rev. J. H. Gilliland, of Bloomington, as president.

The President's Address.

The largest attendance at the convention sessions was on Wednesday at noon, when President H. L. Willett delivered the annual address. The occasion was vibrant with interest. The Chicago newspapers had for two days been stirring up expectancy by sensational predictions that Professor Willett might be deposed from the presiding office or "censured" in a resolution on account of his recent utterances on miracles. It was known that an influential teacher in one of our colleges had urged his deposition in a recent issue of one of the brotherhood's newspapers. This teacher was present at the convention and holding informal conferences with many brethren. Moreover, a formal conference on Professor Willett of perhaps a score of delegates was held on Tuesday in the Palmer House, upon which the professor himself descended accidentally in his search for the meeting place of the state board. The report of this conference got into the newspapers and served to further whet the appetite of the people. So when the vice-president, Rev. Edgar D. Jones, of Bloomington, presented Dr. Willett, he was confronted with a full house of eager listeners, friends and critics. No word went unheeded. Not propositions only, but prepositions were analyzed. Professor Willett spoke without manuscript, but his composition was as clean and adequate as if it had been written down. Our readers will be given the substance of this address in the next issue and can read it for themselves. When the convention adjourned for luncheon it was with a verdict as of one man that a great prophetic word had been spoken. To a Disciple audience every proposition seemed self-evident. Every paragraph anchored itself in the historical position taken by the fathers of this reformation. Two things only for which we wish to commend Dr. Willett: First, that there was no sign of personal passion in any part of his address. The circumstances were stimulating enough to have caused a weaker man, a man less sure of his ground and uncertain of himself, to vent his personal feelings upon his critics. The poise and calmness of the speaker made it clear to every discerning heart that his mind had risen above the mere circumstance that he personally was involved and that his interest was only in the disclosure of the truth.

A second point for which we are grateful is that the question of miracles was not mentioned. A point of view of the Old Testament was re-affirmed which would suggest a ground of defense for the position the speaker had previously taken on the Old Testament miracles, but the subject of miracles was not dignified as of equal rank with the burning questions discussed in the address. So while we enjoyed the address for what it contained, we also enjoyed it the more that it did not contain these two points.

From the moment the president's address was completed a new temper came upon the convention. Men became frank with one another. The whispering suspicions that had been passing about were changed into good natured open conversation in the corridors and at restaurants. The work of the convention proceeded without fear of embarrassment by a theological issue and its spirit was happy and harmonious. No matter on what side of the academic question of miracles a man may stand he cannot but feel that the Chicago convention was a wholesome experience for us all. The issue was met best by transcending it and holding what W. T. Moore calls the "promontory of love" from which holy attitude as we look down all our differences fade into the landscape of God's great plan.

The Field Secretary.

Secretary J. Fred Jones had several chances to hear what the brethren of the state thought of him. Mr. Gunn in his address declared that he would like to see a chair of common sense endowed at Eureka College with J. Fred Jones as its occupant for life. For twelve years Mr. Jones has been state secretary. He knows the field and the men thoroughly. He abounds in good humor and wisdom and is above the average in grace.

The Business Men's Banquet.

The Christian Business Men's Association of Chicago provided one of the most enjoyable features of the convention. The banquet under their auspices on Tuesday evening brought together nearly 200 men at the Auditorium hotel. The following menu was served:

Caviar on Toast
Cream of Peas, St Germain
Relishes
Whitefish, a la Creole
Parisienne Potatoes
Tenderloin of Beef, au Madere
Spinach, au Croutons
Pineapple Sherbet
Chicken Salade
Biscuit Tortoni
Cakes Cheese Coffee

After dinner Mr. E. M. Bowman, president of the association, and toastmaster of the evening started a set of speeches going that will never be forgotten by any man present. The great notes of service and coöperation were struck. The petty differences of creed and theory fell away in the presence of the mighty work to be done. It was a wholesome hour. Professor Graham Taylor of Chicago Commons, a man's man, spoke first. His subject was the "Church and the City." It was a superb setting forth of the situation. He found the sanctions for the church in the necessities of the concrete life of society. Life and religion are one. Many of the functions of the church have been taken over by the city or the state and are now supported by taxation. Education and charities are conspicuous cases in point. If education was a religious function when the church supported it, it is no less religious when the state supports it. So with the organized charities of today. The church is responsible not only to save a few from the wreck of society but to save the wreck. Politics is the housekeeping of the whole community and is a sacred function. It will not always be consistent to have a community of Christians without a Christian community. A man must be better than good nowadays, he must be efficient. The address was rugged in manner and thought. It dealt with facts of immediate and convincing importance. The premises were self-evident. To the discerning mind the point of view held by Professor Taylor suggested a basis for a union of Christian people of all sects which would be not creedal but practical, finding its norm not in any external authority but in the sense of civic and social oneness.

Secretary J. Fred Jones, of Bloomington, and Rev. Steven E. Fisher, of Champaign, followed Mr. Taylor, taking their cues from him and carrying the spirit of his address, the one into our state work and the other into the men's Sunday-school class movement. Following them Mr. John W. Thomas, of Chicago, spoke on behalf of the Business Men's Association, setting forth its aims and plan of procedure. Mr. Bowman as toastmaster kept things going in the finest of humor with his introductions, comments and good stories.

C. W. B. M. Sessions.

Beginning on Monday evening the Christian Woman's Board of Missions held their annual convention. The address was made by Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, national vice-president. Following her address a memorial service for their "promoted leader," Mrs. Helen E. Moses, was held. In this memorial service Miss Lura V. Thompson, Rev. F. W. Emerson and Mrs. Atwater participated, each paying a tribute to the great spirit and fruitful life of Mrs. Moses.

The Tuesday sessions were full of practical interest, including reports of state officers and papers on various subjects. Prominent among the addresses was that of Miss Anna L. Barbre, of Taylorville, who spoke on "Young Ladies' Mission Circles." Miss Barbre is county superintendent of Christian county.

While the men were enjoying their banquet at the Auditorium hotel on Tuesday evening, the women were holding a "Workers' Conference," led by Miss Lura V. Thompson, state secretary. Here were revealed the methods by which this woman's organization maintains its unity and enlists thousands of recruits and a quarter million of dollars every year for the Lord's work. If some plan for organizing men as these women are organized could be put into effect the millenium would speedily dawn. C. C. M.

Selfishness in Sorrow.

Do everything you can to help brighten and beautify the lives of other people. Sorrowing people are as a rule intensely selfish. They consider their own grief the most important thing in the universe, and go about recklessly casting shadows on their lives. Avoid this. Remember that your sorrow is the most sacred of all in life's vast list of woes. A thousand people whom you meet in the daily walks of earth have heavier griefs to bear. A living trouble is far more than a dead one. You at least have a sweet memory to carry through life. Many others have had even memory blighted, and instead of being allowed to weep over the grave, they are obliged to gaze daily at the corpse of happiness to which they are chained.—Selected.

Master Workman.

The real New Year's day for the church comes in September, not in January. The sense of a fresh start in all the work of the church comes with the passing of the hot weather, the return of the members from their vacations and the settling down of life to a more regular schedule of activities. The pastor, too, comes from his vacation with a new sense of power. The little vexations of the year have quite faded out and the feeling of victory is in his heart.

Reviewing the past year not many of us have the sense of thoroughness in what we undertook to do for Christ. Most of us are humbled with the fact that we have not worked up to our ability and our light. Yet perchance there are those whose hands are clean, who, reviewing their past year, have an honest sense of integrity, who can say with their Master, "I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do." This is as it should be. We have no right to assume that such wholeness of mind is impossible. Nor should we compel ourselves or others to grovel morbidly in the dust of self-humiliation when the facts do not demand it. All souls who are actually succeeding in the work of Christ are objects of our congratulation and inspire us to do better work ourselves.

But with most of us who work in the church there is the sense of at least partial failure. The knowledge that our past year is unfinished, that its arrears follow us into the present moment. Our failures are ever with us. They may be explained variously. Perhaps we have not worked for Christ because we did not conceive clearly a task for ourselves that was worthy to call out the best that is in us. Perhaps the work we did was mechanically done, not for love of souls nor of God, but for pride or love of the institution. But with most of us our sense of partial failure in the Lord's work is accompanied with the haunting sense of an unsurrendered will. The second best things of life have distracted our wills from the doing of the first best. We never fully got our hearts' consent to do just "this one thing." Our interests were divided between God and mammon. Consequently our work was unfruitful and now as we review it it causes us shame.

Before beginning a new year it is well for us to face our failures and with humility of heart to bring them all into the presence of Christ our Master Workman. He came to do the will of God and declared with no self-deception at the close of his life, "I have finished the work thou gavest me to do." It will do us good to observe him at his work and learn of him.

First of all, we are impressed with the busy-ness of his life. No critic of Jesus has ever called him an idler. There are the signs of strenuousness and vigor upon every page of his biography. At the early age of twelve he assured his mother that he must be "about his Father's business." Leaving the carpenter shop where he labored with his hands he passed into his public ministry. Here we find him engaged all the time. Crowds surrounded him. They pressed at the door of the house where he was preaching. They came early in the morning with their sick to be healed. Intending to evade the multitude for a day that he might rest and talk quietly with his disciples, the crowd followed him around the lake into the desert place. Only at night had he leisure to pray. Likely he was aged prematurely by his strenuous toiling, for some guessed him to be fifty years old when he was but thirty-two. No loitering, leisurely ministry here. His task was serious. The time was short. The will of God drove him on.

But we cannot fail to observe the calm orderliness of Christ at his work. Each day seemed complete. He betrays no distractions due to unfinished tasks. With an equipoise that marks him as one of the sanest men he moves easily among his duties and keeps his work before him. There are no arrears from day to day. Sleep came to him easily, as when he lay in the boat and slept through the tempest. He did not worry. His heart was clear. His will was lost in the Father's will. As Christian workers we have no more important lesson to learn from our Master than this. Our church temper is anxious. The outsider is impressed with our uneasiness. We are fearful concerning financial support, concerning numerical attendance, concerning the enlistment of more workers. It is thus that we lose in power. Real strength is in repose. But we cannot find repose in our work except as we find it in a clear conscience, a consciousness that what is given us to do has been done with scruple and earnestness. After that the outcome rests with God and then our hearts may be calm.

Just here, therefore, is the third characteristic of the Model Workman—that he moved ever in the sense of the companionship and partnership of God. The clear perception of this fact brought the values of his work home to his soul. Otherwise his work must have seemed an utter failure. No man, speaking from a purely human point of view, ever failed more abjectly than Jesus. With the fires of Kingship and of popular leadership burning in his bones he found himself engaged upon humble and insignificant tasks. His friends were common, simple men. They whose fingers touched the button of power either were against him or ignored him. He was hunted like a wild deer and his life at last was taken in ignominy. Where is there in history such a life failure as this? How natural that the two disciples on the Emmaus road, contemplating the passing of this man from his work should betray their utter disappointment with the sigh, "We thought it had been he that should redeem Isreael."

But within the soul of Jesus there was a sense of something that his disciples had not yet learned to reckon on. That was God. Under the apparent failure of the work of Jesus lay the working of God. And God could not fail. Yea, what God had been waiting for for centuries was not some great man who should succeed, but some faithful man who should fail for the sake of the truth. God's purpose did not require that his servant should be great or picturesque, but only that he should faithfully do the plain will of the Father till the end of the day. Such a life failure God could use. From such a seed, dying, God could bring a vast harvest of souls. Now, it is immensely important for us as workers for God to see just this truth. We are really workers with God. The victory, the success, is not ours, but his. We may seem so unworthy. Our work may seem to count for so little. We spend our lives in a humble corner. But God is here. His power is underneath our puny efforts. His success is underneath our failure.

This new year let us watch the Master closely. Like him let us work hard, and let us work calmly. And like Him let us count God in, so that our hearts may have the assurance of the dignity of the humble thing we do and the prophecy of their ultimate success.

To Evangelical Christians In All Lands.

Greeting: The World's Sunday-school Association assembled in the City of Rome recommended that the third Sunday in October of each year be observed by Evangelical churches everywhere as a day of prayer for Sunday-schools throughout the world, and the Executive Committee was charged with the duty of publishing this recommendation.

You are, therefore, invited to observe Sunday, October 18, 1908, by engaging in public and private prayer to Almighty God for a special blessing upon Sunday-schools in all lands. Every child of God, young or old, learned or otherwise, may constitute a link in this chain of prayer which is intended to encircle the globe, strengthening the tie which unites in a common bond of service, deepening our affection for each other, and increasing our zeal in an effort to secure the universal study of the Word, which is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

In order that this recommendation may have the widest publicity possible, we earnestly invite the coöperation of the religious and secular press, ministers of the Gospel and Sunday-school superintendents, and all others who are interested in the work of the Sunday-school. "And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive."

By direction of the Executive Committee of the World's Sunday-school Association.

The Power of Smiles.

If people will only notice, they will be amazed to find how much a really enjoyable evening owes to smiles. But few consider what an important symbol of fine intellect and fine feeling they are. Yet all smiles, after childhood, are things of education. Savages do not smile; coarse, brutal, cruel men may laugh, but they seldom smile. The affluence, the benediction, the radiance, which—is the smile of a full appreciative heart.

The face that grows finer as it listens, and then breaks into sunshine instead of words, has a subtle, charming influence, universally felt, though very seldom understood or acknowledged. Personal and sarcastic remarks show not only a bad heart and a bad head, but bad taste also. Now, society may tolerate a bad heart and a bad head, but it will not endure bad taste; and it is in just such points as this that the conventional laws which they have made represent and enforce real obligations.—Mrs. Burr.

Christian Union

Errett Gates.

THE NEED OF UNIFICATION IN OUR OWN RANKS.

Wm. Oeschger.

There is no department in the CHRISTIAN CENTURY that the writer of this article enjoys more than the one that is devoted to the problem of Christian Union. Brother Gates has our sincere thanks for conducting such a department in the CENTURY. Such a department will serve as a good clearing house for all that is thought and done on the question of Christian Union. We earnestly trust that it may be a permanent feature of the CENTURY; and may men, both liberal and conservative, be free to use it.

The writer is greatly interested in all that is said and done leading to the union of Baptists and Disciples. His prayer is that the day may soon come when these two great evangelical bodies shall be organically one. The process leading to this union can not be hurried by undue haste, neither should it be delayed by unpardonable negligence and gross indifference. We must pray, work, and wait. God will do the rest through his gracious Holy Spirit. The prayer of Jesus, "That they all may be one," will surely be answered. It is not in the heart of God to refuse His Only Begotten this petition for unity.

As a people we have always felt that we have come to the kingdom for just such a purpose, "To call together into one the scattered forces of Christendom." We were born with an instinct for union. The desire for Christian Union is congenital with us. It is one of our birth marks. Our entire history is marked with intense loyalty to the New Testament ideal of unity. The Disciples have faithfully preached, that unity and not division is the normal state of the New Testament Church. We have been so engrossed with the New Testament ideal of unity, that it has always been made a cardinal feature in our preaching. While there may be differences among us as to questions of practical administration, but upon the scripturalness and necessity of unity we have always been at one. We have never ceased to preach the sinfulness of division and the beauty of unity.

In the past our message has been chiefly directed towards those that are without. Our vision has been extroitive rather than introspective. We have been looking outwardly and not inwardly for our field of activity for Christian Union. Today, however, we are confronted with a situation that calls for serious introspective reflection. For while we have been preaching to others the call for union, we ourselves are in danger of making shipwreck on the shoals of internal division and dissension. No one that has eyes to see and ears to hear, can doubt for a single moment that there are well defined cleavages of thought among the Disciples of Christ. These cleavages are being pressed so far that we are being rent into parties and factions, so much so that it is seriously retarding the growth of the kingdom of God among us. Nashville, with its David Lipscomb, is out of harmony with the McGarvey-Lord thought that emanates from Lexington and Cincinnati; and it is needless to say that there is great discord between Lexington, Cincinnati and Chicago with its Dr. Willett. Nashville, Lexington and Chicago stand for three distinct poles of thought in our brotherhood. Each center, or pole, stands for certain things that are peculiar to each one individually. Each center holds things that are severely condemned by the others. In the case of Nashville this emphasis has been so heavily placed upon the individual peculiarity that it has led to actual division. Yet, while this is true, viz., that each one of these three centers of thought stands for things that are severely condemned by the other two, they all three, nevertheless, stand for Christian union. That center, Chicago, which in the eyes of many seems farthest removed from the historical position of the Disciples of Christ, is nevertheless, the most aggressive in its efforts for Christian Union. True, the platform upon which this wing of the church seeks the union of Christendom may not meet with the approval of the other two centers of thought, Nashville and Lexington, it nevertheless continues to be true to the birth instinct of the Disciples of Christ, the union of Christendom. It is a primordial instinct with us. We have the Christian Union habit, whether we are orthodox or not.

In our zeal to bring about the union of the scattered forces of Christendom we have failed to a large extent to cultivate the spirit of unity in our own ranks. We have neglected ourselves, in failing to give thought, time, and attention to our own internal need for unity. The time has come when we can no longer neglect ourselves in this matter. The hour has arrived when the most imperative duty that confronts us is, that we shall direct our attention upon ourselves if we expect to maintain the unity of the spirit in our own brotherhood. There are lines and cleavages of thought among us that are serious. In many cities we are represented by two churches, one that stands for the thought that radiates from Nashville, the other for that which Lexington radiates. Then we have churches and preachers that stand for Lexington as against Chicago. This last cleavage is one that has been growing more marked every year. The first cleavage culminated in actual division, separation. The difference between Lexington and Chicago, as witnessed to in our religious journalism, has issued in bitter internal controversy. How long this bitter internal dissension will continue until it will issue in outward division, God only knows. But it certainly will come, if it is not wisely dealt with.

To the writer of this article it does not seem that there is to be any great benefit to come to us as a people or to the kingdom of God at large from the attempt to incorporate into our own religious communion other churches, when we can scarcely maintain the bond and spirit of unity among ourselves even as we are now. What would the condition be if we should enlarge our numbers by sudden incorporation or hasty amalgamation? We are growing fast enough. There is a growth that is abnormal. To increase more rapidly than we are, I fear, would only accelerate the spirit of division. What gain will there be to the kingdom of God, if we do succeed in bringing about the amalgamation of a few Christian and Baptist churches? But, if in so doing, we add to the task of maintaining union and unity in our own ranks, the loss would be far greater than the gain. Of vastly greater importance is the unification of our own forces than that of seeking the amalgamation of Christian and Baptist churches. If Nashville, Lexington, and Chicago, could see things more alike, and work together as they should, in the bond of true unity and peace, the kingdom of God among us would go forward in leaps and bounds. The results of such unity and peace when compared with the results that would come from the amalgamation of a few Christian and Baptist churches, would be like the comparison that exists between a mountain and a mole-hill.

If we can not maintain the spirit of unity and oneness in our own ranks, it will all be an empty dream to attempt to grow and enlarge by the incorporation of whole churches. The time has come when we must court each other in our own ranks. The time is here when we must love our prejudices to death, and by the grace of God bury our differences. We must make an earnest prayerful effort to unite our own people in the bond of love and peace. When Jesus prayed, "That they all may be one," he meant that Nashville, Lexington, and Chicago, should also "be one." His prayer admits of no exceptions.

Unity in our own ranks is of infinitely greater importance to the cause of Christ than the union of a few Christian and Baptist Churches. For, if we fail in the former—unity within—the latter—the union of Baptist and Christian churches—will be a mere rainbow chase. We must turn our thought towards our own brotherhood. We must solve the question of unity within. This is the paramount problem that confronts us today. If we can solve this problem we can solve all others. If we fail in this, great will be our failure. For, failing in this, we fail in our birth instinct, the purpose for which we were born into the kingdom.

The writer desires that nothing that has been said in this article shall be construed or understood as being opposed to the union of the Disciples and Baptists wherever that is possible. We should do all that we can to bring about such a union. But for the unity within our own ranks we must labor or fail in our great historic mission. We must work for the former, but the latter, unity within, we dare not neglect. To neglect it, is to commit religious suicide.

Our next article will be on "A Church Irenic." In it we shall attempt to point out a course of procedure needed to bring about a greater measure of unity in our brotherhood.

Editorial Comment.

The foregoing words deserve the earnest and prayerful consideration of every Disciple. Must the Disciples of Christ, who came for the very purpose of uniting the dismembered body of Christ, confess to their confusion that they have been unable to preserve unity among themselves? Shall they who came to heal division be reproached with the admonition—"physician, heal thyself"? Must they who have for a hundred years proclaimed the sinfulness of strife and division be charged with failure to practice what they preach? Have the Disciples been advertising a remedy that does not cure (even themselves) and preaching a plan for the union of the followers of Christ that does not work?

These are serious questions, but they must be frankly faced. It behooves the Disciples to illustrate among themselves the efficiency of the doctrine they preach. Those who stir up hatred and strife among brethren over differences of opinion shoulder a heavy responsibility. Who are responsible, those who make their doctrinal opinions tests of fellowship, and rule out all who do not agree with them, or those who ask toleration for doctrinal differences and stand fast in the liberty wherewith the fathers made them free?

It seems that others have noted the cleavage of opinion among the Disciples. The editor of the Baptist World of Louisville, Ky., makes the following statement in the issue of Aug. 8: "The disciples left the Baptists. When it so happens that the Disciples no longer differ from the Baptists, let the Disciples come home. They will be given a warm welcome. We do not believe that all the Disciples are Baptists in principle. Many still hold to baptismal remission and reject the work of the Holy Spirit. In our judgment the Disciples should divide. The really Baptist wing will lose nothing by coming back to the Baptists as most of the Cumberland Presbyterians came back to the Presbyterians."

Is this the way others see us? Are the differences between Lexington and Chicago sufficient to warrant division? As far as Chicago is concerned she says, No. She does not advise division for doctrinal differences, the rending of the body of Christ is too serious a matter. She does not believe that uniformity of opinion is essential to unity of fellowship. It was to provide for differences of opinion among Christians, and make unity consistent with variety and diversity that the fathers attached themselves to the motto: "Unity in essentials; liberty in non-essentials; charity in all things." Chicago abides by this venerable principle.

Chicago does not think that the present danger lies in differences of opinion, but in the spirit with which differences are treated. There is such a thing as heresy of faith; but there is also heresy of spirit in the treatment of heresy of faith. If a man say, I love God, and hates his brother, and treats him as an alien because of error in belief, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he has seen, cannot love God whom he has not seen.

A Story of the Coal Breakers and the Cotton Mills.

CHAPTER XII.

The Story of a Bill.

When Jean and Uncle Jasper reached Harrisburg on their way back from Pittsburgh, Mr. Hathaway and Doctor Jones boarded the parlor car.

"Why, hello Jean! This is certainly good luck. Where do you hail from?" and Mr. Hathaway grasped Jean's hand cordially and greetings were exchanged all around.

"We had some business in Pittsburgh and are just going home."

"Do you stop off at Minington?" asked Doctor Jones.

"No, I will not have time. I was down there for a day and they told me you were both in Harrisburg."

"Fool's errand! fool's errand!" said Doctor Jones. "I guess we might as well have saved our car fare."

"I see by the morning paper that your bill was defeated," said Uncle Jasper.

"Defeated! Yes, killed dead! It never had a ghost of a chance. The whole lobby were dead against us from the very beginning. Yes, we can even go back farther than that. The mill owners and operators had representatives at the primaries to see that only their tools were nominated; then they had two of the best lawyers in the state employed to direct the fight. We tried our best to get the bill introduced early in January, but even then it was too late. A legislature cares nothing for public opinion after election is over. From that moment, politics, to the majority, is a game of deals, and if the deals are human souls, so much the worse for the souls. Every device that ingenuity could plan or money buy, from argument to direct bribery was used against us. I think many of the legislators considered the bill of considerable importance and would have liked to see it pass, but they never had a chance to show it for it never got before them at all," and Doctor Jones jumped up and began pacing the aisle of the car.

"Where was it killed?" asked Jean.

"In the committee," said Mr. Hathaway. "We had the best legal counsel in the state draft the bill, and it was approved by the state federation of women's clubs, the National Consumers' League, and the New Century and Civic Clubs, of Philadelphia. There were representatives from each of them present, and they put forth every effort in their power, but failed utterly even to get a hearing before the committee. And the worst of it is that these abject slaves of political expediency and the dollar are our representatives. It is enough to make one hide his head in shame for his state."

"Representative McElwain says they will try hard to get the bill raising the age limit of the breaker boys to fourteen years reported out before the legislature adjourns," said Doctor Jones. "There is one chance in a hundred that it may pass; but they utterly refuse to do anything for the protection of the little girls. They must stand at their work at those body and soul destroying night shifts, and worse than all is the fact that they are unprotected from moral dangers shocking almost beyond conception.

"The citizens of the state bow to the wishes of the manufacturers. Why? Because to protect the girls would necessitate some remodeling of machinery, and maybe a little smaller dividends by the company, and the flesh and blood and honor of the girls are cheaper commodities than iron and steel. We have lost again, but they'll find they can't get rid of us so easily. I am more ready to fight than ever before."

"It is my firm belief," said Mr. Hathaway, "that the agitation will never slacken until this iniquity has been swept from every state. But child labor has taken such deep root in our country, that the victory can only be won by keeping it continually before the people as a public and not merely a labor question."

"I believe you passed the compulsory education law in 1901," said Jean.

"Say," said the old doctor stopping abruptly before Jean, "that compulsory education law that was passed two years ago, always makes me think of one of Aesop's fables I read when I was a boy; it was something like this: 'A mountain was heard to give forth dreadful groans, and the people said it was in labor, so they gathered about to see what it would produce. After waiting until they were very tired, out crept a mouse.' It is one of the most harmless and inoffensive laws our state ever passed. It won't hurt the operators a bit, neither will it hinder a single child from going into the mills or breakers whenever its parents see fit to place it there. But it will hinder us from getting a real compulsory education law passed."

"Yes," said Mr. Hathaway, "the bill was so changed before it reached the House that its own father would not have recognized it. The doctor's illustration is good; but, alas, the groaning and moaning of our little white slaves does not even bring forth as much as a mouse in their defense.

"Let me give you some interesting figures; we have in Pennsylvania over 70,000 children that go to work every day or every night. From the years 1880 to 1890, the number of children employed in this country increased 106.5 per cent, from 1890 to 1900, it increased 270.7 per cent, until now the number of children who work for wages reaches nearly 2,000,000, and according to the report of 1901, at least a third of them are under fourteen years of age."

"I tell you, gentlemen, it is almost past believing that such conditions exist in our country, and I think the laws are even more lax in New Jersey than in Pennsylvania, and we are finding it just as hard to get better ones," said Uncle Jasper. "I wish we could get such legislation on child labor as Massachusetts or New York have. They stand ahead of other states in that respect; but the Michigan laws are nearly as good, and I think that state is a little ahead in the matter of enforcement."

"Yes, I think that is true," said Doctor Jones. "A while back I was in Chicago, and just to satisfy my curiosity I went up into Michigan where they said some silk factories were run without child labor. I found three big factories and not a child in one of them. The work was done by young ladies, and they were healthy and happy in appearance. I don't think there was one under sixteen years old, and most of them looked twenty. The operators have built splendid houses for them, with pleasant surroundings and sanitary in every respect. They pay at the rate of two dollars and a half a week for their board and rooms, and work ten hours and fifty minutes every day except Saturday when they only work till noon; and the mills don't run at night. That sounds like fiction, gentlemen, but it is a fact, and I considered it well worth all the trip cost to see that a textile mill can be run at a profit without child labor. The employes receive good wages and the operators are making money.

"Compare that, will you, with the conditions in our own state? I was up at Scranton last December and heard the testimony of those little mill girls before the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, and I tell you it was a revelation to some of the people of our country."

"I have always wanted to hear about that from some one who was there. I read a good deal about it in the papers at the time," said Uncle Jasper.

"Well, there they sat, those little slender girls, with faces careworn and pinched, and their big eyes looking around in wonder and astonishment that so many people should be interested in them.

"I attended a good many sessions of the strike commission, but never one at which there was such intense and breathless interest as this. Why, when little Annie Denks told the story of her life in the mills, every one of the seven commissioners rose to his feet and pressed closer to the little witness; the crowded court room became as still as death, and the plaintive voice was heard in every part of the room. The child told in a simple, frank way that she was but thirteen years old, and worked from half past six in the evening until half past six in the morning, that she stood at her work all the time, and that her parents were living and owned their home. She said that in the mill where she worked there were one hundred little girls employed on the day, and a hundred and fourteen on the night shift. Mr. Darrow asked the child if she would rather go to school. She answered, 'I have to work and if I do not work in the mill I would have to live out.'

"'Would you rather work in the mill or live out?' asked Mr. Darrow.

"'Oh, sir, I would rather live out,' the child answered.

"By this time some of the commissioners were at white heat and demanded to know what the law was in this state about children working in textile mills. They were told that the age limit was thirteen years.

"'What is the law about children working at night?' asked Judge Gray, and no one could answer the question. Think of that: The people concern themselves so little about this crime of child labor that they neither know nor care whether there is a law regulating it or not.

"Several other children were called to the witness stand and told their stories, but all to the same purpose—the pitiful story of hard work, long hours, small pay and under age.

"There was one child in particular that interested me a good deal. She was a little Polish girl by the name of Helen Richsichak. She could not speak a word of English and her testimony was interpreted by another little girl named Mary Oliskie, who was a bright child and interpreted in a very pleasing manner. She, too, worked in the mills.

"Little Helen said she was twelve years old and had been at work for a year, and worked twelve hours a day at three cents an hour; that her father was a miner and working, and that they owned their home. At this Judge Gray let out a short whistle of surprise and said, 'I'd like to see the father.' It was also shown that the girl possessed a certificate showing that she was thirteen, and this was obtained through the father swearing that she was that age. Judge Gray said that the operator and father were responsible for this, and that the mills evidently came to the mining towns because they can secure this cheap labor.

"One breaker boy of fourteen said his little brother ten years old worked in the breaker with him. He said that his father was dead, and when asked how he secured the certificate for his brother, said that he made it out, swearing that his brother was fourteen years old.

"Oh, I tell you they begin young to follow the examples set by their elders in perjury and crime."

"Where did the commission place the blame?" asked Jean.

"Judge Gray severely censured the fathers of the girls, and said there must be many cases where the fathers coin the flesh and blood of their children into money to increase their incomes.

"Mr. Darrow asked, 'How about the employer?' and the judge answered that he was to blame for doing what the law does not allow.

"At the beginning of the morning session, next day, the chairman said the commission was anxious that the lesson of yesterday, drawn from the testimony of those little girls, should be impressed upon this community and upon the citizens of this commonwealth. He said that, of course, they did not want to intrude or criticise the execution of the laws in a commonwealth of which they were not citizens, but that they believed that the good people of this state would take it to heart and see that the laws which were evidently framed to meet such cases were executed."

"I'm afraid the gentlemen of the commission will not have as much faith in the 'good people of this state' after this session of the legislature," said Mr. Hathaway.

"Well, here we are at Minington," said Doctor Jones as the train slowed up.

CHAPTER XIII.

A Twofold Crime.

The morning sun was sending its bright rays into Lottie's school room, which was tidy and neat with its long, low tables and rows of little red chairs. A small boy was watering a scarlet geranium which stood on the window ledge.

"Amil, you love the flowers, don't you?" asked Lottie, as she wheeled her chair a little nearer the window. In answer Amil pressed one of the bright blossoms against his cheek and smiled up into her face. She had grown very fond of the little Italian boy; he was nine, but very small for his age, yet she knew that before long he would be forced to go into the breaker, and that he was now receiving all the education he would ever have a chance to get. Calling him to her, she brushed back the abundant hair from his forehead and kissed the brown face, and as she took the slender hand in her own, thought how soon it would be bruised and spoiled in the breaker.

His face and hands were scrubbed so clean they were shining. This was one of the things Lottie had been able to do for these children of the poor of which she was proudest. Not one of them would appear in the school room with soiled hands and face. But not so with their clothes. The busy Italian, Irish and Slav mothers, not over tidy by nature, found no time to keep their children clean. Lottie and Evelyn had put their heads together to think of some way of making these children presentable, or even tolerable in the kindergarten, and it had resulted in what Lottie called the "kindergarten uniform," which consisted of a kind of bishop gown made of denim; blue for the girls and brown for the boys. These the children slipped over their clothes the first thing on entering the school room, and left them when they went home. Mrs. Kirklin kept them clean for Lottie.

"This is not exactly the way to keep clean," Lottie would laughingly say, "but the children certainly do look better with the dirt covered up."

A commotion in front of the house startled Lottie, and Amil's quick hands rolled her chair near to the open door. A little girl, crying bitterly, came running in.

"Oh Teake! Oh Teake, Teake! O-o-o-o!" and a small Polish girl about eight or nine years old threw herself across Lottie's lap.

"Why Polly! What is the matter?" and Lottie tried to lift the child's head who only clung to her more desperately and sobbed the harder.

"Polly, you must tell me what the matter is so I can help you. Has any one hurt you?"

"No-o, I ain't hurted. My mutter says I must by the fact'ry go."

Polly's sobs got the better of her again and down went her head in Lottie's lap while her hands clutched the wheels of the chair.

The other children were crowding around eager to know what the excitement was.

"What can you mean, Polly?"

Lottie had her misgivings. So often when one of her pupils had come up missing, she had found out they had been sent to work in the factory or breaker. Polly's sobbing somewhat abated under Lottie's gentle sympathy.

"Karl he got sick by the breaker mit a cough and rumatis. My fater he got so mad and swear big, an' he say I must go by the fact'ry."

"Polly, I can't think your parents intend to take you out of school and put you to work in the factory. Why, you are scarcely ten years old. Now run and wash your face, it is time to call school."

Polly withdrew reluctantly. The children filed in, donned their uniforms, and soon the red chairs were filled. But they had scarcely become quiet, when heavy steps were heard on the walk and a barefooted woman wearing a short petticoat and loose sacque, with a small blanket tied around her head, appeared in the door, panting for breath and her eyes flashing with anger. She glanced wrathfully around the room until she saw Polly.

"Ach, Polly Svelderski! Vat you mean goin' by the school today?" and the irate mother made a stride towards the child. Polly, with a cry, sprang towards Lottie and threw her arms around her neck. This move rather disconcerted the woman for a moment. Lottie taking advantage of this, asked Amil to give the lady a chair.

"Ich will kein Stuhl! Ich will mein Polly! Wir sind arm und she go by the fact'ry zur arbeit."

Mrs. Svelderski was getting her English and Polish very much mixed in her excitement, and stood before Lottie shaking her fist as though she, poor little, crippled teacher, was to blame. Perhaps she was to blame for making the little school so attractive to those mind starved children.

"But, Mrs. Svelderski, Polly is not old enough to work in the factory," interrupted Lottie.

"Ja! my man Nick say she be by tirteen. He go by the officer and swear already and get paper to say Polly kan arbeiten. My Karl he has great sickness mit rumatic fever. He get no more check by store. Polly get check. Nick, be drink much and so fierce

The Sunday-School Lesson.

Herbert L. Willett.

*The Reign of Saul.

The lessons of the past quarter are occupied with the life and reign of King Saul. Yet he is by no means the chief character. Beside him stand two others, either of whom claims far more of the reader's attention and regard than does the son of Kish. Samuel is the first of these. For many years he had been the shepherd of Israel, leading them up from ignorance to knowledge, from separation to unity, from indifference to interest. The proof of the great work he had done for them was shown in their request for a king. Whether Samuel regarded the voice of the people as the voice of God in this matter, or resented the request as a reflection upon his own work, we cannot decide. Both views are taken by the various sources as they are combined in our narratives. But at any rate Samuel may well have considered the bare request itself as the proof that the unifying work he had been carrying forward had accomplished its results, and the times were ripe for another sort of rule.

King Saul.

Saul, the one chosen, was an admirable man in most regards. He was of good family, well built in frame and tall of stature, and as time proved, a brave warrior to place at the head of Israel's armies. If we knew nothing of Saul personally and still knew what we do of Jonathan we must still conclude that there was good blood in that family. Of Saul's other children we know little, and that can hardly be called favorable, if the portrait of the weak Ishbosheth and the weaker Mephibosheth, the grandchild, are veritable.

Saul's Defects.

Saul's fundamental weakness was his family pride and his dislike of the prophets. Even for Samuel, whom he revered, he felt a sense of patronage and superiority which little comported with the relations between the two men. If he could have given himself up to the advice and direction of the prophet as David did, at least in the first years of his reign, the story might have been told differently. We must also recall the fact that it is the friends of David who tell the story for the most part, and perhaps full justice has not been done to the first king of Israel. We catch glimpses of the man which make us respect and admire him at the same time that we are repelled by other traits which seem inconsistent with a great character. Yet his faults were the marks of his age, when all men were rough and brutal and mercy was not to be found in the breasts of soldiers. His courage was unquestioned, and his devotion to Israel, even when all hope of success was gone, was beautiful.

Saul and the Prophets.

His real trouble was his inability to comprehend the problem of Israel's life from the standpoint of the prophets. "Is Saul also among the prophets?" expressed the astonishment of the onlookers when they saw the proud Benjaminite youth practicing the ecstatic exercises of the sons of the prophets. This admirably reveals the popular sense of awareness concerning this distance between the two points of view. Saul never comprehended the real greatness of Samuel and the work he was doing. He could not sympathize with the prophet's liking for the rough men of the prophetic groups, in whom he saw only unkempt and ignorant figures where Samuel saw the making of the religious teachers of the nation. The result was that the king was not prepared to estimate at its real worth the authority of the man of God, and thought that his commands could be obeyed or disregarded at will. The tragic outcome of his life is the commentary upon this view.

"The Man After God's Heart."

The other figure whom the lessons reveal is David. To be sure we only see as yet the beginnings of his career. But enough is made plain to indicate the presence of one who must be reckoned with in all the history of his period. David was a man after God's own heart, not in the sense of moral perfection, but because in an age when so little was known of the divine will, and men were living upon the low plain of savagery, this man had some true conception of the will of God, and made it the program of his life to promote religion as he understood it. This did not prevent him from making sad mistakes, but it gave direction and purpose to his life such as appear in none of his contemporaries. To have made the acquaintance of three such men in the quarter is to have gained new and valuable materials for the study of religion, and for a knowledge of the long road which had to be traversed before the full disclosure of the divine nature and will could be made in Jesus Christ our Lord.

Evils Which Must Be Driven Out of Our Country. Topic, Sept. 23. Num. 33: 50-56.

It is the fashion with certain writers to quote a direful prophecy of Macaulay whenever they wish to frighten American citizens out of their indifference to tendencies which threaten the integrity of free institutions. It may be wholesome for us to be reminded occasionally of the abyss into which Macaulay saw us plunging. "I seriously apprehend you will, in some such season of adversity as I have described, do things that will prevent prosperity from returning; that you will act like people who should, in a season of scarcity, devour all the seed-corn, and thus make next year not one of scarcity, but of absolute famine. There will be, I fear spoilation. The spoilation will increase the distress. The distress will produce fresh spoilation. There is nothing to stop you. Your constitution is all sail and no anchor. As I said before, when a society has entered upon its downward course, either civilization or liberty must perish. Either some Caesar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand, or your republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the twentieth century as the Roman Empire was in the fifth."

The recent mob at Springfield bids us moderate our wrath against Macaulay for predicting the downfall of the republic. If we are going to prove that he was a false prophet, we must be terribly in earnest in our opposition to the spirit of lawlessness. Boastful proclamations about curing the evils of freedom by more freedom are a mockery when the fury of the mob is destroying property and life. One of the evils to be driven out of the country is disregard for law. We must begin with the men chosen to enforce the mandates of city, state and nation. No man who is under obligations to the vicious elements of our population should ever be allowed to entertain the slightest hope of being elected to any office whatever.

There is a suspicion abroad that a rich man can escape punishment for his crime. If Harry Thaw had been a poor man, what would have been his fate? The man without a dollar ought to have as good a chance to get justice as the richest man in the land. Can the widow go to the court, present her wrong, and have her case judged upon its merits? Respect for persons, whether rich or poor, vicious or conventionally good, will undermine respect for the law. Unless the great and powerful are made to obey the law, we shall have either the Caesar or the barbarians of Macaulay's prophecy. The umpire must be fair or he will be trampled in the dust.

The greatest evils of the land arise from a lack of appreciation of the worth of the most insignificant citizen. We must learn to honor men because they are men and not merely because they are fortunately situated or have an agreeable personality. Institutions exist for man and not man for institutions. The saloon destroys human life, therefore its destruction should be decreed at once. A tenement is unfit for habitation. Raze it to the ground. People living in certain parts of a city cannot get enough fresh air. The city must break a way for the air and the sunlight. The children must have a chance to live and be healthy in body and mind. A morally sane community will sweep away every refuge of lies behind which men hide when they rob the weak of their right to live clean, happy lives.

We need faith. We do not believe as we ought that God is on the side of the right. Culture without faith is powerless. It ministers to the pride of exclusiveness and ends in bitter pessimism. Faith in God sends men out to work for justice. It creates moral enthusiasm. It preserves the good in the old and it appropriates the good in the new. The man of faith always has something to do that is worth while. He does not live in daily terror of the deluge; he awaits the coming of the kingdom of God.

Lesson XV. The Apocalypses.

In the latest period of biblical history, that which may be called the Jewish period, from 200 B. C. to the downfall of Jerusalem in 70 A. D., there appeared an order of writings different from any which have been considered in this series of studies. These writings somewhat resemble prophecy, yet are clearly of another character. They are more picturesque but less urgent and authoritative. They depend less on the preaching of the prophetic message for the time than on the interference of God in judgment upon sinful men. Despairing of the present world and age, they look for deliverance from present dangers to a future world or time. In them angels are the most prominent figures, and it is seen that God is thought of as removed to a great distance. In this regard these writings are very unlike the prophets'. Instances of such writings may be seen in portions of Zephaniah, Zechariah and Joel. But the best example is the book of Daniel.

The book of Daniel appears to have been the product of the spirit which led to the Maccabeean uprising in 168-165 B. C. It is an appeal to the faithful in Jerusalem not to abandon their faith in the face of the fierce persecution carried on by Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, against the law-keeping Jews. In the course of this persecution many of the faithful were put to death and others were induced to abandon their religion for that of the persecutor. The book consists of two parts, of six chapters each. In the first is presented a series of incidents illustrating the courage and zeal of Daniel and his three friends as servants of Jehovah during the captivity in Babylon. In the second part, the author, living in the days of the persecution, speaks to his countrymen through the character of the Daniel whom he has been describing. He traces the history of the nations from the time of Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon down through the times of the Medes, the Persians and the Greeks to the wars between Syria and Egypt which are occurring in his own time. In each of the visions which Daniel describes, the point to which attention is directed in the sequel is the appearance of Antiochus, usually described as "the little horn," who is to be destroyed. The book was placed by the Jews, not with the prophets, but with the general writings of the Old Testament. Its date was probably about 165 B. C. and its author unknown.

There are many other apocalypses belonging to this period, such as the Book of Enoch, the Apocalypse of Baruch, the Fourth Book of Ezra, the Assumption of Moses, etc. An apocalypse is a revelation of otherwise unknown mysteries. The purpose of all these books, both those in the canon of the Bible and those outside, was to confirm the faith of the despairing and persecuted saints with the hope of the speedy manifestation of the power of God in such a manner as should destroy the wicked and reward the good. The Book of Revelation in the New Testament is the most conspicuous example of this type of writing in the Christian church.

mad when Karl go not for zur Arbeit. Gott in himmel! sie haben kein recht es hir zu halten!"

The shaking fist came close to Lottie's face.

"Alas!" thought Lottie, "that is the whole story. Nick Svelderski wants his little ten-year-old daughter to work twelve hours a day in the factory so he can have more liquor."

She knew she was powerless to hinder the child from going into the factory, although the father had committed the crime of perjury by swearing that Polly was thirteen. This was no unusual case; they all did it, but how her heart cried out against it! Was not she herself, with her poor crippled back and feeble limbs that would never support her body again, a living, crying protest against child labor?

"Oh Mrs. Svelderski! if you would only keep her out a year or two longer. I am a cripple for life just because I was set to work when I was too young. That is why poor Karl is sick, because he went in the breaker too young. Oh, I wish you would let me have her in school another year."

Lottie was pleading as for her own life.

"Ach! Polly strong, she got no sickness ever. Koum heim!"

At this Mrs. Svelderski pulled the reluctant girl away from Lottie and started for the door.

"Good bye, Polly, I will come to see you."

But Polly's grief was too deep for utterance. Lottie sadly turned to her duties as the two forms vanished through the door.

"Gee, Teake! I sure will yell louder than Polly when mine mutter and pappy take me out mit the kindergarten und put me by the breaker. I will go fierce mad und kick."

This emphatic statement came from little Tim Geibe, and acted very much like a mental bomb, for instantly the room full of children began talking and wildly gesticulating. They had watched the exciting and almost tragic scene with intense interest. Their sympathies were with Polly and they all knew very well that it would be but a short time till they, too, must quit school and go to work. One small boy said, "My folks laugh much when I washes mit the soap and say I soon get black mit the breaker what won't washes off."

Lottie found it difficult to quiet the excited children. Then she told them they would have to obey their parents in this as in all other things, but that some time the good state of Pennsylvania would make laws that would keep the boys and girls from going to the breaker and factory, and make it possible for every one of them to go to school till they were almost grown up.

"Why don't they buy the laws right away, Teake?" asked one bright-faced boy.

"I hope we can get some of these good laws very soon," replied Lottie, but she thought, "Alas, that is just the trouble. There is too much buying of laws now. There is where the crime begins."

Our Mainstay, the Farmer.

Let trusts and corporations burst
  Like bubbles in the air,
And every bull in Wall Street's length
  Be swallowed by a bear,
The land is safe, while rising up
  At cock-crow in the morn
The farmer drives his furrow straight
  And plants his golden corn.

Let banks close up their iron doors,
  And bank officials flee
With all the trusting public's cash
  To lands across the sea,
There's nothing in the world to fear,
  We'll have enough to eat,
While in his broad and fertile fields
  The farmer sows his wheat.

Though railroads should forget to pay
  Their dividends when due,
And men promoting wildcat schemes
  Look very glum and blue,
There is no need to feel alarmed
  (Remember what I say),
Unless the farmer should forget
  To gather in his hay.

With The Workers

Three additions here since last report, all by letter. Lewis R. Hotaling.
Hoopeston, Ill.

Nantic, Ill., August 26, 1908.
Two young men and one young lady made confession of their faith last Sunday eve.
J. Will Walters.

J. V. Coombs and helpers are to be with J. P. Givens at Rossville, Ill., in October. The pastor is hopeful and expects a great meeting. All departments of the church are in good condition.

I have accepted the pastorate of the Tingley, Iowa. church, and began work Lord's day, the 16th ult.
George A. Gillett, th eformer pastor here goes to Knoxville, Iowa. J. P. Lucas.

Charles E. McVey, song evangelist, assisted a few days in a meeting at Denver, Mo., led by Evangelist Cooper of Grant City, Mo. There had been five confessions when he left. He is now assisting John R. Golden in a meeting at Flanagan, Ill.

After four years and a half of work at Denver, Ill., B. H. Cleaver of Canton, Mo., has changed to Timewell, Ill., where he succeeds B. S. M. Edwards, now at Versailles, The Timewell Church begins a meeting September 28, under the leadership of A. P. Cobb, Decatur.

The Third Church, Ft. Wayne, Ind., on August 16, four additions; August 30, one addition. Bible school gaining all through vacation months. Organized a Christian Endeavor last night. H. E. Stafford, our pastor, is solving our problems.
Edward Shellaberger, Clerk.

President E. Y. Mullins of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky, will deliver an address on "The Evidential Value of Christian Experience," at the annual public meeting of the Moody Bible Institute, to be held in the Moody Church, on Tuesday, September 15, at 7:45 p. m.

N. T. Haynes of Decatur, Ill., yesterday preached (and with unabated vigor), for the Englewood Church, two highly edifying gospel sermons. This is the tenth consecutive summer that he has visited over a Sunday and preached for this church—having not once missed doing so since he resigned his six and one-half years' ministry here, in 1898. Can the "record"—in this particular line—be matched in the history of another church in our brotherhood, and if so, will some one report"? W. P. Keeler.
Chicago, August 24, 1908.

Chicago, Ill., Sept. 3, 1908.
At a council of the churches at Austin, Evanston, Niantic, Winchester, Sterling, called by the Aurora church to consider some complaints said church had to make against Clifford Monroe, recently pastor of the Aurora church, the following action was taken:

"Resolved, that as we have received reports from several churches where Clifford Monroe has been pastor, that we ragrd him as not a proper person to hold a pastorate for one of our churches."

J. Fred Jones, President Council.
O. F. Jordan, Secretary.

E. Everett Hollingworth closed a week's meeting at Reece Church, Morgan County, Ga., with two baptisms, and one reclaimed. All these are men, two being heads of families.

The church at Salt Lake, by a large congregational vote called Dr. Albert Burton to a second year as pastor. His baptisms last year include Mormon, Methodist, Japanese. His sermons are published weekly in five daily papers. He gave the memorial address in the theater Decoration Day and the Judicial address on Juvenile Courts.

One of the occasions which help to cheer and brighten the life of a minister was enjoyed by myself and family on the evening of the 18th ult. After we had moved into the building which had been purchased and improved for a parsonage, when a goodly number of the membership filed in through the door with faces wreathed with smiles, hearts full of good cheer and hands filled with those things which help to fill an empty larder.

The evening passed away rapidly with music, conversation and various games, which were enjoyed by all. And it was with reluctance that we separated when time came for them to go. Our work has been moving on quite nicely since I came on the field in May. During a contest with the Sunday-school at Versailles which had been arranged just prior to my coming, our school increased in enrolment from eighty-five to 144; but through the month of August the attendance has fallen off some. We expect to organize a teacher training class soon, and hope with the coming of cooler weather to see improvements in every department of the work. T. L. Read.
Chapin, Ill.

Graduating exercises were held last week in the Moody Bible Institute when, at the close of the summer term, eighteen students, eleven men and seven women, were given their diplomas for the two years' work. This makes a total of forty graduates during the year.

Some of these students were expecting to take special courses in Theological Seminaries, but most of them were soon to enter upon various activities on the home and foreign mission fields.

The fall term of the institute opens with a large roster of students from different parts of the United States and Canada, and the various countries of the world.

The church at Flanagan, Ill., is having a successful revival, led by Evangelist Golden and Charles E. McVay as song leader.

NO DATE OF EXPIRATION.

H. Gordon Bennett is in a good meeting at Bushnell, Ill. Ten added first general invitation. It is one of the most difficult fields in Illinois. Booze fighting and booze selling chief occupation of many. Our cause very weak, hence no support or standing in community. H. G. Bennett.

SOME IMPORTANT KENTUCKY NOTES.

Another year in our Kentucky state work has closed. The reports for August are about all in. One hundred and twenty-six added, and much other good done. This completes the record of a good year's work. Our men in the field have done well. Much has been done to advance the interests of the Master's cause. Our books show a credit of $865.81 for the month of August.

RESIGNATION AT BLOOMINGTON.

Thomas J. Clark has resigned the church at Bloomington, Indiana, after a fruitful pastorate of fourteen years. The following facts are taken from the church leaflet of August 30:

The pastor has preached 1,360 sermons during this time. He has attended 483 funerals, an average of thirty-four and a half per year. Of these, ninety-five were members of this congregation. He has married 188 couples, an average of over thirteen couples a year.

The following accessions have been made to the church during these fourteen years: By confession and baptism, 796; by letter, statement, restored, and from other religious denominations, 449, making a total of 1,245.

Amount of money raised and disbursed for missions and other forms of benevolences, including only a part of that raised by the Ladies' Auxiliary for these purposes, $3,073.

At the beginning of this pastorate there was a debt of $1,800 on the parsonage. This was liquidated several years ago. The church has been remodeled during this time at a cost of about $3,600. In addition to this, through the efforts of the pastor, the fine organ was secured from Mr. Carnegie at a cost to him of $2,500.

The "New Purchase" has been secured at a cost of $7,000, and through the liberality of Aunt Jane Thomson, and from rentals, and contributions from members of the congre-

MOTHER AND CHILD

Both Fully Nourished on Grape-Nuts.

The value of this famous food is shown in many ways, in addition to what might be expected from its chemical analysis.

Grape-Nuts food is made of whole wheat and barley, is thoroughly baked for many hours and contains all the wholesome ingredients in these cereals.

It contains also the phosphate of potash grown in the grains, which Nature uses to build up brain and nerve cells.

Young children require proportionately more of this element because the brain and nervous system of the child grows so rapidly.

A Va. mother found the value of Grape-Nuts in not only building up her own strength but in nourishing her baby at the same time. She writes:

"After my baby came I did not recover health and strength, and the doctor said I could not nurse the baby as I did not have nourishment for her, besides I was too weak.

"He said I might try a change of diet and see what that would do, and recommended Grape-Nuts food. I bought a pkg. and used it regularly. A marked change came over both baby and me.

"My baby is now four months old, is in fine condition. I am nursing her and doing all my work and never felt better in my life." "There's a Reason."

gation, the debt has been reduced to a little more than $1,500.

The ladies of the congregation have accumulated for a building fund not far from $2,500.

The present enrollment of the membership of the congregation is about 1,000 or 1,100. The attendance of the Sunday-school runs from 225 to 300, which is a very substantial increase. The greatest drawback to a larger increase in the attendance, is the need for more room.

Mr. Clark goes from Bloomington to Albion, Ill.

SOME INDIANA NEWS.

The congregation at Advance is without a minister, but is negotiating with a good man and will possibly locate him.

J. N. Grisso of Waneland, is manifesting true missionary zeal. There are several preacherless congregations near him and he visits a number of these on Sunday afternoon or on evenings during the week. In this way he is keeping alive the work at Mace and Marshall in addition to his other work.

L. E. Brown of Lebanon was the speaker at the Knox County meeting at Bicknell on August 30.

Our churches throughout the state will suffer a distinct loss in the removal of Orlando E. Tomes, who leaves the Englewood (Indianapolis) Church to take the work at Ann Arbor, Mich. As secretary of the State Sunday-school Association and president of the State Christian Endeavor Association he has rendered valuable services by his addresses and suggestions.

Another loss that we suffer is in the removal of Earl Wilfley, who closes a five years' pastorate at Crawfordsville to locate with the First Church at St. Louis. Brother Wilfley was recently with us in a two weeks' meeting at Thorntown and we learned to admire him for the effective manner, and rare literary style with which he presents the gospel message. During the meeting five were added by confession and one by letter.

There is one item in the Church Extension exhibit in the July-August number of "Business in Christianity" that caused me to "sit up and take notice" and to take hope and courage as well. While reporting an increase of but thirty-three in the total number of contributing churches, there is an increase of twenty-five in the list of Indiana churches contributing. There is some food for consolation for a "Hoosier" in that table. But lest we become "puffed up" we notice that Indiana has but 112 contributing churches, even with this commendable increase; some of our sister states report as follows: Ohio, 160; Missouri, 139; Illinois, 171. When will we truly realize our obligation to this great work. W. H. Newlin.

PIKE COUNTY CONVENTION.

The annual convention of the Pike County Churches of Christ was held at Chambersburg, Ill., August 19-20.

These meetings are looked forward to from time to time with pleasure, and this one proved to be unusually interesting and much good was derived therefrom.

C. L. De Pew, State Superintendent of the Bible School Department, gave an interesting account of the progress of the Teacher Training Movement.

H. H. Peters, field secretary of the Eureka College, delivered a splendid address on "College or Educational Interests." Eureka College has many warm friends in Pike County, who are very much pleased over the prospects for a successful year's work the coming year.

Lodging and breakfast will be furnished all who send their names in advance to H. D. Smith, Hopkinsville, Ky. Every railroad in the state has granted a rate of one fare plus twenty-five cents for the round trip, tickets on sale September 21, 22, 23 and 24, with return limit up to and including September 26. A special train will leave Louisville via the L. & N., Monday, the 21st at 12:30 noon.

Inquiries regarding railroad matters should be addressed to Robt. M. Hopkins, 218 Keller building, Louisville, Ky.

We Need $2,000 Before September 21.

If a list of the churches should be given that have not paid their apportionment it would be a source of amazement to many. While our receipts are a little in advance of this time last year, our load is much heavier. Many churches that have thus far failed to help us bear the burden must do so at the eleventh hour. I am assured that very many of them will. We have now a larger num-

REMAINS THE SAME

Well Brewed Postum Always Palatable.

The flavor of Postum, when boiled according to directions, is always the same—mild, distinctive, and palatable. It contains no harmful substance like caffeine, the drug in coffee, and hence may be used with benefit at all times.

"Believing that coffee was the cause of my torpid liver, sick headache and misery in many ways," writes an Ind. lady, "I quit and bought a package of Postum about a year ago.

"My husband and I have been so well pleased that we have continued to drink Postum ever since. We like the taste of Postum better than coffee, as it has always the same pleasant flavor, while coffee changes its taste with about every new combination or blend.

"Since using Postum I have had no more attacks of gall colic, the heaviness has left my chest, and the old, common, every-day headache is a thing unknown." "There's a Reason."

ber of contributing churches than we had altogether last year. We urge every church that has not had fellowship in this work to take prompt measures to raise the amount asked.

Hundreds of Letters Sent Out Today.

These letters announce that money sent to me here by September 15 will appear in the list of printed receipts to be distributed at Hopkinsville. Money should not be sent to me here later than September 18. After that direct to Hopkinsville. We trust that these final letters will stir up many of the churches to attend to this matter now.

Special Train to Hopkinsville, September 21.

The L. & N. R. R. will run a special train to Hopkinsville on the above date. One car will start from Paris, Ky., at 7:28 a. m. and run through Lexington, leaving there at 8:15 a. m., arriving at Louisville at 11:45 a. m. At 12:30 the special train will leave Tenth and Broadway Station, reaching Hopkinsville in time for evening service. This is to be a solid vestibule train. We can have an idea of how the L. & N. will take care of us going to New Orleans—by this train they are furnishing us.

Maysville people get to Paris for that special car—Winchester, Mt. Sterling, Nicholasville, Danville, Georgetown, Cynthiana, Carlisle, and people of many other towns can reach Lexington in time for the departure of the regular L. & N. train from Lexington to Louisville, to which the special car will be attached. The Short Line, Bloomfield and other branches have trains reaching Louisville in time for the departure of the special.

We urge all who are going to Hopkinsville to use this train. Let us go at the beginning and stay until the end.

A Great Meeting.

The only thing that can mar the greatness of this meeting will be the failure of our people from Eastern and Central Kentucky to go to this meeting in large numbers. We ought to have a large representation there. This is to be a meeting of great historic interest and we urge our people to make strong efforts to be there.

THE GOSPEL TRIUMPHANT IN OKLAHOMA.

Wm. M. LeMay, of Enid, Okla., who recently returned from the Holy Land, where he spent five months, began a series of gospel meetings for us August 14, continuing for two weeks. Brother LeMay is an eloquent preacher of the "old Jerusalem gospel," is an earnest contender for "the faith once for all delivered unto the saints," he is compassionate, loving, and kind in his appeals to humanity, wielding the "sword of the Spirit" in a way that puts to flight envy, malice and hatred, and unites together with golden links of love those who accept the sublime teachings of Jesus of Nazareth. He so teaches and propounds every fundamental principle of the Christian system that it is accepted as a loving request of a crucified Saviour, and is obeyed in the childlike and submissive manner as becometh those accepting so "great a salvation." The visible results of our meeting are sixteen by primary obedience, and four from other religious bodies. Among the influential people coming into the church are the principal of our public schools, and her parents, the former by primary obedience, and the latter from the Methodists. Much seed was sown during this meeting that will yield a bountiful harvest of blessings for our community, and will finally blossom into the bliss of a happy eternity for many souls.

While writing the foregoing I received a letter from our former minister James Cage, now serving the church at Crescent, Okla., and who our brethren will remember as the preacher that received a terrible beating without provocation, at the hands of an outlaw early in the summer at that place. Brother Cage brings us the good news that last Lord's day he received into the church there forty-two souls, twenty-seven of which were by primary obedience. This we think is remarkable taking into consideration the fact that Crescent is only a town of 700 hundred souls, and no protracted efforts were put forth by the church, but these people were simply attracted by the plain presentation of the gospel of redeeming love as it fell from the lips of Brother Cage on this bright Lord's day morning, when all nature seemed to be smiling in loveliness.

WISCONSIN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION AND CHRISTIAN WOMAN'S BOARD OF MISSIONS.

The Disciples of Christ of Wisconsin will meet in convention with the First Church of Christ, meeting at the corner of Seventh avenue and Walker street, Milwaukee, September 18-21. The Milwaukee brethren will welcome and entertain all delegates who come, and a rich spiritual and social feast is anticipated.

Each church in the state is earnestly requested to send delegates provided with written reports of the past year's work, its present condition and its prospects, and together we will plan for the coming year's mission work. Especially, the churches being aided, or that will ask for aid, will be expected to report in detail.

The first session, Friday evening, will be mainly in the hands of the local church. J. H. Mohorter of St. Louis will preach the evening sermon.

Saturday.

The first part of the forenoon session will be devoted to business, the latter part to two addresses.

The afternoon session will be in the hands of the state organization of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, with Mettie J. Monroe as president and Miss Ida C. Towne of Waupun, as corresponding secretary. The time will be devoted to the business of the society, reports of officers and reports of auxiliaries and addresses. As speakers from abroad, they have secured C. C. Smith of Cincinnati, secretary of Negro Evangelization, and Mrs. Effie Cunningham of Indianapolis.

Sunday.

The Bible school will be in the hands of the local church, and following it will be a sermon by W. R. Warren, centennial secretary. At two o'clock the memorial service will be held at which the Obituary Committee will report, and the Lord's Supper will be partaken of. The Christian Endeavor hour will be in the early evening, and the address of the evening will be by W. J. Wright, corresponding secretary of the A. C. M. S.

Monday.

Monday will be devoted to reports of committees, reports of churches, election of officers, and a number of addresses. The evening sermon will be by C. S. Medbury, pastor of University Place Church, Des Moines, Iowa.

Besides the speakers mentioned, we expect F. W. Emerson of Freeport, Ill., J. H. Berkey of Monroe, L. L. Mann of Waupun, J. S. Stone of Chippewa Falls, F. M. McHale of Richland Center, J. I. Carter of Ladysmith, J. Harry Bullock of Footville, H. W. Thoreson of Hickory, and the Milwaukee preachers, C. L. Waite and S. J. Homan.

Representatives of the Foreign Society and Church Extension are expected and will be given prominent places on the program.

The sessions of the W. C. M. A. will be presided over by President J. C. Thurman of Green Bay, who will call to order promptly at 9:30 each morning, and 2:00 each afternoon.

A definite program will be made for each day, made up of the material at hand that day.

Each member of the church in the state is invited and we hope to see a large number present from first to last. Send word to C. L. Waite, 433 Grove street, Milwaukee, that you are coming.

A NOVEL FOR MARRIED PEOPLE

Robert Herrick's "Together" a Bold Story Dealing with the Marriage Relation.

One of the most significant books ever written by an American is Robert Herrick's novel, "Together," which has just been published by The Macmillan Company ($1.50). It is described as a story of married lives in America, and the description is unquestionably accurate. Practically all the important characters are married, and they include at least half a dozen couples whose marital experiences are followed during some years. Mr. Herrick has so chosen these characters that they represent nearly every phase of American life, and "Together" is, in this sense, probably the most typically American novel of recent years.

Already the book has become a storm center of discussion. Mr. Herrick has written more than one fine story, but he has done nothing to compare with "Together" in its truth to actual conditions and its intensity of interest. Such a book is bound to arouse strong feeling, and it is no wonder that Mr. Herrick has been vigorously attacked in some quarters. The New York and Chicago papers have printed columns of interviews with women who controvert the views expressed in this novel, while at the same time disinterested judges concede that it is an accurate representation of the conditions of American married life. Without question, Mr. Herrick says some hard things about the American woman who gives up her life to a struggle for social position, sacrificing her husband and children to her own amusement; but the truth of the picture as he presents it will be acknowledged by everyone who knows the life of the country. The conditions he describes are those not only of the great cities, but also of the smaller towns—of every community, in fact, that has a "society." "Together" is a remarkably outspoken book. It is decidedly not a book for young people, or to be put in a public library. Its early chapters preclude that; none the less it is an indictment of social life that will challenge attention—and it may help to emphasize the call for a reformation in our American homes.

HEROES AND THEIR ANIMAL FRIENDS.

It is an exceedingly i teresting piece of work that our big-hearted friend of the Illinois Humane Society, Mr. John T. Dale of Winnetka, has accomplished under the above title. A sincere lover of animal life, the author has prepared an instructive and entertaining series of short selections which peculiarly adapt the book for use in public schools. More than fifty illustrations, including portraits of noted men and women, add to the attractiveness of the stories and anecdotes which reveal the affection of great souls for their animal friends. The importance of the work Mr. Dale has tried to do cannot easily be over-estimated—nor do we know of any one who has succeeded so well. Surely there is a place for such a book as this in the reading courses of our public schools.

FOREIGN MISSIONARIES IN CONFERENCE.

The conference of missionaries of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society just held in Cincinnati was the most successful meeting of the kind ever held by our people. There were thirty-one missionaries in attendance. Eighteen of them were missionaries home on furlough, having served one term and more on the foreign field. Thirteen were new missionaries under appointment, most of whom will sail this month for the foreign field. Three days were spent together in this conference. It was a time of enthusiasm and great spiritual uplift. There were many addresses and open conferences indulged in by all. Nearly every phase of the great foreign work was considered. Almost all of our foreign fields were represented. The returned missionaries present were as follows: From India, M. D. Adams, Bilaspur; Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Brown of Jubbulpore. From China, Dr. James Butchart and wife of Lu Cheo Fu; Miss Emma Lyon of Nankin; Mr. and Mrs. Herbert P. Shaw of Shanghai; Dr. E. A. Layton and Miss Edna Dale of Wu hu. From Japan, Dr. Nina S. Stevens of Akita and Miss Rose Armbruster of Tokyo. From Africa, Dr. and Mrs. Royal J. Dye and Mrs. Ray Eldred. fried, who goes to China.

The newly appointed missionaries present were W. B. Alexander, J. C. Archer and Harry Eicher who go to India; C. F. McCall and wife and Miss May Hiatt, who go to Japan; Miss Eva Raw and Miss Kate G. Miller, who go to China; Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Wilson, who go to Honolulu; Dr. Z. S. Loftis, who goes to Thibet; Miss Mamie Longan, who goes to the Philippines, and Miss Sylvia Siegfried, who go to Cuba.

At the close of the three-day conference a farewell public reception was held at Central Church. It was indeed an inspiring occasion. As each missionary was introduced, he or she gave a brief, ringing message to the audience. People were deeply moved.

Aside from the messages of the missionaries at this conference, addresses were given as follows: "Have Faith in God," Prof. W. C. Morro, Lexington, Ky.; "The Missionary's Intellectual Life," President T. C. Howe, Butler College; "The Missionary's Inspiration," J. L. Hill, Cincinnati; "The Missionary's Care of His Health," Dr. P. T. Kilgour, Cincinnati; "The Relation of the Missionaries to the People," A. McLean; "The Distinctive Aim of the Missionary," F. M. Rains; "The Missionary and the Holy Spirit," Stephen J. Corey.

NEW ORLEANS CONVENTION.

Announcement Day is Sunday, September 12, 1908.

It is the desire of the New Orleans Convention Committee to make this the most representative convention every held by our brotherhood. "A convention of the people, by the people, and for the people" under Christ. Therefore, we have adopted Sunday, September 20, as New Orleans convention announcement day. Every minister, Bible school superintendent and Christian Endeavor President is requested to make the announcement in open session on that day, to emphasize the importance of the conventions and to invite one and all to lend their assistance in building up the New Orleans convention. We are mailing out twenty-one thousand letters from this office, calling attention to the New Irleans convention.

Prospects are just as bright as noon-day for a great and glorious convention. Everybody, it seems, wants to come.

Fraternally.

W. M. Taylor, Minister.

—The Attorney-General of the United States is a contributor to The World To-Day. The subject of Mr. Bonaparte's article is "Can We Have Good Government?"

THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

Friday evening, October 9, the New Orleans convention will open with the first session of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. That all of our delegates may be informed as to the proper time for the journey, the railroad guide and time tables will be profitable studies these last days. Delayed arrival of our workers for even one session would greatly mar the beauty and the blessing of the convention.

The assurance of a good attendance of the National Board members for the annual meeting,. Friday, at 10 a. m., promises a significant beginning.

The welcome to be accorded us has already been forecast and will be more than verified by the open doors, the responsive hearts and greetings and fellowships within the gates of our host and hostess city.

We are going to New Orleans because we are invited and delight in accepting. Here will be announced the field messages from all lands. From this place will be sounded forth the new watch-words and aims for 1909. Some great speeches will be made. Israel's sweet tongue will gladden the soul with song.

Our presence will encourage our southland workers. They, in return, will yield to us the best of aspirations and of hopes. Numbers, responsive hearts and gifts of silver and gold make a trio of power. New Orleans is to give this uplift. Mrs. M. E. Harlan.

WHY YOU SHOULD VISIT NEW ORLEANS.

Because New Orleans is unlike any other city in the world, situated in the "Land of Sunshine," and flowers, and mirth, and music, and song; in appearance, dress and mode of living, a world's metropolis in all colors—in one street the characteristic people and business of today, and in the next, the styles and customs of two centuries ago.

Because her history is quaint and romantic—a molded past, under a verdant, resonant present, as evidenced by the curious and antique fragments of royal ancestry found in the old French quarter where the clatter of foreign tongues may be heard in the narrow streets, and the gay notes of the Spanish Fandango may still be heard mingling with the soul-stirring charms of the French Marseillaise, and the palatial residences and sky-scrapers, which characterize present-day civilization with exceptional splendor and prosperity.

Because her climate is healthy and delightful, when icy winds and blizzards hold sway in the north, wrapping their frigid cloaks over everything and everybody, the residents of New Orleans are basking in sunshine and enjoying a perfect out-door life under clear blue skies. It is called winter simply through courtesy to the season; for the greater part of what is known as the winter season is but sunshiny days in which is felt the tinge of a bracy atmosphere, especially lovely and attractive with the blue of the Italian skies overhead, the perfume of roses in the air, and the dazzling beauty and profusion of tropical flowers everywhere.

Because here, in addition to one hundred and ninety-five square miles of buildings extending from the Mississippi River to Lake Ponchartrain, and from Scuthport to Chalmette, there are the outlying fields of sugar, cotton and rice; the orange, fig and banana groves; and the ship-lined levee where vessels from all parts of the world, together with large white river steamers, and occasionally a battle-ship, lie peacefully on the waters of the Mississippi.

Because it does not matter much in what direction lies the taste of the visitor—whether exemplified in seeking for old and forgotten love, curious antique and musty by-ways, evidences of a previous occupation, art, religion or science; the magnificent cemeteries, mausoleums and monuments of the dead, and the superstitions concernin the vaulted cathedral, St. Rach and the wishing shrines; the sociological conditions as manifest in the Sicilian luggers laden with tropical fruits, the Indian shrimp girls and herb gatherers, the Arcadian hunter and Dago fisherman, the Voodo Negroes, the country Creoles and their dark-eyed belles; the French Opera, Roman Carnival, Spanish architecture, or the delights of a purely epicurean nature; New Orleans, in its peculiar effects and institutions, is in a position to fully satisfy the demand, and is almost equal to a trip around the world.

Because October 9-15, 1908, is the time for the International Missionary Convention of the Church of Christ, and you can have the benefits of concessions made by the railroads of America, which will enable you to make the trip at half the usual cost at a time when the climate is perfect and profitable, and at the same time be associated with five thousands of your brethren in the fellowship, plans and hopes of evangelizing the whole world. And here you shall feel the heart throb of the grandest body of Christ's disciples on earth and pulse-beat of the missionary z al of the whole world.

Because of the impress you shall make for the cause dearest to our hearts upon one of the most important and most impressionable sections of our great nation, where Christ is not known as we know him and the people are crying for the light of his gospel. Because it is your duty, privilege and profit to come just at this crisis in the history of the Church of Christ in the southland.

The Call To The Soul.

BY ANNA JACOBS.

Sing, my soul, for songs are needed
In this world where hearts are sad;
Speak, my soul, the words of comfort,
Which shall make the sorrowing glad.

Up, my soul, to deeds be turning;
Do thy share in each day's work;
What if by thy life's example
Other souls their duty shirk!

Be not silent in thy judgment,
Nor content with words alone;
If thy neighbor sin, redeem him,
Or his sin becomes thine own.

Give, my soul, each day revealing
In thy life God's love for men;
For, perchance, thy brother doubting
May in thee find faith again.
—Plymouth, Mass.

Special Excursion to New Orleans

INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONVENTION CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA

The Illinois Central Railroad has been selected as the official route by Illinois Disciples and the company has provided special train service at a rate of twenty-seven dollars ($27.00) for the round trip. This splendid service and the low rate secured should and undoubtedly will induce a great many of the Brotherhood to attend this splendid convention. The city of New Orleans is almost an ideal place to visit. Its beauty, its countless attractions, its old landmarks and buildings re-calling an historic past—New Orleans and this international convention will surely make an irresistible appeal to many hundreds in the churches of Christ. Some churches will appreciate the wisdom of sending their pastors at their expense, and many pastors will feel compelled to go at any cost.

The excursion tickets permit a stopover at Vicksburg and the National Military Park, together with a ride of one hundred miles on the Mississippi River between Vicksburg and Natchez, including meals and berth on the steamer, at an additional cost of $3.50.

Special train will leave Chicago at 6:00 p. m., Wednesday, October 7, and arrive at New Orleans at 8:15 p. m. the next day. An attractive folder has been issued by the Illinois Central Railroad and can be obtained free by application to any of the passenger agents or to Mr. R. J. Carmichael, city ticket office, 117 Adams street, Chicago.

Golden Rule

"THE WORLD IS FULL OF RUBS."
(Shakespeare.)

"The world is full of rubs." I found it true
So long ago it seems no longer strange.
It took possession of my childish mind
And crammed it down into a narrow groove;
And for a while I nothing lovely found
In life, and people said, "So hard, so cold,
So cynical she seems for one so young."
And I just thought, "The world is full of rubs."

"The world is full of rubs." I know not when
The bitterness was taken from this phrase;
But time, in passing, brought to me this thought:
There's kindness, too, in this hard world of ours.
And to dispense it must be better far
Than to deplore the other too sad truth.
And in the far-off future I may find
Eternal good, which seems so doubtful now,
If I can live so none will turn from me,
And turning say, "The world is full of rubs."

—Irene Catherwood.

An Unparalleled Offer

Books of special current interest to all Disciples offered at an unusual bargain price or sent free with each new subscription to The Christian Century. With our Centennial Anniversary only a short way off, these records of our early history and these early historic documents are of wide and profound interest. Christian Union is now on every lip, but comparatively few know or realize what an important work Alexander Campbell undertook or what our Brotherhood has accomplished in this direction. Disciples should read their own splendid history. Here are the records:

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS ADVOCATING CHRISTIAN UNION.

12mo. silk cloth, gilt top, 365 pp., $1.00.

This volume includes (1) "The Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery," as it was put forth June 28, 1804, and signed by Robert Marshall, John Dunlavy, Richard McNemar, B. W. Stone, John Thompson and David Purviance; (2) the "Declaration and Address" of Thomas Campbell, set forth in 1809, when the "Associate Synod of North America" virtually reaffirmed the censure pronounced upon him by the Presbytery. Here are the great watchwords spoken by the real formulator of the principles of the Brotherhood and its effort for "the restoration of primitive Christianity." (3) "The Sermon on the Law," by Alexander Campbell, pronounced at a meeting of the Regular Baptist Association on Cross Creek, Virginia, 1816. (4) "Our Position," as set forth by Isaac Errett, and (5) "The World's Need of Our Plea," by J. H. Garrison. Also several chapters of introduction by Dr. C. A. Young.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES.

Bound in green silk cloth, 8vo, $1.00.

This volume is a fortunate companion to the Historical Documents, containing as it does a detailed description of these and many other early documents, as well as early and late discussions of them all. This book, edited by Professor Errett Gates, of the University, with an introduction by the late Dr. Eri B. Hulbert, has been heartily welcomed wherever seen, and will be regarded as an important contribution to the literature of our fellowship. The addresses, and particularly the debates of Alexander Campbell, are fully delineated and their bearing on later and present day discussion clearly shown.

BASIC TRUTHS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

By Professor Herbert L. Willett, Ph. D. Cloth and gold, 12mo, 75c.

A frank and able discussion of the great tenets of the Christian faith, with chapters on The Primacy of Christ, The Father, The Scriptures, The Death and Resurrection of Christ, Faith, Repentance, Baptism, etc. An attractive volume, with illustrations appropriate to the inspiring theme.

SPECIAL OFFER

These are our own publications and for a limited time we are going to offer free to new subscribers their choice of the above volumes. Any present subscriber may send in his own renewal together with one new name and $3.00 and will receive his choice of the above books (one) and also a paper bound copy of "The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples." This special offer will be withdrawn soon.

EDITORIAL

Some Duties and Dangers of the Hour.*

The Disciples of Chicago are deeply appreciative of the honor conferred upon them in the presence of the state convention in their midst. It was a wholly unexpected pleasure which came to us when the Jacksonville convention of last year determined upon this city for its next meeting place. The added honor of the presidency of the convention has been accepted not as a tribute to any man, but as a further proof of the generous good will of the brotherhood in the state toward the churches of this city.

The Disciples in Illinois are not so numerous as in some other states. With 100,000 members we do not equal Indiana with 136,000, Kentucky with 125,000, Missouri with 185,000, nor even Texas with 105,000. But the 769 churches are as loyal and enthusiastic as any to be found in the brotherhood, and the 425 preachers, though far too few for the work, as is the case everywhere, are self-sacrificing, consecrated and in the best sense successful.

The president of the state convention at the time of his election recognized it as one of the duties of the office to visit as far as possible the district conventions. This has proved a pleasant and informing task. It was impossible to reach every one, but in no case where it was within the range of accomplishment was it neglected. In those visits several themes vital to our work have been considered. Among them have been the Centennial aims of the State Board, such as an evangelist in each of the eight districts, twenty-five living link churches in support of the state work, and a fund of $50,000, the interest on which shall constitute a perpetual addition to the offerings for state work. Other subjects considered have been those of church efficiency, young men for the ministry, money and the kingdom, the Sunday-school, Christian worship, and the significance of the social unrest of the age.

At the present time certain other aspects of our work claim attention. We are closing the first century of our history. One hundred years ago the Campbells, father and son, were comparing notes regarding the months of their separation, over the first proofs of the Declaration and Address. Little realization had they of the greatness to which their labors would grow. Like the Pilgrim Fathers, they were seeking an asylum where rest might be found from persecution and the strife of tongues; but like the Pilgrim Fathers they found a world. Christianity had waited long for the message they brought. They published the tidings, and those who followed them became a great host.

Like most religious reformers they rose up in protest against the unhappy condition in which the church found herself. Like the early Christians with their protest against the heathen world around them, or Luther cutting away the bonds that united him to the religious order of his times, these men raised their voices in protest against the powerless state of the churches, the divided condition of Christendom, the theologies of despair which prevailed in that age, the unscriptural methods pursued in evangelism, the priest spirit everywhere dominant in the various denominations, and the emotionalism and romanticism to which religion was too frequently reduced. In their attack upon these things they spared not the edge of criticism and rebuke. But their foremost and ever-present plea was the union of the people of God. Their chief charge against the church of their day was its indifference to the wish and prayer of the Lord.

When they perceived the unresponsive attitude of the churches to their urgent plea for unity, they went further and sought to remove the hindrances to such a condition. They saw that the human devices of the ages stood in the way of the accomplishment of these desired results. Hence grew up their second effort and watchword,. the restoration of apostolic Christianity. This principle of a return to primitive conditions is also one of the common factors in all great movements for betterment. Paul went back of Moses to Abraham, the author of the Hebrews went back of Aaron to the priesthood of Melchizedek, the Renaissance pushed past the mediæval ages to the classic age, the later philosophy appealed from the scholastic method to Plato, and the Reformation denied the authority of the papacy and went back to the apostles. So with the fathers of this movement. They were not mere iconoclasts. They had a program of protest, but also one of restoration. They wished to restore the church to its primitive purity and simplicity.

They insisted upon the restoration of the apostolic creed, ordinances and life. If they were living today they would insist as strongly as then upon these things, but they would phrase them differently. They would plead for the restoration of the apostolic faith, spirit and service. By the first they would mean all that was formerly signified by the creed and ordinances of the first category. By the apostolic spirit they would mean the sense of brotherliness and good will toward all who hold the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, however opinions on lesser matters might differ. And by the apostolic service they would signify the program of Jesus for the redemption of men from the life of self to the life of responsibility and Christian effort.

But there is a third feature of the work of this reformation which is as impressive as the principles of protest and of restoration. That is the progress that has been constant and steady, in face of reaction and sag. The Disciples have traversed much ground in this hundred years of their history. They have left behind tendencies and habits that threatened to become fixed at times in their past. Like Christianity itself, they have quietly dropped features of their practice and teaching that threatened to become characteristic. Among such were millenarianism, the "Word-alone" theory of the Holy Spirit, the opposition to missions, to coöperation, to organs and to an educated ministry, the polemical spirit which still finds its nourishment in the pages of the Christian Baptist and less able but more recent illustrations of the type, and the provincial spirit which delighted in obscurity and obscurantism, believing that the Disciples must always be a despised and feeble folk. No one who had in him the spirit of the fathers could hold such views. Yet strangely enough all these tendencies have found representatives among the Disciples. Happily they go their way in the steady progress of the brotherhood toward better things.

At the present time our gravest danger is that we shall lose sight of the ideals which these first framers of our history set before us as stars to guide us in the course of the years. We are not blind followers of the fathers merely because they began this task of urging upon the world the unity of believers. They claimed no authority for themselves save that of the urgency of the facts they presented and the plea they made. Yet our progress has been most rapid and satisfying when we have kept in mind the rock from whence we were hewn and the hole of the pit from which we were digged. We have little right to existence as a religious organization apart from the realization of the ends which the fathers held of highest worth. Our danger at the present moment is that we shall forget these ideals and drift into a mere denominational and selfish existence, unmindful of the tasks that have called us into life.

The first of our dangers which falls to be considered at this time is that of an unscriptural and superficial type of evangelism, such as the fathers denounced in their day, and would most strongly have deprecated could they have foreseen it as a feature of our present period. It does not need to be affirmed, much less argued, that the Disciples have from the first been an evangelistic people. With great earnestness they have borne witness to the truth, in season and out of season. While it cannot be claimed that either of the Campbells was of evangelistic type, yet their co-laborers were, and their efforts met the sincere approval of the leaders themselves. Barton Stone and Walter Scott were mighty in their presentation of the gospel and their appeals to the adoption of the life of faith. All our history has been marked by evangelistic zeal and success, and there is no wish on the part of any loyal Disciple to depart from these familiar lines.

But the one thing against which the fathers lifted up their voices in louder protest than any other was the superficiality and emotionalism of the evangelism of their day, which swept multitudes into the churches without making them Christians in any competent or permanent sense. Into this very danger we have come in this later time, and apparently with the approval of many of our brethren to whom the names and memories of the fathers are dear, but their message little known. It is a great joy to record the conviction that a very large part of our evangelism today is of a sort which the most earnest contender for apostolic ideals could fully approve. Where our greatest danger lies is in a tendency to regard as successful and desirable the very sort of number worship and superficiality which has been the bane of evangelism from the first, and was the object of the unmeasured rebukes of the first reformers. There is no danger that we shall have too much of the right type of soul winning. We need more and not less. Our danger is that in the stress of efforts for visible results and inspiring reports we shall overlook the fact that these results are consistent with the least possible outcome in actually saving men and women to the life of trust, holiness and Christian service.

Not infrequently our churches show the evil effects of this love of numbers and reliance upon appeals to the least permanent elements of personality. These are methods which indeed produce immediate results, but which cheapen the church in the eyes of the entire community and bring to its membership a diluted type of adherence which is largely emotional in its allegiance to the Lord, and least dependable in the serious work of the kingdom. Such people there are in every community, and their lives are not to be overlooked in the effort to win all men to the truth. But this is no reason why a premium should be placed upon the least reliable elements in the vicinity, and the church be made to carry the burden of so large a proportion of unusable material as some of our churches reveal today. A restudy of the utterances of the fathers on this very question would not be without value at this time.

A second danger is the neglect of Bible study. The fathers were mighty in the Scriptures, and the first generation of this reformation were men and women who knew the texts which put to flight their adversaries. Much of the indefinite and vague theology of that time was due, as the fathers believed, to be the false views of the Bible which prevailed. These men of God found in the Scriptures the history of God's revelation to the world, and they made it their task to call the attention of the church to the fact that the doctrine of a "level Bible," all parts of which are of the same value and authority was one of the greatest hindrances to a proper understanding of the divine record. No word was ever more astonishing and disquieting to the religious world than the message of Alexander Campbell contained in the "Sermon on the Law," in which he pointed out the partial and fragmentary nature of the Old Testament, and its supersession by the New as the rule of faith and conduct.

It is still the need of the Christian world that this distinction be kept clear. The fathers no more ignored the Old Testament than did Jesus. It was his chief solace and inspiration among the materials afforded him by the religious life of his age. So these men of our own movement found in it the roots of that divine process of education which is as old as the race. But they saw at once the difference in value between it and the Christian Scriptures, and they threw themselves with ardor into the proclamation of Jesus as the final teacher of the race, the Lord and Master of souls. The Bible throughout is inspired, but it is not of equal value for faith and conduct. And no people are in better position historically than the Disciples to make this fact clear and impressive in their teaching. The Old Testament is the record of a slow and painful progress toward the light, under the guidance of the Spirit of God. It has many imperfections of form and spirit which the enemies of Christianity have not failed to use as arguments against the faith. On the doctrine of a "level Bible" these arguments are fatal. With the view of revelation which the fathers proclaimed and to which the Disciples have fallen heir, this fact becomes the most impressive argument for the finality and authority of Jesus and the New Testament. The appeal is not to Moses and the prophets, but to Christ.

Such an appeal is at once intelligible to the student body of our time, investigating the questions of religion with deep and eager interest; it is comprehended and approved by the men who make up the armies of labor, and who are little in sympathy with much that passes for religion; and it is understood and appreciated by that large class in the churches who have no interest in speculative matters, but are anxious to know what are the essentials of the Christian faith. Here again the Disciples would do well to read afresh what the fathers have said as to the point of emphasis in the appeal to our generation.

The last consideration for which time can be found here is the significance of the advocacy of Christian union itself. It might almost seem a work of gratuity to mention this matter, since without it the Disciples have no valid excuse for existence in any community. Yet the indications are not wanting that even in our own ranks there are not a few who have forgotten this primary purpose of our history, and are content that we should grow into a great denomination with the machinery which makes effective such an organization. But it is our true business to stand as the insistent representatives of this idea wherever God has given us a place on which to stand. This is our specialty, our vocation. Nothing could be more pathetic and disgraceful than to see the Disciples in any city or town settling down to the selfish life of a church among the churches, when their great mission is the leavening of all with the spirit of brotherhood and union. Our success in promoting this sentiment in many places already is the proof that it may be hopefully tried everywhere. Only thus can we give full proof of our ministry; only thus can we see of the travail of our souls and be satisfied.

These are not our only dangers, but they claim first place in this review. Only the spirit of sanity, wisdom, diligence and love can save us from such perils and the fatal results that would flow from their prevalence. In loyalty to Christ and his message alone can safety and progress be found. He is the Lord and Master of us all, and the only Foundation on which a triumphant church can be reared. In his light may we see light. H. L. W.

The Soul's Mother Tongue.

"Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou only hast the words of eternal life," was Peter's helpless but loyal reply when his Master propounded the anxious query "Will ye also go away?" It was as if he had said, "What other teacher speaks as thou speakest? Who else knows the speech of heaven? The Rabbis, to be sure, can pronounce the words but they know not the meaning of the words they read. The Scribes sitting in Moses' seat mould their language after the great pattern words of their master, but their speech is stilted and pedantic. The Rabbis are literalists. The Scribes are legalists. Both have the forms of the eternal language. Both know their grammar well and their syntax. Both claim to speak very correctly. But they do not inspire us. Their speech does not shed light upon our lives. They halt and turn to their lexicon or their grammar to find the words they need. Perhaps theirs is the heavenly language but they speak it from the head. But thou, Master, speakest it from the heart. The language of eternal life is native to thee. It is thy mother tongue. We know thou speakest correctly not for that we can match thy sentences to ancient models of prophet or lawgiver but that thy words waken and satisfy deep wonderings and needs in our hearts. Thy words compel us not for that they have any external certification of authority but that they really express thine own life, thine own experience. The Scribes teach not, nor dare they even think out, the truth God is revealing in their souls. But thou, Master, showest us what is in thyself, not just what is in the books. Thy heart's experience is written full of God's present witness to thee. And thou hast not feared to read its pages aloud to us. Therefore thy words are not just words, they are spirit and they are life, yea, the words of eternal life."

And Peter might also explain the beauty and singular compulsion of Christ's words by the fact that the language Christ uses is not the Master's native tongue only, but the disciple's as well. Peter's real life is the eternal life. His citizenship is in heaven. His heart's real vocabulary is the vocabulary of the sky. The language of Christ found and mastered Simon because it was Simon's real mother-tongue. He was dwelling away from home. He had learned an alien speech. But he retained in his soul the imperfect syllables of his Fatherland. And when he heard Christ talk, these imperfect syllables revived, filled out with meaning, and he knew he heard a messenger from God.

It is as if a child just beginning to lisp his mother's words were carried off alone into a foreign land. Far away among strangers he lives and, growing, takes on their ways and speech. The incipient words of childhood seem quite forgotten. But one day there comes a traveler into that land who speaks the words of hearth and heath, of home and Fatherland. And as our captive listens the faltering words of childhood, long unused, awake, his heart is filled with wonder, and he knows he hears a messenger from home.

Thus Christ came to Simon. He found him fishing and bartering.

His manners and speech were those of the coarse fellows with whom he worked. His vision extended hardly beyond the fish-market. But there was something in the speech of Christ that thrilled and fascinated him. The words he spoke fulfilled his heart's desire. The empty places of his soul were filled with wonder. The feeble formulae of his own aspiration became strong in the firm accents of Christ. The great words of the Stranger who met him on the seashore were the faltering vocabulary of Simon's deepest self, the self that belonged not to the fish-market but to the sky. Christ gave a name to this deepest self. He called him henceforth Peter. And Peter left his nets and followed Christ.

This is the secret of Christ's authority: that the words of eternal life which he speaks are his own mother tongue, and that there is underneath every Simon of us a Peter whose birth is from above and whose mother tongue therefore is this same language of eternal life.

The Superhuman Phenomena of the Bible.

In a discussion of the superhuman phenomena of the Bible, the teaching of the Bible should be fully, truthfully stated. The first question is: What is the biblical use of the word "nature"? What is included in the biblical use of the word "nature"? In nature there are mechanical aggregations of matter, usually called material nature. Above these are chemical combinations of matter and energy, inorganic, organic, and their phenomena. Above these are vegetable organizations and life, and their phenomena. Above these animal organizations and life, the brute soul and its degree of intelligence, and their phenomena. Above these are human beings, with animal organization, animal soul, and a spirit, and their phenomena. The phenomena of the spirit in man are above what brutes can do, but they are not supernatural. They are superanimal, but they are not supernatural. The Bible teaches that above man there are angelic intelligences and their phenomena. Angelic intelligences and their phenomena are superhuman, but they are not supernatural. Above angelic intelligences and their phenomena are divine intelligences and their phenomena. Divine intelligences and their phenomena are superangelic and superhuman, but they are not supernatural. In its use of the word "nature," the Bible includes material nature, mechanical and chemical, vegetable nature, animal nature, human nature, angelic nature, divine nature. According to the Bible, it is as irrational for men to speak of angelic nature, divine nature and their phenomena, as "supernatural" as it would be for animals to speak of human beings and their phenomena as supernatural, because they are above animals and what animals can do. They are not supernatural, but superhuman. In discussing the superhuman phenomena of the Bible, the word "supernatural" should never be used, for, according to the Bible, there is no supernatural. Angels and divine beings and their phenomena are as much domains of nature, are as natural, as men, animals, and their phenomena. Atheists, materialists, dispute the teaching of the Bible, that there are such domains of nature; but one who accepts the teaching of the Bible, that there are such domains of nature, should never use the words "supernatural," "extranatural," for, according to the Bible, there is nothing above nature, outside of nature. To speak of any phenomenon recorded in the Bible as supernatural is a perversion of the teaching of the Bible, for the Bible recognizes no supernatural. The word "supernatural" should be discarded, and the word superhuman used instead. In such discussion the Anglicized Latin word "miracle" (a little wonder) should be discarded, and the word "sign," a correct translation of the Greek New Testament word "semeion," should be used, for it expresses the New Testament idea, a sign of the action of superhuman intelligence. According to the Bible, signs are neither violations nor suspensions of laws of nature, nor interventions in, nor interferences with laws of nature. For men to treat them as such, is as gross a perversion of the teaching of the Bible as it would be for animals to speak of the phenomena of human beings, as violations, suspensions of, or as interventions in, interferences with laws of nature. In each case they are phenomena of a higher domain of nature, operations of higher laws of nature than occur in a lower domain, but in strict accordance with laws of nature. As Huxley declared in his criticism of Clifford, "No one should assert that a phenomenon is supernatural, extranatural, unless he knows all nature." Nor that it is a violation or suspension of, or an intervention in, or interference with laws of nature, unless he knows all laws of nature, for it may be the phenomenon of a higher law than hitherto known. The real issue is "Are there superhuman intelligences?" If there are superhuman intelligences, then superhuman phenomena are possible, probable, and if the occasion warrants and the character is fitting, reasonable. Their occurrence can be established just as the occurrence of the phenomena of other domains of nature can be established. Huxley has stated the real issue, the proper method of discussion. Believers of the Bible meet the issue as Huxley stated it, and discuss it fairly as he suggests. The superhuman phenomena of the Bible should not be criticized out of their connection and relation. Certain existences and phenomena of nature, when criticized in a fault-finding spirit, can be denounced as unaesthetic, unethical, repulsive, loathsome, immoral; but when viewed as parts of a system, they are rational, have their place and use in the system of nature. They should ever be viewed in their relation and connection, as parts of a system. The higher existences and phenomena should be the test, the standard—not a fault-finding assault on existences and phenomena, out of connection and relation. The superhuman phenomena of the Bible should be considered as a system, and each phenomenon viewed as a part of a system, and considered in its place in the system, and in its connection and relation to the system, the history of the work of inspiration and revelation. The view-point in an examination of the superhuman phenomena of the Bible should be their culmination, the phenomena, the character, the teaching, the mission of users. As Huxley suggested, the first question should be: "Was Jesus superhuman?" If he was merely human, all superhuman phenomena ascribed to him must be summarily discarded. If he was superhuman, the superhuman phenomena that are a part of his history, the virgin birth, the resurrection, the ascension, are possible, probable, and if the occasion warranted, and the character of the phenomena was fitting, reasonable. The superhuman phenomena ascribed to others in the New Testament and the Old Testament, should be examined as parts of a system of which Jesus was the culmination, and in their connection and relation as parts of the system. In a study of man, one could pick out parts of the human organism and consider them aside from their relation to the body as subject to caricature, but to use this as a basis for assaults on the whole body, ending in a rejection of the body and spirit of the entire man would be irrational. We should select the best specimen of man, and consider the entire man, making the spirit the standard, and consider all in their connection with, and their relation to, the spirit and its work. So in examining the superhuman phenomena of the Bible, we should not begin with a fault-finding assault on isolated, minor phenomena as a basis for further assaults on other phenomena, that we may end in a rejection of all. We should begin with Jesus and his character, mission, his work, and consider all else in their relation to Jesus and his work. But as a correct study of the human organism would reject existences that men have tried to make part of it, distortions of it, and diseased and unnatural growths; if there be such in biblical history, they should be rejected. The issue should be "What are truly the works of superhuman power?"

A GREAT TEMPERANCE AND LAW ENFORCEMENT PARADE FOR CHICAGO, SATURDAY AFTERNOON, SEPT. 26, 1908.

Preparations for this great educational event have been going on for weeks. Representatives from the churches, Sunday-schools, young people's societies, W. C. T. U., Good Templars, men's clubs, Boys' Brigades, Junior societies, Gideons, Law and Order Leagues, Missions, Salvation Army, Volunteers of America, Catholic Temperance societies, Anti-Saloon League, Prohibition Party, Adventists, Gospel Wagons, and other organizations that believe in law enforcement and the overthrow of the law-defying, law-breaking saloon, have been meeting together, and planning for the greatest demonstration that this or any other city has ever known.

The special features of the parade will consist of women and girls dressed in white, banners, transparencies, and floats representing every phase of the temperance reform. It is expected that all the church and reform musical organizations of the city will be in line. The Salvation Army with three brass bands, the Volunteers of America with two good bands, and many others are already promised. The direct object is to keep up a persistent warfare against the saloon, awaken the consciences of the people, show that the church of the living God is not asleep, and educate the masses as to the danger of this hideous monster. It is expected that every law-abiding man, woman and child of this great city will march. Every marcher will carry a small American flag.

The parade is planned for the above Saturday in September, so as to avoid the political parades that will occur during October. There is ample time to swing every patriot into line. The pastors of Chicago are asked to march in a body and lead the procession. It is hoped the ministers and Catholic Priests will be glad to comply with this request.

CHAPTER XIV.

Jean's Inheritance.

Aunt Mehetabel was in the morning room filling a bowl with roses. The arrangement of the flowers for the breakfast table was always her first occupation. This morning it was a greater pleasure than usual, for Jean was back from college and this room was his special delight. If it had been planned as a panacea for all trouble and discontent, one could not imagine a greater success. On the western wall was painted a landscape, a cluster of trees in summer verdure, beyond them a lake, and still further in the distance some rocky crags. Three mallard ducks, just risen from the marsh grass, seemed flying across the lake, and gave a life-like appearance to the whole scene. Paul, who had been a lover of the gun, had brought these home from one of his hunting expeditions, and an experienced taxidermist had mounted them for him in the life-like manner. Beautiful palms and luxuriant ferns clustered at the foot of the picture, an English ivy was trained along the oak rafters of the room, and the light from a stained oriel window fell in rosy tints over all.

"Good morning, Aunt Mehetabel."

"Oh, Jean, how good it is to have you with us!" and Aunt Mehetabel went to meet Jean, smiling the welcome she felt in her heart.

"It is more than good to be here," said Jean, "I feel just like a boy again when I get back. This room has always been my paradise. I remember so well the morning after I came here from the hospital. Uncle Jasper carried me down stairs in his arms and brought me here, and it seemed like heaven. You were standing at the table arranging some flowers just as you are now. How it all comes back to me!"

"Yes, Jean, I remember it as though it were yesterday. What a godsend and a blessing you have been to us ever since," said Aunt Mehetabel as she fondly stroked the brown hair.

"Heigh-ho! at your old tricks I see," and Uncle Jasper came into the room laughing.

The three sat down to breakfast with much pleasant talk, and John, the old family servant, came in with the mail which he laid at Aunt Mehetabel's place.

"Here, Jasper, is your morning paper and some letters, but they do not look at all interesting. See this dainty lavender envelope post-marked Minington. No, Jean, you need not look so expectant for it is addressed to 'Mrs. Mehetabel Snow.'"

"Now, Aunt Mehetabel, that is simply cruel. You will at least gratify my curiosity by telling me whom it is from."

Aunt Mehetabel silently perused the letter, her face lighting up with pleasure.

"Yes, Jean, this news is indeed too good to keep. The letter is from Evelyn and she is going to the Catskills with us in August. Just listen, Jasper, Evelyn is going to spend two weeks with us in the mountains this summer."

"Splendid! I will come up every day!" exclaimed Uncle Jasper.

"Jean, you must plan to be there, too, for we must all make it as pleasant for her as we possibly can. I had hoped to have her with us longer, but she writes me that she is going to attend a summer school at Philadelphia and can only come to us the last two weeks in August."

Jean would not have admitted to himself what a pleasant piece of news this was to him. Ever since that April morning, the vision of a fair, winsome girl had been with him as an almost living presence. The shaft of sunshine that fell across the table, brought to his mind a picture of Evelyn as she stood then in the golden sunlight that had warmed and awakened something in his own heart as it warmed and awakened the earth.

"Is it love?" he had questioned. "If it is, will I ever dare tell it to her? Will I, whom she has only known as an ignorant breaker boy, ever dare ask her to share my life?"

Never before had he felt the shadow of the mines so keenly. Here they always made him feel that he was intellectually and physically the equal of any, and among his fellows a peer in manliness; but there was the shadow; and Evelyn, bright, beautiful and gifted, surrounded by friends and admirers, and he thought again, "How dare I hope?"

"Jean," said Uncle Jasper, as they rose from the table, "there are one or two matters of business I want to talk over with you this morning if you have no plans to interfere."

"I am at your service, Uncle Jasper. Joclyn is coming up this afternoon to look over those C. P. and L. accounts with me, but I am scot-free this morning," said Jean as he followed Uncle Jasper into the library.

(Copyright, 1905, Ella N Wood.)

"The matter I want to talk about," began Uncle Jasper, "concerns you, at least to some extent. You have never said much about your future life. When you entered the school of theology at Princeton, I concluded that you were looking towards the ministry. In one more year you will finish the seminary, and it is time to begin to shape your work. I have surmised that nothing would please you quite so much as to be able to do something for the laboring people of Minington, and have had some plans of that kind simmering for quite a while. I went down to Minington the other day to talk them over with Hathaway, and it seems that, to a certain extent, he and I have been thinking along the same line, only he had not gone quite so far as I. He wants an assistant pastor and has had his eye on you for the place. He says you understand the people there as no one could who had not been one of them, and it will give you a chance to be near your parents and care for them in their old age."

Jean was visibly affected. He sat with his elbow on the table and his head in his hand. Uncle Jasper stopped in front of him, and Jean sprang up and grasped his hand.

"This proposition overwhelms me, Uncle Jasper. I had not thought of anything half so good. I am willing to start at the bottom of the ladder and climb, but I do not feel competent to take up this work with Mr. Hathaway."

"I believe Mr. Hathaway is a better judge of that than you," replied Uncle Jasper, "and no difference how far down on the ladder you start, we feel, Jean, that you will get to the top."

"I will certainly try," said Jean.

"Well, to go on with my scheme," resumed Uncle Jasper. "What I have told you is only a part of the plan, but the rest of it concerns you equally as much. Mehetabel and I have been blessed with a goodly share of this world's goods, and have tried to do some good with a part of it as we went along. What kind of an investment do you think it would be to build a settlement house in Minington?"

"Splendid, Uncle Jasper, splendid! There could be nothing better. It would revolutionize the place and give the working classes something to live for."

"Do not lose sight of the fact, Jean, that it will take a big slice out of your inheritance. That is why I said this scheme concerns you materially, for what Mehetabel and I have left at our death will be yours."

"I can think of no greater inheritance than to have this work established in Minington and to be a part of it," said Jean with much earnestness. "If it takes every cent that would sometime be mine I would say use it."

"God bless you, Jean! I was sure you would feel that way about it."

"Have you selected a site for the building?" asked Jean.

"Hathaway and I have looked the ground over and I think it will be the heart of the Black Acre."

"The very best place that could have been thought of! When I lived in Minington, there were fifteen saloons and speak-easys in the heart of the Black Acre. This is still owned by the Gordon Mining Company, is it not?"

"Yes, and they ask a big price for it, but it is by far the best place for the buildings I propose to erect."

The heart of the Black Acre was a heart or wedge-shaped lot situated almost in the center of the section known as the Black Acre. It lay directly in the path leading to both of the collieries then in operation, and was covered with old wooden buildings which were mostly used as saloons and gambling dens. These caught the miners both to and from their work.

"I have employed Tilman, an attorney there, to negotiate for the purchase of this piece of land. That spot is a veritable hell upon earth and the first thing I will do after it comes into my possession will be to serve notice on the tenants to move, and then tear every building down.

"I am going to place the matter of this building in your hands, Jean. You know the needs of the people in Minington. Consult freely with Robert Hathaway. The first thing to be done will be to visit some of the buildings of like nature; for instance, the Carnegie Club at Braddock, this state, also the one at Homestead. Then the one managed by the National Cash Register Company at Dayton, Ohio, and there are two or three other club houses in Dayton that will be well worth looking over. Then Hull House, Chicago, and the Steel Works Club, at Joliet, Illinois.

"I wish you would write to John N. Hartington of Philadelphia, and ask him if he can take this trip with you, and if so, when. He is one of the best architects in this part of the country, and you and he together can work out just what we want to meet the needs of Minington."

"This is great, Uncle Jasper! Where's my hat? I want to toss it up." Then, again grasping Uncle Jasper's hand, Jean said, "I do feel the magnitude of this undertaking, but I believe it is the work of my life and you may be assured that I will go into it for all I am worth."

"I believe you, Jean, and if all goes well we ought to have these buildings completed and ready for operation within a year."

Jean went to hunt up Aunt Mehetabel. He was just brimming over with happiness and he must talk it over with her. Just as he had told all his griefs and joys to his mother when a boy, so he still told them to Aunt Mehetabel. They were good comrades, and she always had a ready ear and hearty sympathy for all his confidences. He found her in the music room arranging some music.

"Aunt Mehetabel, come and sit down, I must talk to you. I am almost beside myself with joy."

"My son, I know about it already. I knew you would come to me."

They talked long over the plan of the buildings to be erected in Minington, and of Jean's future. He could open his heart to this good, true, motherly woman as to no one else, and he always felt stronger and more ready to battle with life after one of these conversations.

"I am eager to begin my life work," said Jean as he rose from the seat beside Aunt Mehetabel. "I can hardly wait till the time comes. The possibilities of the work which you and Uncle Jasper have planned for me are almost infinite. All that I am I owe to you, and if I am in any way equipped for this work, I have you to thank for it."

"No, Jean, you brought us a good piece of material in the rough, and we helped finish it and put it in readiness for the Master's use. You have a splendid realization of the work before you. Don't lower your ideals. Never compromise with evil. Use yourself unsparingly for others. Break your alabaster box of precious ointment at the feet of the living, starving souls about you, and you cannot fail. God bless you, my son."

CHAPTER XV.

The Gulch Spring.

Jean had spent most of the summer in Minington overseeing the work of preparing the ground for the settlement house. The Heart of the Black Acre had been cleared of all buildings, and the work of laying the foundation for the settlement house had now begun. The plan was gaining great favor. Several mass meetings had been called by Jean and Mr. Hathaway, and the whole plan and use of the buildings thoroughly explained, and to those people whose lives had been narrowed down to sleeping, eating and hard work, it seemed too wonderful to be true and they could scarcely talk of anything else.

Jean had been holding men's meetings in the chapel of Grace Church on Sunday afternoons, and the room was always filled to the doors. The miners liked Jean. Had he not been a breaker-boy and his father a laborer in the mines? Was not his brother killed while at work in the mine? Then, too, he had met them heartily as man to man, and hailed them as "Bill" and "Mike" and "Garry" so that his manly appearance and good clothes did not awe them and he seemed almost one of themselves. He fell at once into his old place in the home, and how proud Maidie and Hugh were of their boy.

"Hughie, it is worth all the toil and pain just to see the lad come in and out so bonny and splendid," Maidie would say.

It was drawing toward the last of August when Jean received a letter from Aunt Mehetabel saying that he must come to them for a little while; that Evelyn was with them and they were all hungry for a sight of him. He at once decided to go, for Evelyn had been away from Minington, so they had not met, and he was anxious to see her, to talk with her, to be near her. He knew now that he loved her and determined to win her for his own if he could.

The Snow's summer cottage was a model of rustic luxury. It was tucked into one of the niches of the Catskill Mountains, where nature abounds in trees and rocks and spring-fed streams. The inside was simple and homelike and the broad porches were veritable "sleepy hollows" with their many hammocks, lounging chairs and pillows.

Uncle Jasper was asleep in a hammock with a paper over his face and Aunt Mehetabel was reading in a chair near by. Jean walked from the depot a half mile distant, and came up behind the two old people. Reaching over the porch rail he took the book from Aunt Mehetabel and at the same time pulled the paper off Uncle Jasper's face.

"Why Jean, you bad boy! Why didn't you telegraph that you were coming today, so we could have met you at the depot with the carriage?" said Aunt Mehetabel.

"This walk was too fine to miss. Wake up, Uncle Jasper, and speak to a fellow."

Uncle Jasper had been sleepily rubbing his eyes. At this he scrambled out of the hammock and greeted Jean warmly.

"I am ready for any kind of a vacation you have a mind to put up, Uncle Jasper," said Jean. "Where is Evelyn?"

"There! I have almost a notion to be jealous, inquiring after Evelyn the first thing," and Aunt Mehetabel drew a grieved face.

"I don't blame him," said Uncle Jasper, "she is the finest girl in ten states and it is a good thing for you, Mehetabel, that I am not a young man."

"Evelyn has gone for a walk. She has fallen in love since she came here and went to walk with her sweetheart. I think she took the bridle path to the Gulch Spring."

The mirth fled from Jean's face and he paled visibly.

"Oh, Jean, I was just quizzing!" Aunt Mehetabel hastened to say. "Her sweetheart is a tiny slip of a girl whose people have the cottage next to ours. Go and find them, Jean, and bring them back, for it is almost tea time."

Jean did not realize that his face showed so plainly the effect of Aunt Mehetabel's words. For the moment they were as a dagger in his heart. What if she did love some one else? The thought appalled him. Aunt Mehetabel's explanation was only a partial relief. He had come so expectant, so happy, but he felt now that he could never be contented again until he knew that Evelyn loved him. So without a word he started off down the bridle path toward the Gulch Spring.

"Jasper, that boy loves Evelyn and she seems so wrapped up in her work that I don't believe she has ever thought of loving him."

"Now, Mehetabel, just give them a little time. I believe Cupid will manage that affair all right," said Uncle Jasper with a queer smile.

Jean had almost reached the Gulch Spring when he saw Evelyn and her small companion.

There was a narrow gulch with high, overhanging rocks, from one of which the spring unceasingly gurgled. Close by was a niche in the rocks that nature might have meant for the bower of a fairy queen, it was so beautiful with ferns and moss. A little foot bridge spanned the gulch overhead. Evelyn was sitting on a stone near the spring weaving some leaves into a wreath, and little Margaret was leaning on her knee listening intently. The soft grass rendered Jean's steps noiseless, and the two so busily engaged did not notice his approach.

"When the Prince was still a boy he went away from home and was gone many years," were the first words that caught his ear in Evelyn's soft, clear voice.

Jean's steps were arrested. He felt that he was walking on enchanted ground, and must not break the spell.

"And did he ever come back?" asked Margaret.

"Yes, he came back a tall and beautiful young man. You see when he went away he was poor and ragged, for the people among whom he lived did not know he was a Prince and made him work hard every day."

"And was the Princess glad to see him when he got back?"

"Yes, the Princess was glad to see him, and she was glad, too, that he had grown to be so splendid. You see she knew he was a Prince all the time."

"Oh, Miss Evelyn, did the Princess love the Prince when she saw him?"

There was a pause and Evelyn held the wreath up and viewed it with critical deliberation.

"Now, Margaret, the wreath is finished. Isn't it just lovely?"

"Why, you have made it the shape of a crown! How perfectly beautiful it is. This border of yellow daisies is pure gold and the leaves are emerald like my mamma's necklace. Now you must be the Princess and I will put the crown on your head.

"Oh, Miss Evelyn, princesses always have long golden hair! Will you mind if I let your hair down?"

"Oh, you little fairy! I think you bewitch me, and I do not doubt that you can turn me into a princess or almost anything," and Evelyn took the beautiful face of the child in her hands and kissed it.

Jean stood intent on the scene before him. He never will forget one detail of that picture all his life long. The rocky ledges rising in the background, with gnarled trees and red berried vines growing from their fissures; Evelyn enthroned in the niche of an old grey stone that was touched up here and there with patches of moss, her sunny brown hair falling in riotous waves over her white summer dress, and encircling a face exquisite in the bloom of health—a face almost startling in loveliness with its blue eyes and long, fringed lashes, its clear brow, full of thought and intellect, and its sensitive mouth that could look serious or break into radiant smiles.

Jean's heart was thrilled with this new sweet love, and as the little by-play went on he thought, "O, Evelyn, my princess, my queen! I love you! I love you!"

Little Margaret Hannibal was a veritable fairy with her fair hair and white dress. Flitting here and there, now trailing a vine over Evelyn's hair and down her white dress, then readjusting the wreath on her head, all the time chatting away and giving her imagination full play.

"Oh, Miss Evelyn, you look like a really, truly princess. You are just beautiful. How I wish the Prince would come!" and Margaret looked around with a well-feigned expectancy. As she saw Jean standing on the other side of the gulch, her look changed to one of surprise and fear, but when Jean smiled it was such a merry, friendly, whole hearted smile that it banished the little lady's fears

BAPTIST ATTITUDE TOWARD UNION WITH THE DISCIPLES.

The Baptist Standard of August 1, 1908, contains the following lines signed by J. W. Allen, of South Dakota:

"In nearly every place where the writer has been pastor there have been some 'Christians,' but no church of their own. In not a single instance did these 'Christians' affiliate with the Baptist Church, but if they attended church at all it was with some other denomination. Now, this does not indicate any possibility of such a union of Baptists and Disciples as will be lasting or a blessing to the cause of Christianity. Within the last fifteen years or so I know of at least three cases in which the 'Christians' pitched a tent and crowded themselves into towns where a Baptist church already existed, as well as churches of other denominations. Does this look like union and true fellowship?"

From the Standard of August 15 the following report is taken: "Again if Disciples really desire union with Baptists they have a strange way of showing it. Some time ago they entered this town and from the beginning have bent every energy to proselyting from the Baptist Church, along with the other churches. Recently we had a series of tent meetings, the other evangelical pastors attended the services, the Methodist pastor announcing that there would be no evening services in his church during the tent's stay. But the Disciple minister never showed his face in the tent, instead he had something going on in his church nearly every evening of the meetings."

These two quotations contain one of the most convincing arguments for the union of Baptists and Disciples. The writers, of course, intended them to be arguments against union, but they reveal the deep disgust which every Christian man feels toward sectarian exclusiveness. They confess to the horror at sectarianism that was aroused in their souls by the conduct of those ministers. But if denominationalism is a good thing, why was it not both the right and the duty of those Disciples to utterly ignore all other denominations in the place, and work for the up-building of their own body as if no other church existed in the place? That is the creed of denominationalism—We are right and every other church is wrong; and if wrong they have no right to exist. Every sect lives unto itself. It is the whole church of God on earth.

We share with these Baptist writers the abhorrence which they felt for Disciples who preach union and practice sectarianism and division. Disciples in every community ought to be the first in every union movement. Such reproaches as these Baptists lodge against Disciples ought to have been impossible of Disciples through all of their history. If all Disciples had practiced what they have preached for a hundred years, their service in the cause of Christian union would have been far greater than it has been. Not all Disciples, thank heaven, have contradicted in their lives what they have professed with their lips—the doctrine that Christ's children should love one another, and should receive one another even as Christ also has received each. "They who are friends of Christ should be friends of each other."

At bottom, these Baptists testify how unseemly it is for Baptists and Disciples to live apart, side by side in the same community. There is not a community where they exist together that one does not hear from both Baptists and Disciples the frequent remark, "There is no reason why there should be the two churches in this place." This remark is even more frequent on the part of persons of other bodies. They see even less reason for the existence of the two denominations. How perfectly unnatural and unreasonable that Baptists and Disciples should not coöperate—should not be the very first to seek each other. They are like a family of estranged brothers and sisters living in the same neighborhood, but having nothing to do with each other. Those who should be the closest friends are the remotest strangers to each other.

Referring to the union between the Memorial Baptist Church and the First Christian Church of Chicago, a writer in the Baptist Standard of August 1 says: "Have such Baptists lost their convictions? Have they forgotten the heritage bequeathed to them by the fathers, nay, more, by their God? Have they concluded that there is no longer a need for Baptists? If so, let such Baptists go to their own place—with 'paedos' and 'mixed paedos.' We wish them no harm, but we have no use for them in the denomination, breeding discord and bringing disgrace to the name of a Roger Williams, Peck, Armitage, Broaddus, and the tens of thousands of other Baptists."

If the name "Disciples" should be substituted for the name "Baptists," and the names of Campbell, Stone, Scott, and Errett were put in the place of Williams, Peek, Armitage and Broaddus, in the above quotation, we would have an admirable expression for the feelings of some Disciples over the Chicago union. The fervor with which this Baptist tears his hair over the loss of the Baptist name from the Memorial Church would awaken our sympathy if occasioned by the loss of something more vital to Baptist integrity than a name that stigmatized them at first, and misrepresents them at the present time.

The Baptist World of August 6 says editorially:

"The union of the Memorial Baptist Church of Chicago, with a Disciple Church of that city has led to many surmises. The name is the 'Memorial Church of Christ (Baptists and Disciples).' The point raised is evident. What denomination is it? Will it be called Baptist or Disciple or begin a new denomination? The pastor, H. L. Willett, is a Disciple. Is it not time to say that we are opposed to the loss of Baptist churches merely for the sake of union?"

"Merely for the sake of union." Is it a small matter to answer Christ's prayer for unity, to be joined together in the bonds of peace, for Christ's followers to set the example of brotherhood among themselves? "The loss of Baptist churches." How is this church lost? Is it blotted out of existence? Have all of its members died? Have the Disciples absorbed it? Has it departed from Baptist faith? Has it renounced Baptist fellowship? Has it refused to support Baptist missions and education and benevolences? To all of these questions the answer "No" must be given. How is it lost, then? It has united with a church of the Disciples—a church of that body of people whom some Baptists delight to call "Campbellites," and to hate as they hate Romanists, Unitarians and Mormons. Now, the Baptists of the Memorial Church will be taught to love Disciples of Christ, and to welcome them as brethren to their fellowship. They will no more reproach them with hateful names, and consign them with Mormons and Unitarians to the Vale of Hinnom.

This must be the "loss" spoken of by the Baptist World. Some Baptist preachers' sermons will lose several minutes of impassioned denunciation of "Campbellism," and Baptist audiences the luxury of a flight of oratory. But this sort of Baptist preacher or audience is not the kind the great Baptist brotherhood is depending upon for the maintenance of its splendid missionary and educational organizations.

Biblical Problems.

Herbert L. Willett.

Would you say that the narratives of creation in the Bible are fanciful accounts of the successive steps of evolution as we understand it today? A. K. B.

Kansas City.

The narratives of creation, both that of the first chapter of Genesis and of the second chapter, were the common property of Semitic nations, as is shown by the fact that they appear in Babylonian poems whose age has been established as much older than the Mosaic period. They relate the story of creation in at least two of the forms in which it was commonly told in that age. The Hebrew writers made use of these narratives from the past to emphasize the only elements of the stories in which they were concerned, viz., the work of God not of the gods in creation. In the hands of the prophets the narratives, though still retaining their variant forms, teach that in the beginning, whenever that time may have been, it was Jehovah who made the heavens and the earth, that he made man as the climax of the creative work, that he made him in his own image, i. e. with the same faculties possessed by himself, and that he made him as the subject of moral discipline and spiritual culture. Neither the Babylonian nor the Hebrew accounts show any sign of belief in an evolutionary order of creation. The whole process was speedy, creative, immediate. To impose upon the biblical narratives the idea of creative "periods" to make them agree with the established facts of science is to totally misconceive the spirit and purpose of the Hebrew writers. They were interested in the process of creation only as they understood it in their day, and as it offered itself as an illustration of the divine power. The evolutionary view, now accepted as accounting best for the universe as we find it, differs in method but not in meaning from the view of the Hebrew prophets. They accepted the belief that God worked in sudden and mechanical ways in the creation of the universe. We hold with Jesus that the Father has always worked at the tasks of the world. In both cases it is God who is the Creator. Evolution is simply the best explanation of the way in which he has worked at the creation of the worlds.

Would you say that the story of the destruction of the children by the bears at Elisha's command violates probability and is unethical? A. K. B.

Yes. Our sole method of understanding the final authority of the prophets is by comparing them with Jesus who is the complete revelation of the Father's life and love. Such an event in the life of Christ as is related of the prophet Elisha is at once seen to be unthinkable. When John wished to call down fire from heaven upon the ungracious Samaritans, Jesus rebuked him with the assertion that they had not come to take men's lives but to save them. It need not be denied that the children of Bethel mocked at the young prophet with his tonsured head, nor that he cursed them in the anger of the moment, nor even that they were destroyed by beasts. The difficulty arises in the supposition that such a curse was justified by the conduct of the children, and that it could have been effective in bringing about its tragic results. Such interpretations of God's character were not displeasing to the prophetic minds of early ages. But in the growing light of the larger visions of prophecy, which was always correcting itself and rising to higher levels, they fall away to give place to more just and adequate meanings for the message of revelation. Scepticism has too long flung these odds and ends of Old Testament tradition in the face of the world, affirming that this was the sort of thing of which the Bible was composed, and forgetting that all such incidents combined make but an insignificant portion of the great volume of preaching and practice which composes the Old Testament. It is not by denying to such stories their true value as commentaries upon the low plane of religion in that time that we reach the truth, but rather by attempting to see that in spite of such perversions of the idea of God, even on the part of great men, the work of the Spirit went forward and in the fulness of time a complete disclosure of God's nature appeared in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Do you believe that God has ever yet delivered a message to man in the words of the spoken or written language of any nation?
Roodhouse, Ill. L. W. Spayd.

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews expresses admirably the process of God's self revelation in the words, "God, who at various times and in fragmentary ways spoke in times past unto the fathers in the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us in his son." Here the progress of revelation is explained as God speaking in the prophets. God has never left himself without witness among any people, but it was among the Hebrews that there were found some who perceived the will of God as did no others of any ancient people. The ordinary way in which this communication of the human and the divine was represented was in the form of divine utterances heard by the prophet and communicated to the people, or written down by the prophet as a record of his message. At other times the idea of a divine transcript is resorted to, as when we are told that God wrote upon tablets of stone. Yet even here the conception vibrates between a word spoken by God and written by the prophet and a record made by the finger of God. It is evident then that the prophets, who were so confident of their messages as divine, and who have proved them to be such by their results, were oppressed by the necessity of making their words authoritative to the people to whom they spoke. To all such the only final form in which a message can come is in the very words of God. So the Old Testament is full of such expressions as "The Lord said," "Thus saith the Lord," "The word of the Lord came, saying." Yet the free and personal manner in which the divine message is given by the different prophets, the rise from vision and dream, as in the cases of the earliest prophets to the high level of spiritual intuition occupied by the great prophets of the later age, and most conclusive of all, the use of the form implying direct divine verbal communication to one prophet while an equally authoritative and direct message of precisely opposite spirit and purpose is made to a later one, shows the biblical student that it was the content and not the method of the revelation of God's will with which the Old Testament concerned itself. "Holy men of old spake as they were moved, impelled, urged on, by the Spirit of God." It is in human lives that God has ever spoken. The Word has to become flesh before it can be given to men. There is a childlike craving for graven characters and spoken words. But God has ever spoken in his own way, and the ages have learned that it is intelligible and sufficient.

at once and clapping her hands she shouted, "Oh, here is the Prince! Miss Evelyn, here is the Prince!"

Evelyn was startled, and turning saw Jean coming toward her.

"Why, Jean, where did you drop from? I did not know you were within a hundred miles of here," said Evelyn, as she went to meet Jean with outstretched hand.

"I surely have been transported to Fairyland where there are elves and fairy queens," said Jean.

"Oh, Jean! Did you hear my ridiculous fairy story?" and Evelyn blushed rosy and began to coil up her loose hair.

Jean thought her more beautiful than ever.

"Yes, and it was splendid as far as it went, but you did not finish it," and Jean looked searchingly into Evelyn's face. Her eyes dropped and she stooped to pick up her garden hat that lay on the grass. She felt that in a way Jean had understood her fairy tale, but with a merry laugh she said, "Oh, didn't I? Well, never mind about that, we will finish it another time; just explain your mysterious appearance."

"Well, I took the wood path from the depot and surprised Uncle Jasper and Aunt Mehetabel at the cottage, and Aunt Mehetabel sent me to find you;" but Jean did not go into detail about the eager questioning that had disclosed her whereabouts.

"Oh Miss Evelyn, let's go home! I'm sure it's most supper time."

Margaret had been watching Evelyn and Jean, and was beginning to feel a little slighted.

"Why, Margaret!" Evelyn had almost forgotten her. "This is my friend, Mr. Kirklin. Jean, this is little Margaret Hannibal, and she has been helping me have the very best time ever since I came."

"Margaret, I am just 'Jean' to you and Miss Evelyn, and you will let me into some of your good times, won't you?" and Jean picked the little sprite of a girl up and tossed her high.

"Y-e-s, you can have part of me and part of Miss Evelyn, but you can't have all of her for she is my bestest friend," said Margaret with hesitation.

"Yes, Jean, Margaret and I will help to give you a jolly good vacation," said Evelyn.

"I'm glad, though, that you're not a real prince, for they nearly always carry off the princess. Come on, let's go!" and Margaret wriggled out of Jean's arms and skipped across the bridge and up the path, leading Jean and Evelyn a merry chase through the woods toward the cottage.

Newspaper Accuracy.

S. S. Lappin, editor of the Christian Standard, says, in reporting the Illinois convention at Chicago:

"The newspapers of Chicago are the limit of audacious impertinence and bald misrepresentation. Scarcely a line of truth regarding the convention found its way into print, though true and proper accounts were furnished repeatedly. A half-column report would contain three or four lines of the furnished facts, and the rest would be garbled guesswork and sensational conjecture. When shall we be delivered from this grievous affliction?"

Those friends of Professor Willett who insist on his getting a true statement of his recently criticised lectures in the daily papers will perhaps be able to see from Mr. Lappin's statement how impossible that would be. In the light of such an utterance, it makes one smile at good Professor McGarvey's naivete in saying that because the report of Dr. Willett's lectures was "printed in quotation marks," people could not refrain from giving it credit!

Thirsty For Knowledge.

"Now, children," said the history teacher in her most impressive manner, "I wish you to remember that the time to ask questions in my class is whenever anything is said which you wish explained. Do not wait until the time comes for recitation and then complain that you 'did not hear' or 'did not understand' when I talked."

"Yes'm," chorused the scholars, cheerfully.

"Very well," said the teacher, "we will begin today with James First, who came after Elizabeth."

The new scholar raised his hand.

"What is it?" asked the teacher graciously.

"What made him come after her?" asked the new scholar, eagerly.

The Sunday-School Lesson.

Herbert L. Willett.

ISAIAH'S TEMPERANCE SERMON.

The greatest of the prophets of the Old Testament was Isaiah of Jerusalem. He lived during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, or from about 760 to 690 B. C. He was a man of high social station, and his influence at the court of the kings of Judah was very great. He preached to the people the sanctions of righteousness in spite of the indifference with which the men of his time regarded the message. But there were those whose hearts were touched by the work of the great preacher, and he left an enduring mark upon the history of the nation.

Early Sermons of Isaiah.

His call occurred as he tells us in the year that King Uzziah died (739 B. C.). This call is recorded in the sixth chapter of the book which bears his name. Soon after, during the reign of Jotham the son of Uzziah, he began to preach. Two of his sermons of this period have come down to us. The first (chapters 2-4) is the one dealing with the theme of the "Exalted Mountain." It opens with a picture of the ideal Jerusalem, taken perhaps from some earlier prophet, and then contrasts with it the present condition. The conclusion is that severe judgments are to fall upon the city and its people.

The second sermon, from which the present study is taken, is contained in chapter five, with 9:8-10:4 inserted between verses 25 and 26. It is the sermon of "The Vineyard." On a fruitful hill a friend of the prophet's had set out a vineyard, with all the care which could promise results. To his astonishment only wild grapes appeared. Such had been the experience of God with the carefully planted and abundantly blessed Israel. No fruit had come to maturity. On such an unprofitable property only destruction could fall. The nation's doom hastened to its fulfilment.

Israel's Call to Repentance.

In the course of this arraignment of the sinful nation the prophet took occasion to name and denounce the sins of which the people, and especially the leaders, had been guilty. The first was monopoly. Certain men bought up all the land, till there was no place for the poor on the soil. Field was added to field and house to house till vast estates crowded all but the wealthiest out of possession. This sounds like a very modern charge. Monopoly is one of the facts of our own age which is rousing the conscience of the nation and compelling men to study afresh the ethics of Jesus.

The Sin of Strong Drink.

The second crime to meet the condemnation of Isaiah was drunkenness. Woe is pronounced upon those who spend their days in orgies of intoxication. From morning till night their one concern is self-indulgence. With musical instruments, which always ought to minister to the higher life of men, they aid on the work of depravity. The will and work of God are forgotten. The foundations of sobriety and sound public life are undermined. For these who thus indulge themselves are the leaders of the state. They are the men whose example ought to be a beacon light to all the people. What could be expected when such things prevail? The health of the public life is in jeopardy. The servants of the state are losing all regard for their offices as public trusts, and are employing them as means for private indulgence and debauchery. This, too, sounds like a very present and timely warning against abuses all too common in our own time. People say of the Old Testament that it is a very old and outworn book. Yet to compare its warnings and descriptions of sin with our own age one would think that it were the freshest treatment of public life, hardly dry from the press.

Public Calamities.

The results of these public evils were already seen in the calamities that were falling upon the nation and the city. War had already thrust forth many of the people into slavery. The downfall of morals had brought misfortune and ruin upon the community. All classes were feeling the hardships in which they were involved. They should yet see such troubles as should bring all low, save the God whom they had forgotten, and who should remain exalted in righteousness.

The other classes denounced follow in rapid succession. They are the skeptics and eager sinners, who harness themselves to loads of iniquity and pull sins after them as with cart-ropes. They scoff at the prophet's warning of the wrath of God, and say the Day of God, the time of judgment on sin, will never come. Let God come on with his chastisements; they are not afraid.

Then the perverters come in for a rating. They change the values of good to evil and of evil to good. They delude the people with false estimates of conduct. You can never rely upon their words. They would make sin attractive and virtue odious. There are also the conceited, wise in their own eyes, but ignorant in fact. Men with no qualities for leadership are they, yet attempting to lead. All who follow them are sure to go astray. They are blind leaders of the blind.

Drunken Leaders.

Then at the close of the study the old warning is sounded against the dangers of strong drink. There are judges and public officials who ought to be men of strength. They are strong indeed—to drink wine! They are truly men of strength—to mix intoxicants! There alone have they ability. And the state and city to which they ought to devote their powers suffer because these shepherds have forgotten the flock and are only ambitious to please themselves.

A Public Trust.

Here again is the secret of public loss and scandal today. Office is too often a means of self-gratification rather than a noble duty to all the people. There needs again to be heard the voice of Isaiah in these days of ours. The very fact that the conscience of the cities and of the nation is being aroused on such questions shows better than anything else that Isaiah and the other prophets are being heard. Wordsworth cried out,

"Milton, thou should'st be living at this hour."

But the cry of Wordsworth and many others is the best proof that Milton and the ideals for which he stood are living again in the souls of men. So with the prophets. Isaiah speaks again in every preacher and teacher who stands up against the unsocial practices of an age like our own. In every effort to put down the dreadful curse of the saloon, the prophets, who never knew anything in the public life of Israel so vile as the saloon, are speaking afresh. It is for us to see that their protests against the sins that kill are made effective in the social order of our time.

The Prayer-Meeting.

Silas Jones.

FRUIT-BEARING.

Topic, Sept. 30. John 15:1-8.

In the Old Testament Israel is likened to a vine. The fruit of the vine Israel was never altogether satisfactory. Many times it yielded wild grapes. It may be that the Lord was contrasting himself with Israel when he called himself the true vine.

In the Day of Darkness.

The disciples were to be sifted by temptation. The Lord reminds them of the supreme matter for their consideration. They were to meet bitter taunts and their lives would be endangered, but they were to think first of the relation in which they stood to the Master. Their union with him would make them all that men ought to be. For us of this day the emphasis needs to be placed where Jesus put it. What will all our learning, wealth, and organization profit if we abide not in Christ? Our darkest days may come when all men speak well of us and of the gospel.

The Pruning.

The vinedresser does two things; he cuts off the useless branches and he prunes the fruitful ones so that they bring forth more fruit. A church is to be congratulated when it encounters difficulty. The cowards run at the first sign of danger. They say that if the church had money to put up an attractive building, to employ a more eloquent preacher, if it would get rid of a few disagreeable people, they would stay with it. Every church in the land has these miserable cowards in it. They know nothing of the spirit of sacrifice and therefore nothing of Christianity. Like Judas, they are ready to betray the Master when the high priests of worldliness and greed seek to destroy him. The true disciple is helped by hardships to overcome his faults. He learns by the things he endures to trust his own heart, to feel that it is loyal to the Christ. Much as we dislike the rough road we admire still less the men and women that have always walked in smooth paths. We do not believe in the soundness of their morals or religion.

Ask What Ye Will.

Oneness with Christ causes the lips to speak forth the praises of God and to ask for the things that God is pleased to grant. The vain repetitions of the heathen come from empty lives. Where there is no knowledge of the goodness and mercy of God, men may cry out to the higher powers as they would to a heartless tyrant; they can not pray to the Father in heaven for the extension of his kingdom through all the earth. One of the noblest fruits of union with Christ is true prayer. Formal prayers we have in abundance, more than we like to hear. We have too few of the prayers that bring us to the very throne of God, rebuke our selfishness, purify our hearts and increase our faith.

The Glory of God.

"Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." I saw the other day the United States flag waving over the playgrounds of Ogden Park, Chicago. The nation is exalted when its emblem is displayed by those who serve the people. The flag over the playground teaches patriotism. God is glorified when those who employ the symbols of faith are servants of mankind. Is your church despised or ignored by the people of your community? Ask whether it has made itself necessary to the life of the people. You may find that it is to the credit of the people that they despise it, for it may not be doing the work of the Lord. Marion Lawrance says a Sunday-school is generally as large as it deserves to be. We may say the same of a church. A church that is doing what God demands of it will be honored and God will be glorified through it.

Lesson XVI. Outline of Bible History.

1. The Hebrews.

While the Bible is not a book of history, its purpose being to reveal the life and purposes of God, it is still so interwoven with the experiences of the Hebrew people, through whom that revelation was made to the world, that the important events in their history are the landmarks of revelation. The Hebrew people was chosen to be the race through whom the true faith should appear, not because it was more cultured than others, nor because God preferred it to its neighbors. It was because it possessed the qualities of teachableness and appreciation of the divine will, and was better able to serve as an instrument through whom all nations might be blessed. The Hebrews belonged to that group of nations called Semites, the descendants of Shem. They were closely related by race to the Assyrians, Babylonians, Arabs, Phoenicians, Moabites and Edomites around them. They came into Canaan as a small group of people under the leadership of Abraham, just as other migrations had brought other groups of Semites into the same region at an earlier date. They came from a land where idolatry was practiced, and even in the western region, which they now occupied for a time, they were surrounded by idolators. the Canaanites of the low country, and the Amorites of the hills. Here Abraham and his family built their altars to the true God, and though strangers in the land, lived successively at such centers as Shechem, Beersheba and Hebron. (Gen. 12-25.)

2. The Settlement in Canaan.

The patriarchal history of the Hebrews includes the names of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and the twelve sons of the latter, who became the fathers of the twelve tribes of Israel. Israel was a name given to Jacob, and it soon became the title of the entire group of clans. One of the sons of Jacob, Joseph, was carried into Egypt and rose to high favor at the court of the Pharaoh. Impelled by famine and the better opportunities offered by the hospitality of the Egyptians, the Hebrew tribes migrated to the region of Goshen in the east of the Delta in Egypt. Here as time passed their condition became increasingly difficult, owing to the oppression with which, under the change of dynasties to native princes, they were treated. At length, some time in the thirteenth century B. C., probably not far from the year 1200, the oppressed people departed under the leadership of Moses, who from this time became the recognized head of the nation, and whose influence was perpetuated throughout its history. The journey led across an arm of the Gulf of Suez, where the providential deliverance of the people in the face of almost certain destruction forever fixed itself in the memory of Israel as the proof of Jehovah's power and protecting love. In the wilderness at Mt. Sinai the primitive institutes were promulgated by Moses and the religion of Israel as a belief in the one God and as the effort to fulfill his righteous will assumed definite form. Moses led the people toward Canaan, the land where their fathers had dwelt, bringing them, through the conquest of Edom and Moab, to the regions east of the Jordan, where he surrendered the leadership to Joshua. Under the command of the latter Israel gradually came into possession of Canaan west of the Jordan, although for many years the people were closely associated with their idolatrous neighbors, the former possessors of the land. (Gen. 26—Josh.)

3. The Days of the Judges.

The period that followed was one of very slow and painful growth toward national unity. The leadership of strong men like Moses and Joshua was lacking. The religious life of the people was too often characterized by superstition and idolatry through the example of the Canaanites. Here and there local chieftains arose in answer to the necessities of their own tribes, but "there was no king in Israel in those days, and every man did that which was right in own eyes." Among the leaders who brought deliverance to different sections of the nation were Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Jepthah, Samson, and Samuel. Under the latter the nation began to acquire a sense of unity and a truer conception of the nature of God and the demands of religion upon them. (Judges, Ruth).

4. The Hebrew Monarchy.

It was the preaching of Samuel and those associated with him in the prophetic work which brought to Israel at last the desire to manifest more fully its life as a people with definite purposes and with a unique religion. The people asked for a king, and Saul, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, was chosen. A man of excellent qualities, but not in true sympathy with the program of Samuel, Saul's kingship was scarcely more than experimental. It soon became evident that another kind of man must assume the leadership in Israel. This man was found in David of Bethlehem, a member of the tribe of Judah, whose rapid rise to popularity at the court of Saul gave promise of better things. He came to the throne about 1017 B. C., and ruled for forty years. During this period Jerusalem, the stronghold of the Jebusites, was captured and made the political and religious center of the nation. The organization of the kingdom was begun in a manner unthought of in Saul's day. A standing army was maintained, and revenues were secured from the various provinces. The boundaries of the kingdom were extended through the personal achievements of David, and later of his chief warriors. The ark of Jehovah, which had remained in obscurity since the days of the Judges, was brought to Jerusalem with rejoicing, and preparations were made for the erection of a temple. Solomon, the son and successor of David, increased Israel's territories and renown. Ascending the throne in 977 B. C., he reigned, like his father, forty years. He erected palaces in Jerusalem, and completed his father's plans by building the temple on the height of Mt. Zion or Moriah, north of the city. Commerce with neighboring nations was encouraged and expeditions were sent to India and the west, which brought back treasures to enrich the capital. (I Samuel—1 Kings).

CHURCH EXTENSION NOTES.

Remember that the books close on Wednesday, September 30th, and that all offerings should be sent promptly on Monday, the 28th, so as to reach Kansas City by the 30th. Remit to G. W. Muckley, 500 Water Works building, Kansas City, Mo., by personal check, draft, express or money order.

There are now before the Board worthy applications for loans aggregating $97,000. Offerings should continue to be taken in October until every coöperating church is heard from. Do not refuse to send an offering because it may be small. Let us join heartily in a work so necessary to the mission churches we have created.

Many new applications will be coming in after the offering for aid to build. Note this fact: Only the worthy church is aided. The really needy church is the one that, having done everything to help itself, is yet unable to build its workshop and home. Let all the brethren note that these churches are self-reliant, after all, because they ask for loans, not gifts; loans that will be returned to the Board to go out again.

Since September 1st three new annuity gifts have been received: $300 from a brother in Indiana, $250 from a sister in California, and $500 from a sister in Colorado. Plan to give some annuity money this fall to the Board of Church Extension, because annuity money builds churches just the same as 4 per cent money. As to the plan, inquire of G. W. Muckley, 500 Water Works building, Kansas City, Mo.

Rev. M. M. Davis, of the Central Church, Dallas, Texas, has resigned, after a pastorate of many years. We understand his resignation has been accepted.

The newspapers are announcing the union of Free Baptists and Disciples in the control of Kenka College, New York, by the Disciples gaining a half-interest in the institution. S. E. Space is the president.

Waynesburg, Pa., Sept. 10th, 1908.

I spent my vacation month of August in supplying the morning service at the East End Church, Pittsburg. During the evenings of the week and Sunday evening I held a meeting at Lone Pine, Pa. This was my second meeting with this church. It was a good meeting. There were forty added, all by baptism. Brother I. N. Fry will preach for this church the coming year. The work at Waynesburg moves along hopefully.

F. A. Bright, Minister.

A good meeting is in progress at Flanagan, Ill., conducted by John R. Golden and Charles E. McVay, singer. Mr. McVay has organized a large junior and senior chorus. The meeting has been in progress but a few days, and there have already been some accessions to the church. R. E. Thomas is the local minister. The meeting will continue throughout September.

H. F. Kern closed a two weeks' meeting at the New Salem, Mo., church Sunday evening, September 13. There were seven confessions and good interest was shown in the work.

TELEGRAMS.

Grand Island, Neb., Sept. 14, 1908.

Christian Century:—Meeting closed with twenty added at last night's invitation, making 129 total. Bible-school almost trebled; new converts pledge $500 to current expenses; pastor's salary raised, church rejoicing. Missouri Valley, Iowa, next.

Wm. J. Lockhart and Garmong.

Fostoria, Ohio, Sept. 13, 1908.

Christian Century:—Hundreds could not get in to hear Herbert Yeuell tonight. One hundred twenty-six to date; twenty-two today. Wonderful victory for this conservative city and comparatively unknown church. Two union meetings within a year utterly failed. Our audiences very safe and confessions every service. Yeuell's two men's and women's meetings greatest in history of Fostoria. Membership doubled. We are praising the Lord for this victory. V. G. Hostetter.

A VISION OF A CHRISTIAN COLONY.

Rev. S. J. Vance.

I am planning a return trip to the Great Snake River country of Southern Idaho with a view to securing a home under the Carey Act on which to live when I am too old to preach, as I am not yet reconciled to the Osler Act.

Under this Act (the Carey Act, not the Osler Act), one can buy land at 50 cents per acre of the state and secure a perpetual water right at $15 to $35 per acre share on ten annual payments and this in a land of the big red apple, big hay-stacks, wheat 30 and 60 bushels per acre, sugar beets 20 tons to the acre and other bountiful crops with a genial sunshine and a health-giving climate.

Last month I stood on an 80,000 acre tract of this land just opened to settlement under the Carey Act by the Big Lost River Irrigation Company and had a vision. A vision of a great colony of prosperous, contented and happy Christian homes on these broad rich acres and when I awoke I thought, why not realize the vision, for it is here I want a home and it is here you can get one, my brother, if you want it, as there are yet 60,000 acres of this fertile valley unappropriated, but it will not remain so long.

If you wish to investigate with a view to a home, write me, enclosing stamp for reply and I will gladly give you what information I can about this most wonderful country.

Carthage, Mo.

An Irishman intended to take up a homestead claim, but did not know how to go about it. "Mike," he said, "you've taken a homestead, and I thought maybe you could tell me the law concerning how to go about it." "Well, Dennis, I don't remember the exact wording of the law, but I can give the meaning of it. The meaning of it is this: the government is willing to bet ye one hundred and sixty acres of land agin fourteen dollars that ye can't live on it five years without starving to death."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

WHAT MAKES GRANDMA CROSS?

My mamma's gone away today,
And grandma's cross;
My mamma told me to be good.
I've tried to help just all I could,
And haven't done a thing that should Make grandma cross.

I cleared away the breakfast things
Quick as a fly;
The gravy spilled a little mite,
Although I hugged the platter tight.
But, if I was an "awful sight,"
I didn't cry.

I went upstairs to make the beds
And dust around;
I filled the bathtub to the brim,
So Jack Tar could learn to swim—
And then I jumped in after him
Before he drowned.

I really thought the parlor should
Be dusted, too;
An angel fell down on his face
And hit a Royal Worcester vase—
I put the pieces back in place
With Stickum's glue.

I've been as good as good can be—
But grandma's cross;
I've swept, I've ironed all my clothes,
I've washed the windows with the hose,
What in the world do you suppose
Makes grandma cross?

—Sarah Abbey Davis, in Children's Magazine.

—"What's your occupation, bub?" asked a visitor at the Capitol of a bright boy whom he met in the corridor. The boy happened to be a page in the White House. "I'm running for Congress, sir," he replied.—Christian Intelligencer.

A little colored boy was sentenced to a short term in the penitentiary, where he was sent to learn a trade. A friendly white acquaintance asked, "Well, what did they put you at in prison, Ranse?" "Dey started in to make an honest boy out'n me, sah." "That's good, Ranse, how did they teach you to be honest?" "Dey done put me in the shoe shop, sah, nailin' pasteboard onter shoes fo' soles, sah."

The old gentleman was very angry, there could be no doubt about that. Threatening the other with his fist, he shouted, "If your brain was put in a mustard seed it would have as much room as a shrimp in the Atlantic!"

On leaving his study, which is in the rear of the church, the pastor of a church in Brooklyn saw a little boy, a friend of his, talking to a stranger. "What was he saying to you, Dick?" asked the divine as he came up to the youngster. "He just wanted to know whether Dr. Blank was the preacher of this church." "And what did you tell him?" "I told him," responded the lad, with dignity, "that you were the present encumbrance."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

—Eighteen magnificent state buildings at the Jamestown Exposition, which originally cost between $300,000 and $350,000, have all been sold for about $56,000, just about one-fifth of the original cost.

BEFORE THE BOOKS CLOSE.

Treasurer, Do not Steal! Of course you would not for yourself. No, you would not even steal for your children or your church! What do you call it when money given for Missions is used for the janitor's wages or the minister's salary or interest on the church debt?

Minister, do not halt! If you have shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God, your church has had fellowship in every good word and work. Look over the receipts and see that the assortment is complete: State Missions, Ministerial Relief, Education, Foreign Missions, National Benevolence, Home Missions and Church Extension. Look into the record of the Bible school, Christian Endeavor and C. W. B. M. When you are sure that all is well, come on down to New Orleans and help to rightly inaugurate the greatest year of all!

Christian, do not Murder! "Destroy not with thy meat him for whom Christ died!" We are near the end of the year for all the organized agencies through which the churches of Christ are advancing his kingdom. Devote an evening to examining your personal record since last September. You have completed the circle of the year and God's grace has not failed at any point. But are there not some entries that you wish made to your credit before the books close? Compare your outlay for food with your payments to your local church. Put side by side your expenditures for clothing and your gifts to benevolence. Bracket together your rent and your offerings to your college. How do Missions compare with Pleasure in the year's outlay? Or has the extension of God's kingdom become your chief delight? Have you not forgotten the disabled preacher who forgot himself for you? Square up like a man and then you'll feel able to come down to New Orleans!

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

FOR SALE—A Bargain, Preacher's library, including Meyer's Commentaries on New Testament, Hastings' Dictionary (6 vols.) Century dictionary (10 vols. with case) many others up to date. Prices and list sent to applicants. About 30 per cent below cost. J. W. J., Lock Box 175, Rockwell City, Iowa.

THE NATIONAL BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The National Benevolent Association has just received a fine two-flat house in St. Louis. This property was given for the enlargement of its work for aged, indigent disciples.

The Association is exceedingly anxious to sell this property as it is in great need of money. The Jacksonville, Illinois, Home is full, with many worthy applicants waiting an opportunity to enter.

The property is very attractive for a home or an investment. He who buys it will help himself, his brethren and the Lord.

Two friends of the Gospel of the Helping Hand have recently made contributions on the annuity plan. Mrs. Eliza Williams has given $200 and Mrs. Ann M. Cook $400. One of these good sisters is an old friend of the cause. She has the joy of having given for several years for the benefit of her less fortunate brothers and sisters. The other is just entering heartily into fellowship with Christ in this holy ministry.

Chas. Reign Scoville will deliver the address for the Gospel of the Helping Hand at New Orleans. The National Benevolent Association will present an exceptionally stirring program at our National Convention.

The Association is just closing one of the most fruitful years in its history. It has been a hard year, however. While Easter offering showed a very decided gain over last year, the offering for the entire year is less than last year. Its candle has burned at both ends. The business depression in the country reduced the income and increased the outgo by increasing the number needing aid. The new building in St. Louis, made necessary if the orphanage was to continue its great work, has greatly added to the Association's burden. The income has been light during the summer. The Association is the sole support of about 400 orphan children. It calls upon every friend of Christ to come into fellowship with him as he seeks through his church to feed the hungry and clothe the naked.

BETHESDA ACADEMY—A PECULIAR INSTITUTION.

Bethesda Academy, an Industrial School and Orphanage located at Limestone, Tenn., appeals for aid to carry on its special class of work, the education and Christian training of the poor of the mountain children, the cotton mill children, the coal mining children and the children of the common farm renter and laborer of the South. This institution seeks only that class of young people and orphan children turned down by the existing schools and colleges. It advises all able to pay their way at other schools and colleges to go to them. It confines its efforts entirely to that class absolutely unable to pay their way in other schools. There are now in the Institution almost one hundred children and young people dependent upon the free will offerings of God's people for food and clothing. New buildings are going up for the institution, a plant being built to accommodate five to seven hundred children and young people. Applications are on file from every southern state, besides a number of states in the West and North. This Institution has never turned a real needy child or young person from its doors. It owns a fine farm of two hundred and fifty acres of land, and prominent people over the country are uniting to raise $400,000 more fully to equip the institution and enlarge it until it can fully do the great work laid upon it. If room was at the disposal of the institution, two hundred children would be in the Home within the next three months. What Tuskegee Institute means to the negro of the South, Bethesda Academy will mean to the mountain, cotton mill, coal mine, and farm renter white child. A postal card will bring to your address a copy of "The Bethesda Beacon" published in the interests of this institution. Will you not send your check today? Food, clothing and education are badly needed.

CHRISTIAN WOMAN'S BOARD OF MISSIONS.

Forecasts for the National Convention.

The Church in all lands is making preparation for this. Gifts and reports of work are coming from India, Jamaica, South America, Porto Rico, Mexico, New Zealand, Africa, and from all our missions in the United States.

The delegates and all who can attend are studying the program and in thought and prayer are making ready for the feast of days. A great host who cannot attend are aiding in the gathering of funds and the compiling of reports and even now are looking in hopeful anticipation toward the Annual Convention.

The receipts for September, 1907, were $55,849.91. If we can make our receipts $60,000 for September, 1908, we will reach our financial aim. Tell this out to the friends and encourage the very best effort possible. We believe it can be done. You perhaps have noted that the June, July and August receipts for 1908 have exceeded the receipts for the corresponding months for 1907.

Our speakers feel the burden of responsibility. This sense of obligation will yield masterful messages. Leaders in the council chambers are searching the field of methods that in the convention conferences the newest and best agencies may be evolved.

Prominent speakers will be W. G. Menzies of India; C. H. Winders, Indianapolis; W. R. Warren, Pittsburgh, and Mrs. N. E. Atkinson, Indianapolis. The Netz Sisters and Miss Una Dell Berry will thrill our hearts with their beautiful song messages.

The Missionaries' period is always a good hour—the choicest in point of real heart power. Four of our lands abroad, India, Mexico, Porto Rico and Jamaica, will be rep-

A KENTUCKY EXPERIENCE.

Coffee and Tea Still at Work.

A Ky. lady had a very agreeable experience, in leaving off coffee drinking which she found harmful, and taking on Postum. She never loses an opportunity to tell others of her good fortune. She says:

"For over twenty years I suffered from nervous trouble. Four years ago I was down with nervous prostration and heart trouble. After several months of misery, my doctor, one of the best in the country, told me I must quit coffee and tea.

"What was I to do? I must have some warm beverage for breakfast as I had never done without one in my life.

"I decided to try Postum, little thinking it would amount to anything. At first I did not like it, but when we boiled it 15 minutes, until it was dark and rich, it was delicious, and I soon began to feel better.

"After using Postum constantly three years I feel like a different person. I always had been a poor sleeper but now sleep well and am in perfect health. And I give the credit to Postum.

"My entire family now use it in preference to any other beverage at meals. I am an enthusiastic friend of Postum and I know that what it has done for me it will do for others, so I never let a chance go by to recommend it to those who suffer from coffee drinking."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

resented. Mrs. Menzies and Miss Zonetta Vanca will speak for India.

J. H. Fuller and Mrs. Bertha Mason Fuller will be there from Monterey, Mexico, also Miss Bertha Westrup.

Mrs. Maria Reynolds Ford and Miss Nora Siler will speak for Porto Rico.

William Pearne and wife, who have served the work in Jamaica, will bring a message from our first foreign mission field.

Mrs. N. E. Atkinson will give the closing address and conduct the memorial hour.

Mrs. M. E. Harlan, Cor. Sec'y.

A FINAL WORD.

This is our last word before the books of the Foreign Society close, September 30. It is important that every church and Sunday-school and Endeavor Society and personal friend of the work send in their offerings before that date. This will be recognized at once.

We gladly report personal offerings pouring in from every quarter as never before. We ask all for one final rally.

So far we have received more different gifts than in any former year. This indicates a wide and growing interest. It seems now that the churches, Sunday-schools and Endeavor societies, both in numbers of contributions and in total amounts, will surpass all previous records. There is a threatened loss, however, in annuities.

For the first ten days of September there has been a gain of $1,923 from the churches, $506 from the Sunday-schools and a total gain from all sources for ten days of $4,547.

It is gratifying to be able to report twenty new missionaries sent to the field, the greatest number in any one year in the history of the work. Most cheering news comes from every mission field.

Let all the friends of the work remember that the books must close promptly, September 30, for the reports to the New Orleans convention, October 12.

Please forward to F. M. Rains, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio, who will promptly return a proper receipt.

AN APPEAL TO THE BROTHERHOOD FOR THE RELIEF OF AN AGED SISTER IN DISTRESS.

Dear Brother Editor:—Knowing no other way I can bring about relief for my aunt, Miss Mary E. Sparks of Bennett, Iowa, in her present distress, being a deformed scrofulous cripple and thus physically deprived of lifting this burden privately. Noticing the good works our brotherhood has done along this line I write asking you if I can place an appeal before them through the Christian Century asking aid in raising a subscription for said aunt's relief?

Her condition is as follows. Owning a small home in the country where she hoped to spend her days, but for lack of funds to meet repairs her house has gradually gone to ruin until now it has been pronounced by the county poor authorities as unsanitary to live in.

It is in the following condition: Previously a four-room cottage, but now the kitchen is completely worn out and abandoned, leaving but one room to serve as kitchen, dining and living room; in this room the windows are all worn out, upper part completely worthless, making it inconvenient and in one impossible to raise the lower sash, and thus causing the heat to be very uncomfortable in the summer. Besides this room there are two small bed chambers, one unfit for use, owing to its window being completely closed up. Floor and doors wearing out and plaster falling off the walls of all the rooms. Outside the house, the roofing and weatherboarding are rotting and falling off, making the house very damp, uncomfortable and unhealthful in both summer and winter. This is why the poor-authorities are making a complaint; while they affirm they will not render enough private aid to repair the house, they are requesting that we go to the poorhouse.

Not knowing any way to better her condition, the trouble has nearly worried my old aunt to death, as she cannot bear the thought of being separated from her home.

This is why I come to you asking that you help me raise a subscription to save her her home, as this is all my physical condition will let me do.

Believing it to be the reader's due to be told a little of the private history of those asking their charity, so that they will know they are not aiding impostors, I give a short sketch of my aunt's life, a personal remark, and the signature of one of our town merchants as reference to testify that this cause is worthy of your sympathy and aid.

Mary Ellen Sparks was born in Green county, Ohio, ninety-five years ago, was the youngest child of Andrew S. and Jane Sparks and is the only surviving member of her parent's large family of twelve. Her father was among the first that entered the reformation, giving his whole heart to the cause of Christ and bringing up his children strong in the faith.

Aunt Mary united with the church in Green county, Ind., her parents having moved there at an early date, later moving to Cedar county, Iowa. Here Aunt Mary entered membership in the Inland Christian Church, which was a thriving body at this time, entering and working faithfully in the Sunday-school and church work until the disorganization about twenty years ago. Was highly esteemed by the ministers who preached for this congregation, namely Bros. Simpson, Ely, Ingram, Painter, and others.

Personally I am a member of the First Christian Church of Davenport, Iowa, being immersed October 9, 1906, by Bro. A. Martin while he was ministering to this congregation at this time, and if he happens to see this letter will recall the incident.

Will those contributing to the subscription please send funds in some safe way? Address letters to Cora C. Haselton, Route 1, Cedar county, Bennett, Iowa.

Testimony:—The following party testifies by his signature to the truthfulness of Miss Sparks' above related condition.

R. J. Johann, Bennett, Iowa.

A MODEL MISSION STUDY CLASS AT NEW ORLEANS CONVENTION.

Professor C. T. Paul of Hiram College is to conduct a Convention Mission Study Class during the National Convention session this year. This promises to be one of the most interesting and helpful features of the entire convention. Professor Paul has taught for years, the largest mission study class in the world. This last year the enrolment was about 200. His class is the most popular in the college. He knows how to popularize mission study. Many classes are being organized all over the brotherhood. The great question is "How may I teach missions in the most successful way?" Those who attend the New Orleans Convention can have an exhibition of the real thing. Professor Paul will use a text book on Home Missions and one on Foreign Missions. A large hall in the same building with the convention auditorium has been secured. The class will be held from 8:30 to 9:30 each morning. This will be before the regular program begins and will not interfere with it in the least. Every preacher and worker in attendance at the convention should attend this class straight

THE WAY OUT
From Weakness to Power by Food Route.

Getting the right start for the day's work often means the difference between doing things in wholesome comfort, or dragging along half dead all day.

There's more in the use of proper food than many people ever dream of—more's the pity.

"Three years ago I began working in a general store," writes a man, "and between frequent deliveries and more frequent customers, I was kept on my feet from morning till night.

"Indigestion had troubled me for some time, and in fact my slight breakfast was taken more from habit than appetite. At first this insufficient diet was not noticed much, but at work it made me weak and hungry long before noon.

"Yet a breakfast of rolls, fried foods and coffee meant headache, nausea and kindred discomforts. Either way I was losing weight and strength, when one day a friend suggested that I try a 'Grape-Nuts breakfast.'

"So I began with some stewed fruit, Grape-Nuts and cream, a soft boiled egg, toast, and a cup of Postum. By noon I was hungry but with a healthy, normal appetite. The weak languid feeling was not there.

"My head was clearer, nerves steadier than for months. Today my stomach is strong, my appetite normal, my bodily power splendid and head always clear."

"There's a Reason."

through. The text books used will be "The Why and How of Foreign Missions" and "The Frontier." We believe hundreds of strong mission study classes will result from this class. The hour has been put early in the morning that the minds of the people may be alert and receptive. It would be vastly worth while to attend such a class before breakfast. Eight thirty is not early—the class is possible for all. The sessions will be held Saturday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday mornings.

"THE FRENCH MARKET IN NEW ORLEANS."

The French Market was at first a resort for the Indians, who brought for sale the dried sassafras leaves from which "gumbo file" is made. These Indians belonged to the powerful Choctaw tribe, which never took up arms against the United States, but were bound by deepest ties to the early troubles of the settlers of Louisiana, were always at the side of the colonists in the early troubles of the settlement, and when Jackson led the Americans against the British, on that memorable 8th of January, 1815, they followed the fortunes of the Americans and merited a compliment from "Old Hickory" in his report to the government.

In 1723 the French first built the market on this spot; but it was destroyed by a hurricane, and the present market was built in 1813 at a cost of $30,000 and stands on the exact spot where the first market was built.

The buyers and sellers are men and women of all races; there are the Gascow butchers, the Italians and Spanish fruit venders, the German and Italian vegetable women; there are the Moors with their strings of beads and crosses, fresh from the Holy Land; there are peddlers and tinners and small notion dealers, the "rabais," "Mew" with their little stores on wheels, there are Chinese, Hindu, Jew, Teuton, Malay, Spanish, French, Creole and English all united in a ceaseless babel of tongues that is simply bewildering.

The highest praise that can be bestowed upon any article for sale in the market is to declare that it is Creole; hence one hears on every side the application, "Creole chickens," "Creole eggs," "Creole vegetables," "Creole Figs," "Creole oranges," etc. This term is used to distinguish the commercial produce of Louisiana from that brought in from other countries. The term "Creole" means a native of Spanish America or the West Indies, descended from European ancestors. The Creoles are a noble, pure blooded race who are proud of their descent from the best families of France and Spain, who applied to themselves the term "Creole" to distinguish the "old families" of the state from the families of emigrants or of other nationalities. Marion Crawford said of them, after visiting New Orleans, "You will find in little old French houses old fashioned and tumbling in ruins—houses that must have been built in the last century with their long hallways opening upon queer little courtyards, and all suggesting another age and civilization—a people the most charming and cultured that I have ever met, with all the grace and dignity of manners and the equal in birth and bearing of the grace of the most distinguished in European centers." Such are the inhabitants in the district of the French Market, which is not far from the Atheneum Hall, where the sessions of our International Missionary Convention will be held October 9-15, and it will prove a most delightful diversion for you to rise early some morning during the convention and make the rounds for the greatest study in sociology it has been the privilege of any one to have outside of New Orleans.

This is the one convention of your life that you cannot afford to miss.

Torturing Animals To Assist Science

Is A Cruel Method to Follow, But It Has Saved Many Human Lives.

Prof. Pawlow, of Russia, was engaged for many years in experimental work, trying to learn the workings of digestion, especially the digestive glands.

He, with able assistants, operated upon dogs, eats, guinea pigs and other animals.

His methods were seemingly painful, but he gave to science a work which won the Nobel prize and made for him an undying fame.

Science penetrated the secrets of nature. Prof. Pawlow saw animals digest food. He analyzed juices from every part of the digestive canal and stomach under all conditions of digestion. He spent years of ceaseless study amid the howling and dying beasts, but he won, and science today looks upon him as a great man.

"To do a great right do a little wrong" Shakespeare said, and Prof. Pawlow obeyed this trite saying.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are prepared by the most scientific process. They are produced by modern appliances, and meet the demand of 20th century chemistry.

They give man the means to correct his infirmities of stomach and digestive organs.

They enrich the blood, give nature the juices and fluids she lacks, stop the formation of noxious gases and the fermentation of food. They neutralize powerful acids and alkalies, which irritate and devour the stomach. They prevent and relieve bowel and intestinal trouble and soothe the nerves.

They should be used after every meal whether one has dyspepsia and stomach trouble or the stomach be naturally healthy. By their use one may eat at all hours and whatever one desires and they help the system digest or throw off such food. They are thoroughly meritorious as their tremendous sale and popularity illustrate.

Every drug store has them for sale, price 50c per package. If you would like to test their merits free, send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail without cost. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

Special Excursion to New Orleans

INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONVENTION CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA

The Illinois Central Railroad has been selected as the official route by Illinois Disciples and the company has provided special train service at a rate of twenty-seven dollars ($27.00) for the round trip. This splendid service and the low rate secured should and undoubtedly will induce a great many of the Brotherhood to attend this splendid convention. The city of New Orleans is almost an ideal place to visit. Its beauty, its countless attractions, its old landmarks and buildings re-calling an historic past—New Orleans and this international convention will surely make an irresistible appeal to many hundreds in the churches of Christ. Some churches will appreciate the wisdom of sending their pastors at their expense, and many pastors will feel compelled to go at any cost.

The excursion tickets permit a stopover at Vicksburg and the National Military Park, together with a ride of one hundred miles on the Mississippi River between Vicksburg and Natchez, including meals and berth on the steamer, at an additional cost of $3.50.

Special train will leave Chicago at 6:00 p. m., Wednesday, October 7, and arrive at New Orleans at 8:15 p. m. the next day. An attractive folder has been issued by the Illinois Central Railroad and can be obtained free by application to any of the passenger agents or to Mr. R. J. Carmichael, city ticket office, 117 Adams street, Chicago.

May 09

I read Shakespeare, Wordsworth, Tennyson and Coleridge for views of man to meditate upon, instead of theological caricatures of humanity; and I go out into the country to feel God; dabble in chemistry to feel awe of him; read the life of Christ to understand, love and adore him; and my experience is closing into this—that I turn with disgust from everything but Christ. A sublime feeling of a presence comes upon me at times, which makes inward solitariness a trifle to talk about.

An Unparalleled Offer

Books of special current interest to all Disciples offered at an unusual bargain price or sent free with each new subscription to The Christian Century. With our Centennial Anniversary only a short way off, these records of our early history and these early historic documents are of wide and profound interest. Christian Union is now on every lip, but comparatively few know or realize what an important work Alexander Campbell undertook or what our Brotherhood has accomplished in this direction. Disciples should read their own splendid history. Here are the records:

12mo, silk cloth, gilt top, 365 pp., $1.00.

This volume includes (1) "The Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery," as it was put forth June 28, 1804, and signed by Robert Marshall, John Dunlavy, Richard McNemar, B. W. Stone, John Thompson and David Purviance; (2) the "Declaration and Address" of Thomas Campbell, set forth in 1809, when the "Associate Synod of North America" virtually reaffirmed the censure pronounced upon him by the Presbytery. Here are the great watchwords spoken by the real formulator of the principles of the Brotherhood and its effort for "the restoration of primitive Christianity." (3) "The Sermon on the Law," by Alexander Campbell, pronounced at a meeting of the Regular Baptist Association on Cross Creek, Virginia, 1816. (4) "Our Position," as set forth by Isaac Errett, and (5) "The World's Need of Our Plea," by J. H. Garrison. Also several chapters of introduction by Dr. C. A. Young.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES.

Bound in green silk cloth, 8vo, $1.00.

This volume is a fortunate companion to the Historical Documents, containing as it does a detailed description of these and many other early documents, as well as early and late discussions of them all. This book, edited by Professor Errett Gates, of the University, with an introduction by the late Dr. Eri B. Hulbert, has been heartily welcomed wherever seen, and will be regarded as an important contribution to the literature of our fellowship. The addresses, and particularly the debates of Alexander Campbell, are fully delineated and their bearing on later and present day discussion clearly shown.

BASIC TRUTHS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

By Professor Herbert L. Willett, Ph. D. Cloth and gold, 12mo, 75c.

A frank and able discussion of the great tenets of the Christian faith, with chapters on The Primacy of Christ, The Father, The Scriptures, The Death and Resurrection of Christ, Faith, Repentance, Baptism, etc. An attractive volume, with illustrations appropriate to the inspiring theme.

SPECIAL OFFER

These are our own publications and for a limited time we are going to offer free to new subscribers their choice of the above volumes. Any present subscriber may send in his own renewal together with one new name and $3.00 and will receive his choice of the above books (one) and also a paper bound copy of "The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples." This special offer will be withdrawn soon.

EDITORIAL

Orthodoxy and Ethics.

This week we are giving space to the report of a church council held in Chicago concerning the alleged unethical conduct of the pastor of a mission church. The publication of this report raises the whole question of the cause of disturbance in our churches.

It is true that we have had a few churches in the course of our history which have had local disturbance and even division over the theological opinions of their pastors. In some cases such division has been ascribed to theological causes when in reality it was due to other local causes, such as jealousy over leadership in the local church. In all the history of our movement extending through a century, however, we have not had as many churches ruined by heresy as we have lost this past year by reason of the unworthy lives of some of our ministers.

Do our journals think that the heresy of the relatively few is more menacing than the immorality and unspiritual living of those relatively far more numerous? Do our journals in fulminating ferocious editorials against higher criticism consider this question of more importance than a clean family life in the ministry? Is the paying of debts a mere bagatelle compared with the solemn issue of combatting the evolutionary method in theology? Ethics surely do receive their sanction from religion and the preservation of a sane theology may have some connection with the moral life. But from the point of view of practical church administration, one unworthy minister failing in the fundamental matter of living right brings more reproach on the church than all our heretics possibly can.

The primitive game of head-hunting commands no admiration out in the world of today when we attempt to decapitate a man because of his opinions. Should all of our journals join for one year, however, in the hunting down of men of vile lives masquerading as true ministers of the word, we would advance the church in the eyes of the world beyond calculation.

Ideals of the Market Place.

It is often asserted that the men of the mart are indifferent to the higher life of the cities in which they live. There is no doubt much truth in this statement. The passion for success is upon the American, and it is difficult for him to take time to consider the things that make for individual and community growth into moral and spiritual stature. The idols of the market place take far more of his time than its ideals.

Yet there are times when another vision of the facts can be secured, and the real heart of a great town reveals itself. Such an occasion was witnessed in this city last week when a thousand and more members of the Association of Commerce met at a banquet in the Auditorium Hotel and listened not only with close attention but with enthusiasm to the addresses of men who pointed out to them the ideals for which a great city should stand.

The Association of Commerce is the strongest of all the organizations in Chicago. It numbers in its membership three thousand of the most notable men in the town. The merchant princes, the captains of industry and the makers of empire in the American sense are of its fellowship. It sends out its representatives after trade, and they bring it from the ends of the earth. It points out to Congress and the State Legislature the opportunities for the improvement of its river, harbor, park system, and public utilities of various sorts, and the suggestions are heeded.

But best of all, it is devoting itself to the improvement of the morale of business life, the betterment of city politics, the care of the improvident and helpless and the beautification of the city which has sprung so rapidly into commanding influence not only in the Mississippi basin but throughout the nation. For such services the Association is able to command the time and earnest labors of men the most successful in the business world, who at no other call, not even that of the church, would devote themselves to such tasks. This is a notable sign of the times.

The addresses of the occasion mentioned dealt with these very issues. Jacob Riis came from New York to point out the "Duties of Citizenship," and every word was listened to with the closest attention. The other speakers dwelt upon similar themes, and every telling point was hailed with strong approval. There is much that is discouraging in a modern city. But its sin and shame are ever before us. Its quiet ministries of goodness and devotion we rarely see. Reforms are slow. But there are those, and their number is great, who watch for better things as for the dawn, and of their number not a few are adding prayer and labor to their waiting. The City of God is coming faster than we know.

"Dry Baptistries."

A good deal of anxiety is being expressed in certain quarters over dry baptistries. There is no doubt that it is a serious thing for a church to cease to grow in membership. The law of self-preservation and the very spirit of Christianity as it finds expression in Christian missions demand that the churches shall be aggressive evangelistic agencies.

The cause of dry baptistries is often confidently asserted to be the preaching of liberal doctrine. There can be no doubt that this is occasionally true. Not all truth is good for present use. Both Jesus and Paul reserved some of the message they had to deliver until a time when it would prove helpful. And furthermore there are those who would make a hobby even of some of the truths of a liberal theology. The hobbyist makes no converts, though he may figure with scare headlines in a sensational press at times. On the other hand it is abundantly demonstrated that a liberal theology properly used is quite as effective as any other kind. The careers of such men as Gypsy Smith and W. J. Dawson are abundant evidence of this. There are a number of men in our own brotherhood with the evangelistic gift who are succeeding with a liberal interpretation of Christianity and that in a marked degree. The cause of dry baptistries must be sought elsewhere than in the preaching of a liberal and rational faith.

There is the dry baptistry that results from dry sermons. Preachers sometimes rehash the ancient formulations of doctrine to the delight of the faithful and to the satisfaction of those who fear a more ringing ethical message. The continual reiteration of the "steps" to salvation with no ethical or devotional content will empty any church and bring the cob-webbed baptistry so much deplored.

There is the dry baptistry that results from a dead church. The lodges of the community nurse the sick while the church stands idly by. Needle guilds feed the poor, and public dances finance new enterprises while the church sleeps. It is not a matter of wonder that citizens of that community want to join something that "does things."

There is the baptistry that is seldom used by reason of the social problem. The country church finds its old and prominent families moving away and the district being filled with people of a foreign tongue. Even though these foreign speaking people build no church of their own, they are usually immune to the evangelism of our church in the first generation. As a result many of these country churches have dry baptistries. The amazing number of country churches taken off the list in Illinois the past year illustrates this process. Such a church must operate its Sunday-school and wait for the harvest to come in future years. Its dry baptistry is no reproach.

But it is a pity some over-worked baptistries are not dry for a season. The ever-flowing baptistry that turns out dead converts is a sacrilege. We hear of various quack remedies for the body but none are so deadly as a quack remedy for the soul. Baptism is the symbol of the regenerated life. Baptism without regeneration is as bad as marriage without love, or as parenthood without affection. It is a hollow mockery that arouses false hope in the deluded victim. Better the dry baptistry than the blasphemous baptistry of the nose-counter. But best of all is the church full of true religion that wins sinners from the errors of their way and symbolizes their union with Christ in a baptistry that is full of the most holy religious associations.

The Bolenge, Africa, Church gives $609.55 for missions this year. This remarkable record ought to bring shame-facedness to us all. No Living-link church here can boast of its accomplishments in comparison with our church on the Congo. The wages of those people average less than ten cents a day. Out of their poverty they have contributed this sum. Comparing their income with ours, the $609.55 means far more than $6,000 for any church of similar size here. Let this heroic giving be a watchword for us in this Centennial year. With the help of God let us go and do likewise. Let our commonplace, half-heartedness be elbowed aside by something worthily heroic.

The Foreign Society receives a legacy of $200 from Shanghai, China. This is from the estate of a native Chinese Christian. Bro. Ware of Shanghai, baptized about a year ago Miss Miao Tsugn, of the "Door of Hope," in connection with his mission there. She has recently died and requested in her will that this sum go to the cause she loved. Hundreds of our people in the homeland should make similar bequests in their wills for the great work of foreign missions. What more beautiful monument could a person perpetuate than this? When the granite and marble shafts have crumbled unto dust, these memorials will remain in souls won for Christ.

Dr. Z. S. Loftis sailed from San Francisco on September 15 for China. From Nankin he will go on a little later to Batang on the borders of Thibet. It will take him nearly four months to get there. Batang is the most remote mission station in all the world. It is high up in the mountain passes. He goes to the "roof of the world." He joins Dr. and Mrs. Shelton and J. C. Ogden and wife there. Let us rejoice that our Lord has opened up this last heathen land to the ambassadors of the Christ and that our people are accorded the high privilege of planting the banner of the Cross first at this far outpost.

C. C. Wilson and wife of Shelby, Ohio, will sail on November 3, on the steamship "China" for Honolulu, where they will become missionaries of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. Bro. Wilson has done a splendid work at Shelby and is one of our strongest young men. He and his wife are both graduates of Hiram College. They are glad to leave the homeland and the rare promises of usefulness there, for the work in the Hawaiian Islands. They expect to make this their life work. The Lathrop Cooley mission at Honolulu is a strategic one, as that city is the gateway of the Orient in many ways. These new missionaries will not only do a work among the native people, but also among the Chinese and Japanese.

The work of Rev. W. M. Taylor, pastor of the New Orleans church, in advertising the New Orleans convention should be publicly spoken of and commended. The newspaper offices have been kept informed of the plans and expectations of the convention city and of the attraction of the trip. And now the Sunday-school superintendents, Christian Endeavor presidents, and church boards are being bombarded with exhortations to send representatives—at any rate to see to it that their pastors are given a purse and vacation so they can attend. The convention will be a splendid success if every other factor in it works as well as the New Orleans pastor.

Dr. E. S. Ames of Chicago reports a recent visit to the "House of David" at St. Joseph, Mich. Among other peculiarities, the men of this queer colony wear their hair long. When asked why they did so the reply was, "Because Jesus did so." If Jesus were to come to earth now, to whom do you think he would go: to the long-haired people or to the short-haired people? The measure of the "House of David" is probably given in such a statement.

Last week mention was made of the union of the Free Baptist and Disciples in the control of Keuka College in New York. We are glad to present in this issue a statement from Rev. Joseph A. Serena showing in detail the process and purposes of this unification. No more likely point of beginning the Christian Union movement can be found than our educational institutions. Academic life tends to break down sectarian castes and feelings. In colleges young people may discover the real unity of the spiritual life underneath creedal distinctions. Our hearts rejoice at this interesting beginning and pray for its happy consummation.

The Return to Childhood.

By Earle Marion Todd.

That is what all manly growth and development mean—a return to childhood.

God has given us many beautiful things in this world. Beauty is God's way of doing things. Whatever God does is beautiful. If he fashions a microscopic cell or shapes a leaf or a bee's wing or colors a rose, if he builds a tree or a mountain or lays out a landscape, if he builds a firmament or lights up a star or paints a sunset, it is all done in beauty. Beauty is an end with God; he delights in it for its own sake. Newman Smyth and others have shown us that the utilitarian theory of the origin of beauty, as taught by Darwin and others, does not account for all the facts. The earth is full of beauty that has no use except as beauty itself is useful. Some one has defined art as "the beautiful way of doing things," as contrasted with civilization, which is "the expeditious way of doing things." God is never in a hurry; he can take time to make things beautiful, even the unseen and hidden things.

The most beautiful thing in the world is a little child. Here you have in most real, though imperfect, manifestation the highest beauty of God. Out of the child's face look purity, spirituality, truth, sincerity, candor, faith, love, life, joy, earnestness—all the moral and spiritual qualities of the Godhead; and whatever of beauty there is in these—and it is the supreme beauty—shines in the face of childhood.

But soon passes—as the face of the father in wonderful similitude appears in the face of the new-born child, but vanishes with almost the first breath of life. And must pass—overlain in the prior process of physical development; just as the beauty of the architect's work, appearing transiently in the "elevation," is obscured by the scaffolding in the process of construction; just as the glorious and subtle beauty of the Grecian civilization, and the massive strength and grandeur of the Roman, vanished temporarily in the reconstruction of Europe during the Middle Ages, being overthrown and buried by the incoming tide of barbarism from the north.

But as the scaffolding and the rubbish are but a temporary obscuration of the beauty of the architect's creation, and for the purpose of its higher and permanent realization; as the beauty of Athens in the days of her supremacy was but a foreshadowing of what is yet—for it is still future—to be realized in infinitely larger measure in every city in Europe, and for which the temporary reign of barbarism was the necessary preparation; so the eclipse of childhood is but a temporary eclipse, that the spiritual may shine out later in greater glory and in abiding realization. The exquisite spiritual beauty of the child is but a pre-vision of the end—of what shall be when the disciplines of life shall have wrought out into reality the ideal that existed in the mind of God and of which he gives us a vision at the beginning—the fleeting vision of the Father's face in the face of the new-born child.

And so, to us in manhood and womanhood, the task of life is the return to childhood. "Except ye become as little children ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." For most of us it is a wearisome and painful task, for we have wandered afar. Not far, perhaps, in gross sin, but how far from simplicity, sincerity, serenity of mind, purity of heart, faith, joy, hope! and the spiritual is heavily overlain with the physical. But it becomes a passion to those who know the meaning of life.

Let our life, then, lift itself up to the sublime heights, and clothe itself with the ineffable beauties, that are our heritage by right as sons of God, in perfect realization, for they were ours by prophetic forecast at the beginning.

Manchester, New Hampshire.

MY PRAYER.

If there be some weaker one,
Give me strength to help him on;
If a blinder soul there be,
Let me guide him nearer Thee.
Make my mortal dreams come true
With the work I fain would do;
Clothe with life the weak intent,
Let me be the thing I meant;
Let me find in Thy employ
Peace that dearer is than joy;
Out of self to love be led,
And to Heaven acclimated,
Until all things sweet and good
Seem my nature's habitude.

—John G. Whittier.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION.

By Dr. Everett Gates.

SOME SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

A very interesting temporary union was effected between the Methodist and Christian churches of Pullman, Wash., during the past summer. Speaking of this significant exhibition of good fellowship between the churches, the local paper has the following to say: "A few weeks ago the Methodist congregation found that it was without a church in which to worship. True, a magnificent new church was rapidly being rushed to completion, but the old one was being torn down and transformed into a residence. The leaders in the congregation discussed all manner of plans. It was proposed to secure a large tent and hold services therein; to occupy the skating rink; and a variety of other plans were thought of, and dropped. Then the pastor of the Christian Church of Pullman, Rev. Mr. Schooling, came to the rescue of the homeless congregation. The followers of John Wesley were invited to join with the Christian congregation in holding services on the Sabbath."

L. P. Schooling, the pastor, writes in detail as follows: "Our Sunday-schools meet as one school for opening exercises, after which the Methodist Sunday-school classes take their places in the basement at the same time ours take their places on the main floor and gallery. Our services are unanimously approved by the membership of the two churches. We have communion service every Sunday, both the congregations taking part in it. The fellowship in every way is more genuine and rich than we anticipated. The people of both churches feel that it is a step forward. They feel its superiority to the spirit that holds Christian people apart. The young people's societies are merged and have union officers. The mid-week meeting is likewise a union meeting. In short the two congregations are as thoroughly one in fellowship and work as any single congregation in Christendom."

This is a refreshing manifestation of the true spirit of Christian union. It is such a spirit as we could wish to see manifested between churches in every community. These are the first early steps that must be taken in the way that leads to the unity of Christendom. What a splendid impression such happy affiliations must make upon the outside world. "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Especially commendable was the action of the minister of the Christian Church. No Disciple should let an opportunity pass to call attention to the cause of union. Some one must interest himself in the cause of union in every local community; and who is more logically or naturally the one to do it than a minister of the Christian Church?

Report was made at the Chicago Ministers' Meeting last Monday morning of the generous proposal of the Congregational Church of Austin to the homeless Christian Church of that place to join the Sunday services of the two churches in the Congregational building during the coming year. It will be remembered that the building of the Austin church was destroyed by fire last April. Geo. A. Campbell, the pastor, reported that his people had accepted the invitation, the ministers of the two churches to preach alternately to the united congregations. The Disciples were asked to put a baptistry into the Congregational Church for their use, and to celebrate the Lord's supper, according to custom, every first day of the week. These two churches have been holding union services during the past summer. The experiment has worked so well that they are desirous of continuing the arrangement.

We shall watch with deepest interest this approach between a Christian and a Congregational Church. There are those among the Disciples who believe that the Disciples and Congregationalists really stand closer to each other in spirit and doctrine than the Disciples and Baptists, and that the barriers to union are fewer. The great barrier and practically the only serious barrier to union between them is the difference in the practice of baptism. No adjustment has yet been found of the baptismal question, except the surrender of one to the other. Neither body is yet in such a mood. The cultivation of fraternal relations, as in the union meetings at Austin, will do very much to open the way, by mutual understanding and appreciation, to prepare the way for more permanent relations.

Presbyterians and Episcopalians.

The British Weekly of recent date has the following item of interest concerning union:

"The most practical step towards unity with Episcopalians has been taken in Victoria, (Australia). There, as was first stated in our columns, the Presbyterian Committee and the Prelates have agreed on a plan of union, which is to be submitted to the Lambeth Conference by the Archbishop of Melbourne, who approves of it. The plan seems to be that while the orders of living Presbyterian ministers are recognized, in future all ministers will receive Episcopal ordination. How the plan would work out in detail we do not know, for no official statement has been published from the Presbyterian side."

The same paper contains the following wise sentiment concerning unity:

"For ourselves, we believe that corporate unity is far off, and that it should not be sought for in a spirit of impatience and rashness. What we need above all things is to know one another better. As things are in England, really intimate intercourse between Nonconformist clergy and Church clergy is extremely rare. There is undoubtedly a drawing together. There has been a change during the last thirty years, and the change is still going on. Christian intercourse, fellowship in the service of Christian ends, a spirit of humility and charity, earnest prayer to God, will in God's good time remove misunderstandings and heal breaches, and gather the true Israel into warmer and more shining unities of sympathy and love."

CHAPTER XVI.

Plans and Counterplans.

The days went on apace, the happiest days that Jean could ever remember. His life had been one continuous struggle to obtain the education which is every man's right, which every man must have if he would make a real success of his life. His childhood had been filled with toil, hard and merciless; his boyhood days were almost passed before he had a chance to reach out after the higher things of life, and when this chance finally came he worked unsparingly, knowing no fatigue, no failure, until he had placed himself beside those of his own age. Even then he was not satisfied, but forged ahead till he excelled in scholarship. Nor did he give all the training to his mind, but by plunging persistently into athletics, he developed the puny, round shouldered form of the breaker-boy into a splendid, manly physique. His love for music had led him to seek the best masters. Here was his greatest pleasure; he poured forth all the passions of his pent up childhood in the melodies of the great composers. Up to this time nothing else had so thrilled and touched his soul; but now he knew an intoxication that was sweeter than music—a love that could touch his heart strings with melodies sublime. For nearly two weeks he had spent the long days with Evelyn. Every morning she had come to meet him on the porch or down the bridle-path.

Together they had climbed the mountains, and Jean had gathered the late wild flowers for her and sat at her feet while she arranged them. They had rowed and driven, and Aunt Mehetabel had planned the most delightful outings; one day it would be a yachting party, the next a picnic up the mountains or a trip to the Hudson.

The hazy September days had come; the locusts were trilling their monotonous songs, and the sumac was putting on its brilliant garb of red; the first autumn leaves were falling and lay rustling in the path. It was the afternoon of Jean's last day in the mountains, and he and Evelyn were going through the woods to the Gulch Spring. Little Margaret, who had shared most of their good times, wanted to go, but wise Aunt Mehetabel had coaxed her to ride in the carriage with her.

"Evelyn, this is our last visit to the gulch. I believe it will always be the most beautiful spot on earth to me."

"If I were an artist I would paint it for you," said Evelyn.

(Copyright, 1905, Ella N. Wood.)

"I will take a picture away with me that will be more real than any artist could paint. It will be the dell yonder, with a fair Princess sitting on the grey stone. Above her head the rugged rocks, and near her a fairy in the act of placing a crown on her head. Here we are! Now will the Princess be seated in her royal chair?" and Jean took Evelyn's hand and placed her in the saddle of the old rock.

"Now, Princess, I have brought you here today to finish your fairy story;" and Jean threw himself down on the grass at her feet.

Evelyn's heart stood almost still; a great fear had come over her. She felt Jean's hand tremble as he led her to the rock, and there was a tense look on his face as though he was suppressing some great emotion. She had thought once or twice that he had shown more than a friendly regard for her, but their frank friendship of the past two weeks had allayed these suspicions, and she was not vain enough to think that he would propose to her when they had only been good comrades.

"Oh surely he does not mean that," thought Evelyn. "He must not, he must not! My answer can only hurt and I cannot bear to hurt him. I want him for my friend and I want to be good to him always."

These thoughts crowded through Evelyn's mind in the moment that Jean was waiting for his answer.

"Can't you recall the place where you left off? I think I can help you," he said.

"Oh no, Jean, I don't want to recall that foolish fairy tale. I think I finished it anyway," Evelyn hastened to answer.

"Evelyn, sweetheart, the story must be finished. It must be finished before I leave tomorrow, before we leave the dell today." Jean's voice was low and earnest. He reached up and took the little fair hands in his and all the passion of his great love shone in his face.

"No, Jean, no, please don't insist."

"You must hear me, Evelyn, I love you. I have loved you ever since I was a little, grimy breaker-boy. You seemed like an angel to me then, and you have been my good angel ever since, leading me on to higher ideals and nobler aspirations. It was you who fired me with a desire to get away from the mines and seek an education. In a great measure I owe what I am to you. The worship I gave you as a child has grown into a love that is the very breath of my life. I want you, I want your love. Dear little one, come to me, say that you love me!"

Jean was eloquent in his pleading. His words rang true and earnest.

"Jean, Jean, why have you done this? My answer can only hurt you. I cannot share my life with yours. Our friendship was so sweet and you have made it impossible ever to be the same again."

"You have not said that you did not love me, Evelyn, only say that you love me."

"I don't know what to say; I have never thought of your caring for me like this. I have been interested in every step of your life, and am proud to call you my friend; but I have planned my life without you and I cannot change it. I cannot understand the feeling you have, but if it is love I must put it behind me forever, to do the work I have laid out for myself and longed to do ever since I can remember. I must go alone."

"Evelyn, dearest, do not say that. I cannot think you mean it. Our plans and purposes are almost the same; we will each give our lives to righting the great evil of child labor. We could do it better by joining forces. Evelyn, Evelyn, I cannot give you up!"

A great sob shook Jean's frame. He rose from the ground and walked away a few steps, and stood there battling with his emotion, trying to master it.

"Jean, you must not feel so about this," and Evelyn sprang up and went to him, her eyes wet and her voice trembling. "Why have you given me this great love? There are other women who are far more worthy."

"Don't, Evelyn!"

Jean turned and placed his hands on Evelyn's shoulders and there was a hurt look on his face.

"Forgive me, Jean. Oh, I am so sorry to have hurt you. I am so sorry about it all."

"Evelyn, do you love another?"

"No, no, Jean, I do not. There is no one in the whole world that I admire and respect as I do you. I want you to always know this. I want you to always be my friend, my brother."

"Is this final? Will you not try to love me, try to see that our lives can be more useful together than apart?"

Evelyn slowly shook her head.

"I cannot hold out any hope, Jean."

"My darling, my only love! Must I give you up? Must I go my way in life alone?"

Jean drew Evelyn into his strong arms and held her close to him.

"May God keep you always," and Jean's lips kissed the fair brow, and as he let her go he smiled down into her face, not in his own happy, boyish way, but with a sad weariness that Evelyn never forgot. Hand in hand they went home through the woods, assuming the same comradeship as the old, yet each knowing that it could never be the same again.

When Evelyn came down to breakfast the next morning, she found Jean had taken an early train for Crystalville. Her first feeling on finding him gone was one of relief. Through the long hours of the night she had fought and reasoned with her rebellious heart. When Jean had held her close in his arms, and his lips had pressed her brow, she then knew that she loved him and it had been the sweetest moment of her life. Should she be honest with herself and him and tell him? was the question she had asked herself over and over, and now she felt it was answered for her, for he was gone; yet she was miserable and unhappy and presented a woebegone appearance at the breakfast table. She made a feint at eating and tried to appear as usual, but failed utterly and when Aunt Mehetabel went to the bungalow after breakfast, she followed her.

"Oh Aunt Mehetabel, I am so miserable!" and Evelyn sat down on a stool at Aunt Mehetabel's feet and buried her face in her lap.

"Dear child, you must tell me all about it. I saw last night that there was a misunderstanding between you and Jean, but I knew you would tell me about it in time. My poor boy went away so dejected this morning. I have never seen such a look on his face as there was when he kissed me good-bye."

"I have cruelly hurt him, Aunt Mehetabel. He loves me and asked me to marry him. I told him that I couldn't; that my life work was all planned and could not be changed, and gave him to understand that I was altogether too good for him. I didn't know then how much I cared for him."

"Do you love him, Evelyn?"

"Yes, yes, I know now that I love him, but it is too late. Jean is so proud and the hurt is so deep that he will never come to me again. But, Aunt Mehetabel, even though I love him, I cannot believe I ought to give up my work. All my life I have been preparing myself for a teacher of the poor little working children. Yes, ever since I was a little child I have planned for this, but can only do it alone and unhampered by the cares of married life. Look at the splendid work of Frances E. Willard and Clara Barton! If I could only do something great for the world as they have, I would sacrifice everything else."

"Evelyn, this is a grave matter. Do not make a mistake. I fully appreciate your ambition and desire to do this splendid work for which you have planned, but I seriously question your being able to do it best alone. I give all honor to those noble women you mentioned, but, on the other hand, Evelyn, a poor woman born and reared in a squatter's cabin, gave a Lincoln to the world, and Harriet Beecher Stowe rocked the cradle with one hand while with the other she wrote a book that stabbed slavery to the heart. Think of Maud Ballington Booth and what she and her husband have accomplished with their splendid united lives. Look at your own mother, Evelyn; do you think she could have done more good in the world if she had not married your father?"

"Oh no, a thousand times, no! They have accomplished together what they never could have done alone. You make it all look so different to me; what a foolish girl you must think me."

"No, not foolish Evelyn, you have had some mistaken ideas about life. You and Jean have the same work at heart. Jean will make himself felt in the world. He will be a power for good in whatever walk he pursues, and what could be better than to be his companion and helper? Evelyn, I may be old fashioned, or I may be pleading for my boy, but I believe from my heart that you are making a mistake, and I trust I may live to see it righted. Evelyn, write to Jean and tell him of this change in your feelings."

"No, I cannot do that," said Evelyn, "he would think me weak and fickle minded; and, Aunt Mehetabel, you must never repeat any of this conversation to him. If I have made a mistake, I alone must suffer for it."

"Not you alone, Evelyn, but Jean also. No, I will not interfere in the matter, but will pray God to show you both how to make it right."

"I start for the South next week and do not expect to see Jean again before I go."

"Go to your work cheerfully, Evelyn; be happy in the thought that Jean loves you, for such a love is not to be despised and remember that your future is in God's hands."

Evelyn's refusal had wounded Jean sorely. His only fear had been that she might love another, and if she did not, he had hoped that he might win her. But the reason she had offered seemed insurmountable. With a growing feeling of injured pride, he thought of how she had told him that she had marked out her career and that there was no place in it for him, yet, in spite of it all, he knew that he loved her better than ever before.

"She is mine, mine! I will win her, I must win her! I cannot live my life without her!" he said over and over to himself as the train sped on towards Crystalville.

The Sunday-School Lesson.

Herbert L. Willett.

THE DEATH OF UZZAH*

It is evident that some leagues of the journey toward a competent knowledge of the meaning of the Bible will have to be traversed before men to whom is entrusted the delicate task of providing the material of Sunday-school lessons for children can be fully trusted to make wise choices. It has long been recognized that not all portions of the Word of God are of equal value for instruction. It has even become clear to the least open-minded that some parts of the Bible cannot be used for general religious instruction in any circumstances. But there are many who still stand at the half-way house of ancient apologetics, willing to accept for themselves and their children narratives that a more thoughtful consideration of the Scriptures has long since placed among the sign posts of the past rather than the directions for the present and the future.

Growth of Prophetic Ideas.

No narrative of the Old Testament illustrates this type of material more admirably than the present one, and few are less suitable for a lesson to be taught to children who are seeking to obtain some adequate conception of the character of God. In the days of the prophets, preceding the coming of our Lord, when it was most important that men should fear God, and the nature of his will was but faintly understood, such an account as this was no doubt of great value in enforcing the ideas of morality and religion. But as prophetic ideals developed, and the real nature of God was disclosed by the great teachers of righteousness, the partial and imperfect nature of such views of God's dealings with men became apparent. And the interpretation of the Father given by Jesus leaves all these cruder notions far behind.

David's Capital.

The facts of the occasion are soon told. The ark had been taken into the Philistine country after the disastrous battle of Aphek. It was taken about from town to town in triumph, but a series of misfortunes which fell upon the country was interpreted as the result of its presence with them, and it was sent back to Hebrew territory. Here it remained for some twenty years in the home of Abinadab in the high place of Kirjath-jearim. When David became king, first of Judah and then of all the tribes, he looked about for a suitable capital. Of all the possibilities the town of Jerusalem seemed best. It was admirably situated for defense, it was in the hands of the Jebusites and its capture would add to the renown of the king, it was outside the tribe of Judah and therefore adapted to be a capital of all the nation, and it was on the border line between the north and the south, whose rivalry was so great even at this period. Jerusalem was accordingly captured and made the seat of David's government.

The Royal Procession.

Almost the first concern of the monarch on gaining this central and commanding position was to add the religious to the secular leadership of the city. To do this he wished to bring the ark from its long resting place, that it might be the visible sign of the divine presence in the city. A procession was accordingly organized, and the king, his warriors, the priests and the people went down from Jerusalem to Kirjath-jearim, or Baale as it is here called, and taking the sacred chest from the house in which it had been deposited, they started back to the city. It was a great occasion, and the king and his followers celebrated it with the abandon of a high religious festival. Singing and dancing to the strains of the instruments of music, they made their way up toward the capital. The ark had been placed upon a cart drawn by cattle, and was in the immediate charge of Uzzah and Ahio, the two sons of Abinadab, in whose house it had been kept.

The Death of Uzzah.

At a certain point in the road, spoken of as Nachon's threshing floor, the ground was uneven and the cart was in danger of being overturned as the cattle stumbled. In fear for its safety, Uzzah put out his hand to steady it. The act was perfectly natural, and would be approved by every reader of the account. But the man was stricken with some malady and died on the spot. The nature of his death we do not know. It may have been sunstroke or any similar attack. But an age like that could only see in such a fact a sign of the anger of God. The king himself was puzzled and distressed by the event. It was an unlucky omen for the entrance of the ark into his city. He could not afford to mar the beginning of his establishment of formal worship with an accident so untimely. The result was that he left off the effort to bring up the ark for the time, and put it for safe-keeping in a neighboring house, apparently that of a Philistine, Obed-edom of Gath. Here it stayed for three months, and as David learned that good and not evil had befallen the household of the Gittite, he decided that the death of Uzzah was not to be construed as an ill omen, and that it was safe to complete his plans by bringing up the sacred box to the city. This accordingly was done.

Incomplete Views.

But the interpretation put upon the death of Uzzah, which also finds its sanction in the text, is that God slew him in anger because of some impiety which he had committed in touching the ark. This view was no doubt fostered by the priests who gradually assumed exclusive possession of the ark and all other sacred objects. To the simpler life of the early Hebrews such ideas of awful holiness as attaching to instruments of worship were unknown. It was the work of the priests to increase the sense of holiness and reverence as belonging to such objects. With this procedure the prophets of the great period had very small sympathy.

The Character of God.

But the most difficult fact to explain in this lesson is the misleading conception of God which is conveyed in the description of his wrath against one who had performed a quite natural and pious act in attempting to safeguard the ark. The moral sense which has been educated by the teachings of the later prophets, and most of all of Jesus, turns away from this interpretation of the character of the Father. We have come far on the road toward a better understanding of his nature. This narrative is chiefly valuable as an illustration of early conceptions of the divine character which had to be overcome, common as they were, before the larger truth of God's justice, equity and love could be comprehended.

The Larger Lessons.

But the teacher may well ask, "What then shall be done with a lesson already selected and set for study on a designated day?" The answer is that much may be made of it, in spite of its inappropriateness as lesson material. Among the items that may well receive stress are David's reasons for wishing the ark in Jerusalem and his pious plans to bring it there; the happy nature of the ceremonies which accompanied the event; and the fact that the ark, as the symbol of God's presence in the home, brought blessing to the house of Obed-edom. The main fact of the lesson, the death of Uzzah, may be used as illustrating the contrast between the ancient idea of the nature of God as wrathful and vindictive and the better knowledge of his nature given to us by the prophets and our Lord. Lastly the fact that there is a fear of God which is quite different from the servile dread of his wrath, a fear to disregard his will as it has been made known to us by our Lord, a fear to fall below the standard of his approval, in which only can true happiness and usefulness be found.

TRIFLERS.

Topic, October 7, Luke 9: 57-62.

The trifler puts first things second and second things first. The fundamental principles of Christianity are by him brought down to the level of local custom or personal whim. Immediate consequences are all important for him, although the pleasure of the moment may entail a curse for all the future.

Not Counting the Cost.

The first man that meets us in this scripture was blind to the difficulties of discipleship. He was impressed with the teaching of Jesus. Like many another, he was willing to confess his faith when it did not cost anything. Jesus saw his difficulty and told him that his followers were living lives of privation and hardship. We ought to be as frank with men who come to the doors of the church as Jesus was with this rash disciple. A Livingstone may say truly that he never made a sacrifice, for Livingstone had such an appreciation of the religion of Christ that he forgot the weariness and pain of his service in the joy of fulfilling the will of his Master. But the average man thinks it is a serious matter to give up some of his vices. He has to fight for his soul against riotous passions. His vision of the truth is not such that he can stand before a crowd of scorners and be concerned only for their welfare, caring not at all for their opinions of him. Then there are real sacrifices which men are called upon to make for the sake of Christ. The missionary leaves home and friends that he may obey the divine summons. The purer his faith is, the stronger will be his attachment to kindred and home. Few of us can pass through life without having set before us the choice between duty and the friendship of some one with whom we should like to be intimate.

The Common Level.

The second man said he was willing to follow Jesus after he had buried his father. The answer of Jesus to him shows that the disciple cannot please his Master by doing only what is customary nor by putting off the demands of Christ until all customary duties are done. Jesus expects his followers to do the unusual duty. Men in his day understood how to treat the body of a neighbor. They could be depended upon to bury the dead. Ordinarily the son cared for the father in his declining years and saw that his body was laid away with due ceremony. But Jesus needed this man and he called him to a wider service. We Disciples of today have our round of prescribed duties but these are not enough. Society is still imperfect. We must preach and practice the whole gospel of Jesus. We cannot plead as a reason for allowing great wrongs to go unrebuked the insistent calls of common tasks. If the first disciples of Jesus had waited until they were ready to preach the gospel, you and I would be pagans. Routine work will be done with more zest if we press on to new duties.

Looking Two Ways.

The third man was willing to go with Jesus provided he did not have to give up anything. If men of this sort are told to quit stealing, they say, "Yes, we will be honest, but first suffer us to rob another bank or express train." If they love money too well, they will say, "Yes, we must give attention to something else, but first suffer us to get another farm or another railroad." There is no salvation for such men, they are "not fit for the kingdom of God." Of course the Lord asks no man to rush blindly into difficulties. Men must have time to think of what they are going to do. This man, however, had done his thinking. His allegiance was divided. The interests of the kingdom of God were not paramount with him. The Lord calls for men who will live for the kingdom and subordinate all their ambitions to it. Every relation of life is sanctified when the kingdom of God is first in men's thoughts. Every institution comes to its perfection when it becomes an instrument for the extension of the kingdom.

Teachers Training Course.

5. The Kingdom of Israel.

Upon Solomon's death, in 937 B. C., popular resentment of the heavy taxation, the arrogant attitude of Solomon's son and successor, Rehoboam, and especially the apprehensions felt by the prophets lest the nation should forget its earlier and simple religion in its love for wealth and display, led to a revolt on the part of the twelve tribes against the dynasty of David. A young leader named Jeroboam was placed upon the throne of the new kingdom of Israel, thus separated from that of Judah in which the descendants of David continued to hold the power. The capital of the new kingdom was fixed first at Shechem and later at Samaria. Every effort was made to prevent pilgrimages to the temple at Jerusalem. Sanctuaries were erected at Bethel at the south, and Dan in the north. The worship of Jehovah was carried on, but in a mixed manner which practically amounted to idolatry. The dynasties of the northern kingdom succeeded each other rapidly. Kings were cut off by assassination, or were slain in battle. Of these kings the ablest were Jeroboam I (937-915), Omri (887-875), Ahab (875-853), and Jeroboam II (781-740). The prophets Elijah and Elisha organized the protest of the worshipers of Jehovah against the incoming idolatry practiced in the worship of Baal, in the days of Ahab and the kings who followed him, and in the times of Jeroboam II, Amos and Hosea, the earliest of the prophets whose writings have been preserved to us, carried on their work. Soon after this the northern kingdom became involved in conflicts with the advancing power of Assyria, and after a three years' siege by Salmanesar IV, the city was taken by Sargon, in 721 B. C., thus bringing the kingdom of Israel to an end. (I Kings, II Kings, Amos, Hosea).

6. The Kingdom of Judah.

Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, ascended the throne to find himself stripped of a large proportion of his father's kingdom through the revolt of the ten tribes. After the first efforts to reunite the nation had proved unsuccessful, the kingdom of Judah accepted the situation and, maintaining its capital at Jerusalem, and continuing the worship of Jehovah at the temple, perpetuated the traditions of David and Solomon. The most important kings of the southern kingdom were Asa (917-876), Jehoshaphat (876-851), Azariah or Uzziah (782-737), Hezekiah (715-686), and Josiah (639-609). The great kings of Judah, such as those just named, were sincere worshipers of God and reformers of the national life. But there were other kings in whose reigns religion became scarcely more than idolatry, even the temple itself being invaded by the signs of the heathen faiths. Josiah, who followed the evil days of Manasseh and Amon, organized a great reformation, inspired by the Book of Law (probably Deuteronomy) found in the temple. The high places, where idolatry had been practiced, were destroyed, and all worship was centralized at Jerusalem. The reforms were greatly aided by such prophets as Zephaniah and Jeremiah, who performed similar services to those rendered by Isaiah and Micah in the eighth century. But the political and religious condition of Judah grew weaker under the later kings, and in 586 B. C. Nebachadrezzar of Babylon took the city and destroyed it. (I Kings, 2 Kings, 1 Chron., 2 Chron., Isa., Micah, Zephaniah, Jeremiah).

7. The Exile.

A large number of inhabitants of Jerusalem, including the wealthier and more important members of the community, together with the court, were carried to Babylonia, and placed in communities here and there. They were not the first exiles who had been taken to the east, but the destruction of the city made them less hopeful of return than their brethren of earlier deportations. They were permitted a limited amount of self-government, and many of them embraced the opportunities of trade which Babylon offered, only to lose thereby their interest in the national hopes and their loyalty to Jehovah. As there was no temple at which they could worship in Babylonia, religion took on the new features of prayer, fasting and alms-giving. The prophets Daniel and Ezekiel were among those who kept alive the hopes and faith of the exiles during the first years after their arrival in Babylon. Later on other voices were heard, such as the later chapters of the book of Isaiah record. The people were encouraged to hope for a return to their own land. The Messianic expectations were impressed upon them. These prophetic words in some measure prepared a remnant of the people for the new duty which now devolved upon them. (Obadiah, Lamentations, Ezek., Dan. 1-6, Isa. 40-55).

(To be concluded next week.)

The following beautiful invocation was written by Carmen Sylva, queen of Roumania: "Keep with me always a mother's heart. Take not from me a mother's tenderness, and let my forgiveness of injustice be equal to hers. Have with me her power of defense. Let my intuitions be as keen as her divination. Take from me much, if it by Thy will, but spare me the mother's heart."

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS.

By Professor Willett.

My Dear Brother Willett:

Much has been said in secular and religious newspapers recently concerning your views on biblical matters, and I write you this open letter in a frank and brotherly spirit to elicit, if possible, the truth concerning your attitude. You have many friends and brethren who will gladly defend you, if they can consistently do so, and all of the great brotherhood embraced in your fellowship will be gratified to learn your position.

1. In the Century of September 3 you wrote an article upon "Miracle and Faith" in which you say—"The objection which has most weight in our day, and which unless removed will stand as a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of miracles is the apparent chasm which separates the phenomena from the uniform course of events in human experience and under the reign of law." Now, my brother, do you mean by that statement that the apparent chasm between the miracles of the New Testament and the uniform course of events in human experience must be bridged over or it will prove a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of those miracles? Take as an illustration, the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, must the apparent chasm between that fact and the uniform course of events in human experience be bridged over or it will prove a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of the resurrection of Jesus Christ?

2. A little further on in the article you represent another as saying, "Such a being was Jesus. He was a visitant to the world but his normal residence was in heaven, whose supernatural character he bore in his earthly life and with whose powers he was clothed. His miracles were a manifestation of this superior life and the setting aside of nature in obedience to a higher law." Speaking of the above quotation you say: "This theory is in direct conflict with all modern conceptions and is either giving way to more satisfactory explanations of the facts or a total rejection of the miraculous."

From this statement I understand you to say that Jesus was not such a being, that he was not a visitant of the world, that his normal residence was not in heaven and that he was not clothed with supernatural power and that his miracles were not a setting aside of nature in obedience to a higher law. Am I correct in thus interpreting your language? If I am not correct—was Jesus such a being as the quotation describes?

3. Near the conclusion of your editorial you say "The redemptive facts of Jesus' life are independent of miracles." I have always been under the impression that Paul stated the redemptive facts of Jesus' life when he said, "Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures and was buried and rose again the third day according to Scriptures." Now, my brother, do you understand these three great facts to be redemptive facts in the life of Jesus and do you declare these facts to be independent of miracle?

4. A few questions of a more general nature.

First: When you speak of a prophet being inspired do you mean that he was enabled by the Spirit of God to predict future events that were beyond the reach of human foresight?

Second: When you speak of a historian being inspired do you mean that the Spirit of God imparted directly to him the knowledge of past events and enabled him to speak of them without error?

Third: Do you believe that we have in the Book of Genesis a true account of the careers of Abraham, Jacob and Joseph?

Fourth: Do you believe that our four gospels were written by the men whose names are attached to them?

Fifth: Do you believe that Jesus promised the apostles that the Holy Spirit should call to their remembrance all that he had spoken to them; and do you believe that the Holy Spirit did so call to their remembrance?

Sixth: Do you believe that Jesus was born of a virgin as represented in the gospels of Matthew and Luke?

Seventh: Do you believe that God bore witness to the preaching of the Apostles, "both with signs and wonders and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost," according to his own will?

Now, my brother, these questions are not written for the purpose of provoking discussion. They are not written to set any trap for your feet. They are written to open a door of utterance for you that the great brotherhood may understand your exact position on these fundamental propositions. They are so formed that you can answer each question with a yes or no, if you desire to do so.

Very sincerely and fraternally,

Columbus, Ind. Z. T. Sweeney.

It is a pleasure to receive the above letter. The method Bro. Sweeney has chosen is one much better calculated to arrive at a satisfactory knowledge of the facts than reliance upon newspaper reports, which are frequently found to be either quite false or largely misleading. For the sake of convenience in considering the different items in the letter, the paragraphs are numbered.

1. In the statement from which the excerpt is taken, and to which attention is again directed for a full setting forth of the matter, a distinction is made between two definitions of miracle, one of which has been common but is no longer satisfactory, and the other a description of the same events but in terms which do not render the acceptance of the miraculous events of the New Testament impossible to the student of today. The first insists that miracle is a violation of the laws of nature by one possessed of supernatural power. The other holds that such a description of miracle is contrary to the very revelation God has made of himself both in nature and the Bible. It would define miracle as the manifestation of power at a higher level, and by a being in whom dwelt a fuller life. Jesus was historically such a being, and the only one who ever possessed such power. The resurrection of our Lord was no departure from this principle. It was the inevitable manifestation of the divine fulness of life in him. Death had no dominion over him. It was impossible that he should be holden of it.

2. You are not in the least correct in your interpretation, since you ignore the very point of the argument, that the statements you quote are insufficient to describe the character and work of Jesus. My words in the article from which you quote are as follows:

"The life of Christ is the one perfect life of history. He lived the normal, natural life of a man at its highest point. This consisted perfectly with his claim to be the Son of God. In this estate he employed law at its highest level. The responses which our inadequate and fragmentary life obtains from nature, and which become more complex and varied as we gain new altitudes of vision and new depths of spiritual experience, seem as nothing worth beside the calm supremacy of his power. He touched the keys of life beyond the range of our limited experience, and the harmony which poured forth we call miracle. His word was with power because the secret of nature was his own. Nor is there a hint in the Scripture that the works of Jesus were suspensions or suppressions of natural law. They exhibit the use of law at a higher point than that to which other lives have attained."

The trouble with the definition from which you quoted is that it does not adequately set forth the nature and work of Christ so that he can be understood by a generation like our own that is no longer thinking in the terms of scholastic metaphysics. The New Testament reveals the Savior as the manifestation of God in flesh, the perfect being whose word was with power because in him dwelt all fulness. To him miracle was the sign of control over nature beyond the frontiers of the fragmentary lives other men have lived. Yet it was not the fracture of law, but its higher employment.

3. It is well to keep in mind the context of the quotation. The statement is made in reference to Jesus' personal ministry, and is as follows:

"The redemptive facts of Jesus' life are independent of miracle. His wonderful deeds were an aid to his followers in the creation and nourishment of their faith in him and in their immediate work of evangelization. Such a value the miracles no longer possess. But they assist in the comprehension of the origins of our faith, and of the unique influence of the Lord upon that age. Miracle had its value, but also its limitations."

No one would insist more strongly than I that the miracle of the resurrection was one of the great facts of the gospel. The fact of the resurrection of Jesus was the most impressive detail of the early preaching of Christianity. If later on, as the New Testament clearly reveals, the resurrection yielded precedence to the death of Christ as the most important event in the history of redemption, it was not that the resurrection was less a matter of confident belief, but that the deeper meaning of the death of Christ was seen. Yet the real significance of the resurrection lay not merely in the fact that Jesus conquered death, but in the assurance that by his redemptive work, sin and death are vanquished in the lives of his followers. This is the daily victory, the "rising with Christ" not merely in baptism, but in the attainment of the life he imparts and sustains. This is the victory which conquers death itself.

4. As to the more specific questions, the following will indicate the answers I should give if space were adequate. Questions which cover the wide ground here traversed are worthy of much fuller consideration than is now possible.

First: Such prediction was a part of the work of some of the prophets. But it was only a part, and no definition of prophecy which reduces it to the mere foretelling of the future will satisfy a competent student of the Word of God. The inadequacy of the definition lies in the fact that it describes the work of these preachers of righteousness in terms of only one, and that not the most important of their functions.

Second: No. There is no hint in the Bible that such was the method by which the events of the past were preserved and recorded. The prophet employed his own knowledge of the past, and used all suitable material in the framing of his message. He employed events of the past, the present and the future. But his interest in these events was not that of a mere chronicler but a preacher. He used them as the vehicles for his religious message. Herein lay the uniqueness of his mission. His inspiration lay not in his unerring knowledge of the past, but in the spiritual vision which enabled him to interpret these facts to his people, and the sense of urgency which drove him forward in his work of religious instruction.

Third: Yes, in so far as it was the aim of the writers to give such an account. The narratives are fragmentary. They contain only a few of the facts which were in the possession of the patriarchs, but to show how their lives enforced the principles of God's government of men and nations. The evidence which comes to us from external sources, as well as the united testimony of the Hebrew records confirms the historicity of the patriarchal period.

Fourth: Yes. It must be borne in mind that the assignment of the four gospels to the evangelists rests not upon any claim made in the books themselves, but upon early Christian tradition. Happily the processes of criticism applied to the problem have gone far to confirm this primitive tradition. In the case of the fourth gospel it is evident that later hands have added to the apostolic record.

Fifth: Yes.

Sixth: Yes. I do not hold, however, that the virgin birth of Jesus occupies a position of such importance, either in apostolic preaching or present Christian faith, as the resurrection or many other of the facts of his life. I should not make it a test of Christian belief in the same sense.

Seventh: Yes.

Bro. Sweeney has intimated that my views on these questions are of interest to the Disciples of Christ. In this intimation he perhaps goes further than is necessary. Yet I appreciate the courtesy which prompts it. My views upon these and all other questions connected with the Bible are not secrets of the class-room or study. I have made them public in lectures, articles and sermons for a score of years. In that period I hope I have changed many opinions and grown into a deeper and more satisfying faith in the Holy Scriptures. Yet I am not conscious of having altered my beliefs or utterances in any essential particular. If, however, anyone is interested in ascertaining my precise standpoint on any of these matters, it seems to me the method Bro. Sweeney has adopted is the one most likely to elicit the facts. That an answer is always possible in a single word no one would hold who knows the depths to which Christian faith reaches. But at least indications can be given of the points of view held. It is less essential that men should agree upon opinions than that they should understand each other, and be conscious of a common core of faith in the foundations of Christianity.

CHRISTIAN UNION IN EDUCATION.

KEUKA COLLEGE.

By Joseph A. Serena.

A movement which promises to be of no small importance in the contribution towards Christian Union has just been consummated in New York state whereby the Disciples and Free Baptists join forces in the operation of Keuka College.

This college was founded in 1890 by the late Dr. Geo. H. Ball and associates and since then has maintained itself as an institution under the direction of the Free Baptists. Dr. Ball was pastor of the Hudson St. Free Baptist Church at the time and visiting on the shore of beautiful Lake Keuka he received, as he always believed, an inspiration. With profound conviction he said to himself, "This is the place which God Almighty has prepared for a Christian school. God helping me I propose here to found a school where young men and women of moderate means may get a thorough education under Christian influences." For seventeen years he continued as president of the institution, his death only preventing a longer term of service.

The spirit of Dr. Ball, his great desire for the union of the Disciples and Free Baptists, has permeated the institution, and when financial need manifested itself the trustees turned to us with their problem. Appealing to the New York Christian Missionary Society first they requested that a committee be appointed to confer with them regarding the institution. To this committee they offered part ownership of the institution, or if this could not be facilitated, to give our people complete control if we would agree to continue to operate it as a college. At that time it was not thought advisable to consider the matter for several hindering reasons, but later when President Space presented the matter in writing to the late New York Christian Missionary convention at North Tonawanda, it was decided that a committee of three should be appointed carefully to consider the proposition and to report back to the state board its findings. Accordingly a committee consisting of L. C. McPherson of Wellsville and Robert Stewart of Rochester, together with the writer, visited the institution and carefully went over the entire proposition, and as a result reported that we recommended entering into a plan of coöperation with the Free Baptists in the conducting of the college.

The college owns a tract of 130 acres of land, including a campus of eighteen acres, upon which it erected in 1890 a five-story brick building, 200x65 feet, at a cost of about $90,000. This building contains class rooms, laboratories and chapel, besides dormitory accommodations for 125 students. In the basement is a large dining room with accommodations for 100, kitchen, pantry, etc. besides two large boilers for heating the plant. The entire property is valued safely at $125,000 while the Regents of the State of New York value it at $200,000. There is a small endowment of $12,500, while there is an indebtedness of about $8,000 outstanding which will be cancelled by holders of same as soon as we put in operation the outlined plan of work. There are no other debts, this making clear a property worth $150,000.

On the ground belonging to the college a settlement of some sixty houses, known as Keuka Park, has been built. As rapidly as sold, the money from the lots is turned over to the college endowment. The location of this property is indeed beautiful, situated on the west shore of the lake four miles from Penn Yan, with which it is connected by trolley.

The college and Institute have a faculty of fourteen and carry on a high grade of regular collegiate work. With scarcely a precedent, Dr. Ball caused to be inserted in the charter a provision that graduation from this college should be based entirely upon examinations under the immediate direction of the State Board of Regents. Thus the graduates of Keuka College have no fear of comparison with those of older and richer institutions.

Tuition and board in the institution make it possible for a young person to get through on $165 per year.

A board of twenty-four trustees own and operate the college, eighteen of whom came from the Free Baptist Church. The agreement arrived at by the committees representing both bodies was as follows:

1. That our respective bodies enter at once into joint ownership and joint operation of Keuka College.

2. That the Disciples of Christ be given the privilege of naming four trustees immediately, and that, as other vacancies occur in the Board, the number be increased as expedient, until they shall have equal representation with the Free Baptists.

3. That, on entering upon this agreement, the Disciples of Christ shall be given at least one representative on the Executive committee, and that they shall be duly represented in the personnel of the faculty.

4. That we jointly assume the responsibility of the current expenses and that we enter upon a joint canvass for $100,000 additional endowment, only the income of which is to be used for the maintenance of the college.

5. That the Disciples of Christ secure for the college a suitable man to enter upon field service, to aid in securing students and money for the institution.

6. That as soon as a suitable man be secured from the Disciples he be elected President of the College, in the meanwhile President Z. A. Speer continues to act.

Acting upon the above suggestions the trustees of the college met September 3 in Keuka Park and elected the following Disciples:

Mr. S. M. Hunt, Springfield, Mass.; Rev. Robert Stewart, Rochester, N. Y.; Rev. L. C. McPherson, Wellsville, N. Y., and Rev. Jos. A. Serena, Syracuse, N. Y. Mr. McPherson was also elected vice-president and field secretary.

Thus another chapter in Christian Union is being written. We are brought into intimate relationship with a body of Christians closely akin to us, and as one of the first steps in this movement means the institution of a Bible Department under the instruction of a Disciple, our people have no reason to fear the charity and freedom of these brethren. A college in the east ought to be of incalculable benefit in furnishing preachers for our churches, besides giving us another institution for Christian culture.

For once the beauty of his home failed to attract him. Even the servants missed his usual jolly greeting, and whispered among themselves about what could have happened to "Mr. Jean" to make him look so troubled. Only Cap, the English setter that had belonged to Paul, received the usual caress, but missed something of the spirit and mirth that always accompanied it, so he followed Jean from room to room, or lay at his feet and thumped the floor with his tail and looked into his face as much as to say, "I know you are in trouble and I wish I could help you."

Often in his fancy, Jean dreamed of the day when he would bring Evelyn here, and how he would take her to the morning room, and to the library where they had laid him that first night, then to his own den where he had spent so many hours in study; how he would show her the summer house and the lake at the foot of the lawn, and the deer park that Uncle Jasper took so much pride in. At last he could not bear the house any longer, and all the afternoon he and Cap tramped through the woods but his heart was just as heavy when he returned. John had a cheerful fire in the grate for the evenings were getting cool; his slippers were by the chair, his house jacket was thrown across the arm, and the faithful old servant brought a small table and served his dinner there, hovering about, anticipating his every want, but his best effort failed to elicit more than a kind "Thank you, John," and he carried the almost untouched meal back to the kitchen feeling perplexed and anxious.

After he had gone Jean tried to read, but he could only see a winsome face crowned with sunny brown hair on the pages before him. At last he could endure it no longer, and determined to write to Evelyn to tell her once more of his love and plead with her to reconsider her answer. He wrote:

"Little Sweetheart:—It is hard to make myself believe that you have cast my love aside. It must be that I do not deserve to have such a treasure. I know I am not worthy of you, dear one, but you have crept into my life as my one great, all absorbing need, and now I must give you up. I am not sorry I love you; I am glad, glad; nothing can take it from me. I will always love you, my own, my beautiful one. Oh, Evelyn, come to me, love me! Let us work together always. Whether you give yourself to me or not, your love will be the crown of my life. Such a poor life without you, I fear, and yet I am better and stronger for having known you. Your future will be full and I will rejoice in every success you attain. God bless you, dear little one. JEAN."

Jean could not trust himself to read the letter over, and hastily addressing an envelope he placed a stamp on it and started to take it to the post-office, but at the hall door he stopped. A struggle was going on in his heart. Can I send it? What reason have I to expect she will change her mind? For a moment he stood irresolute, and then with a half audible "Oh God, help me to give her up!" the struggle was over and he rushed to his room, threw the letter into a drawer, packed his suit case and hurried to the train. The old feeling to take his trouble to "Mither" had come over him.

For the next two weeks he buried himself in the work of the settlement house, then went to Princeton for the last year of his seminary work.

Jean only saw Evelyn once before he went away. Mrs. Hathaway invited him to tea with Doctor Jones. Evelyn was her own bright self, but she and Jean never exchanged a word or look that would show how their hearts were aching.

ANNOUNCEMENT DAY IS THE LORD'S DAY.

September 20.

What Announcement Day?

Of the International Missionary Convention.

Where and when is it?

In New Orleans, October 9-15.

What is that to us?

Because it is our church, our Sunday-school, our Endeavor, our C. W. B. M., our men's clubs, our colleges and our missionary and benevolent societies.

Are you going?

Yes.

Why?

Because everybody who can is going. Because I want to see the southland and visit the most interesting city in America. Because I want to help the cause. Because I want the uplift it will give me.

What will it cost?

Room will be from 50 cents per day up, meals from 15 cents up, and all railroads in America have given the best rates that can be gotten by any convention to any city. We will have to ask our local ticket agents the exact cost of travel.

What sort of program will New Orleans have?

Professor Hackelman will lead the chorus of 500 voices; the Netz Sisters Quartette will sing, Miss Una Berry is the soloist; the C. W. B. M., the Christian Endeavor, the Sunday-schools, the American and Foreign Missionary societies, the boards of Church Extension, Benevolences, Ministerial Relief and colleges will have one of the finest issues of sacred eloquence ever put on the platform; then there will be the Union Communion Service and the Christian Union Session. Thus we can shake the hand of our missionary heroes from all over the world.

Would I have any right to attend?

Just the same as any other disciple of Christ.

How is the weather in New Orleans this season?

Fine; delightful.

What sort of clothes must one wear?

Rather light weight: even white wash dresses are used some at this season.

Must I give notice beforehand that I'm coming?

Not necessarily, for the local reception committee will meet every train. But, if you like, you may drop a card to our minister, W. M. Taylor, 1628 State street.

How many friends may I have to go with me?

All you can, for New Orleans has unlimited facilities to care for the visitors.

Will our minister go?

He wants to go, and the church can make his heart glad and reap a glorious blessing from his future labors with us by giving him a purse and a vacation so he can attend.

Well, I am going to get the church to send the minister. I am going with him and shall get several others to go with us. Good-bye, I'm off. Will meet you in the registration room in the Convention building, the Athenaeum, corner St. Charles avenue and Clio street, New Orleans.

This is the one chance of my life! Think of it! I just can't afford to miss it! I can afford it, for I am a child of the King; this is the King's business; it will be an education to me, will broaden me, and the Lord will repay me a hundredfold. Nothing can turn me: I'm going.

WITH THE WORKERS.

The revival at Flanagan, Ill., is proving a success. It is being conducted by Hon. John R. Golden and Charles E. McVay. There have been nine confessions to date. Flanagan has five saloons and a large foreign population which make a revival effort difficult. R. E. Thomas is the pastor of the church.

Charles E. McVay who is now singing in a meeting at Flanagan, Ill., will assist J. H. Fuller in a four weeks' meeting at Fremont, Neb., in October.

L. C. McPherson has resigned at Wellsville, N. Y., and is now holding a meeting for his brother at Dunkirk, N. Y. He will supply W. C. Bower's pulpit in North Tonawanda until February, when he will begin to give his entire time to Keuka College, the new institution which is owned jointly by Disciples and Free Baptists.

The Cook County Sunday-school Association, with offices at 140 Dearborn street, in Chicago, has prepared a good tract on teacher-training work. In this tract there is a fine list of books that have proved serviceable. There are many good suggestions concerning the successful operation of these classes.

The church at Washington, Ill., had an unusual day of blessing recently. There were seventeen accessions to the membership of the church. A new choir, a recarpeted church, a large Sunday-school and a new society of Christian Endeavor added to the delights of the day.

Rev. Norman H. Robertson and Mabel Currie were married at Everton, Ont., on September 2. They will be at home in Colfax, Ill., after October 6. Mr. Robertson has had a successful ministry in Colfax and we wish him the more abundant success now that reinforcements have come in the work.

Charles Blanchard recently closed a short meeting at the old historic church at Lost Creek, which is the oldest church in the state of Iowa. The church was founded in 1836. The meeting resulted in twelve confessions of faith. L. B. Kline, pastor of the church at Fort Madison, assisted in the meeting.

W. B. Taylor of Moberly, Mo., is to assist F. W. Norton in the work of establishing the Wharton Memorial Home for the children of our foreign missionaries. Mr. Norton will give his time to the work east of the Mississippi and Mr. Taylor will present the work in Missouri, Iowa, Kansas and Texas. Mr. Taylor was a college classmate of G. L. Wharton. His more recent pastorates have been at Mexico and Moberly, Mo.

Rev. W. F. Rothenburger, until recently pastor of the Irving Park Church of this city, will return to Chicago September 27, as the preacher in the anniversary services of that church. The first Sunday in October he will begin his pastorate with the Franklin Circle congregation in Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. and Mrs. Rothenburger enjoyed vacation days near Toronto, Can.

Rev. O. E. Tomes, pastor of the Englewood Church, Indianapolis, Ind., has accepted a call to become the minister of the congregation in Ann Arbor, Mich. Here he will succeed Prof. A. C. Gray, who will teach this year in Eureka College. Mr. Tomes has accomplished a notably successful work in Indianapolis during two pastorates in that city. As a member of the State Board and the state president of Christian Endeavor among the Disciples he has been earnestly interested in the progress of our cause in Indiana. He will move to Ann Arbor, October 1.

Rev. Ben N. Mitchell was the preacher recently in the regular services of the church in Litchfield, Ill. Mr. Mitchell is the successful pastor in Virginia, Ill.

Mrs. F. N. Calvin, wife of the pastor of the Compton Heights Church, St. Louis, Mo., passed away Monday, September 7. Her death was unexpected, coming after but a few hours' of serious illness. Mrs. Calvin was a talented and cultured woman, always earnestly interested in the work of the church and ably co-operating with her husband in the labors of his minstry. The Christian Century shares with the many friends of the family the sincerest sympathy for the bereaved husband and children.

John Ray Ewers closes three years' service with the First Christian Church of Youngstown, Ohio, October 1. The congregation has heartily and unanimously asked him to remain as the pastor indefinitely and he has accepted, the relation between pastor and people being most happy.

Two hundred and forty people have united with the church during this pastorate, 168 by primary obedience. The Sunday-school enrolls 360, the mission circle for young men and women numbers 150, the men's club 100, the choir fifty, the training classes sixty, the C. W. B. M. eighty. The total membership (revised roll) 900. Mr. Ewers always holds his own meetings.

The church is a social center and is attended by great numbers of young people. Fifty-five young men have united with the church during the pastorate. This includes the ages of eighteen to forty only. The church is in splendid condition. The old debt has been paid off and many improvements made in the property.

Mr. Ewers is and has been during most of this time president of a board of ministers and laymen, which has successfully completed a social settlement building worth $25,000, and which is doing a wonderful work among the foreigners. There are four paid workers and about forty volunteer workers.

The cause in Youngstown prospers with three strong churches.

Dr. Bruce Brown of Valparaiso, Ind., has a way of making his sermon subjects attractive. On Sunday mornings he is preaching a series of sermons through September on "The Problem of Human Suffering," through October on "The Problem of Prayer," and through November on "The Problem of Human Duty." His evening sermons for the same period are on the general subject. "The Gospel for Today," with such subtitles as "Mental Myopia" (the need of open mindedness today), "The Gospel for an Age of Doubt" (the need of faith today), "The Standpatter" (the need of conservatism today), "The Extremist" (the need of the radical today).

No promise is surer of fulfillment than that brief but comprehensive statement of the Master's, "Seek and ye shall find." We are bound to find what we are looking for if our quest is rightly directed and we continue it long enough. Nothing encourages us in our search for the vision beautiful like the companionship of those of like purpose. If in the solitude of our daily tasks we have failed to touch elbows with God's people and have sought no inspiring drum beat to quicken our pace and lighten our lagging foot steps, we shall do wrong if we wilfully neglect the opportunity to receive such a blessing.

Paul's figure of the athlete training for the race should spur us to forego some of our secular duties or pleasures in order to fit ourselves more perfectly for the race that is set before us. How are we running? Do we foolishly beat the air and merely mark time, wasting our energy on things not of eternal worth? Let us get out of the rut we have cut for ourselves in the past year and mingling with the rejoicing hosts at New Orleans catch the uplift of zeal for service. With this new and broader view point we can make a new valuation of ourselves and our work and go forward surer of our ground and with new and better equipment for higher service. Jasper T. Moses.

Concerning the resignation of Rev. M. M. Daws of the Central Church, Dallas, Texas, further information reaches us that he was made pastor emeritus by the congregation when his resignation was accepted. Texas will regard him as a sort of bishop who by his rare character, his eighteen years of ministry in Dallas, and his singular ability will be able to aid the state-wide movements of the brotherhood.

AFRAID TO EAT.

Girl Starving on Ill-Selected Food.

"Several years ago I was actually starving," writes a Me. girl, "yet dared not eat for fear of the consequences.

"I had suffered from indigestion from overwork, irregular meals and improper food, until at last my stomach became so weak I could eat scarcely any food without great distress.

"Many kinds of food were tried, all with the same discouraging effects. I steadily lost health and strength until I was but a wreck of my former self.

"Having heard of Grape-Nuts and its great merits, I purchased a package, but with little hope that it would help me—I was so discouraged.

"I found it not only appetizing but that I could eat it as I liked and that it satisfied the craving for food without causing distress, and if I may use the expression, 'it filled the bill.'

"For months Grape-Nuts was my principal article of diet. I felt from the very first that I had found the right way to health and happiness, and my anticipations were fully realized.

"With its continued use I regained my usual health and strength. Today I am well and can eat anything I like, yet Grape-Nuts food forms a part of my bill of fare." "There's a Reason."

Chicago and Vicinity.

The Englewood Church celebrated the twenty-third year of its history last Friday night. The pastors of the Living Link churches at Chicago Heights and Elgin were present to congratulate the mother church. The Englewood Church enters the fall campaign with an aggressive and unified program.

The tentative union of the Austin Church with the Congregational Church of that suburb will be watched with great interest. See the Christian Union Department for particulars.

Mr. Conrad preached at the Northwest mission last Sunday. This mission is anxious to have a settled ministry and it is hoped that this may be arranged at an early date.

Dr. Ames preached last Sunday on "A New Method of Church Organization." He proposes to divide up his church into classes which will meet once a month for study and counsel in the religious life. The idea is a modification of the system of ancient Methodism and is said to have a parallel in the Christian Science movement. It will be a most interesting experiment and we shall hope to present the plan in more detail at a future date.

Mr. and Mrs. Rainwater are now hard at work at the task at Garfield Boulevard Christian Church. The mission there has suffered great reverses, but under their leadership is taking on new life.

The loss of Mr. Rotherberger is felt deeply at Irving Park. He will be missed from the Chicago group. Irving Park hopes to locate a pastor before long.

Mr. Kindred is much improved in health after his summer vacation.

Everything is perfectly harmonious at the Memorial Church. Dr. Willett is back from his vacation and has preached there the past three Sundays. The church has suffered a great deal of newspaper notoriety concerning a division in the camp which had no foundation of fact.

The Evanston Church will observe October 4 as Rally Day. Services will be held at various hours all day with brief intermission. A number of outside speakers will assist. The church is going into the work this fall with great enthusiasm and unanimity.

The Monroe Street Church celebrated the tenth anniversary of the ministry of their pastor, C. C. Morrison, last Sunday. Ten years ago the church was a mission worshiping in a basement. Six years ago this basement structure was torn down and a building erected, costing $27,000, which is now one of the finest structures which the Disciples have in Chicago.

Harry F. Burns of Peoria has located with the Douglas Park Church, while he does some post-graduate work in the University of Chicago. This mission is fortunate to be provided with so able a ministry.

Chicago is fortunate in having almost all of its pulpits filled, only two churches not being supplied. With no invidious comparisons, it can be said that we have never been better represented in Chicago than this year. The ministers are working together with a good fellowship that is delightful.

The mission work of the various denominations in Chicago will be conducted henceforth in the spirit of Christian comity. Through the efforts of Dr. Shailer Mathews, a central organization has been formed with representation from Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists and Disciples. This organization will prosecute a more thorough study of the field than would be possible for any single organization and furnish the co-operating missionary boards with the facts they desire. A comparison of the work of the various societies showed that there was a mad race on the part of the denominations to possess the suburbs while the real problem of the city, the foreign population, was being merely played with. Only one of the denominations named had a Chinese mission. Many of the nationalities had not yet been entered by any of them.

A. J. Saunders writes from South Chicago that there is a prospect of negotiations with the Baptist Church of their part of the city looking toward union. Our South Chicago Church meets in an upper room and lacks the equipment that is necessary to many forms of church work.

Parker Stockdale lectured at Chautauquas most of the summer. He is now back at his post of duty. He will deliver his lecture on "Clouds and Rainbows" early in October to his church. The church insists on taking a silver offering in connection with this lecture and sending him to New Orleans. Every church in the city should devise a plan to get their minister to the national convention.

Prof. W. D. MacClintock has returned from his trip in the Orient. He will be the superintendent of the Hyde Park Sunday-school another year.

Mrs. Oliver W. Stewart visited Europe this summer as a delegate to the International Congress of Equal Suffragists. She was accompanied by Miss May Rogers, who teaches in the Englewood High School.

The Chicago churches responded so generously with entertainment at the state convention that nearly twice as much was offered as was used. Chicago hospitality has been abundantly demonstrated.

It is now a year since the tragic death of Mrs. Lillian White Grant. The Messenger of the Hyde Park Church prints this month a number of appreciations of her beautiful life. Mrs. Grant was a kindergarten teacher of national fame. At the time of her death she was principal of the neighborhood kindergarten of the University Congregational Church. She was the teacher of the kindergarten department of the Hyde Park Christian Sunday-school. The spirit of her life has been most fittingly summed up in these words, "Not our personal enjoyment, nor yet our seeming success in life, but our part in God's plan for others is the measure of our importance in this world."

Dr. Willett spoke at a banquet of the Association of Commerce at the Auditorium hotel recently. Jacob Riis of New York was the other speaker. A thousand of the leading business men of Chicago were present.

CRAIG-CARPENTER.

It will be a cause of great pleasure to their friends to know of the marriage of Rev. William Bayard Craig, D. D., of Denver, and Miss Mary Carpenter, of Des Moines, Iowa. The event took place in Hyde Park, Chicago, September 10. Rev. O. W. Lawrence of Decatur, Ill., son-in-law of Dr. Craig, performed the ceremony. The groom is pastor of the Central Church of Christ in Denver, where he has for many years been identified helpfully with all enterprises of religion and progress. He was the builder of the church in San Antonio, Texas, and late chancellor of Drake University. His ministry is respected and widely influential amongst the Disciples of Christ. Miss Carpenter has been one of the most important factors in the development of Drake University, serving for some years past as librarian and dean of women. Perhaps no woman in Des Moines is more highly respected and loved. The well wishes of a host of good friends follow them into the coming years.

DEADLY INSTRUMENT.

An Irishman, who had been in New York a couple of years, said to his newly-landed friend: "Now, Jim, you ought to settle down here; it is a mighty great country. Why, man, they don't hang you for murder here."

"And in faith, what do they do with you?" asked Jim.

"They kill you with elocution," said his kind adviser.—New York World.

"THE PALE GIRL."

Did Not Know Coffee Was the Cause.

In cold weather some people think a cup of hot coffee good to help keep warm. So it is—for a short time but the drug—caffeine—acts on the heart to weaken the circulation and the reaction is to cause more chilliness.

There is a hot wholesome drink which a Dak. girl found after a time, makes the blood warm and the heart strong.

She says:

"Having lived for five years in N. Dak., I have used considerable coffee owing to the cold climate. As a result I had a dull headache regularly, suffered from indigestion, and had no 'life' in me.

"I was known as the 'pale girl' and people thought I was just weakly. After a time I had heart trouble and became very nervous, never knew what it was to be real well. Took medicine but it never seemed to do any good.

"Since being married my husband and I both have thought coffee was harming us and we would quit, only to begin again, although we felt it was the same as poison to us.

"Then we got some Postum. Well, the effect was really wonderful. My complexion is clear now, headache gone, and I have a great deal of energy I had never known while drinking coffee.

"I haven't been troubled with indigestion since using Postum, am not nervous, and need no medicine. We have a little girl and boy who both love Postum and thrive on it and Grape-Nuts."

"There's a Reason."

BOOKS CLOSE.

The fact that our convention falls about a week earlier this year than usual, makes it imperative that we close our books on the evening of September 30. The time after that is all too scant for the preparation of our reports. Offerings which do not reach us by that time cannot be credited in the present missionary year. Please hurry your offerings into our hands by that time.

The American Christian Missionary Society,
Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

DOWN HILL ALL THE WAY.

It has become proverbial that everything good is up-hill work. But we have reached an exception. It is down-hill all the way to the great International Convention at New Orleans, October 9-15. For a million members of our churches all that is necessary to do to reach New Orleans is to jump into the nearest stream and float. The Father of Waters will bring them to the Crescent City. And indeed half the rest of our membership could float down into the Gulf of Mexico and drift around to New Orleans by observing a few simple rules of navigation. But easy as this is, most of us will find it still more convenient to go by rail.

The convention will offer such a record of victories won in all fields of Christian activity, will afford such uplifting fellowship with the best people on earth, and will bring such inspiring messages from the princes of God's house, that before the adjournment all will find themselves on a very mount of transfiguration. From its heights all roads will lead down-hill to Pittsburg, 1909. And no disciple needs to be told that the great Centennial at Pittsburg will be an eminence at whose feet the whole world will lie outspread as an inviting field for triumphant Christian progress. On to Pittsburg by way of New Orleans!

History is to be made at New Orleans this fall. Every minister of the brotherhood ought to be there to have a share in the organization of the American Christian Ministerial Association, and to help inaugurate its great campaign for the enlistment of four thousand new preachers in 1909. Every Bible school superintendent and teacher ought to be there to share in shaping and forwarding the great enterprise of enlisting one hundred thousand women and one hundred thousand men in ten thousand organized adult classes. Every elder and deacon ought to be there to give and to get suggestions as to how we may, in the closing year of the century outstrip all previous records in restoring the Christianity of Christ in its life and products as well as in its doctrines and ordinances. Every C. W. B. M. woman ought to be there to get a fair start in the great membership campaign for a hundred thousand. Every endeavor officer should be present, for all must bear a part if we are to rank first in 1909. On to a greater century by way of New Orleans, 1908, and Pittsburg, 1909!

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

Charcoal Removes Stomach Poisons

Pure Charcoal Will Absorb One Hundred Times Its Volume in Poisonous Gases.

Charcoal was made famous by the old monks of Spain, who cured all manner of stomach, liver, blood and bowel troubles by this simple remedy.

One little nervous Frenchman held forth its virtues before a famous convention of European physicians and surgeons. Secheyron was his name. He was odd, quaint and very determined. His brothers in medicine laughed at his claims. Thereupon he swallowed two grains of strychnine, enough to kill three men and ate some charcoal. The doctors thought him mad, but he did not even have to go to bed. The charcoal killed the effects of the strychnine and Secheyron was famous. Ever since that day physicians have used it. Run impure water through charcoal and you have a pure, delicious drink.

Bad breath, gastritis, bowel gases, torpid liver, impure blood, etc., give way before the action of charcoal.

It is really a wonderful adjunct to nature and is a most inexhaustible storehouse of health to the man or woman who suffers from gases or impurities of any kind.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made of pure willow charcoal, sweetened to a palatable state with honey.

Two or three of them cure an ordinary case of bad breath. They should be used after every meal, especially if one's breath is prone to be impure.

These little lozenges have nothing to do with medicine. They are just sweet, fresh willow, burned to a nicety for charcoal making and fragrant honey, the product of the bee. Thus every ingredient comes to man from the lap of nature.

The only secret lies in the Stuart process of compressing these simple substances into a hard tablet or lozenge, so that age, evaporation or decay may not assail their curative qualities.

You may take as many of them as you wish and the more you take the quicker will you remove the effects of bad breath and impurities arising from a decayed or decaying meal. They assist digestion, purify the blood and help the intestines and bowels throw off all waste matter.

Go to your druggist at once and buy a package of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges, price 25 cents. You will soon be told by your friends that your breath is not so bad as it was. Send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM THE MAYOR OF NEW ORLEANS.

August 28, 1908.

To the International Christian Missionary Convention of the Churches of Christ. Greeting:

On behalf of the citizens of the city of New Orleans, I extend to you the hospitality of our city with the sincere wish that you may find your stay here both pleasant and profitable.

New Orleans is always glad to welcome in her midst the propagators of Christ's faith, and, as chief executive of the municipality, I tender you my services in any manner you may desire, and again assure you of your welcome to our dear city.

With best wishes for a harmonious and successful convention and assurance of my highest esteem, I am. Very truly yours,

Martin Behrman, Mayor.

The Convention Committee for 1910 are receiving inquiries relative to entertaining the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ the year following the centennial. Recently, both from Nebraska and Oklahoma, messages have come acknowledging the priority of our claim and expressing the hope that they might be given the opportunity to entertain the convention in case Topeka waived her claims.

To all such brethren we desire to reply, through the medium of our papers, that the question may be settled once and for all. After having received $300 from the Commercial Club of the city to be used in our campaign at Norfolk, we feel that we are morally bound by every consideration of fair dealing and Christian obligation to protect the interests and conserve the rights of the citizens of this city, who so generously gave of their means and interests in the last contest.

Certainly no other state will seriously entertain a proposition to contest Topeka's claim for 1910, if they but consider the promises made to Topeka at Norfolk, the money that the Commercial Club has already expended and the timeliness of this early notice to the brotherhood at large. We want you all here in 1910.

Charles A. Finch, Chairman.
F. E. Mallory, Secretary.

CONCERNING CLIFFORD MONROE.

The Aurora (Ill.) church called a church council during the state convention to consider charges against their minister, Clifford Monroe. A considerable number of churches were represented by invitation and Clifford Monroe was invited to attend. Mr. Monroe failed to put in appearance, his only excuse being that a detailed statement of charges against him was not furnished. The council was presided over by J. Fred Jones, the state secretary, and O. F. Jordan of Evanston acted as secretary. Reports were heard concerning Mr. Monroe's ministry in Missouri, and in Clay City, Batavia, Aurora and Sandoval in Illinois. The council resolved unanimously that the charges of financial irregularity and of social indiscretions made Mr. Monroe unworthy to represent the Disciples in the ministry.

Carthage, Mo., September 14, 1908.

Christian Century:

I am starting today to Blackfoot, Idaho, where I spent some time last July, to secure a home and do what I can toward locating a colony of our people and building a Christian church.

There are 80,000 acres of choice land, segregated and reclaimed by the state and opened to settlement under the Carey Act, on the Big Lost River in southern Idaho. These lands will furnish 500 choice homes and an opportunity to our people to do excellent missionary work in the great Northwest country.

What preacher among us has a good tent to donate or sell very cheap, to be used as a place of worship on these lands until we get able to build a church house?

I want to get a tent on these lands early next spring and then I want to get some good singing evangelist to help me hold a meeting and establish a church.

I shall be glad to hear from those who want a part in this work.

I have an open date for a meeting after November. S. J. Vance, Evangelist.

Special Excursion to New Orleans

INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONVENTION CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA

The Illinois Central Railroad has been selected as the official route by Illinois Disciples and the company has provided special train service at a rate of twenty-seven dollars ($27.00) for the round trip. This splendid service and the low rate secured should and undoubtedly will induce a great many of the Brotherhood to attend this splendid convention. The city of New Orleans is almost an ideal place to visit. Its beauty, its countless attractions, its old landmarks and buildings re-calling an historic past—New Orleans and this international convention will surely make an irresistible appeal to many hundreds in the churches of Christ. Some churches will appreciate the wisdom of sending their pastors at their expense, and many pastors will feel compelled to go at any cost.

The excursion tickets permit a stopover at Vicksburg and the National Military Park, together with a ride of one hundred miles on the Mississippi River between Vicksburg and Natchez, including meals and berth on the steamer, at an additional cost of $3.50.

Special train will leave Chicago at 6:00 p. m., Wednesday, October 7, and arrive at New Orleans at 8:15 p. m. the next day. An attractive folder has been issued by the Illinois Central Railroad and can be obtained free by application to any of the passenger agents or to Mr. R. J. Carmichael, city ticket office, 117 Adams street, Chicago.

FREEDOM

We are not free: Freedom doth not consist
In musing with our faces toward the Past,
While petty cares and crawling interests twist
Their spider threads about us, which at last
Grow strong as iron chains to cramp and bind
In formal narrowness heart, soul, and mind.
Freedom is recreated year by year,
In hearts wide open on the Godward side,
In souls calm-cadenced as the whirling sphere,
In minds that sway the future like a tide.
No broadest creeds can hold her, and no code;
She chooses men for her august abodes,
Building them fair and fronting to the dawn.

An Unparalleled Offer

Books of special current interest to all Disciples offered at an unusual bargain price or sent free with each new subscription to The Christian Century. With our Centennial Anniversary only a short way off, these records of our early history and these early historic documents are of wide and profound interest. Christian Union is now on every lip, but comparatively few know or realize what an important work Alexander Campbell undertook or what our Brotherhood has accomplished in this direction. Disciples should read their own splendid history. Here are the records:

12mo, silk cloth, gilt top, 365 pp., $1.00.

This volume includes (1) "The Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery," as it was put forth June 28, 1804, and signed by Robert Marshall, John Dunlavy, Richard McNemar, B. W. Stone, John Thompson and David Purviance; (2) the "Declaration and Address" of Thomas Campbell, set forth in 1809, when the "Associate Synod of North America" virtually reaffirmed the censure pronounced upon him by the Presbytery. Here are the great watchwords spoken by the real formulator of the principles of the Brotherhood and its effort for "the restoration of primitive Christianity." (3) "The Sermon on the Law," by Alexander Campbell, pronounced at a meeting of the Regular Baptist Association on Cross Creek, Virginia, 1816. (4) "Our Position," as set forth by Isaac Errett, and (5) "The World's Need of Our Plea," by J. H. Garrison. Also several chapters of introduction by Dr. C. A. Young.

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES.

Bound in green silk cloth, 8vo, $1.00.

This volume is a fortunate companion to the Historical Documents, containing as it does a detailed description of these and many other early documents, as well as early and late discussions of them all. This book, edited by Professor Errett Gates, of the University, with an introduction by the late Dr. Eri B. Hulbert, has been heartily welcomed wherever seen, and will be regarded as an important contribution to the literature of our fellowship. The addresses, and particularly the debates of Alexander Campbell, are fully delineated and their bearing on later and present day discussion clearly shown.

BASIC TRUTHS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

By Professor Herbert L. Willett, Ph. D. Cloth and gold, 12mo, 75c.

A frank and able discussion of the great tenets of the Christian faith, with chapters on The Primacy of Christ, The Father, The Scriptures, The Death and Resurrection of Christ, Faith, Repentance, Baptism, etc. An attractive volume, with illustrations appropriate to the inspiring theme.

SPECIAL OFFER

These are our own publications and for a limited time we are going to offer free to new subscribers their choice of the above volumes. Any present subscriber may send in his own renewal together with one new name and $3.00 and will receive his choice of the above books (one) and also a paper bound copy of "The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples." This special offer will be withdrawn soon.

EDITORIAL

Our Periodic Disturbance.

A heated controversy is raging in our brotherhood just now. Perhaps we have no right to call it a controversy, for it is all on one side. The Christian Standard of Cincinnati goes into convulsions each week over the report that Professor H. L. Willett, one of the editors of the Christian Century, has been asked by the centennial program committee to make an address at the Pittsburg convention a year hence. It is the persistent theme of its editorial columns, and by every device possible the paper is stirring up its partisan constituency to send in words of protest against the contemplated "outrage." The "protest" began some weeks ago when some one contended that Dr. Willett should not be allowed to raise the gavel at the Illinois state convention of which he was the president. Following that convention (held a month ago) at which Dr. Willett presided without a word of objection from a single voice, the Standard took up the hue and cry against the missionary societies for his reported appointment on the centennial program. They profess not to know whether he has been so appointed or not. It may all be a false rumor, mere gossip or guesswork. It may prove to be a dream. Certainly it is a nightmare. But at any rate, it is a good pretext to make a fuss, and the Standard dearly loves to make a fuss, especially just before the hosts gather in their national missionary conventions. Last year it was McLean. This year it is Willett. What the nature of the disturbance will be next year when all the world stands by and reviews the grand procession marching to Pittsburg, who can guess? We cannot doubt that such an extraordinary chance will not be missed by this enterprising newspaper to get itself into the light of attention. It would not do for the Standard to let the brethren gather in convention with undistracted minds to sing and thank God together for his mighty blessings on the great cause he has committed to our hands. It would not do to let the councillors of the church sit down together in quiet confidence and plan greater conquests for the future. No! The Standard must be kept in the limelight. Its pages must be kept lurid with hate and partisanship. It will not be enough to ignore Willett, "we must repudiate him," their editor says. That sounds sensational. Everybody wants to read the next issue to see the "repudiation" actually executed. So the convention with its vast and solemn interests is corrupted in the very process of preparation for it, and the imagination of the people filled with irrelevant expectancy.

Last year many went to Norfolk because they expected a "fight." This year, no doubt, not a few will go to New Orleans from the same motive. They may go as partisans — to "save the cause." They may go as curious spectators — to "see the fun." Or they may go as peacemakers — to spread abroad an atmosphere of love and brotherliness and liberty, thus to shield our holy enterprise from shame in the eyes of the world. But whatever the primary attitude toward the contending factors in the situation, the great good sense of the Disciples of Christ will dominate at New Orleans as it dominated at Norfolk and at the Illinois convention. The Lord's cause will not be obscured by the contentiousness of a disingenuous newspaper. The missionary societies will make reports whose significance will be enhanced in view of the hard financial year through which the country has passed. The great plea and temper of the fathers of our Reformation will not be forgotten. A difference in philosophical speculation will not be made the basis of alienation of those who hold sacredly to the Lordship and Divinity of Christ Jesus.

Therefore, to those who are going to New Orleans to "see the fun" we say do not waste your time or money. There will be joy there, but no "fun." There will be triumph there. There will be unity there. For that convention will be presided over by men who are themselves presided over by the Spirit of Peace.

A "Centennial" Book.

It is important for the Disciples that the coming year be used by ministers and laymen alike in a study of the history of our movement and the principles that underlie it. It is a time for the wide dissemination of the best literature our people have produced. Every minister and Sunday-school teacher should be made familiar with the great utterances of our leading men. Many books might be mentioned that would aid in this. The works of Alexander Campbell—his Debates, The Christian Baptist, Millenial Harbinger, etc.—should be given wide circulation. The Histories of the Reformation—Tyler's and Gates' and Longan's—will aid in setting the facts in perspective. But there is one book which, if all others are disregarded, should be read by every Disciple of Christ without exception, and that is C. A. Young's collection of "Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union." Here are the great words of Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address," Alexander Campbell's revolutionary "Sermon on the Law," Isaac Errett's "Our Position" and J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." No person can afford to go to the Pittsburg convention next year without possessing this splendid volume. Many pastors will use it this year as the basis of a series of studies for the Midweek service. Such pastors will find that their people will read its pages with absorbed interest and will finish the study with clear ideas and a burning enthusiasm for the cause whose centennial year we are preparing to celebrate.

Can Modern Religion be Positive?

In our time theological dogmas are breaking up and new conceptions are being formulated only in a tentative way. The practical habits and sanctions which belonged with the dogmas of yesterday are being abandoned by great multitudes of folk. The means by which the life of the spirit has been cultivated in the individual soul and made effective in collective organization are regarded by many minds with indifference, often with contempt. The conventional machinery of religion does not seem to men of today to enter into the subject matter of revelation as does the spiritual content of religion. The legalism of yesterday is breaking down and with it is vanishing the deference to arbitrary authority.

A Christian is not any longer defined in terms of any objective formality such as attending church, submitting to baptism, observing the communion, reading the Bible, or other specific acts. No type so delights the caricaturist as the church member whose scrupulous care for the conventional practices of church life is not backed up with sympathy and vision. The novel, the theatre and the newspaper cartoon delight to hold him up to the ridicule of all men. The modern preacher, too, finds himself laying first emphasis upon the life of the spirit as over against the life of the organization. A Christian is defined in psychological or spiritual terms, not in terms of external conformity. Love, loyalty and service — these are the tests of a Christian. In an increasing number of minds the church organization, its services and customs, are treated with indifference.

Minds of this sort reason concerning the observance of the Lord's day that every day is sacred, and instead of remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy, we should remember more especially the other six days to keep them holy. Concerning the Bible, they reason that it was written by men of like passions with other poets and sages and prophets, but all good scripture, whether in the Bible or any other book, is profitable for the soul. So, why make a special place in the faith of our hearts for this particular volume and set special times at which it is to be read? Concerning public worship, they reason that God is everywhere, that we live in him and have our being in him. Why, therefore, should we make a point of worshipping him in a particular sort of building called a church and on special days? Concerning the ministry, they reason that God is directly accessible to each one of his children. No priest, no mediator, is needed to commend us to the Father of our souls. Why then maintain a distinct order of ministers? Concerning the church itself: it has always been assumed to be of divine origin, to have come down in some miraculous way out of heaven. But we now know that it arose naturally out of the conditions of human life, as any other social institution arises, and no more represents a breaking into the social order by a supernatural power than does the state, or the family or the educational institution. Of what use then is the church? What can justify its continuance among us? So far as it renders any real service to mankind are not these services better rendered by the home or the school or the state?

The attitude of mind that reasons thus is peculiarly characteristic of our time. Whatever loss organized religion exhibits today is due in part to the fact that there is some resemblance of truth in such reasoning. The dogmatic sanctions by which men and women were formerly impelled to submit themselves to the authority of the church and its customs have been vitally weakened. In many minds where they have not been consciously uprooted they are too pale to act as motives. A new way of thinking has come over us. It is difficult for the modern mind to credit the miraculous origin of any existing institution and even where the miracle is credited as a fact its value as an infallible proof of the divine is disputed.

As a consequence of this state of mind many are at sea in the practice of religion. The modern emphasis on the inward, the subjective often leaves religious sentiment without a mechanism for overt expression. Hence, it becomes sentimentalism and comes to nothing. The preaching of religion as love—love to God and love to man—however much it may stir the emotions, is often a soporific to the will. If we abandon legalism can we speak a definite, objective message? If we shelve dogmas can we still be positive?

We are raising these questions not for the purpose of discussing them now, but as indicating the direction we mean to take in a series of editorials beginning next week. First of all, we shall have something to say on "The Lord's Day."

A Cincinnati Silence.

Down on the banks of the Ohio they do say that silence gives consent. A great many times in the last few years Chicago ministers have been accused of various things by the Christian Standard and asked to deny them. Many of the Chicago ministers do not take this journal and do not see the demand. Other ministers of Chicago do not always put "thumbs up" when the demand is made, but choose the policy of dignified silence which is understood among educated men in a great many communities. This has lead to what is known as the Chicago silence. The Chicago silence has been interpreted as convicting certain men of various things which if not as serious as horse stealing have been considered reasons for severe punishment. Not only have the Chicago ministers often been tried and condemned by challenges which have had no answer, but missionary boards and secretaries have met the same treatment. The men who are responsible to the church for the administration of our missionary funds have been called upon to discriminate against brethren who have been among the very best friends of missions, upon grounds which had nothing to do with missions. Because the societies have almost uniformly refused to recognize the authority of our journals to administer the missionary funds, the men of the mission boards have almost always kept silence. Upon the basis of this silence, our Cincinnati contemporary has insisted that they were guilty.

We do not yet yield the point that with most men dignified silence is not a confession of guilt. But if silence means anything anywhere it ought to mean something in the office of the Christian Standard where the test has been so often proposed. In that case, what of the silence of the Christian Standard on the challenge given by the Christian Evangelist this last summer? The Evangelist gave a ringing pledge of loyalty to our organized mission work. It accused the Sandard of being opposed to organized missions and asked it to join in a statement of loyalty. The owner of the Christian Standard proposed to state his real position in the near future with reference to missionary societies, but through these anxious weeks we have had nothing but silence. Are we to interpret this silence as Chicago silences are interpreted? Is the Christian Standard secretly intriguing against our missionary societies? We could not believe that the very journal, which yet puts the name of its great founder to the mast-head, had flopped over to the position of Ben Franklin with reference to the societies, did we not read in its pages each week the very sort of criticism of the societies which is printed in the "anti" journals. There is no criticism of the societies in the Octographic Review which does not find an echo in the Standard, except concerning the scriptural authority of the societies. Shall silence mean consent in Cincinnati as it is supposed to do in Chicago?

The Campbell Institute.

A copy of the September "Scroll" is in our hands. We note a change in the management of this interesting monthly journal. The Campbell Institute has abolished the editorial office and now publishes the Scroll through a committee, whose function is simply to solicit contributions from the members and to see that the paper is printed. The purpose of this change is to make the paper represent the Institute rather than to be the organ of an editor or an editorial board. The Campbell Institute is composed of men of all types of theology and varying temperaments. The widest differences emerge in their discussions. The basis of their fellowship in the organization is declared to be not similarity of thought, but a desire to know the truth and to seek it with an open mind and by the methods of scholarship. They disavow any intention of making a theological propaganda of the organization. Fortunately, the wide divergence of views among them is the best rebuttal of the charge that they have any such intention. We hear some talk of an advance step to be taken by the Institute shortly looking toward the expansion of its membership and the broadening of its field of work. The purpose of the Institute is to cultivate and maintain in its members the scholarly habits and ideals which are so in peril of being lost amid the rush and pressure of practical life. Certainly this is a goal which every college graduate should keep constantly before him. And he probably needs only the co-operation and partnership of others of like interests to stimulate him to his best work. We hope to see the advantages of this splendid organization extended beyond the smaller circle of University graduates (to which the membership is now limited) into the wider field of those who love and wish to know the truth.

The Christian Evangelist reports the serious illness of its beloved editor, Dr. J. H. Garrison. He was compelled to leave his summer home at Pentwater, Michigan, very hurriedly and submit to an operation upon his arrival in St. Louis. A second operation was subsequently performed, from which recovery is slow. Hundreds of those attending the New Orleans convention will regret to read that they will not be priviledged to see his face in that great gathering. The prayers of a grateful brotherhood are ascending to God for his recovery. In these prayers the members of the Christian Century staff heartily join. Long since has the brotherhood learned to trust and follow the spiritual leadership of this gracious servant of Christ.

The Temperance Parade.

Last Saturday 8,000 people marched through State street, Chicago, in a temperance parade. The movement originated with the W. C. T. U. but was joined by practically all the temperance organizations of the city. Prominent clergymen like Bishop Fallows and Jenkin Lloyd Jones marched on foot with the other ministers. Individual churches had floats, the Englewood Church and the Jackson Boulevard Church of our own communion having large delegations. The banners had many suggestions that were forceful and timely though a few were unfortunately exaggerated or inappropriate. The number of voters in the line of march was most impressive. Numerous bands added to the spirit of the enterprise, the Scotch bag-pipe boys being the most conspicuous of all the musicians.

The frequent assertion by banner and song, "Chicago is going dry" aroused comments among saloon habitues all along the line of march. While the occasional wag raised the cry for some popular brand of beer, the whole impression was a serious one. Is Chicago going dry? Probably not right away. But the whole movement of the social spirit is against the saloon. It stands square across the path of progress. It is the enemy of the better day when righteousness shall be the rule in Chicago, the future city of God. With the forces of a new civilization set against the rum-shop, the cry of the children "The saloon must go!" will be fulfilled.

The people responsible for the parade have been criticised for launching the movement at this particular time. It has been claimed there was no occasion for it. There seems ample occasion, however, both in local and national affairs. The fight for Sunday closing has not yet come to the last round. The state and national elections are near at hand. The parade was also justified in other ways. The city has been given an impression of the strength of the temperance movement that will abide. Men who thought the church was dead now realize that it is very much alive. The parade has been an important skirmish in the great battle for a sober nation.

The Place of Miracle in Christian Belief.

In much that has recently been written in regard to miracle there is displayed a strange misconception of the value of the miraculous in religion, as compared with other elements which have received insistence in the origin and progress of the kingdom of God. It appears to be the feeling of not a few in this generation that a religion gains in value as it appeals to the marvelous. That the more astonishing the displays of its effects, as contrary to the usual course of nature, the more convincing it will be, and the readier will be the human mind to accept it as divine.

This attitude is perhaps not unnatural. It was certainly the earliest. Most primitive religions have made their appeal to miracle as the best evidence of their validity. Wonder-working has had a place in nearly all the ancient faiths, so far as they can be traced. In some cases the marvels were manifest frauds, perpetrated upon a simple people to effect their submission to the ministers of the national cult. There is abundant evidence that such was too often the case among the Greeks and Romans. In other cases there may have been a sincere faith on the part of both priests and votaries that the wonders wrought were true and credible.

But in any case the value of these works of marvel was no greater than their success in turning the minds of those who witnessed them to the greater values of the religion in the name of which they were performed. The tendency in all such cases has ever been to rest upon the miracles as ends in themselves, and fail to see the moral meanings involved in them. Jesus encountered this very type of mind. Men followed him in crowds, not because they wished to learn the truth from his lips, nor to conform their lives to his teaching, but only because they loved to be astonished by the acts of power which he performed.

His miracles had their values and their limitations. They were evidences of his power to those who saw them. They were revelations of his love to those whom he healed. They illustrated the unvarying tendency of the kingdom of God to restore men to normal life. They were prophecies that the reign of sin, which is the secret and cause of all suffering, should be overthrown. But their value was inconsiderable beside the life, the teachings and the sacrificial purpose of Jesus. Their significance was lost beyond the circle of those who saw them. To all such it has been necessary to prove the nature of our Lord as divine in order to convince them that he wrought these works of power. Men believe in the miracles today, if at all, because they believe in him. To such the works which are recorded of him are the natural fruits on the tree of such a life as he lived.

The entire process of man's redemption is a wonder past all explanation. In this sense it is not improper to say that Christianity is a supernatural religion. Man is made for greater things than the life of the dust. In this sense he is the object of a supernatural ministry. But in so far as this term is employed to indicate an infraction of the processes of either nature or the nature of man it is misleading and subversive of the right view of God's work in the world. There is no virtue in a violation of those very laws which are God's ways of working. There is no piety in the mere acceptance of wonder without an effort to rightly comprehend the plan of God in his revealing grace. The man who rejects that definition of miracle which makes of it a fracture of the very order of the universe which is the first law of God may be far more reverent than he who insists that the more marvelous the miracle is, the more delighted he is to accept it. God has not given us the spirit of credulity, unthinking and irrational, but the spirit of judgment, inquiry and a sound mind.

The present generation finds the miracles the least convincing feature of the ministry of Christ. Whether it rejects them or accepts them with question it is quite likely to declare that they do not concern it very much. To the Christian with inherited faith and unquestioning adherence to the statements of the New Testament this attitude seems unwarranted and shocking. Yet as those who wish to interpret our holy faith to the age in which we live, the only one in which it will be our privilege to work, we cannot but appreciate the fact that a definition of miracle which makes it consistent with the interpretation of nature and God as we accept them is at least the duty of the hour, in so far as it is not inconsistent with the facts of the New Testament. It is this interpretation for which we plead. It is this, if any, which the student, the army of workingmen keenly interested in social and scientific inquiries, and the average man of all types, will accept.

But above all views of miracle is the present and pressing appeal which the Christ makes by virtue of his character, his inspiring message and his plan by which every life may achieve redemption from the power of sin, and redemptive value for mankind. By this door a man may be led at last even to the acceptance of miracle, to whom this unique side of our Lord's life made at first no appeal. Through faith in him there may come faith in the miraculous.

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary, writes: "'The Christian Use of the Tithing System' is enabling all who adopt it, according to their unanimous testimony, to: First, Give more than they ever thought possible before; Second, Live better on nine-tenths than on ten-tenths; Third, Know the truth of the words of the Lord Jesus when he said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'

"Let those who are systematically giving a tenth or more send in their names and addresses and they will receive the Centennial Tither's Certificate. This involves no change in the way of distributing your tenth. Let those who are not tithing, or who wish to enlist others, write for free literature."

The Church having the most tithers is at Bethany, Neb., having 100 and the next is the First Church of Mobile, Alabama, with 77. The total number of tithers that have reported to date is 1,783. These will add considerably to the income of the Church.

A paragraph clipped from a recent issue of a newspaper tells its story plainly. "A poor boy, who by dint of hard work had succeeded in getting an education, decided to try for a vacancy in a Chicago bank. While he was in the office the bank president touched a button and the bank's detective stepped in. He looked at the boy and then went away. The president said, 'Come back in a week.' At that time the president said, 'There are forty-six applicants for this place. All have been watched for a week. Only two boys passed the character test, which touched particularly the points of extravagance, vice, where evenings were spent, and the Sabbath day. All this is strictly business and not at all an inquisition into private character. This bank must take account of these things for its own sake. Of the two you have the best qualifications, and the place is yours.'"

Begin the day with God:
Kneel down to Him in prayer;
Lift up thy heart to His abode,
And seek His love to share.

Open the Book of God,
And read a portion there;
That it may hallow all they thoughts
And sweeten all thy care.

Go through the day with God,
Whate'er thy work may be;
Where'er thou art,—at home, abroad,—
He still is near to thee.

Converse in mind with God;
Thy spirit heavenward raise;
Acknowledge every good bestowed,
And offer grateful praise.

Conclude the day with God:
Thy sins to Him confess;
Trust in the Lord's atoning blood,
And plead His righteousness.

Lie down at night with God,
Who gives His servants sleep;
And when thou tread'st the vale of death,
He will thee guard and keep.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates.

Trial Unions.

Some of us are inclined to be a little impatient over the slowness of the movement for a union between Baptists and Disciples. Those ministers and members of the two bodies who have outgrown the differences between them, and stand with perfect readiness to move into fellowship, grow restive under the indifference and opposition of those who still hold the differences real and vital. It is a serious question how far a union is justifiable in the face of a small irreconcilable minority. Shall the great majority of a church who are ready for union wait for the two or three who are not ready? Or shall the union be effected against the will of the few? This has been done in many of the unions already consummated.

Union between two churches is never justifiable where it leaves a minority on one side or the other, large enough to constitute a new church. A union should always mean the reduction of two to one. If after the union of two churches there are two left, the united church and a fragment of one or the other church, the union has not accomplished its full purpose. And, furthermore, it is in a position to lose its own unity and strength. It is never profitable to sow the spirit of division in a church over a proposed union with another church. That would be doing evil that good may come.

But there is another recourse that may be had with influential minorities opposed to union . All effort need not cease. Temporary unions of the public services under a joint minority can be entered which will leave both churches unchanged in their faith and order, but at the same time will promote acquaintance with each other's customs, ideas and cherished peculiarities. They might be called trial unions. They may be entered into for the few months of the summer, or they might extend through a period of six months or a year; and even then extended indefinitely if thought advisable, but preserved as temporary, not permanent unions until every member of both bodies was satisfied or dissatisfied with the experiment. Some who would scare at permanent unions, might very heartily enter into temporary unions, that did not raise the question of change or compromise. It might be that at the end of a temporary union such perfect accord and sympathy would be discovered between the two bodies, that a permanent union could be entered into without any feeling of estrangement from the old or compromise of cherished faith.

The advantages of a trial union would be very great in most communities. It would command the respect and attention of the outside world. Any exhibition of unity between churches has a wholesome influence upon the unchristian part of a community. Corruption in politics and municipal affairs thrives on the division in the ranks of the forces of righteousness. All forms of wickedness and unrighteousness count on division in the churches to give them life, breath and being. If the Christian interests were as closely united in a community as the liquor interests, the saloon could not live, wrong doers never like to see the churches getting together. They take notice when they do draw into closer fellowship. Living together, even temporarily, means acting together; and acting together on the part of the followers of Christ, means the coming of the kingdom of light, and going of the kingdom of darkness, in any community.

A trial union would be of the nature of a religious sensation that would command not only the attention but the attendance of the outside community. It would quicken the interest of the members of both churches. It would be the occasion of conversation among neighbors upon church matters, and that is always good. It would hold the religious interest of the community in suspense longer than revival, and, in fact, might be given many of the features of a genuine revival. If the two churches had settled ministers, a joint ministry would free them from some of the burdens of sermon preparation, so that they could devote time to other sides of their work, or could unite in new forms of social service in the community. Two congenial, resourceful pastors, uniting their congregations during a year, could plan larger things for both their churches and the community than either could alone. It would relieve the solitary minister of that heavy feeling of provincialism and rivalry which every denominational minister feels when he faces the other churches of his neighborhood as competitors. It is this leaden, discouraging sense of competition that gives strain to a sectarian ministry. The community is not all his for Christ's sake. He fears that he will trespass upon another man's ground in his work. But a joint ministry will give comradeship to a minister's work, and the spirit of possessorship, mastery and leadership in the community. What a bemeaning tone it gives to our modern sectarian ministry, when a man goes threading his way between homes whose doors are closed to him, and doging in and out of the homes of "his own people." Such a ministry can not be large, responsible and statesmanlike. A taste of fellowship and unity in a community would give any man a new heart and a larger spirit.

But what about the details of trial union? They are easily adjusted as the asking of the question. The two congregations could meet in one, presumbably the larger, building, if both churches had buildings, thus saving the expense of heating and lighting two buildings. Provision could be made for the separate weekly communion of the Lord's supper by the Disciples, if the Baptists did not choose to join. The classes of the two Sunday-schools could be preserved undivided under their own teachers, with joint opening and closing exercises. Prayer meetings, young people's meetings and many other meetings could be joined to the great advantage of both. Yet each church would be left free to hold such separate meetings in its own building as denominational work require. The ministers could have change of sermons on alternate Sundays, or they could alternate between morning and evening services. Missionary and special offerings could be taken from each congregation on separate Sundays, while the regular Sunday offerings could be taken from both at once, each using its own distinct envelopes.

Consider how much of the Sunday services could be performed in common, and one really practiced in common in the separate services; the singing of hymns, reading of scriptures, prayers, sermons, missionary appeals, giving of money, etc., etc. The same things are done in practically the same way in the two congregations every Sunday. Why could they not be done togther to greater advantage? A foregn missionary sermon preached by one minister will serve the same purpose for the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, and the Baptist Missionary Society. In what manifold ways the two people meet in their Sunday services, not to say anything about the solemn celebration of baptism, which is the mark of their family likeness.

Why have two church buildings, lighted and heated for doing the same things, at the same hour, on the same day? Let us have many trial unions, as first steps to permanent unions. They would try out all those anxious questions of congeniality, latent differences and ripeness for union, which face two churches contemplating an uncertain plunge into a permanent union.

What do the ministers among the Disciples think of trial unions? Let us hear from you.

A Church Irenic

By William Oeschger.

By many, especially by theological writers outside of our brotherhood, the title of this article would technically be called A Denominational Irenic. But, since there are those among us who do not believe that we are a denomination, we substitute in deference to these, the word Church for that of Denomination.

It is said that "An honest confession is good for the soul." Such a confession we desire to make right in the beginning of this article. The confession is this: it is much easier to point out the fact that there are divisions and party spirit among us than it is to prescribe a remedy for the healing of the wounds that have been caused by the party spirit swords. It is only when one seriously sets about to suggest a solution of our present situation that one becomes aware of the stubborn factors with which one has to deal. How to restore union and unity among us will tax the wisdom and ingenuity of the wisest and best men in our brotherhood for years to come. We confess our inability for the task. All that we hope to do in this article is to make a few suggestions, which we trust may be helpful, pointing in the right direction, and causing others to take up the task of restoring unity and oneness among those who have preached that division is sinful, and who have had for their motto: "One Lord, one faith, one baptism."

Before we can look for any progress towards the removal of divisions and the elimination of the party spirit among us we must be made fully conscious of the fact that they exist. We must be made to see the facts just as they are. And seeing the facts we must acknowledge their existence, humiliating as it may be. Nothing is to be gained by a denial of the facts, or a refusal to see things as they are. We must take an inventory of our divisions and the liabilities they create, as well as of our unity assets. When we have done this, then we must fully examine the losses that these divisions entail upon us. These losses are experienced both by the individual and by the collective forces of the kingdom. Through the existence of a party spirit and bitter controversy individual christians are made acrid in their spirit, instead of growing in sweetness. Where once a gentle and peaceful spirit held sway, the party spirit enthrones a harsh and polemical one. The spirit of fraternity is banished to give place to a spirit of hostility. Love for our brother is driven out to give place to hostility, animosity, and hatred. This is no exaggeration. The writer could only wish that it were. The writer has been in towns where we have had two churches, both pleading for the restoration of "the ancient order," but who were at sword's point with each other. There was absolutely no fellowship between such churches. They were bitter rivals. Their relationship was marked by bitter controversy. The individual members wrangled over doctrinal differences and methods of work far more than they prayed for the coming of the kingdom of grace. Such an atmosphere dwarfs the souls of men. It crushes out love and desire for saving the lost. If the spirit of controversy and division have had that kind of a result between the Nashville and Lexington schools of thought, we need not look for a different harvest in the Lexington-Chicago controversy. Individual men all over the country are lining up on one side of the controversy or the other. After they have taken sides they can only see virtue on their side, and only error on the opposite side. When men have once taken sides in a theological controversy it is hard for them to see the truth of the words of the great Gladstone: "The liabilities of human nature to error do not all lie on one side." Such liabilities are not all on one side, but it is hard for a religious partisan to see error or fault on his side.

It is, however, not the individual alone, that suffers by the party spirit; but the general cooperative work suffers also very greatly through its existence. The progress of the kingdom at large is greatly retarded, because the party spirit makes general cooperative increasingly difficult. Those who have in charge the work of our National Boards are forced into embarrassing situations that the party spirit creates. The last two years of our history furnish abundant proof of this. Men on one side are notifying the Mission Boards that if certain men are given prominent places on the National Convention programs, they, the protestants, will cease to cooperate with the Boards. This is a grave situation. Both sides have the same right to protest. If both sides should exercise this right, what then should, or could, the Mission Boards do? Both sides have the same liberty to threaten the Mission Boards with a withdrawal of their support, if one or the other side is given prominent places on the Missionary Convention programs. If such a state of affairs should come to pass, what would become of our cooperative work. It would be strangled in the household of faith. These things ought not to be so, yet they are; and during the last two years they have been rapidly growing worse, and they will continue to grow worse, unless we set our faces in the direction of unity and oneness.

Another great essential necessary for the removal of the party spirit in our beloved zion is, that we set ourselves resolutely to the task of unification. We desire to emphasize this very emphatically, that there must be a determined desire on the part of those who are contending for the faith once delivered to the saints to see to it that the scandal of contention, party spirit, and division, is removed from our ranks. One reason for the existence of the present condition lies in the fact that we have been indifferent, failing to give attention, to the growing spirit of division in our own ranks. Our strength has been expended in seeking numerical enlargement and not in maintaining inner unity. We have preached and labored as though there was no problem of inner unity to look after, nor ever would be. In short, we have neglected ourselves. But the time has now come when we must look after our own domestic affairs, for not to do so, means a failure in the great historic purpose for which we came into the kingdom, the bringing together of the scattered army of God. It is the faith of the writer that the energy, the intelligence, the devotion and loyalty to the interests of the kingdom of God, that exists in our brotherhood, if given up unreservedly to the work of restoring unity and oneness in our ranks, that it will be accomplished. When we shall teach and pray, with the problem of unity in our minds, as well as that of evangelization, then our divisions will soon be healed. The present hour is one that calls for unification. We must all earnestly pray and labor for an irenical movement in our brotherhood. It is the most imperative duty of the hour.

Irenical movements rest upon certain well known conditions that must be complied with in order to make them possible. Simply to resolve that divisions must cease and unity be forthcoming, will not bring about the desired end. There are conditions that we must fulfill, if we are to restore the desired unity. Irenics as a theological science has a well defined function to fulfill. This function, "Is to discover the measure of truth in the keeping of opposing parties; and to point out the conditions upon which a gradual understanding, and ultimately a true and lasting reconciliation, of existing contrasts, may be brought about." This statement, taken from a great work on Theological Encyclopædia and Methodology, clearly sets before us the line of procedure that we must pursue, in order to restore the spirit of oneness and unity that we all so much desire and need.

The first duty that this classic statement places upon us, and that our present situation calls for, is that we shall discover the measure of truth that is in the keeping of the different schools of thought in our brotherhood. What truth is in the especial keeping of Nashville, what truth in that of Lexington, and what truth in that of Chicago? Each one of these schools of thought is the custodian of some special truth. When we shall honestly look for the truth that each school of thought is the keeper of, we shall find it; and when we find it, and see it as it is, then we shall have an appreciation of each other that we can not have until we make this much needed discovery.

Upon close inspection of the Nashville school of thought we will discover in it the most robust and virile individualism among us. Nashville places its emphasis upon individual effort rather than upon collective effort. The individual is to bring in the kingdom. Cooperation for conquest is lost sight of through the greatness and the importance of individual effort. There is real virtue in this. Some of our churches have failed to utilize their own strength and forces, because they have depended too much on outside assistance. The writer has a certain church in mind that eight years ago had a membership of one hundred and a good comfortable house of worship. On the house there was an indebtedness of $600. Today this church is almost a thing of the past. The prime cause of its failure has been the fact that this church has always been looking to the State Mission Board to give it free meetings, and to outside people to pay off its indebtedness on the church, instead of going heroically to work and doing these things itself. This dependency upon others destroyed its independency, and through it, its self-efficiency. Dogmatically, theologically speaking, the Nashville school is fiercely conservative. But in this it has no exclusive monopoly over the Lexington school of thought. Whatever truth it guards in this direction is also firmly held by Lexington.

Coming to the Lexington school of thought, we ask, of what truth is it the special guardian? Contrasted with Nashville, Lexington has been the especial champion of cooperative work. This was especially true of it in its earlier years. In fact, it came into existence for that very purpose, to champion cooperative work, and to introduce newer and better methods in church work. But when contrasted with the Chicago school of thought, theologically speaking, it is the conservator of the ancient landmarks. In theology Lexington and Chicago may be contrasted as conservative and liberal. The former glories in Dogmatics, the latter, in Criticism. To the one, the conservative, our message is fixed and our program a closed one; to the other, the liberal, both our message and program are open to revision. The former constitutes the school of stern dogmatism, the latter, the school of flexible criticism. Both of these schools are the guardians of great truths. Each renders a great service to the kingdom of God. This each must concede and allow to the other. When this is done, the way will be open to a better feeling and a lasting reconciliation.

[Mr. Oeschger's splendid article will be concluded next week by an examination of Dogmatism and Criticism with the purpose of leading up to a unification.—Editors.]

GOD'S TEMPLE AND DAVID'S HOUSE.*

This lesson is chosen from the Book of Chronicles. This is a document which originally included not only our present books of First and Second Chronicles, but as well the two following books, Ezra and Nehemiah. The style, character and point of view are the same in all four. They were probably separated partly by the accidental tearing of the document (cf. the end of 2 Chron. with the beginning of Ezra), and partly for convenience in study and reference. Large parts of these narratives are parallel to the similar accounts in Samuel-Kings. But though they are so much later in date of writing, having taken form in the Greek period, in the fourth century B. C., they are not copies of the earlier books, but appear to derive their materials from other sources as well. Many things recorded in Samuel-Kings are omitted by Chronicles. In other instances the latter give details not found in the other record. At still other points the two are closely parallel. In points in which the two disagree scholars usually give the precedence to Samuel-Kings, as having taken form nearer to the events, and as being dominated less by the priestly spirit, which appears to have shaped the history in accordance with its own ecclesiastical purposes.

In the present study the account is in all but slight verbal matters in entire agreement with the earlier account. It is one of those great prophetic utterances which stand out in the line of the Messianic hope in Israel. Prophecy consists in much beside predictions of the future. And what predictions were actually made dealt far less with the details of future events than with their general purpose and tendency. It is on the high levels of the eternal purpose of God to reach the world through a chosen nation that prophecy usually moves. And this lesson is an admirable illustration of the fact. Here the king has desired the privilege of building for God a house of worship. It seemed that there could be no appropriateness in permitting the ark, the sacred chest of Israel, to remain in a mere tent, while the king himself lived in a house of his own building. To erect a sanctuary therefore was the pious wish of David. But in contrast with this desire comes the assurance that God will build for him a house of sure foundations, the enduring rule of the nation, culminating in the world-wide sweep of the kingdom of God.

This promise was sufficiently astonishing to fill the king with deep wonder and gratitude. It is indeed quite possible that its precise terms as written down by later prophets were given directness by their partial fulfilment in the succession of David's line as kings of Judah. But the promise was greater than any worldly monarchy could be, and the force of its Messianic meaning cannot be missed.

The attitude of the prophet Nathan toward the plan to build the temple is not without significance. At the first, when David made his proposal to erect a building for the worship of God, the heart of the aged counsellor of David was warmed by the thought. It seemed fitting that his royal master should signify his reverence for Jehovah in just this manner. If other kings in Egypt and Babylonia made offerings of temples to their gods, and counted all treasure worthily spent in such votive offerings, how much worthier was the God of Israel. The prophet therefore added his blessing to the plan of the king.

Yet later on, within a very few hours, Nathan returned to the king to revise his first word. Reflection in the light of all the divine leading of the nation caused him to bring to the king an entirely opposite oracle, which he uttered as confidently as the word of God as he had the first one. Nor was he in error in either case. It is often true that some plan for the advancement of the kingdom of God is brooded by earnest souls who have no other wish than to be of service. At first the program appears to promise the fairest results. It is only by reflection and criticism that the true aspect of the matter is discovered. Yet the loyal souls who wrought at the plan, and those in whose judgment it failed of approval, have been helped by the effort to view from every angle the matter which has taken form in their minds.

In this very incident there is found an admirable commentary upon the whole problem of the inspiration of the prophets. Was Nathan mistaken when at first he gave his approval to the king's project? And was this mistake corrected by subsequent divine commission? This is the usual view. Yet how little credit does this do the prophet. Why should he not have taken time to receive the oracle of God before speaking at all? And if he was in error in the first instance, who shall guarantee the accuracy of his second message? All such comments reveal a singular meagerness of acquaintance with the real work of the prophets. They were men who brought to their task of sacred teaching a unique devotion to the work of God in their generation, and a rare insight into the messages of earlier teachers of God. Yet they used, as they were indeed compelled to use, the faculties which God had given them as men, and their sole concern was to interpret the divine will in accordance with the needs of their time. In so doing they were often compelled to revise the utterances of earlier prophets, and sometimes their own. Reflection and closer study revealed the error of some judgment rendered. This is true of the present experience.

As a matter of fact no project seemed more appropriate than the erection of a stately house of worship. But in reality it was far from being an ideal plan. At first it approved itself to Nathan. Later he thought it unwise. The later judgment was approved by history. To be sure he took away the sting of David's disappointment by stating that it was not altogether fitting that he, whose hands had been wet with the blood of so many foes, should be a builder of the house that should be a symbol of peace. It is also probable that later coloring of the oracle added the promise that a son of David's should build the house. This last would virtually neutralize the very purpose of the message. Its true purpose was to dissuade David from the entire effort, by showing that God needed no central sanctuary in which to dwell; that he had used none at any time as an exclusive dwelling place in the nation, and that he had nowhere commanded any man to build such a house.

In this statement the true prophetic attitude appears, which deprecated the centralizing of religion in one place alone, and protested against making it a matter of place and time and external rites. The priests stood for all these things, but the prophets for a purer and more spiritual worship. One cannot fail to reflect upon these things in the light of the later prophetic experiences. Solomon built the house that his father David wanted to build. Its effect was to draw to Jerusalem most of the religious influences that should have been scattered throughout the nation. The king made the temple one of the great show buildings of his capital. But from that day the influence of the prophets declined until at the close of his reign they arose in their desperation and rent the kingdom asunder. They had ruined forever the prospect of a great world power, but they saved religion to Israel and to the world. Thenceforth the temple was merely the sanctuary of Judah, with far better means of being kept free from idolatrous taint than before. The temple as the center of a rich and gorgeous cult was a hindrance rather than a help to the faith of the nation. As a simple house of God, such as it later became, it did much to keep alive the spirit of devotion during dark days.

But the real house promised in the lesson was the house of David, the one in whose line the King of the Nations was yet to be born.

THE CHILDREN OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

Topic, October 14, Matt. 19: 13-15; Zech. 8: 3-5.

"Children not allowed" may be an appropriate sign for the greedy landlord to put up but it is in the wrong place when it is over the door of a Christian church or a Christian home. In fact neither institution is Christian unless it has a welcome for the children. Jesus loved the children and he imparts to others love for them. It is the abnormal person who is willing to go through life childless; the normal man or woman considers it a privation to be without offspring. Husbands and wives who murder the unborn belong to the lowest and most dangerous class of criminals. Their presence among respectable people in no way atones for their crimes. The church must speak plainly upon this question. Plain preaching will offend none but the criminals and the imbeciles, and no worthy preacher of the gospel allows these to dictate his message.

"Unto Me."

What did the children find when they came to Jesus? They found one who understood them and who delighted to see them living under right conditions and enjoying all the privileges that childhood may claim. They were not misled as to the meaning of life by any word or act of Jesus. His was the seriousness of one who never divorced duty from happiness. If we would bring the children to Jesus, we must not put over them as teachers grumblers and pessimists. We have heard much about the danger of allowing young persons to come under the influence of light-minded, worldly teachers and we have not heard more than we ought to hear, but it is just as important to keep the long-faced, sanctimonious men and women out of the public school and the day school as it is to keep out the thoughtless. The man who always has an ache or a pain is unfit to be with children. Brave, patient sufferers have their lessons, too, for young and old. I am not speaking of them, but of the cowards who try to impart their misery to everybody about them. It is a sin to let such people stand as representatives of the church. They doubtless have a right to be members but they have no right to be accredited by the church as instructors of the children. They can not give correct impressions of Jesus.

The Children in the Streets.

"And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." The street is not usually considered a desirable place for children to play. Wise and careful parents have a wholesome fear of the influences of the street. But when the kingdom of God is fully come, the street will be redeemed. It will no longer be a place of danger to the inexperienced. The whole gospel of the kingdom applies to the public thoroughfare as well as to the home. If men say that trade cannot be carried on in accordance with the principles of Jesus, they are bound to be corruptors of youth. If they say the city cannot furnish amusements for the people if vice is suppressed, they are enemies of childhood's innocence. Not until the spirit of Jesus rules in the market and in the pleasure park will the places of public travel and intercourse be safe for the children. Our cities have been built to meet the needs of industry and commerce; they must be rebuilt to meet all the needs of the people, social and moral as well as economic.

If we will only look about for the good there is in our cities, we shall have reasons for believing that there is redemption for them. Morbid curiosity or innate viciousness takes many a man from the country into the haunts of vice and he goes home ignorant of the good there is in the city. The politicians of the country array themselves against those of the city. It is time for us all to join with the good men and women of the city and work with them for its redemption. The last vision of the Bible is of a city from which the unclean are excluded. It is worth while to have a vision of Chicago and New York freed from destroyers of virtue. If we have no vision of this kind, our hope for the children will be quenched. More and more the ideals of the cities rule in the whole land. To save them is to save our civilization. All that we can do for the children will keep only a few of them sound in morals if our cities be not cities of God.

The vision of spiritual power, even as we see it in the imperfect manifestations of human life, is ennobling and uplifting. The rush of courage along the perilous path of duty is finer than the foaming leap of the torrent from the crag. Integrity resisting temptation overtops the mountains in grandeur. Love, giving and blessing without stint, has a beauty and a potency of which the sunlight is but a faint and feeble image. When we see these things they thrill us with joy; they enlarge and enrich our souls.—Henry Van Dyke.

8. The Revival of Judah.

In the year 538 B. C., Cyrus the Persian conquered Babylon and made it his capital. He soon after issued a decree permitting the nations held in captivity in Babylon to return to their own lands, taking with them their gods and other religious symbols. The messages of the prophets had prepared the way to take advantage of this opportunity, and yet there were probably very few Jews who cared to go back to their old home. A new generation had come upon the scene. Judah was in ruins and overrun by the Philistines, Samaritans, Edomites, and other foreign people. There was no desire in the heart of the people to return. Babylon offered too many advantages. Yet the resolute and earnest work of the prophets secured sufficient interest to send out a small company of pilgrims under the leadership of a representative of the Davidic dynasty. Meantime, efforts were being made in Judah to rebuild Jerusalem. The prophets Haggai and Zechariah roused their countrymen to the task of erecting the temple. The arrival of the pilgrims from the east encouraged this work. From time to time others came, until in the days of Nehemiah and Ezra more than forty thusand were enrolled in the census of Judah. The erection of the temple was begun in 520 B. C. and the building was completed four years later. But the revival of the city was slow and discouraging, as is amply proved by the Books of Zechariah and Malachi. About the year 445 B. C., Nehemiah, a Jew at the court of the king of Persia, was sent as the governor of the province of Judah, and by his energy and patriotism the walls of the city, which had been in ruins so long, were rebuilt. About the same time Ezra, a scribe, led a fresh company of Jews from the east and reorganized the worship of Jerusalem, in accordance with the Levitical law. (Ezra, Neh., Hag., Zech., Mal.).

9. The Maccabean Kingdom.

The later history of Old Testament times is much less familiar because so little record has been left us regarding it. The Persian kingdom continued until the days of Alexander the Great, who conquered the eastern world and set up his capital at Babylon about 330 B. C. After his death, two of his generals, Seleucus and Ptolemy organized the kingdoms of Syria, with its capital at Antioch, and Egypt, with its capital at Alexandria. Between these two kingdoms, lying respectively north and south of Palestine, there was continued warfare, and the Jews suffered more or less by reason of these operations. At first Judah was an Egyptian province, but later was attached to the kingdom of Syria, Antiochus Epiphanes, the king of Syria (175 B. C.), defeated in an expedition against Egypt, and angered by the refusal of the Jews to adopt completely the Greek religion and practices of which he was a devotee, subjected Jerusalem to cruel indignities, defiling the temple itself with swine's flesh and putting to death numbers of the faithful. These and other outrages led to a popular uprising in which the most conspicuous figures were Judas Maccabeaus and his brothers. In the war between the Jews and the Syrians, Judas gained many victories, and though he lost his life in battle, a Jewish kingdom was established with the Maccabees, the descendants of the family of Judas, as priest-kings. This is the romantic period of Jewish history. (1 Maccabees, 2 Maccabees, Dan. 7-12).

10. New Testament Times.

The Roman Empire which had been extending its power throughout the east took possession of Syria about 65 B. C. Pompey took Jerusalem June, B. C., 63, and the Jewish monarchy was abolished. Antipater, an Idomean (Edomite), who had rendered valuable services to Julius Cæsar, was given the position of procurator in Judea, with the permission to assume the title of ethnarch, or king. From this man descended the Herods, who during the succeeding period occupied so conspicuous a place in the history of Judah. In 40 B. C., Herod, surnamed the Great, secured from Rome the title of King of the Jews, and soon after occupied Jerusalem. This city he enriched with walls, palaces, a theater, and chief of all, the temple, a wonderful structure combining the features of fortress, sanctuary, market and academy. His long reign which ended in 4 B. C., was marked by such cruelties as to make him almost universally detested. His benefactions to the Jews were small compensation for his crimes and exactions. He was succeeded in the very year in which Jesus was born, by his sons, Archelaus, to whom fell the province of Judea, Antipas, who received Galilee and Perea, and Philip, to whom fell the region east of the Sea of Galilee. In 6 A. D., Archelaus was

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS.

By Professor Willett.

I am beginning to read the Bible again with some young people. We have begun the study of Genesis. Can you tell us how to proceed in order to get the most practical help? We have little leisure, and want to make every moment count. R. W. M.

Wade's "Old Testament History" is a good companion for the Bible reader (Dutton, $1.50). With this would go McFadyen's "Messages of the Prophetic and Priestly Historians" (Scribner, $1), and Ottley's "Short History of the Hebrew's" (Macmillan, $1.25). The best single commentary on Genesis is that of Driver (Gorham, $1.75).

Please tell me how books were published in the first century; and were the books of the New Testament published in the ordinary way? W. H. B.

The New Testament writings circulated in the Christian communities at first. They were not public documents in the same sense in which the heathen writings were, because they were produced by men who were more or less under the ban of connection with an illicit religion. Yet as Christianity grew in strength, these documents must have become like other books, a part of the literature of the time. Book-shops existed in Rome in the first century before Christ, and at Athens probably four centuries earlier. Atticus, the friend of Cicero, sold books and kept a large number of slaves employed as copyists in their production. Books thus manufactured were not very dear. The first book of the poet Martial sold for about seventy-five cents, the present equivalent of which would be perhaps three dollars. As the Christian community increased, a demand for copies of the sacred writings would naturally grow, and publishers for Christian readers would be found no less than for heathen. But information of a specific nature is lacking on this point.

If God works in accordance with law, and only so—and I believe that all his actions are governed by eternal laws—what is the need of prayer, except to make us humble and submissive? He is the Infinite Supreme and All-Wise; we in every respect the opposite. I cannot therefore see any good reason why prayer should be used to prevent anything in his plan. And since his laws are eternal, it is difficult for me to reconcile this doctrine with that usually taught. Inquirer.

God works in accordance with law, not that he is the creature or victim of law, as the Greeks believed Jove to be, but because his is a life of harmony and conformity to the highest order. Law is the expression of this perfect order in his life. God is our law in the sense that what He is and what He does is the rule of our being and doing, in so far as we desire conformity to his perfect life. The Bible so puts it: "Be ye holy, for I am holy." The right idea of prayer is not that of getting him to do our will, but of helping us to do his will by engaging us in reverent and trustful communion with him. By the laws of God as seen in nature are meant his methods of bringing things to pass. We soon learn by experience that in everything involving any human agency God never brings things to pass without some sort of human co-operation. Prayer is simply one form of human co-operation with God, through its endeavor to link and lift our wills to his will in unity of effort. One great error in this matter is the idea that prayer seeks to change God. It seeks rather to change our relation to God, to rectify our attitude toward him and his methods.

Although a firm believer in God and his all-wise love, yet I find it difficult to satisfactorily reconcile his affection for his children and the permission upon his part of such terrible and destructive events as sometimes occur—as in the case of the San Francisco disaster, or the loss of life and property in connection with the eruption of Vesuvius. In these instances many human lives have been wiped out—old and young—and no doubt many of them were innocent and God-fearing. Why does a merciful providence direct or permit such things to occur? T. W. M.

God has given existence to living beings on a planet which is subject to the same changes of surface, and therefore the same catastrophies and convulsions necessitated in all like bodies by the cosmic processes of cooling and shrinking. This makes such disturbances inevitable, though more likely in some regions, than in others. It is a part of man's education to overcome these dangers by increase of knowledge. He gradually learns where dangers are likely to be encountered—as in volcanic regions or earthquake zones—and the means by which they are to be avoided and overcome. Once every demonstration of nature was a terror to man. Fire and storm were his dreaded foes and masters. It is no longer true. Plague and famine are being banished. This is God's plan. God's laws are for the highest good of the race. "Shall gravitation cease as you go by?" asks a poet. A full answer to your question cannot be given in a word, but one may well consider the following items in a reasonable view of the matter. It is reasonable that God should create life on such a planet as ours. If the processes of nature, such as produce earthquakes and storms were arrested, great calamities would result. Reliance on the uniformity of nature is essential to human progress. God cannot make beings capable of pleasure without making them also capable of pain, any more than he can make a light that casts no shadow. Pain is not evil in itself, but a preventive of evil. Death is not an evil. It is nature's way of moving forward. Nothing that is purely natural is evil. Man is at his best where nature is hardest. The test of things as good or evil is not in their taste, but in the use that is made of them. God's chief concern is not for our ease, but for our welfare, and that means development of character. The noblest lives have testified with Socrates that "No evil can befall a good man, in life or in death," and with Paul, that "All things work together for good to them that love God."

CHAPTER XVII.

The Blood Stained Windows.

The December night was cold and a heavy snow was falling. Doctor Jones rang the bell at the Hathaway's and the cheerful light, warm atmosphere, and warmer greeting that met him when the door was opened, were the only pleasures in the lonely doctor's life that he often sought to gratify. He had never married. The older inhabitants of Minington could remember a fair young girl that used to walk to church beside the doctor, but she had sickened and died. An elderly woman had kept house for him for many years, and her son took care of his horses and did the chores about the place. Mr. and Mrs. Hathaway had always made him welcome in their home and loved him as a brother; he had seen Evelyn grow up from childhood and had almost a father's pride in all that she said and did; she had taken long rides with him as he visited among his patients, and had always been in the habit of going to him for help in her studies and difficulties of every kind. When she was away from home he missed her sadly, and her letters were handed over to him to read whenever he dropped in.

"When did you hear from Evelyn last?" he said as he spread out his hands before the open fire in the grate.

"We had a letter today, Doctor, and it has worried me a great deal. I am afraid she is overworking and letting her sympathies go out too much to those poor people with whom she has to deal. Read the letter and see what you think."

The doctor took the letter and adjusted his glasses.

"Dear, sweet Motherdie:" he read.

"I don't want you to think I am homesick because I am writing again so soon, for I am not; but I am heartsick and the burden of these poor little white slaves rests heavier on me every day. I haven't written you much about the condition of things down here, for I never seem to have time; so I got up an hour earlier this morning and am going to write you a long letter.

"I am sitting at an open window looking towards the west. The sunrise is reflected from a hundred windows in the mill, and they look like blood. From the tall stack a long streamer of smoke trails along the sky, and hurrying along the streets and by-paths are swarms of children going to work. Am I growing morbid, mother, to fancy the windows stained with their blood, and that 'the smoke of their torment goeth up unto ages of ages?'

"We think the child labor problem serious enough in our own state, but it is worse here in the South. In the first place, the children who work in the factories and breakers in Pennsylvania are nearly all of foreign parentage, while the children in the South are of American birth, we might almost say of our own flesh and blood. I do not know that this makes the evil any greater, but it does seem to me that a child born under the stars and stripes might at least have a chance to have a strong body and a common education.

"Then, too, in Pennsylvania we have some child labor legislation, alas, not enough as we well know, but in Georgia there are no laws regulating it. There is a civil code which says that, 'The hours of labor by all persons under twenty-one years old shall be from sunrise to sunset, customary times for meals being allowed;' rather long hours, we would think, but that is all there is. I understand that there is an organization of private manufacturers known as the Georgia Industrial Association, that has drawn up a set of rules to regulate the age limit of children who work. But, mother, it does not stand to reason that corporations that fight every bill in the legislature that has anything to do with regulating child labor, will enforce such rules very strongly. I have seen no signs of such enforcement at Connersburg. The mills here are alive with children from six years old and up. Many of them are puny looking, with pinched faces and big eyes, and they act like automatons going back and forth unceasingly among the spindles. Those on the night shift are to be pitied most, for that seems to break down their health in a very short time. They often fall asleep with fatigue, only to be rudely awakened by the overseer, often by a dash of cold water in their faces.

"I was rummaging through Dr. Ransom's magazines the other day (Dr. Ransom is the pastor of the Methodist Church), and I came across this significant sentence in an article on child labor in the Literary Digest; 'It is said that a cotton mill having a pay roll of $6,000 a week in New England can be run for $4,000 in the South because of child labor—making a clear pick-up of $104,000 per year.' That tells the whole story, mother, oh the pity of it!

"Dr. Ransom tells me that the good people of the state are putting up a big fight for child labor legislation. For several years the bill has been killed in the lobby but he is very hopeful that they will get one through the next legislature.

"I wish, mother, I could have taken you with me last night. I went to call on one of my pupils who had not been at school for a week. She lives in a forlorn little house on the outskirts of the town with her parents and five brothers and sisters. Their names are Sawyer and the little girl's name is Jennie. She is a frail little thing nine years old, who worked at the cotton factory till she gave out entirely and could no longer stand at the spindles. Then her parents took her out of the mill and put her in school. She was dull and listless and I could not arouse her interest in anything. She seemed to love me and would do her best to please me, and would sit and watch me an hour at a time with her big, sad eyes, but that was all she could do. Last night I found her on a little cot in a dark room. Her mother told me that she had been there for a week and that she did not notice anything or anybody. She sleeps most of the time. Her mother tried to waken her by telling her that her teacher was there. She opened her eyes and looked at me, and after a moment smiled, then closed them again. She looked so tired it made me cry to look at her and think of all the weary hours she had spent at the spindles. Her mother says she will never get up again; that she had another little girl eleven years old die in just the same way. She had worked in the mill nearly four years and then got sickly and died. I asked her why she let her children go into the mills so young. She said, lowering her voice, 'The ole man he puts 'em thar,' and she jerked her thumb toward a man that was sitting over by the stove. She said her 'man' had got into bad habits since they moved to Connersburg and did not work any; that it took all the whole family could earn to get along, and that 'he,' nodding towards the man, 'needed a lot of whisky and tobacco.'

"She said that three years before they had owned a little farm of two or three acres in the mountains, and one day an agent came there from Connersburg and told them such a fine story about how they could live in a nice house and earn a great deal of money and have lots of things that they could not have in the country, if they would move to town. They had got what she called a 'right smart' living off the farm and the children had gone to school in the winter, but they left it all and came here and she had never known a happy day since.

"I have but few of the mill children in my school. There are a good many little tots belonging to the mill families in the kindergarten, bless their hearts, but that is all the education they wil ever get. Then in the night school there are a few of the older children who work in the mills. It is very hard to teach them anything, for they are so tired and sleepy it is impossible to arouse their minds to activity, but I find that by using object teaching and bright stories I can accomplish a little.

"What a prosey letter this is, but I know both you and father are interested in this work as much as I am. Be sure and show this letter to Dr. Jones and give him my love.

. "I want to thank you again, Motherdie, for the pretty shirtwaist you sent me. It fits to perfection and is just what I want for the school room.

"Give father a big hug for me, and my dear love to you both.

"Connersburg, Ga. EVELYN."

Dr. Jones read the letter through slowly, as though he was measuring every word, then folded it and put it in the envelope, and as he handed it to Mrs. Hathaway she saw his eyes flash.

"What do you think of it, doctor?"

"Think!" The doctor fairly exploded, and if Mrs. Hathaway had not been familiar with his ways she might have thought she had seriously offended him.

"I think," the doctor resumed, "that I must be living in the dark ages. These hideous wrongs that Evelyn has written about might be attributed to a race of savages, but not to civilized people. Talk about Herod! Why, instead of one Herod we have a hundred who are killing our children, body and soul, too, and for what? Oh, Lord, it makes me ashamed to think that it's for a few paltry dollars!

"I tell you this matter is coming to have a national significance. If long hours and child labor become the fixed conditions of success, then the whole field of competing industry must eventually come down to that basis. No condition is safe which offers a competitive advantage to anything that leads toward ignorant, inferior citizenship. It is not safe, whether in a southern mill village or a northern city slum. Evelyn has not exaggerated one whit. When I was in the South a year ago I saw scores of little people working in the din and dust of the spinning rooms, and scores of others on their way to the mills before daylight who would not come out till after dark. I saw something of their home life and the wages they earn; I even collected over a hundred of the pay envelopes of both women and children, and their wages range much less than a dollar and a half a week. They earn from 10 to 40 cents a day."*

Mr. Hathaway had come in from the street and stood warming his hands while the doctor talked.

"Doctor, what has stirred you up so on the child labor question?" asked Mr. Hathaway, as the doctor ceased speaking.

"Why, this last letter from Evelyn just makes my blood boil. I wish there were a million like her, bless her heart; but do you know, Hathaway, there are a good many people agitating this question? All we need is to get the facts before the public."

"You are right, doctor; let the people once demand child labor legislation and a compulsory education system, and we will have them both."

"Now, Mrs. Hathaway, don't you worry about Evelyn. This experience will not hurt her a bit, but will help fit her for the work here. You see we are going to have plenty of work for her next year in the new settlement house."

"Well, I'll not be sorry to have my girlie back home again. Now you are both warm, and tea is waiting, so come right out and sit down," and Mrs. Hathaway led the way to the dining room.

"This is an unexpected pleasure," said the doctor, "but I can never resist one of your suppers and the pleasure of eating it with you."

deposed, and Judea came immediately under the Roman procurators, whose residence was Cæserea. In 37 A. D., after the death of Philip, Agrippa became tetrarch of his former dominions, and after the banishment of Antipas in 39, Agrippa received his dominions as well. In 41 he became King of Judea, although this title was largely complimentary. At his death in 44, Judea once more came under the authority of the procurators. The final downfall of Jerusalem resulted from the resistance of the Jews throughout Palestine to the excessive taxation under which they suffered during the reign of Nero. Revolts broke out in Galilee and Vespasian, a Roman general, was sent to quell the disorder. The siege of Jerusalem, conducted by his own son Titus, resulted in the capture and destruction of the city in 70 A. D., thus bringing to an end the history of the Jews as a nation. During this period occurred the birth of Jesus (4 B. C.), his life in Nazareth (3 B. C.-26 A. D.), his public ministry (26-30 A. D.), the organization of the church in Jerusalem (30 A. D.), the spread of the gospel through Syria as far as Antioch, the conversion of Saul (35 A. D.), his missionary labors and writings (50-66 A. D.), and the appearance of the earliest Gospel, Mark (65 A. D.), (Gospels, Acts, Epistles of Paul.)

To try to be fit for the Spirit's indwelling, therefore, is as truly a duty as a privilege. Humility, penitence, self-sacrifice, and a prayerful temper are to be cultivated both for our own sakes and that we may serve others most fruitfully. The heart is like a garden. The divine Spirit may breathe upon it as the sun and the wind play upon the soil, but if there be no purposeful effort to take advantage of the offered blessing and help from above by striving to prepare and keep it fit for heavenly influences the heart will bear as little fruit as an untilled garden.—Selected.

WITH THE WORKERS.

Henry Genders, of Farmer City, Illinois, spent the summer at his old home in England.

The Marshall Street Church of Richmond, Va., burned a mortgage of long standing last week. Rev. B. H. Melton is the pastor.

The church of Tuscola, Illinois, is beginning a meeting with the help of the Brooks Brothers and Professor Tapp.

The churches at Clarence and North Lancaster, New York, are being supplied for the remainder of the year by Claris Yeuell.

W. J. Cooke has just closed a fine meeting at Shiloh, Kentucky. There were 30 additions, 24 by confession of faith.

J. H. O. Smith, of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, has returned from his vacation and is now at work in his church again.

Eugene Olson is in a meeting at Puyallup, Washington, with 80 additions in two weeks. C. L. Becker is the minister.

Mr. Robertson, a brother of N. H. Robertson, of Colfax, has been called to the church at Heyworth, Illinois.

President Zollais has been preaching in Ohio this summer. While there he took the confession of his granddaughter.

C. W. Worden has closed a most useful series of special services at the church at Jericho Springs, Mo. There were 15 additions.

L. B. Appleton is holding a meeting at Pleasant Hill, Illinois. The first week resulted in 17 confessions. The meeting will continue a second week.

A handsome new church building was dedicated at Dorchester, Nebraska, recently. L. L. Carpenter was the master of ceremonies on that day.

Cephas Shelbourne is having splendid success in his church at Dallas, Texas. Forty have been added to the church during his ministry there.

F. L. VanVoorhis and Edward McKinney are in a meeting at Edmond, Oklahoma. The result of the first eight days is 19 additions to the church.

The cause is making rapid strides in central Illinois. A new church is reported at Decatur, Illinois. This makes three churches for that important city.

J. M. Philputt has returned from his vacation and is again in his pulpit at the Union Ave. Christian Church of St. Louis. He spent the summer on the coast of Maine.

Victor Dorris has just closed a most successful revival in Wickliffe, Ky. There were thirty-two additions, seventeen making the good confession.

A new church has been dedicated at Elmo, Mo. The pastor of the Methodist Church came in and helped raise the money on dedication day.

W. H. Boden, of Athens, has just held a meeting at Chauncey, Ohio. There was a very substantial addition to the working force of the church as a result. The church now has 41 new members.

S. G. Fisher reports that there have been 59 additions during his ministry at Walla Walla, Washington. The church is preparing for a meeting under Brandt in November.

Rev. DeWitt H. Bradbury has taken the pastorate at Pompey, N. Y. He has been assisting in the pastorate of the 169th Street Church, New York City, during the past year.

Irving S. Chenoweth, who has been the assistant pastor in the Union Ave. Church of St. Louis, is entering Union Theological Seminary to prepare himself for work on the foreign field.

W. H. Barragar makes a most optimistic report of his work in Sunnyside, Washington. There have been 16 additions since last report. The full apportionment for Church Extension was raised.

The church at Shelbyville, Indiana, has paid off $2,500, and $1,000 more will be paid the first of October. The church has bought a lot in another part of the city and hopes to have a second church after awhile.

The First Church at Lincoln, Nebraska, has recently laid the corner stone of a new building. T. H. Adams, Chancellor Aylesworth, and W A. Baldwin were among the speakers on the occasion.

S. M. Bernard held a meeting in his own church at Madisonville, Kentucky. The meeting lasted two weeks and resulted in fifty additions to the church. J. Walter Wilson assisted as soloist and chorister.

G. H. Fern has held a good two weeks' meeting at Stone, Kentucky. The church speaks in the highest terms of him. There was a substantial increase of membership to the church, 65 being added.

J. W. McGarvey, Jr., held a meeting at Mt. Eden, Kentucky, recently, with 49 additions. He is highly commended as an evangelist by the minister of the church there, J. E. Pritchett.

The church at Kirksville, Kentucky, has recently had a fine revival with 53 additions, 37 by confession of faith. C. E. Powell, the minister, has been called to the new Woodland Church in Lexington, and will begin his labors there soon.

The church at Mareeline, Missouri, has been having a protracted meeting. Part of the preaching was done by the pastor, A. Munyon, and part by G. W. Buckner, of Canton. The workers have been reinforced by 49 new recruits.

E. R. Nelson will preach at Amazonia, Missouri, while he attends Drake University. The church has recently been substantially aided by a meeting under the leadership of J. M. Bader, Forty-seven were added.

The church at Chester, Nebraska, will dedicate a new building October 18. F. M. Rains, of the Foreign Society, will be with them to assist. The church is preparing for a meeting under the leadership of James Small.

For about three years the Ocala, Florida, church, has been repeatedly asking him to return to this field. He finally yielded to their request. Since taking up his new work two have been added to the church, the Sunday-school is growing and the ladies are planning to start an auxiliary to the C. W. B. M.

Robert Simons has assisted the minister, M. M. Mitchum, in a meeting at Crooker, Missouri, which has resulted in 16 added. A new church building has been dedicated and other important advances made in the work of the church.

Taubman and Gardner held a meeting at Newton, Illinois, in September. This effort resulted in 41 additions, 34 by primary obedience. E. W. Tate, the minister, has been called for another year and everything promises a period of great usefulness for the church.

The church at Paxton, Illinois, held its annual meeting of the congregation recently. The reports were most encouraging, showing that the church had expended $500 on repairs during the year, and that other lines of church work were in healthy condition.

It has been decided to proceed immediately in the enterprise of a new First Church building in South Bend, Ind. Rev. George Henry, the able successor of Rev. Perry J. Rice, is pastor of the congregation. The new building will occupy the site of the old one, an excellent location in one of the best parts of the city.

The ministers of Pittsburg have voted in a recent meeting to hold the centennial convention in Exposition Hall, a building seating 15,000 people. This is subject to the approval of the convention at New Orleans, of course. The advantages claimed in the change are the Exposition Hall has better transportation facilities and is much closer to the hotels and restaurants.

Rev. J. Randall Farris, after a two years' pastorate with the Indiana Ave. Church in South Bend, Ind., has resigned to accept a call to Bristol, Tenn. Mr. Farris became pastor of the South Bend Church immediately after the completion of his course in Transylvania University. He has accomplished a notable work there. His ministry in Tennessee will begin November 1.

Rev. W. H. Collman closed his work in Tampa, Florida, August 17. In the little less than eighteen months of his pastorate, fifty names were added to the church roll, most of them at regular services. The church debt was reduced, the Sunday-school attendance increased, a Junior Christian Endeavor Society of twenty members was organized and at both state conventions the Tampa Auxiliary to the C. W. B. M. stood highest on the roll of honor.

Rev. L. N. D. Wells of East Orange, N. J., writes as follows: "Vacation just over. It was spent pleasantly in Pgh, in central Ohio, and on the great lakes. We were privileged each Lord's day to supply the pulpit of Bro. Wallace Tharp in the historic old First Church of Alleghany, Pa. Our new building has progressed splendidly during the summer. The art glass is now being placed. Contracts for seats and heating have been let, and we are completing arrangements for dedication. Bro. Z. T. Sweeney will be with us, date to be announced soon."

CHICAGO.

Parker Stockdale is reported ill. We hope he may have a speedy recovery.

Dr. Gates will preach at Batavia every other Sunday this year.

The Sunday-school at Oak Park had an attendance of nearly a hundred last Sunday.

In the illness of Parker Stockdale,, Miss Marie Brehm spoke at Jackson Boulevard Sunday.

C. G. Kindred and his people had a live day with their visiting missionary from China, Mrs. Lillian Shaw.

Mr. Conrad supplied at Logan Square again last Sunday. The mission there is doing nicely.

Herbert N. Garn, who took his degree at the University of Chicago, has accepted a call at Augusta, Illinois, beginning Oct. 1.

Dr. Willett will speak at the next meeting of the Ministers' Association. His subject has not yet been announced.

The quarterly meeting of the C. W. B. M. will be held this week at the Harvey church. An interesting and helpful program has been prepared.

C. C. Morrison reports a Rally Day in his Sunday-school last Sunday. The school had the largest attendance it has had in years. With an able superintendent it expects an unusually successful year.

There was an addition by letter at Maywood church last Sunday. This church will begin a meeting with home forces about November 1. Victor F. Johnson is the pastor.

Guy Hoover reports the departure of S. J. Markham and family from the Pullman Church to Missouri. Bro. Markham's were among the most loyal and self-sacrificing of Mr. Hoover's splendid membership.

A. R. Knox, of Hinsdale, visited Sheffield Avenue and gave a talk of ten or fifteen minutes to the delight of his many friends. Over 60 years he has been in the church work.

Rev. Joseph C. Todd, formerly of Marshall, Mo., now of New York, has taken the church at Bloomington, Indiana. Rev. Thomas J. Clark recently resigned this church after a pastorate of many years.

Pastors desiring the services of accredited workers will be furnished with a complete list of the members upon application to the secretary, Rev. Henry W. Stough, 125 Scott street, Wheaton, Illinois.

The officers for the ensuing year are: President, Rev. W. B. Biederwolf; vice-presidents, Revs. J. Wilbur Chapman, Henry Ostrom, John H. Elliott, James H. Cole; secretary and treasurer, Rev. Henry W. Stough.

Rev. S. T. Willis of the 169th Street Church, New York, submitted to an operation for goitre recently. He is recovering nicely and will shortly take up his work again.

The annual meeting of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association will meet at the auditorium of the Woman's building on the State Fair grounds at Springfield, October 1. Mrs. Ella S. Stewart, of Chicago, will preside at all the sessions.

Dr. Ames presented his scheme of church organization at the Ministers' Association this week. It elicited the generous criticism that is always alloted to his ideas. The scheme has many strong points and deserves study.

Its membership is composed of men and women whose Christian characters were thoroughly investigated before they were admitted to membership. Their membership in the Association is a guarantee of their integrity and trustworthiness.

The Interdenominational Association of Evangelists is a voluntary organization of nearly two hundred of the leading evangelists and gospel singers of the United States from all denominations for the purpose of raising the standard of evangelistic work and of promoting it in the churches of America.

The Memorial church worshiped in a redecorated auditorium last Sunday. The ladies have put in a new chandelier that not only helps the lighting but the acoustics as well. Many of the Baptist members of the congregation are insisting that our Richard Gentry remain as assistant pastor in spite of the agreement to have a Baptist assistant.

The Monroe Street church raises its missionary money by monthly collections. This is apportioned to the various societies. The church gave to the society as follows:—Chicago, $63; Foreign, $52.50; Home, $31.50; Church Extension, $31.50; Ministerial Relief, $10; Education, $10; N. B. A., $10; I. C. M. S., $21.

The Englewood Church of this city is rejoicing in the added beauty given its auditorium at the hands of those who have had charge of the redecoration of the building. The room has one of the prettiest interiors to be found in any of our church houses. C. G. Kindred has resumed his labors as pastor with his accustomed vigor.

A three-cornered congress of Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples will be held in Chicago in November. Though the committee had made other arrangements, they have changed and placed the meeting of the Congress at Memorial church for obvious reasons. Every minister within reach of Chicago should attend the sessions of this Congress.

W. F. Rothenburger was a visitor in Chicago last Sunday. At the Irving Park Church he addressed fine audiences in attendance at the special anniversary services of the congregation. This church is now in the best condition in its history. Next Lord's Day Mr. Rothenburger will preach his first sermons as pastor of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio.

Richard W. Gentry, associate minister of the Memorial Church, is mourning the loss of two bicycles which have been stolen from him since he began his work on the South side. Mr. Gentry's work has so commended itself to the united congregation there that he will likely be asked to remain permanently despite the fact that the original plan was to have a Baptist as the associate of Dr. Willett.

Rev. Sumner T. Martin, formerly city evangelist of Chicago has been located as pastor at Santa Barbara, California, for about a month. He reports seventeen added to the church by letter in that time and one young man by confession of faith. All the societies and the Sunday evening services have been largely increased in attendance. The church extension offering was $33.75. A Teachers Training Class just organized, promises to enroll at least 100 members. Mr. Martin reports himself happy to be in California, but expresses his abiding interest in the Chicago churches and missions.

A Few New Books.

THE AXIOMS OF RELIGION.

Rev. E. Y. Mullins, D. D.
Price, $1.00 net, postpaid.

This book, as Dr. Mullins tells us in the preface, grew out of a number of addresses delivered by him on various occasions. Some of these addresses, and one or two of the chapters, have already been published in the denominational papers. Dr. Mullins proceeds to show that religion has its axioms no less than other realms of knowledge and experience. These axioms are given as follows: The Theological Axion, the Religious Axiom, the Ecclesiastical Axiom, the Moral Axiom, the Religio-Civic Axiom, and the Social Axiom, all of which are set forth with utmost clearness. We anticipate this book to rank among the best selling theological books this year. The price is $1.00 net, postpaid.

HOW DOES THE DEATH OF CHRIST SAVE US?

Rev. Henry C. Mabie, D. D.
Price, 50c net, postpaid.

The question forming the title of this book was asked of a prominent divine and failed to receive an answer that was even moderately satisfactory. The defects of the reply caused earnest thought in Dr. Mabie's mind. A doctrine so vital as the atonement of Jesus Christ ought to be susceptible of such a presentation as to make it measurably clear. Dr. Mabie undertook to furnish this. The emphasis placed by Dr. Mabie on the reality of the relationship between Christ and God on one side, and Christ and man on the other, in the transaction of the cross, and his enforcement of the thought that the man thus redeemed must be redemptive, make his discussion very helpful.

Just ready. Price, 50c net, postpaid.

THE MASTER OF THE HEART.

Robert E. Speer.
Price, $1.00 net, postpaid.

"The chapters of this little book are not essays, but addresses. They are not theological or literary but practical. They were spoken in the first place to the young men and women of the Northfield Conferences, and present simply and earnestly some aspects of Christian truth. They were reported at the time and are printed here in almost their original form, in the hope that in some life they may make a larger place for our Lord and Master, Jesus Christ."

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY.
235 E. 40th St., Chicago.

HERBERT YEUELL AT FOSTORIA, O.

By Pastor U. G. Hostetter.

Fostoria is a manufacturing city of 10,000 inhabitants. Conservatism is common to all towns in the Western Reserve. This is true of Fostoria to a marked degree. The people do not move quickly in religious matters. The Church of Christ is about ten years old and has been self supporting for a little over two years. Denominationalism is intrenched and of a character that causes it to look contemptuously upon a body of people who would be known by the name Christian only. The Catholics, Methodists and Presbyterians are particularly strong, all having costly buildings. The Baptist church though older is weaker than our own. So far as corrupt practices are concerned, the people believed more in them than New Testament christianity. A union meeting in the Methodist church over a year ago was not a succes so that when we determined upon a campaign for souls people smiled and predicted failure. It was preposterous to think of a church of one hundred and thirty members undertaking a campaign which the ten churches, unitedly would not touch. It was said that August was the worst month in the year. It was vacation time, and people would not attend for there were too many outside attractions. The community had been fed on the mourner's bench doctrine and miraculous conversion idea. Many had become indifferent to christianity and looked upon the whole thing as a farce. The churches did not grapple with moral questions and the hands of ministers seemed tied. The Church of Christ was little known save that the membership was clean and at the front in campaigns for righteousness.

The Preparation.

A religious census was taken soon after the evangelist was secured. A large tabernacle used as an armory and rink was rented because of the central location. It was thoroughly cleaned, painted inside and out in white. A large chorus platform seating 150 was erected, comfortable seats made for the auditorium, electric fans installed, ten one hundred candle power incandescent lights placed within, two pianos rented and the building tastefully decorated. The members of the board had pledged $500 before the meeting began and every one of them was a working man. A baptistery was installed at the suggestion of the evangelist and hundreds saw for the first time scriptural baptisms. It was used every night. Business men were not bored by begging. When purchases were made they were paid for and no reductions asked. At every service months beforehand something was said about the approaching meeting. Prayer meetings emphasized it.

An effort was made to follow the directions of the evangelist. His letters were always full of hope and encouragement. He created confidence.

The Evangelist.

Herbert Yeuell was secured as evangelist. The church refused to take "No," for an answer when he was first approached. From the time he appeared on the field he manifested his generalship and grew in the affections of the people continually. Not once did he err in jurdment. An anti-saloon campaign was on, which made it more difficult to center the minds of the people upon the meeting. Conditions were such that a blunder at any time would have meant disaster. He took the swords away from those who tried to place him at a disadvantage and they knew not how it was done. Denominational ministers attempted ridicule but made themselves ridiculous. Mr. Yeuell's language was always chaste and scholarly and as plain as the book itself. Every sermon was a spiritual impress. The people believed him to be an earnest man with a great message. The message, not subterfuge was depended upon as the drawing power. The last night was an ovation. He was applauded from the time he entered the building until he reached the platform and that too by people who at first were angry when they heard the truth preached. The last night a purse of gold was presented to him.

The Results.

One hundred and seventy-seven came forward during the twenty-six days of invitation. This is the largest meeting ever held in northwestern Ohio by one congregation, and none ever before was so widely noticed. From distances of many miles the people came. The building was full the first day and interest grew to the last. At times the people could not be accommodated. The meetings for men and women were the largest ever held under one roof in Fostoria. The meeting being held in a rink which had been used for worldly purposes made it all the more difficult to move people. The suggestion offered by the building was not conducive to a spiritual atmosphere. Hundreds were surprised to learn that denominationalism was not Christianity. Many obeyed the Lord more perfectly in baptism. Homes were united and new families reached. Of this meeting it can be said that the evangelist was the sower and the church is in line for greater victories. It will reap continually because of the seed sown in the hearts of the thousands who heard him.

AN ADVANCED MOVEMENT.

The Foreign Society hopes to make an advanced movement this new year, the Centennial year. The first step in this direction is to secure at least $25,000 for a new Bible college property at Vigan, province of Luzon, Philippine Islands. This is one of the most pressing needs of the Society at this time.

J. W. Hardy, of Nashville, Tenn., has been asked to represent the society in this special task and will begin his services October 1. He needs no introduction to our people in Tennessee and South Kentucky, where he has served as pastor and evangelist for many years; and where he has also been eminently successful as a financial representative of South Kentucky College, recently newly christened "McLean College," Hopkinsville, Ky., and West Kentucky College, Mayfield. The funds of these two institutions have been increased no less than $50,000 through his special effort. To any other community where his lot may be cast, we can most cordially commend him to the fullest confidence of the friends of the Foreign Society. We have no doubt he will be gladly received and promptly seconded in his efforts to found a great institution of learning in Luzon, one of the most important mission fields in the world. His permanent address is 308 17th street, Nashville, Tenn.

F. M. Rains, S. J. Cory, Secretaries, Cincinnati, O.

Rev. S. J. Vance, evangelist, has an open date in January and would be glad to correspond with a church desiring a meeting. He is now in Idaho investigating conditions for the establishment of a "Christian Colony" there, a plan he outlined in a recent issue of this paper. He may be addressed at Carthage, Mo.

THE NEW ENGLAND CONVENTION.

The annual convention of the New England Christian Missionary Society was held with the Highland Street Church of Christ at Worcester, Mass., where A. P. Finley ministers. Most of the churches were represented and while regretting the absence of some of the speakers, it was on the whole a very profitable season. The sessions opened Thursday evening, September 10th, and closed with Lord's day following.

Thursday evening convention opened at 8 o'clock by devotional service led by Bro. McCreary of Lubec, Me. Sister Mattie

If you want a beautiful complexion, free from liver spots, pimples and freckles and other discolorations, purify your blood.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers cleanse and clear the blood, remove all poisonous and irritating influences and permit it to flow gently through the veins. These little wafers are famous for their beautifying effects and every lady may use them with perfect freedom.

They do their good work remarkably fast owing to the wonderful power of the ingredients which they contain. Here they are: Calcium Sulphide, Quassia, Eucalyptus, Golden Seal and an alterative and laxative. Ask your doctor what he thinks of these as blood purifiers. He prescribes them many times every year.

The popularity of Stuart's Calcium Wafers is great and growing constantly every year. They do a wonderful work with apparently little effort and do not necessitate suffering and expense as so many complexion cures occasion.

You may enjoy a fair complexion if you will use these little wafers. They are taken after each meal and go into your blood just like food. They do your entire system a great good. They help your intestines and relieve constipation, thereby giving the system the power to remove and exclude poisonous gases and fluids which filter through the intestines into the system and contaminate it.

Don't despair if your complexion is muddy. Write today for a free trial package of Stuart's Calcium Wafers or go to your druggist and buy a box. Price 50 cents. Simply write your name and address and a trial package will be sent you by mail without cost. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

Pounds of the C. W. B. M. told of the sad condition of the children of foreign lands, and the work of the Junior C. E. in behalf of these orphans.

Friday. After morning devotional service led by Bro. Underwood of Yale University, Bro. A. R. Finley of the Highland Street Church gave cordial welcome to the delegates.

E. Jay Teagarden, president N. E. C. M. S.—in his annual address, set forth the needs masterfully of the New England field, after which a discussion of the same; among the suggestions was the great need of a N. E. superintendent of missions, to give direct attention to propagation of the missionary idea among the churches and by evangelizing —one who should represent both A. C. M. S. and N. E. C. M. S.

Dr. O. E. Marrow of a neighboring Baptist church spoke of the friendly relations existing between their people and the disciples of Christ, expressing an earnest hope that they soon may be one in all respects.

The National Benevolent Association was represented by Bro. Armstrong of Troy, N. Y. and setting forth the need of caring for the orphan and the aged—the lack of which encouraged the organization of secret societies. Bro. D. L. Martin of Boston, spoke of the embodiment of Christ in our lives as the supreme need of the true Christian.

Business session of Aux. C. W. B. M. Missions followed with the president Sister Newton Knox in the chair, who set forth the work of the vigorous society, followed by Sister Mattie Pounds, urging the support of their work, after which an interesting exercise was given by the Junior C. E. Society of the local church.

At the morning session, an excellent address was given by Bro. D. C. McCallum of Everett, upon the Test of Discipleship—"By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one to another."

At the evening service Bro. Milton C. Snyder's solo "Judge me O, God," was finely rendered.

Saturday morning Bro. W. R. Mains of Haverhill gave a strong address—the Keynote in reviving church work, namely, the faithful attendance of every member at each service. At the Bible school session the report of the superintendent, Bro. F. H. Bailey of Danbury was read by Sister Teagarden.

Bro. G. A. Reinl of Springfield set forth the relation of the Bible school to missions. "The Testimony of the Bible through all ages" was the topic of Bro. A. McLean's excellent and most interesting address, after which Bro. J. A. Gardner gave a thoroughly practical talk upon the means and methods of Bible school work, which was enthusiastically received.

At the afternoon session the annual report of the corresponding secretary, Harry Minnick of Worcester was read, showing the condition of the work in general throughout New England. The officers for the ensuing year are elected as follows: President, E. Jay Teagarden, Superintendent, B. S., F. H. Bailey Danbury, G. E. Daniel Johnson, Boston; Corresponding Secretary, J. A. Gardner, Boston.

Executive Board: Buxton, Young, Gardner, Minnick, Hunt, Teagarden, and Bolton. Meeting at Haverhill, 1909.

Ministerial educational fund has aided Bro. Ford at Hiram and Bryson at Lexington. The afternoon address by Bro. L. F. Sanford of Brockton on "Needed results in the Christian Work" was well delivered and received. Saturday evening, A. McLean addressed the convention upon his favorite topic, "Foreign Missions," and in his strong, forcible manner.

In the evening H. A. Denton gave an address upon Home Missions, and H. R. Warren of Pittsburg, was enthusiastic on "Centennial Aims."

There were interesting verbal reports from the N. E. churches Lord's day morning. Bible school session at the noon hour and the communion service in the afternoon.

NEW ORLEANS CONVENTION
October 9 to 15, 1908.

A word of greeting to the Disciples of Christ with reference to our National Convention to be held in New Orleans, October 9th to 15th inclusive.

Nearly every disciple of Christ in America has desired at some time in life to visit the quaint, curious, ancient, modern, beautiful and interesting city of New Orleans, and has been waiting for just such an occasion as one of our International Missionary Conventions to satisfy that desire.

This is the most delightful season in which to visit the great state of Louisiana, for just as the hosts are gathering from the four quarters of the earth,—in great convocation the cotton fields will be fleecy with the snow-white staple, the pecan trees will be dropping their meaty nuts, the orange blossoms will have matured into golden juicy fruit, and the cane fields will be giving up their sweetness to be converted into sugar.

At this season the sky is usually bright and the air balmiest, and the plantations most resonant with the songs of the "old darky folk" making their own melodies as they sing.

From the standpoint of economy no one can find a better time to visit New Orleans. Seldom, if ever, do the railroads give such good rates to that city except during "Mardi Gras," when hundreds of thousands of people flock there and fill all hotels and boarding houses, paying fabulous prices for all accommodations, while at this season we can be well taken care of at a minimum expense; our local executive committee in New Orleans stand between us and all graft, and have secured contracts with the hotels and restaurants guaranteeing less than the normal winter rates for board and lodging. If one desires to economize, he can live on one dollar per day, by taking a room in a private house and eating at good restaurants; or if he desires to do so, he can have as fine accommodations as can be had anywhere, in either of the magnificent new hotels.

Again, it is well to note that under no other circumstances could our people receive such cordial reception, or make such good impression, for our convention will be the only thing going on at the time to attract the attention of the citizens or to call forth their hospitality. Jew and Gentile, Catholics and Protestants, Americans and Foreigners, official and private citizens are co-operating with our local committee in making preparation for the entertainment of our people, and the secular press is giving liberal space to our cause. We pray that every disciple of Christ in the United States may be impressed with what a large enthusiastic meeting of our people will mean as affecting our cause in Louisiana, and more particularly in the city of New Orleans.

There never was a more opportune time, a more cordial citizenship, a more receptive people, nor a more impressionable heart and life,—than are offered us in the invitation which we have received to visit that southern metropolis at this time. Possibly never again in a life time, will we have such a pressing invitation to visit that great city in the interest of such a great cause with the assurance of accomplishing such great good.

It is also well to keep in mind that with this great opportunity comes also great responsibility and that no disciple of Christ was ever under such great obligations to join his presence and best efforts to make one of our Missionary conventions an eminent success, especially in view of the centennial in 1909.

Every member of every state and national board should be present, every annual and life member and director of every Missionary Society should be present, every business man interested in education, missions and benevolences, should be present, every woman who can leave home ought to be present, every university, college and school among us should be well represented, and every church, Bible school and Christian Endeavor Society should be represented, and no preachers can afford not to be present. If all the interest of all our churches should be fairly represented, there would be no less than thirty thousand delegates present at the New Orleans convention.

Hoping to meet and greet you in the convention at New Orleans, October 9-15, 1908, I am,

Yours fraternally,
R. A. Long, President.

A FINAL WORD FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE LOCAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

All in readiness, come to the feasts. Our committees are still working day and night to provide comfort and convenience for the gathering hosts. They will not consider their work ended until every delegate has enjoyed to the fullest the rich spiritual and physical treat prepared, and are safe on their homeward journey. We believe all will carry back with them most pleasant recollections of their sojourn here.

New Orleans is assisting our committees regardless of faith or nationality. We are daily proffered assistance both by letter and word of mouth from Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, Catholics, etc., and each seeming to vie with the other as to who can do the most to help us entertain you. From what we have told the people here of our high qualifications they expect a great moral and spiritual uplift. We feel assured that much and lasting good will be accomplished by our hospitable city being in a receptive and impressionable mood. After you have come, enjoyed and profited by this gathering ing of the Lord's people, there can be no doubt of a regret that the time you spent here was all too short and a longing to have you come again.

The love that we as Christian people have for the cause and for one another cannot but win the hearts of people. Come, Come, Come.

We await you with glad hearts and willing hands to do your bidding.

All who have asked for reservations will call at headquarters for their assignment.

Reception Committee will meet all trains. Delegates please place yourselves in their hands.

John J. Zigler.

LODGING IN NEW ORLEANS.

The Local Executive Committee has secured special rates at the hotels and advises every one who can to room at the hotels for comfort, neatness and convenience. It is better in every way at the hotels; but for the sake of those who might be willing to put up with the inconvenience of small boarding houses for the sake of economy, we have listed a great number of rooms at fifty to seventy-five cents per day.

I hear that some are planning to park sleepers and sleep in them while in New Orleans. Of this I am sorry, for it will be very unsatisfactory in many ways. First, the cars would have to be parked in the most undesirable parts of the city, second, the Pullman car will be hot and ventilation poor, third, where these sleepers will have to be parked there are lots of mosquitos. By going to hotels and boarding houses one escapes all of these and has the assurance of stopping in a decent community.

Our local committee is in position to save our delegates and visitors trouble and money. We have but one desire for every one and that is the very best of everything at the least cost.

We are at the command of every one, let no one hesitate to ask favors of any and all of us.

W. M. Taylor.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

THE SYMPATHY OF FRIENDSHIP.

To know each other, to trust each other, to like the same things, to walk arm in arm thru' the fields and woods, to sit silently beside the brook and fireside; to march together thru' the aisles of high-vaulted ambition; to thread softly the chambers of sorrow; to kneel side by side before the altars of faith; to rebuke each other's faults in love and to cherish each other's virtues in joy—this is the significance, I would almost say the heavenly significance, of real friendship.

SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY CONVENTION.

The coming annual convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, to be held at Buffalo, N. Y., Oct. 15th to 21st, promises to be a most auspicious occasion. This meeting will mark the sixtieth anniversary of the first convention ever held in the world, in the interests of equal civil and political rights for women. That first meeting occurred in 1848 at Seneoccasion. This meeting will mark the 60th equal civil and political rights for women. The first meeting occured in 1848 at Seneca Falls, N. Y., and several women who participated in it still survive and will be honored figures in the Buffalo gathering.

Besides these pioneers, many other distinguished persons will be present; among them Miss Jane Addams, Mrs. Mary McHenry Keith, Mrs. Harriet G. R. Wright, Mrs. Florence Kelly, Mrs. Katherine Reed Balentine, Mrs. Catherine Waugh McCullough, Miss Laura Clay, Miss Alice Stone Blackwell, Miss Harriet May Mills, Mrs. Harriot Stanton Blatch, President M. Carey Thomas of Bryn Mawr, Mrs. Mary J. Coggeshall, Rev. Anna Howard Shaw, Mrs. Rachel Foster Avery, Miss Laura A. Gregg, Miss Kate M. Gordon, Dorothy Dix, Mrs. Harriet Taylor Upton, Prof. Sophronisba Breckinridge, Rev. Antoinette Brown Blackwell, Mrs. Mary Simpson Sperry, Charles Edward Russell and Rabbi Stephen Wise.

From the small beginning in 1848, this movement has become world-wide and at the International Woman Suffrage Congress held in Holland last July, there were present delegates from sixteen organized countries.

13,000,000 Dyspeptics

Live In the United States and Canada Suffering Terribly Every Meal.

A rough estimate gives the enormous total above as the number of people who suffer in America from Dyspepsia. Add to this those who suffer occasional stomach trouble and you have the field which lies open for Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

These wonderful little digesters are the most popular dyspepsia remedy sold in Canada and America.

Why? There must be merit to them or they would not or could not be distancing all competitors.

Ask any druggist to tell you of their popularity.

They will assist nature in digesting a meal no matter what the condition of the stomach. They are prepared scientifically and are made powerful so that nature restores the lost ingredients with which she manufactures her digestive fluids.

They soothe the tired and irritated nerves of the stomach. They prevent and relieve constipation and bowel trouble.

If you want to eat a dangerous meal at late hours take a tablet with you and fear no evil consequences or make up your mind that Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will reduce the ill effects of over eating.

They are made up from fruit and vegetable essences and their tablet form of preparation preserves these qualities longer than fluid or powder modes of administering the same essences.

They have been tried for years and found to be not wanting. You don't buy a new thing in Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, you purchase a remedy for stomach trouble that has a record for cures by the thousand. Ask the druggist, then give him 50c for a package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

VOTING A RELIGIOUS DUTY.

Christians Must Attend Primaries Too, Says Famous Pastor.

Church-goers should regard the exercise of the franchise as a religious function and should vote in accordance with religious precepts on every matter involving a moral question either in the issues at stake or in the personality of the candidates, declares the Rev. Charles F. Aked in the October number of Appleton's magazine. Dr. Aked is pastor of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, of which Governor Hughes is a member. Further than this, he asserts it is just as much the duty of a church member to attend ward meetings and to vote at the primaries as it is to take part in the affairs of his church or to cast a ballot in the election of a pastor.

According to Dr. Aked the proportion of regular church attendants who frequently stay away from the polls on election day and who seldom or never take part in primaries or local meetings for the election of delegates to conventions is larger than among any other class. These delinquents, he holds, are as much responsible for corrupt conditions of government or the election of unworthly men to public offices as are the heelers who buy votes to accomplish this result or the bar-room hangers-on who sell their ballots.

"The abuses that have arisen in the past," says the Appleton article, "from the interference of the church in politics have been due to the fact that religion was made political instead of politics being made religious. Except under circumstances of extraordinary moral pressure the churches cannot enter the arena of party politics. The church cannot become a caucus. Only the projection of a supreme moral issue can warrant a clergyman in publicly taking a position as a party man. He may be permitted in his own heart to pray for a party—if he is satisfied that it is not past praying for. But the church can and should undertake a more important function—one that underlies all law and government—the formation of righteous public opinion. The church cannot compel in this day and generation. If it cannot inspire it is because it is no longer inspired and a church without inspiration is a corpse which people with decent regard to health should quietly bury. The church must teach that a Christian can no more neglect the plain duties of citizenship than he can neglect to pay his debts. The religious man who stands idly by and sees American politics made a byword for dishonesty is neither religious nor a man."

Eureka College has an advertising booth at the State Fair now in progress in Springfield, Ill. H. H. Peters writes that the enterprise is a good move and will aid greatly in the campaign of education now on in Illinois in the interest of our college work. The Disciples of Illinois are taking advantage of public gatherings of an educational nature as never before and the results are very encouraging.

Rev. Richard Martin of the "Martin Family," Evangelists, reports a splendid meeting at Piedmont, Kansas. About sixty have been enrolled in an infant organization there.

This book, as Dr. Mullins tells us in the preface, grew out of a number of addresses delivered by him on various occasions. Some of these addresses, and one or two of the chapters, have already been published in the denominational papers. Dr. Mullins proceeds to show that religion has its axioms no less than other realms of knowledge and experience. These axioms are given as follows: The Theological Axion, the Religious Axiom, the Ecclesiastical Axiom, the Moral Axiom, the Religio-Civic Axiom, and the Social Axiom, all of which are set forth with utmost clearness. We anticipate this book to rank among the best selling theological books this year. The price is $1.00 net, postpaid.

HOW DOES THE DEATH OF CHRIST SAVE US?

Rev. Henry C. Mabie, D. D.
Price, 50c net, postpaid.

The question forming the title of this book was asked of a prominent divine and failed to receive an answer that was even moderately satisfactory. The defects of the reply caused earnest thought in Dr. Mabie's mind. A doctrine so vital as the atonement of Jesus Christ ought to be susceptible of such a presentation as to make it measurably clear. Dr. Mabie undertook to furnish this. The emphasis placed by Dr. Mabie on the reality of the relationship between Christ and God on one side, and Christ and man on the other, in the transaction of the cross, and his enforcement of the thought that the man thus redeemed must be redemptive, make his discussion very helpful.

The Christian Century

Vol. XXV. CHICAGO, ILL., OCTOBER 10, 1908. No. 41.

EDITORIAL

The New Christian Century.

Several weeks ago a preliminary announcement was made concerning the reorganization of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY management. An announcement was given in that statement that when the plans were completed our readers would be taken frankly into our confidence.

It is more or less generally understood that the assets of the old CHRISTIAN CENTURY company were sold at auction last August on account of the foreclosure of a mortgage. Mr. C. A. Osborne, subscription manager of the United Religious Press, was the purchaser. Since then the paper has been issued under difficulties with the aid of some of its good friends. On Monday October 5 the entire property was purchased from Mr. Osborne by William A. Kennedy and C. C. Morrison who with H. L. Willett, O. F. Jordan and others are now in the process of forming a new company to publish the paper. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY COMPANY will be incorporated as speedily as the legal process will allow.

In the editorial organization of the new paper Charles Clayton Morrison comes into coöperation with Dr. Herbert L. Willett. Orvis F. Jordan has been selected assistant editor. It is especially gratifying that we are able to announce the continuance of many of the former staff of contributors. Dr. Errett Gates will continue his department of Christian Union. George A. Campbell has taken up again his suggestive and helpful writing in answer to correspondence on the Religious Life. Dr. Willett has added a new department, "Biblical Problems," in which he will discuss questions of exposition and criticism from week to week. He will also continue his weekly exposition of the Sunday school lesson. Professor Silas Jones, who has for a series of years made his prayer-meeting exposition the most helpful thing printed on these themes, will continue.

With these hands set to our task it is confidently expected many others will coöperate. Plans are being made for securing correspondents in the leading cities of the country who shall report and interpret to us the religious and social movements of their respective communities. A book table will be spread from time to time and the significant publications of the best houses will be interpreted to our readers.

No foreword as to plans and policies is entirely convincing, we are well aware. A newspaper is known by its fruits and its policy can be better formulated by its readers upon examination of its columns than by the promises of the management. However, it seems fitting to say at least three things that THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY purposes to do:

1. It will aim to be a newspaper. It will reflect not alone the thinking of the brotherhood but the doings of the brotherhood. Our initial task will be to organize a mechanism for gathering the significant church news from our entire country. Our "With the Workers" page will be increased in extent and vitalized. Evangelistic and administrative achievements will be given hearty reports. In this feature of the paper we wish not to be confined to our own brotherhood alone (though, of course, the main body of our space will be so utilized) but it will be our purpose to consider the important happenings in other churches and in the social order outside the churches. Thus our readers may be kept in touch with the wider currents of social and church life.

Chicago will have a unique place in our news columns. This great city has peculiar significance not to our brotherhood alone but to the whole nation. What our churches are doing, what other churches are doing, what social forces are at work and how they work—these will be matters upon which authoritative reports will constantly be made. It is expected that THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY will become a medium of communication among our Chicago brethren and thus a factor in deepening the fine fellowship that already exists among them. In doing this, we are well aware, we shall be eliciting the interest of readers the country over.

2. The literary character of the paper will be a matter of scruple with us. THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is printed by the United Religious Press, a syndicate of religious newspapers. Through this arrangement we are enabled to secure literature of the best class which perhaps would be beyond the reach of one single paper. The pages for Home and Children will be carefully edited. Our current serial story drawing soon to a close will be followed by "The Dawn at Shanty Bay," the best production of that most delightful author, Robert E. Knowles, the "Ian McLaren of Canada."

3. It is the purpose of the editors to open our columns to a discussion of the vital and acute problems now before our people and the religious world. We believe the time has come for speaking plainly. Our brotherhood is racked with dissension. Many thousands of hearts are tremulous with fear and not a few with grief. For years a vicious propaganda has been carried on among us with a newspaper as its head and front. The souls of many have been poisoned. Falsehood and bigotry have walked abroad in the livery of the fathers. The channels of our thinking run with vitriol and invective—not with the good will of Christ. The issues raised by this propaganda THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY proposes to discuss, not bumptiously or with passion, but with humility and great earnestness. We are determined that whatever is said of us, no reader shall charge us with not being frank.

Not for one moment do we mean to suggest that any newspaper or man or group of men is to be made the object of our attack. We have higher aims than that. Moreover, the issue now joined in our brotherhood is not ours alone but is the problem of all churches today. Unfortunately we have been thrown into a passionate temper over the issues by the conscienceless partisanship of the conservative organ and the issue cannot be frankly met without reckoning with this propagandist. But our purpose is not to attack, but to build up. The Disciples of Christ believe in discussion. We like to talk things over. We hate concealment. The new CHRISTIAN CENTURY believes in discussion. We do not care for leadership; we only care to bear our testimony. That testimony we will bear.

We shall admit frankly at the beginning and all the way that the modern way of regarding religion differs from the conceptions of an older time. We believe the difference is very important and radical. It will be our purpose to interpret the modern conception truthfully, frankly. We believe that every value that Christianity possesses under the older view is enhanced under the new, and many other values are added. We believe that the essential principle of our plea and the example of the fathers of our movement predetermine the Disciples of Christ to the position the scholarship of the world is taking. Our fathers were the pioneers of modern progressiveism.

Constructive, therefore, our work will ever be. We shall strive to make our pages brim with faith and hope and love—faith in the God who is revealed to us in the holy scriptures and in the face of Jesus Christ; faith in the present nearness of that God and his active guidance of the vast enterrise of his kingdom, hope in the destiny of that kingdom and the glorious immortality of each redeemed soul, and love for all men—a love that recognizes no of under all our differences and the possibility of coöperation in the spirit of Christ despite the widest theological separation.

We are not aiming here to make a comprehensive, but a merely suggestive, statement of our ideal. The editor and workers on the old CHRISTIAN CENTURY who continue with the new, take the deepest satisfaction in the new organization and its purposes. The new editor and assistant cast in their lot with the enterprise with a sense of opportunity to bear testimony to the truth that it is in us and an appreciation of the valient service already rendered by the paper into whose good will we now come. In doing our work we shall constantly pray for the guidance of the Holy Spirit of Jesus Christ both when we draw the sword and when we put it up, into its sheath. The big enterprise of the kingdom of God shall be ever before our eye and our hope shall be to serve that kingdom by what we do.

Yet Another Centennial Aim.

The Disciples have improved on Emerson's advice to young people, to "hitch their wagon to a star," and have hitched their centennial wagon to a great many stars. Our "aims" are a great multitude. No society but has many "aims" for our centennial year. Some of these aims we are realizing in advance. Some we will yet see consummated. Others, we regret to predict, will certainly fail. Our aims are for more money, or for more converts, or more ministerial students, or more college endowment, or more missionaries, or more church buildings, or less debt. We were conscious of what we did when our committee declined to select one solitary object, the realization of which should stand as our centennial monument. It seemed best at that time to have many aims, and to augment the flow of normal religious activities by forcing the centennial sentiment into all the channels of the church.

We are still of the opinion that this is the best way to celebrate our hundredth year. It is with no timidity, therefore, that we suggest yet another centennial aim. The "aim" we have in mind seems to us more important than any yet adopted. Our Pittsburg convention will be one of the greatest religious gatherings the modern world has witnessed. More than any other event in our hundred years of history, it will bring us into the focus of the world's attention. All the ways that lead to Pittsburg will be lined with millions of our fellow-religionists, to review the mighty procession of Diseiples of Christ marching upon that city. The question will be asked, "What meaneth this? Who are these people? What do they stand for? And how have they succeeded in realizing the ends for which they exist?"

For decades the Disciples have gone on about their work with intense devotion. We have been largely ignored by the religious world. We have only of late begun to be taken seriously by others than ourselves. Our conventions have not been reported in a significant manner in the public press. We have been left to ourselves to develop in our "clan" the logic and the fruit of the principles which gave us being. But next year we will not be ignored. Next year the secular press will report our immense convention. Thoughtful men who study the ethical and social significance of popular movements will ask what this vigorous host of a million and a quarter souls believe. What do they practice? In what are they peculiar? We will be subjected to the most searching examination we have ever undergone.

And the item that will most interest the world will be, not our plea as a theory, but our plea as we ourselves practice it.

These Disciples of Christ were born for the propagation of the ideal of Christian union. The "Declaration and Address," whose first pronouncement determines the date of this celebration, was a symphony whose sole motif was the unity and union of Christ's people. In that day Thomas Campbell had to contend earnestly for the desirability of union. In our day nearly everybody desires it and prays for it. The problem of our day is one of method. How can we unite? This is the question of today. Can you Disciples of Christ show us how we can be one as Christ and the Father are one?

How will we answer that question next year? Are we ready to undergo an examination of the condition of our brotherhood with respect to its own unity? This is to be the crucial test. Probably no denomination around us has on its hands such a nasty quarrel at this hour as the Disciples of Christ. Who can say that we are united as Christ and the Father, in the face of the exhibition of recent weeks and of recent years?

Will the Disciples' plea for union work? That is the big question. The quotation from the Presbyterian Interior, printed on another page, suggests to us the attitude other church people will take toward our claims and our plea. But next year the examination will be more searching. The strife and alienation treated of in Mr. Oeschger's two articles will be exhibited by our critical neighbors to our shame. Are the Disciples only doing what all the denominations have done? Are they going to the world with a program for union which is itself sectarian?

We boast of nothing so much as of the fact that we were able to weather the storm and strain of the civil war without division, and we point to the divisions in other churches over that issue as a proof of the validity of our claim to have the true basis upon which all Christ's people can unite. But behold the "anti" disaffection. Since the war we have become practically two brotherhoods.

At present we are torn apart with matters quite as trivial as the organ or missionary societies. Our present bone of contention is a philosophy of miracles. Not the fact of miracles—for nobody is denying miracles as facts—but the philosophical conceptions with which the miraculous facts are made reasonable,—these are under dispute. And men are calling hard names and working up the mind of the brotherhood into a temper of hate and vindictiveness on account of what? On account of a pure matter of human opinion.

Will our hundred years of protest against making human opinions a test of fellowship come to this ironical finish at Pittsburg?

We do not believe it possible. Our brotherhood knows its plea too well and its heart is too true to its plea and its Christ to allow that.

The great "aim" of this, our centennial, year, more vital than money or numbers of converts, is the preservation and establishment of the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace—and that in our own brotherhood. Absolutely nothing could be so fatal to our hope and prayers as to go up to Pittsburg in a quarrel. Is our plea big enough; is our basis of union big enough; are we big enough to love one another despite our philosophical differences and to coöperate on the basis of our mutual love and our equal loyalty to our divine Lord?

The Case of Jan Pouren.

"First wash your bloody hands." Such was the reply of the New England conscience to the czar's demand for the extradition of Jan Pouren, a Russian refugee, confined since last January in a cell of the Tombs prison in New York City.

Jan Pouren was taken into custody by the Federal authorities at the request of the Russian government as a common criminal under charges of murder, arson, burglary and attempted murder. In the long drawn out proceedings before Commissioner Shields he was completely exonerated of the murder charges. As to the other offences, it was conclusively shown that they were acts of war committed during the revolutionary rising of the Baltic provinces of Russia in the years 1905 and 1906. Even the evidence introduced by the Russian government showed that Pouren had taken an active part in the revolutionary rising. Nevertheless Commissioner Shields ordered in favor of the czar's demand.

From this opinion an appeal has now been taken to the president and to the American people as a high tribunal of public opinion. Protest meetings have been held in many places and strong resolutions in favor of maintaining the right of political asylum passed unanimously.

When Franklin H. Wentworth, the famous Boston orator, gave vent to his righteous indignation recently in the historic hall of Cooper Union in New York, thundering at the czar: "First wash your bloody hands," the immense assembly responded in frantic applause.

The speaker had given voice to the thought that was in everybody's heart, trembling on every lip.

The civilized world shudders as it beholds the cold and cruel butchery in which the czar's henchmen indulge since the temporary defeat of the Russian people. It responds warmly to Tolstoy's noble protest against these unspeakable atrocities. But it believes itself powerless to stay the hands of the Russian barbarians at home.

The case is different when the czar now reaches over the sea in an attempt to seek another victim who has found a refuge on American soil. Jan Pouren, though merely a poor Lettish peasant, will be defended by the American people against the Russian torturers and hangman. From ocean to ocean the American answer to the czar will be:

"First wash your bloody hands."

Breaking the Silence.

The silence of the Standard on the subject of its attitude to organized missions in the church has at last been broken after months of waiting. In one of its last pronouncements, before its era of silence, the following sentiment had made us all take notice: "We would not say that missionary societies are an unmixed evil, but we do say that they are a dangerous good." The Standard inadvertently shows by printing a letter from an anti-society missionary in Japan that it is being understood among the brethren as a friend of the old hap-hazard way of doing missionary work advocated by Ben Franklin and by the Octographic Review at the present time. Is this cordial letter from an anti-society missionary a misplaced affection? The brotherhood will want to know.

In its article this week on missionary methods, the Standard feels cautiously among the brethren to see how much they will stand. If this week's article arouses no protest, may we not expect that it will proceed farther in its descent into the Avernus of "anti-ism"? Some sentences this week are marked in the departure they make from the point of view of the sainted Isaac Errett. "The Standard would no more talk of being loyal to the American Christian Missionary Society, or the Christian Woman's Board of Missions than the blacksmith or the carpenter would declare loyalty to the tools or his trade." But even artisans do not throw away their tools and work with their naked hands. It were a poor carpenter who in a pet would throw his chisel in the well and use his thumb-nail.

The position of the Standard that there is danger of exalting the missionary societies to a place of ecclesiastical power, is ludicrous. The only demand ever made on them to exercise the power of an ecclesiastical court has come from the Standard. The Standard has urged that brethren who associate together for continuing their studies in the Campbell Institute, should be kept off of convention programs. The Standard has insisted that missionaries should have an O. K. from Lexington before being allowed to go out. It is the Standard that has demanded of the societies that they exercise the functions of an ecclesiastical court. Inasmuch as they have almost uniformly refused to do this, the Standard is now much concerned lest undue power come into their hands.

The most daring sentence in the cautious utterances of the week comes in the suggestion to the societies to give way at the Centennial. "It would have been nothing more than gracious for our missionary societies to have gracefully yielded the floor on that occasion, in deference to the great number who question their Scripturalness so that every soul in the brotherhood would be free to join in a celebration that represents the origin and spread of the great principles which we all hold in common." Does our Cincinnati contemporary seriously contemplate the societies abdicating at their own convention? When did our people ever have a national convention before the organization of the societies?

While the "sick man" of Cincinnati has responded to inquiries concerning his health with "Worse, thank you!" we note that he has after all not given any definite statement about the future policy toward the societies. The Christian Century has no uncertain sound to give forth. A hundred years of church life have demonstrated that the independent and individualistic method of doing missionary work is a failure. The societies have probably spent a million dollars in the work of the kingdom the past year. Our anti-society brethren probably have not spent ten thousand dollars outside their own churches. Our societies have the authority that comes from the Providence of God. They have succeeded where others have failed. While we never have denied the right of churches to carry on independent mission work, we question the expediency. The whole spirit of our age is away from the individualism of the French Revolution to the social spirit of modern times. Commercial enterprises organize and combine with great economy and great increase of effectiveness. The Christian Century will ever defend organized missions and will trust the godly men who have specialized in mission work to carry on our common enterprises better than any group of newspaper men could ever do.

Herbert Moninger's New Book.

We are in receipt of a copy of Herbert Moninger's new book, "The New Testament Church," which we judge has been sent us for review. We understand that a copy has been sent to every minister in the church. Since the book is issued for the most ambitious of all purposes, to be the teacher of our future teachers, we think it merits a consideration which its scholarship or its literary quality would never secure for it.

We are interested in the first place to see how Herbert Moninger, A. M., B. D. (behold the unscriptural titles!) a graduate of the Divinity school of Yale University, shall proceed in the production of a book that shall secure the imprimatur of his employer. The book is a strange and incongruous mixture of milder higher criticism and the archaisms that were current among us before we organized any colleges. It has many a modern word on the New Testament but calls the Old Testament a "prophetic photograph." It presents our plea after the statements of Ben Franklin, instead of after Isaac Errett, and gives the conception of a static church. If the book is to be widely circulated among us, we ought to know what principles of interpretation we are thereby introducing and determine what conception of our plea.

We propose, therefore, to accept the invitation of the publishers to give the book an adequate review which we shall do in the following series of studies: Archaisms, Mr. Moninger's Higher Criticism, Mr. Moninger's Conception of Our Plea, Mr. Moninger's Conception of the Church, Mr. Moninger's Sources.

Leadership and Testimony.

In the attacks which are made upon the men among the Disciples who are stigmatized by their critics as the interpreters of modern and heretical teachings regarding the Scriptures and the Christian faith, the charge is constantly made that they are "leaders" of the critical wing, that they are "leading" the brotherhood into new and dangerous beliefs and experiments, and the warning cry is raised against such "leadership."

In the more moderate and dignified, but still conservative press of the Disciples, these men are not exactly cast out of the fold of brotherly recognition, nor branded with the mark of the theological Cain, but they are gravely cautioned not to ruin their chances of "leadership" by utterances contrary to the approved doctrine of the journalistic mentor. They are told that the brotherhood will not honor as "leaders" men who speak in different tones from those it has been accustomed to hear, and that in order "to lead" it is necessary to remain close to those who are to be led.

Without stopping to comment upon the temper which actuates the first of these attitudes, nor the frequent and even inexcusable perversions of fact upon which the second is based, it is worth while to consider the question of leadership.

It is manifest that in the popular sense a leader is one who receives public recognition at the hands of a company of people who have confidence in him and wish to honor him. No true man is indifferent to the good will of his brethren. When through the usual channels of selection he is placed in conspicuous positions, either of official character or as a speaker in behalf of important interests, he may well count himself honored in a brotherhood like that of the Disciples of Christ. It may well be regarded as a sign of recognised and confirmed leadership if such choices are frequent, and his name becomes familiar and prized.

Yet it is not infrequently the case that men of sensitive nature and sincere appreciation of the good will of their brethren prefer to accept the privilege of testimony rather than the honor of leadership. Few men are unaware when they find themselves in serious disagreement with the body of people with whom they have been connected. They generally become pessimistic, irritated and hostile. Such men can have little place in the life of any religious movement. But when the foundations of the faith grow firmer yearly in the mind of a believer, and the historic purpose of a people like the Disciples grows increasingly evident and essential, he may hold too firm a faith in the deeper meaning of our history and its ultimate purpose to join the forces that stand for stagnation and decay. He may possess so deep a confidence in the unchanged convictions of the majority of his brethren, and their unwavering devotion to the time-tested elements of our holy faith, that he will refuse to assent to the temporary expedients which may spell leadership in days of hesitation, and choose to wait in patience and with clear testimony till the times have recovered balance.

We believe that there are not a few such men today among the Disciples. They are deeply distressed at the ruin wrought among us by unprincipled journalism masquerading under the name of soundness in the faith. They are not asking for public honors, but are content to bear their testimony to the truth as the New Testament reveals it and the fathers understood it. They know that the future is with them. With them is the tide of progress to better things in the life of the church. With them is the spirit of the age and the spirit of Christ. Life is on their side, and death as well. They know the promise of the word of God, and to them the meanings of Christian history are plain past all misreading. The signs of the times are too manifest to be ignored. The desperation and vindictiveness of bigotry and obscurantism are too evident not to be encouraging. The night is far spent and the day is at hand.

Meantime these men are not concerned about public honors as compared with the duties of testimony. If they are placed upon convention programs, as they are constantly and in spite of all hindering effort, they accept the duty with due appreciation of all that it implies. If they are ignored in the making of such programs, they have no word of complaint, knowing that scores of men as faithful and worthy as they are never thus set in the public view.

If the brethren who are the self-appointed guardians of orthodoxy in our Israel could understand how little the mere incidents of leadership and publicity appeal to those who are most deeply concerned with the purpose and destiny of our brotherhood, they would cease to believe that such men can be cajoled with promises of public honor or hindered with threats of suppression. The real assizes of life are in higher hands than ours, and for these larger judgments of conduct all true men are content to wait.

The November Congress.

The approaching joint congress of Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples is an event of unique interest. It is the first time such an occasion has been arranged. Baptists have appeared upon the platform of our own conventions and congresses, and representative Disciples have spoken before Baptist assemblies. But a gathering in which both met upon equal terms, and in this representative manner, is a new thing.

The questions which are to be discussed are of great interest. Some of them relate directly to the problem of Christian union with which the Disciples have always been profoundly concerned, and in which they are today more truly interested than ever before. Some of the themes are of wider value, dealing with historic and fundamental matters in the faith of the church. The speakers are among the most representative in the three bodies co-operating. The sessions are certain to be intensely interesting and profitable.

The gathering is to be held in a church which is itself a living illustration of the principle of union. In spite of hindering activity and grave predictions of failure and disaster, Memorial Church of Christ has consummated the union of Baptist and Disciples, and is moving forward in perfect harmony to what promises to be a most happy and fruitful ministry in the important section of the city in which it is placed.

The Disciples have received generous recognition in the plans of the congress. They have been given equal voice in all of the counsels preparatory to the meeting. Their response in attendance will go far to convince the Baptists and Free Baptists that we are something more than theorists regarding the union of the people of God. The date of the congress is Nov. 10-12. The place is Memorial Church of Christ, Oakwood Boulevard, near Cottage Grove Avenue, Chicago. The program will be published next week.

It Has Come to This.

"The fact may as well be recognized first as last, that the patience of the brethren is exhausted. They have seen these men put forward year after year, not only on our national programs, but on State programs as well, and are beginning to discover that it is effected by secret-society methods. It is openly charged that Mr. Willett's election to the presidency of the Illinois State Convention a year ago was effected by methods that were unfair and discreditable, through manipulation by a notorious member of the notorious Campbell Institute. We can not but believe that the Centennial Committee, or at least the major part of them, have been victimized by similar methods, and it is above all things important that it should be narrowed down to the responsible parties."—Christian Standard of October.

The utter wantonness of the Christian Standard in its conscienceless attack on those who differ from it is exhibited in this quotation. Driven from a fair and dispassionate discussion of the question on its merits it has debased itself to the most contemptible dealing in personalities.

The Standard says that it is "openly charged." We ask it to name one man and who openly charges this thing. There can be no reason for withholding his name if the charge is "open."

Who is the "notorious member" of the Campbell Institute who is charged with manipulating Professor Willett into the presidency by "unfair and discreditable methods"? Let The Standard give the names. At the start of your editorial career, Brother Lappin, your employer should warn you that the printing of things like that involves you in very delicate danger. The best way out of it is to tell the brotherhood and the interested parties what facts, if any, you have on hand.

A Church Irenic.

By William Oeschger.

The first installment of Mr. Oeschger's article was printed last week. In it he laid stress upon the fact that our brotherhood is in grave danger, due to the working of the party spirit among us. Individual spiritual life is being injured and our co-operative missionary organizations menaced. He notes the increase of the party consciousness among us in the past few years. In our zeal for evangelism, he argues, we have neglected ourselves, the needs of the spiritual organism. He contends that we need a church irenic, a serious attempt to discover and appreciate the measure of truth in the conflicting schools of thought—schools which he symbolizes by the three cities, Nashville, Lexington and Chicago. Nashville stands for church Individualism. Lexington stands for theological Dogmatism. Chicago, he says, represents Criticism. If any reader has overlooked the first section, it would amply repay him to read it in connection with what follows.—EDITORS.

We shall proceed to examine Dogmatism, and see if we can discover its special service to the kingdom of God. When we see what that is then we will be able to see what the function of the Lexington school of thought is. Henry Drummand, speaking of Dogmatism, Criticism, and Evangelism, said this: "The three outstanding departments of the church's work are criticism, dogmatism, and Evangelism. Without the first there is no guarantee of the truth, without the second there is no defence of the truth, without the third there is no propagation of the truth. Criticism then, in a word, secures truth, dogmatism conserves it, and evangelism spreads it." By this definition of dogmatism, or statement of its function, we see that the special office of dogmatism is, to conserve the truth by defending it against the forces that seek to overthrow it. Scientifically speaking, dogmatism presents to our notice, "the material obtained by exegesis and history in an organized and systematic form, representing the sum of the truths of the Christian faith in an organic connection with the facts of the religious consciousness." This system of truth that dogmatism has organized into an organic whole it proclaims in a positive, authoritative and magisterial manner. It resents the encroachments of criticism, for criticism does one of two things. It either forces dogmatism to give up some things that it has proclaimed for the truth as being no longer tenable, or it compels it to incorporate into its system new truths. Either of these result in serious disturbances to dogmatism. The seriousness of these disturbances is greatly augmented by the fact that dogmatism is usually vitally related to great vested interests. Changes in the platform disturb the vested interests that have come into existence by virtue of the dogmatic system. It is the nature of dogmatism to command allegiance to its principles. In order to do this successfully it must exhibit elements of stability and great constancy in its platform; for if it fails in this it will not warrant the confidence of men. Truth for evangelistic, propagating purposes must be presented in a dogmatic form. There must be positiveness of statement. Truth must have the ring of authority. Unless it has this it will not bring conviction and persuasion to the masses. The writer must confess that when it comes to preaching the gospel he is a dogmatist. He can easily see why our evangelists are almost to a man all dogmatists. The work they are called to, compels them to be such.

The Value of Conservation.

Now the service that the Lexington school of thought renders is this. It conserves the old truths. It presents truth in a form that compels conviction. It is positive. It preceeds in the consciousness that its message is authoritative and ultimate. There is great power in this. The things that Lexington stands for are wonderfully effective when a man is engaged in an evangelistic campaign. But the substance and the form of its message are admirably fitted for active propagandism among the masses. It is the special function of this dogmatic and conservative wing of the church to conserve the truth, to defend it against the rash and hasty conclusions of criticisms. In doing this it also serves as a bulwark of defence to the great vested interests of the church. When criticism passes a hasty judgment upon some time honored custom or institution, such as baptism by immersion, seeking to set it aside as non-essential, dogmatism vetoes the action. It says to criticsm, you shall not do this, for there is truth here that must be conserved. Dogmatism is the conservator of the truth. The church has always had her dogmatic party, and she always must have, if she expects to continue to exist. Without this party the church would suffer disintegration. To Lexington belongs the task of conserving the old truth by defending it against the unreasonable encroachments of criticism.

Chicago and Criticism.

But Chicago, as well as Lexington, has in keeping great sidered reasons for severe punishment. Not only have the Chicago ministers often been tried and condemned by challenges which have had no answer, but missionary boards and secretaries have met the same treatment. The men who are responsible to the and vital truths. Chicago is the school of criticism. That is her special function. Now it is the function of criticism to discover truth. Without the work of criticism there could be no guarantee of the truth. Criticism is neither tied to the past nor are the doors of the future closed to it. It exercises a certain open mindedness toward everything with which it meets. It has nothing in its keeping that the new can disturb. It is the nature of criticism to go upon excursions into unexplored realms for the sake of making new discoveries. It puts everything it meets with, whether it be old or new, through a critical process. It sounds both the foundation and superstructure of truth anew for every generation. All the facts of religion are submitted to a critical investigation. In doing this it exercises a most wholesome influence on our dogmatic systems. Criticism compels the dogmatic systems of the past to submit to a critical examination to see whether they are still tenable in the light of the newly accumulated evidence that criticism brings to bear upon them. This enables the present to throw off the yoke of error that the past may seem to bind upon it. It forces dogmatism to examine itself to see whether it be in the faith or not. It means light for darkness, and truth in the place of error. It means more than deliverance from error. It means new life injected into the old systems. Criticism saves dogmatism from stagnation, death and decay. Dogmatism constantly tends towards crystalization. It is so easy for it to go to seed. Its insistency upon a life of self-sufficiency causes it to become sterile and barren in its inner life. It will, if not subjected to criticism, become mechanical and unfruitful in the things of the spirit. Criticism is constantly bringing to the dogmatist new facts, asking him to incorporate them into his system. It is this that vitalizes dogmatism. This means change, but it is a change from a less vital to a more vital dogmatism. The new facts and issues that criticism brings to dogmatism compels the latter to interpret itself anew to every generation. This is not to be deplored, but a thing to be rejoiced over. It means a better dogmatism in the end. This is the service that Chicago is rendering to our brotherhood. Its function is to relieve dogmatism of error and to invigorate it with new life.

Dangers on Both Sides.

That there are dangers to dogmatism from criticism that must be carefully guarded against, goes without saying. Criticism may become hasty, rash, holding to fanciful and arbitrary conclusions. It may attempt to cast out of our dogmatic systems facts that can not be parted with under any circumstances. It may seek to disturb foundation stones in the household of faith that God never intended to be disturbed. It may become erratic, arrogant and even insolent in its assaults on the great truths of revelation, which it is the sworn duty of the dogmatist to defend at any cost. It may become unduly bold in insisting that its conclusions, hastily arrived at, be accepted as true. However, when it does this we are not to deny it the right to exist. But we are to meet it with a better criticism. In like manner, when dogmatism becomes stagnant and barren, we are not to deny to dogmatism the right to exist, but we are to replace the dogmatism that is dead by one that is living. This then is the first step that is necessary in any movement that looks towards a lasting reconciliation between these different schools of thought. This is especially necessary at the present time as it relates to Lexington and Chicago. Both sides must see the great service that each is performing in the conservation and growth of truth.

A School of Mediation.

Our next task is to point out the medium, agency, through which the desired unity and oneness may be secured. There must be some agency or factor that can secure this appreciation. In order to secure this appreciation of Lexington and Chicago there must come into existence a Mediating School of Thought. For such an alignment there is abundance of material. At the present time they are either lined up with Lexington, the ultra school of dogmatism, or with Chicago, the ultra school of criticism. There is need of a new formation. This new formation should constitute a mediating school of thought between the extremes, Lexington and Chicago. It is the writer's conviction that there are many men in our brotherhood that do not care to be classified with either Lexington or Chicago. These men feel that they belong in a place midway between these two extremes. These men desire to hold on to all that is true in the old, but they are not in sympathy with all for which Lexington stands. These same men are determined to maintain an open mindedness towards all that is new. They appreciate every contribution that the Chicago school of criticism may have to make. But they are sensitive in some matters. They refuse to go as far as some of the men of the Chicago school go. They can not agree with all that is said and done by some of the leaders. With such a condition confronting us the only course open to us is to conform ourselves into a mediating school of thought. Such a school of thought would serve as a strong link between the two extremes. Such a school would be dogmatic in the pulpit, and critical in the study. Its members would continue in sympathetic touch with Lexington, and Chicago also. They would champion neither the side of Lexington nor that of Chicago. This mediating school would take what is good from both, leaving the extreme fruits of both to perish. It would exercise tolerance and forebearance towards both extremes. It would meet both extremes in the Christ spirit, exercising Christian charity where it could not agree with the extreme positions held by either party. The existence of such a mediating school would at once exercise a modifying influence on both Lexington and Chicago. It would have a wholesome tendency in curbing extreme statements. This mediating school not being involved in the discussions between the extremes, Lexington and Chicago, would be free to work for the peace and prosperity of Zion with all of its strength. We could all become so engrossed with the great practical affairs of the kingdom that theological differences would fade out of our consciousness. Love and service would melt all of our differences out of existence.

The path to inner unity in our brotherhood lies through appreciation and mediation. We must discover and learn to appreciate the truth that is in the keeping of all the different schools of thought, and the service that each is rendering to the whole of truth. Then those of us that can not go to the full length to which either of the extremes go, should form ourselves into a mediating school of thought, whose chief mission is to be to labor for the inner unity of our brotherhood. The writer has unlimited faith that we can all be brought nearer together, if we earnestly and prayerfully set ourselves to the task. The men who are antipodes on the questions that divide Lexington and Chicago, are all noble and God-fearing men. This the writer knows by actual experience. For four years he was a student under that prince of Bible teachers, Bro. D. R. Dungan. From him he imbibed a love for authoritative, dogmatic statement, that comes to the surface every time a sermon is preached. It was also the writer's privilege to be a student for four years under that most manly of men, the cultured and scholarly Dr. Willett. During those four years there was inculcated into the mind of the writer a goodly measure of the teacher's spirit. This spirit has meant for him a certain open mindedness towards all that is new. The spirit of the one causes me to cling to the old landmarks, while the spirit of the other compels me to scan God's later days for the newer truth. When the spirits of these two men, one an ultra conservative, the other an ultra liberal, move in my soul, I dismiss neither. And while the influence of the one may modify the influence of the other, I accept the results with the prayer, "Lord help me to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and while I contend, do thou lead me into all truth, Thou God of all truth."

With an earnest hope and a sincere prayer that what has here been written may be conducive to a larger spirit of unity and oneness in our ranks, the writer closes this article in the faith that the day will come when we all shall be one even as Christ prayed that it might be. May it come quickly.

Vincennes, Indiana.

As Others See Us.

The following, under the title, "A Program for Unity That Doesn't Work," was printed editorially in the "Interior" (Presbyterian) last week. See our comment on editorial page, under heading, "Yet Another Centennial Aim."—EDITORS.

A Disciple clergyman in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY reads his fellow-churchmen a severe lecture on their present dissensions. He tells them bluntly that their conventional talk about a "plea" for Christian union becomes absurd when they can't keep united themselves. The simple fact is that the Disciple people are now discovering for themselves in their own family experience the inherent fallacy that has always slumbered in Alexander Campbell's idea of the union of churches. The Campbellite recipe for union runs thus: "Let everybody come and believe what I believe, and then we shall get on beautifully together." But that is a perfectly futile formula, for the inevitable reason that all people can't believe the same thing. Saying "Let's agree on the simple statements of the Bible" makes the proposition specious enough to conceal its impossibility for a good many years together, but in the end the fatuity of it comes out in spite of everything. Even people who start together on that program can't keep together; they begin with one set of doctrines and end with a dozen. The Scriptures don't change, but their interpretations diverge. And when they find themselves disagreeing, they feel in duty bound, out of respect for their original principle of unity, to set up a quarrel, since the logical converse of "agree and unite" is "disagree and—fight." That isn't at all the correct way to get at the unity of Christians; the Bible is not itself constructed for any such method. It is a great complex and manifold book, out of which, as all religious history shows, various men will draw very various ideas. And this is no reflection on the Bible; it is simply God's all-wise way of adapting his book to "many men of many minds." And his people don't get any closer together when they insist on a uniform exegesis of the Scriptures as a condition precedent to their mutual fellowship. The true condition precedent is a liberal allowance for intellectual differences among people whose moral purposes are the same. Just how large that allowance can be made without engendering a "don't care" attitude toward truth, is a practical question that the years must settle. But undoubtedly the sphere of that allowance is larger than the majority of Christians have thus far realized—a mighty deal larger certainly than Alexander Campbell considered it.

The Workingman's Soul.

By Arthur Holmes.

This article is the first of a set of five dealing with MEN AND THE CHURCH. Mr. Holmes is Director of Educational and Religious Work in the Pennsylvania Railroad Department of the Y. M. C. A. It will be remembered that he presented a most suggestive paper at the Bloomington Congress on "Men's Work in the Church."—THE EDITORS.

The political history of the world may be viewed as the advance of the slave to the rights of the citizen; the economic history, as the advance of the toiler toward a just share in the goods he produces. This slow progress has been made through the rule of the autocrat, through the domination of the aristocracy, through the control of the middle classes, and now at last the wage-earner rises with his demand for dominance in the social scheme. He is the center of interest today. The next readjustment of social forces is sure to feel the push of his sturdy shoulder. It is well, therefore, for the church to study him.

No breath should be wasted in blaming him. What he is, he is by the grace of the past and the environment of the present. To all appearances he is here to stay, and apparently has as much right to his idiosyncracies as any other element of society.

Possibly the first impulse of the tyro is to take sides with the workingman in his labor disputes. Such a proceeding on the part of the church would be both useless and foolish. True, the labor problem bulks very large in the workingman's thinking. No other interest finds such a ready response. Whatever aid the church may give by education and sympathetic advice toward the solution of this problem is in place, but as an organization the church can no more endorse labor unions than it can socialism or single tax. Unions are but expedients—temporary, it is to be hoped—for reaching an end. Their logical conclusion is their own destruction. The church is eternal, grounded upon human nature, with a work never to be finished. Its plea is to all men and its interest confined only by the common interests of all its coonstituency. Any official endorsement of the interests of one group as opposed to any other group would lead to suicide. The right point of attack upon the problem of serving the workingman is a study of the inner life of the toiler.

His ignorance, crudeness, prejudice, emotionalism are all striking enough to engage the whole attention of his would-be helpers. His unexpected out-croppings of pride and stubbornness often dishearten their efforts. What they deem good for him he passes by; what he longs for they do not give.

The key to the workingman's character is his egoism. Like every other man he wants to be an individual. Centuries-long repression of this instinct in his forefathers and life-long thwarting of it in his own case have warped this legitimate feeling into a distorted passion.

His daily life demands constant self-suppression. At work he is merely a number, an economic means to an end. Before the law he is an insignificant atom compared with a mighty corporation. Socially he is a non-entity. No society column heralds his goings or comings, nor marks his birth, marriage or death. Public officials, common carriers and employers, all alike offer him slights, ignorings, brow-beatings and petty persecutions.

In his helplessness his pride in self becomes vanity. It breeds suspicion. It resents paternalism in any form. It demands to be counted as good as any man. It makes him wary of any plausible plans for his welfare, so often mere veneered plans for his exploitation. It makes him suspicious of churches, prodigal of a free Gospel but careful to pass a collection plate.

Closely allied with his desire for individuality is his ambition. To him a livelihood is his birthright; a fortune is an American prerogative. He soon recovers from his delusion. He learns that 1 per cent of the people own 54.8 per cent of the wealth and that 88 per cent of the people are fore-ordained to poverty. His dreams of riches fall to ashes like autumn leaves in a forest fire.

Nor is this all. From the ashes of his dreams he rises to face the further terrible truth that 4,000,000 people of his country are always dependent upon charity and that his own family can never hope to be more than three weeks from destitution. If he can work regularly, work for years, and work well, he may hope to escape the poor-house until he is old.

But facts again rudely shatter this hope. Bitter experience shows that in the best times only 50.19 per cent of the workers are constantly employed and that periodic depressions reduce this number to almost nothing. No man can escape a lay-off. Sickness he may avoid; taxes he may dodge; death even may be put off; but hard times come inevitably. Skill, sobriety, diligence, faithfulness—all are cast into the scale and weigh as nothing to the exigencies of that pitiless economic machine which grinds to pieces the men who have nothing to do with its making.

Out of such conditions comes the most constant feeling of the workingman's soul—the feeling of injustice and oppression. It forms the basis of socialistic and communistic appeals. It flares out in destruction and murder in riotous strikes. It bursts the bounds of sanity in anarchy and assassination. It strikes blindly and unreasonably at any institution which savors of supporting the system of such oppression.

Again let it be reiterated that the workingman should not be blamed for such a condition of mind. Blame will not win him. Neither will it do aught to change the conditions of which he complains. A sympathetic understanding of his grievances is necessary; a patient dealing with all the elements of the problem, the same amount of time spent in thought on these questions as is put upon finances or academic discussions.

The Man in the Boy.

In the acorn is wrapped the forest,
In the little brook, the sea;
The twig that will sway with the sparrow today
Is tomorrow's sturdy tree.
There is hope in a mother's joy,
Like a peach in its blossom furled,
And a noble boy, a gentle boy,
A manly boy, is king of the world.

The power that will never fail us
Is the soul of simple truth;
The oak that defies the stormiest skies
Was upright in its youth;
The beauty no time can destroy
In the pure young heart is furled;
And a worthy boy, a tender boy,
A faithful boy, is king of the world.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates.

SOME UTTERANCES FROM THE BAPTIST CONGRESS OF 1907

The Baptist Congress, which met at Baltimore in November, 1907, provided, in three sessions of its proceedings, for the discussion of the question, "What Are the Next Steps to Effect Organic Union Between Baptists, Free Baptists, and Disciples of Christ?" Representatives of the three bodies were invited to discuss the question from their respective points of view. The following are some of the most striking and positive declarations in favor of union:

Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, (Disciple) said: "I cannot get away from it but it seems to be positively wrong that there should be a division between the Baptists and the Disciples or between the Baptists and Disciples and Free Baptists. Jesus has prayed that we might be one. It is not a question of surrendering our convictions. If there is anything that these bodies, brethren, will ask me to give up, I am perfectly willing to give it up, unless it is specified as essential upon the pages of the written book. The question of our communion is really not a difference between us. If my Baptist brethren want it once a month and I want it every Lord's Day, to me it appears it would be a greater heresy for me to divide from my Baptist brethren than to yield to them. I cannot see but that the prayer of Jesus is the mightiest issue today among us believers, that we "all may be one as Thou, Father, art in me and I in you that we all may be one in him," in order that the world "might believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God."

Dr. Goodchild, of New York, (Baptist) said: "Most of the things tnat keep the denominations apart today are inconsequential. Many of the ideas which were maintained by the shedding of blood a few centuries ago have proved themselves untrue, and some which are still accepted as true are seen to be not worth fighting about. The bitterest bigotry has been shown over the least valuable ideas. We recognize this today. And yet the divisions caused by them are still unhealed. Some of the divisions, it is true, have a basis in intelligent conviction. But for the most part our churches are separated from one another by old traditions, by personal pride, and party prejudice. I hope I am one who feels the importance of the testimony of Alexander Campbell and Barton Stone and their followers when nearly a hundred years ago they protested against the strifes and discords of the denominations, and withdrew to found an organization that should revive New Testament simplicity. Not all the denominations, it is true, had their origin in such crises as these I have mentioned. Some denominations have been founded, and more have been pertpetuated by little men who were wise only in their own conceits, who magnified microscopic differences until they seemed of vital importance.

"I should not wish to intimate either that denominationalism has done no good. Neglected aspects of truth have been brought out by it and emphasized until they were granted their right place in the scheme of Christian belief. But I believe sincerely that most of the denominations have so delivered their distinctive message that it has been accepted by other Christian bodies, and so the reason for their separate existence has passed away. Now the time has come for division to fade into unity. Surely no one can find any delight in the mere fact of denominational division. A sect can hardly satisfy our ideal of what the church ought to be. We can but hope that Philip Schaff's words may prove true. He said: 'The Reformation of the 16th century ended in division: the Reformation of the 20th century will end in reunion.' God grant that it may! The mediæval church secured unity by the sacrifice of liberty. Our fathers secured liberty by the sacrifice of unity. It is ours to achieve the harder task of establishing unity with liberty, and showing that they ought to be one and inseparable.

"In the foreign field, where our differences are less understood, the disadvantages of denominationalism are even greater than at home. It is difficult to say to what extent our divisions hinder the progress of the gospel. We are told that twenty different churches are contending with each other as they seek the salvation of the Hindus. We are told that the Japanese, seeing the headquarters of fifteen different Protestant sects in the square in Tokio, wrote to America: 'Do not send us any more kinds of religion.' I have read that when Max Muller asked the head of the Brahmo Somaj to become a Christian, the astute Oriental motioned toward the six different denominational mission houses on the same street, and said, 'Into which of your religions am I to be baptized? I cannot become simply a Christian.' It ought to be possible for people at home and abroad to become simply Christians. The divisions of Christendom are a bewilderment to the world, a shame to us, and an unspeakable hindrance to our work. A divided church never can win the world for Christ. Every pastor ought to impress that truth on his people. If the million and a quarter of Disciples, the eighty thousand Free Baptists, and the great host of Baptists should come together in an enthusiastic union, the thrill of it would be felt around the world. A few who still cherish an exclusive spirit might not like it, but as George Eliot makes Adam Bede say: 'It's the right thing to be done, and what's liking got to do with it?' Each of the denominations has a history of which we are proud, but the history would not be lost in the merger, and with united forces we should make history in the days ahead of which we could be prouder still. It will involve sacrifices on the part of each denomination, but the consciousness that we are answering the Saviour's prayer will make the sacrifice worth while. There will be no sacrifices of personal liberty in such a union as is contemplated. There will be no effort to compel any sort of uniformity. Insistence on conformity has always been the father of non-conformity. Religious tyranny is the fruitful mother of sects. We should demonstrate in our union that liberty promotes unity.

"The basis of our union could not be creedal. Renan sagaciously said 'Jesus taught nothing but Himself.' It is strange that a French infidel should discern what many a Christian teacher has overlooked. But we are coming to see it. Principal Fairbairn has told us that 'the most distinctive element in modern theology is what we may call a new feeling for Christ.' The Lord Jesus alone must be the object of our united allegiance. His New Testament would be our sole statement of faith. There is no better rule than Alexander Campbell gave when he said 'Where the Bible speaks we will speak, and where the Bible is silent we will be silent.' With the simple organization of the New Testament Church, and the simple faith of the New Testament Christians, our united hosts of six million people would have some of the glory of that Church that is declared to be fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

President Horr, of Newton Theological Seminary, (Baptist) said: "We do not forget that the union contemplated will involve sacrifices. It may make it necessary for us all to sacrifice our denominational names. Perhaps that will not be a grievous loss. Did you ever think how absurd it is that the names of the Evangelical denominations are almost without exception names given to them by their enemies, names that they did not choose and names that at first they repudiated? You look on the old map of Boston and you will find the location of the First Baptist Church signalized in this way, the Anabaptist church in Boston. It was not until 1770, that a Baptist church in Massachusetts was legally recognized by any other title, and when the General Courts changed the title, they changed it fron Anabaptist to Anti-pædo Baptist. Probably the name Baptist is only a little more than a century old, except in Philadelphia. It might be a good thing for us to change the name our opponents have fastened upon us. Certainly it makes that characteristic which is not at all so. An Immersionist is not, therefore, a Baptist."

Prof. Anthony, of Lewistown, Maine, (Free Baptist) said: "May I venture another suggestion? We must exercise patience, we cannot accelerate a movement of so great import. It would be a crying shame if we Baptists, by any overzeal of haste, should gather together the choicest men out of the three bodies and make one new body and leave behind our weakened brethren, who, by the departure of the choicest men, would be by so much the weaker; and if we, by attempting to unite the three bodies, really compose four bodies, where would a united Christendom be? We Free Baptists cannot afford to move faster than the slowest man in the ranks, and we are moving rapidly for the Kingdom of Christ only as we keep our ranks entire and let the vanguard go only so fast as the rear can be brought up. Otherwise, in seeking union, we are creating division, and division at home; and we must have none of it in our midst. And so our speed must be regulated, not by those of the clearest vision and of the farthest vision into the future, but by those who come more slowly, with greater hesitancy, who understand least and need most a supervising care. It is therefore a question for calm and patient deliberation."

The addresses given on this occasion were published in full in a separate pamphlet of eighty pages, and may be had, free of charge, by ministers, by sending a request on postal card to Errett Gates, 5464 Jefferson Ave., Chicago, Ill. If more than one is asked for they may be had at ten cents a copy. They are just the tracts you need if you desire to promote closer fellowship or union between Baptists and Disciples.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett.

"Please inform me where I can find a chronological arrangement of the Old Testament as it is believed the different books took form. I have found fragmentary arrangements, but nothing which tells which is the oldest and which is the youngest document."

P. C. S.

Perhaps the best single volume on the subject is Sander's and Fowler's "Outlines of Biblical History and Literature" (Scribner, $1.25). This surveys the entire field of Old and New Testaments, and in addition presents an admirable bibliography on the entire subject. The Biblical Introductions of McFayden and Bennett and Adeney discuss the dates of the different Bible books, though the arrangement is that of the common order in the Bible. The series of bookss called "Messages of the Bible," edited by Sanders and Kent (Scribner, $1.25 each), presents the material of each division of the Bible in chronological order, with brief introductions. A strictly chronological arrangement of the literature of the Bible has scarcely been possible until the present time. The traditional dates of the different books have been to a considerable extent displaced by a more satisfactory arrangement, in accordance with the data afforded by the books themselves. The controversies occasioned by critical inquiries have given us a far more convincing plan of the Old Testament writings, and while there still remain details of the method to be adjusted, in the main the results of the historical examination of the books are the basis of all modern study. It is but a question of time when there will be available a Bible arranged in chronological order, on the principle partly illustrated in the Twentieth Century New Testament. This will not supercede the present form of the Scriptures in popular use, but it will prove of the greatest value to the student and Bible teacher.

"On what principle is the Book of Revelation to be interpreted? I have always understood that it was predictive in character, and a revelation of the events of the future till the coming of Christ. But I have recently seen the statement that it is not rightly interpreted in this way. Can you help me? What are some good books on Revelation?"

McB. H. A.

The Book of Revelation is, as it declares itself in its opening words, a "revelation of Jesus Christ." It is concerned to declare his true nature as the conquering king, in a time when the church was suffering from the fiery persecutions of the Roman empire. It was a trumpet-call to the Christians to hold fast their faith in face of the troubles with which they were environed. It belongs to the class of writings called "apocalypses," or "revelations," i. e., disclosures of hidden things. This type of literature was very common in Jewish circles from the time of the Book of Daniel (164 B. C.), to the close of the Jewish state (70 A. D.). It abounds in impressive imagery, to which the writers of this order of writings resort in place of open declarations of impending judgment on the enemies of the faith, which might be construed as treasonable utterances and thus bring on severer calamities. The concern of Revelation is not with the distant future, but with the present and the events just ahead. The seer is oidden to "write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which are about to be." It is the announcement of the overthrow of the hated world-power of Rome and the triumph of the Kingdom of Christ, with the consequent realization of the new social order, the New Jerusalem, which is not heaven, but the coming of the ideals of Christ's rule to expression in human society. Such a coming of the Son of Man in the power of his kingdom was not an outward and spectacular thing, but its arrival was to be known by the coming of great catastrophies, such as the persecution of the saints and the fall of the Holy City. In short, the Revelation is a commentary, to the initiated of the Christian community, upon the Saviour's apocalyptic discourse in Matthew 24. Among the best books upon the subject are the pertinent parts of Farrar's "Early Days of Christianity," Porter's "Messages of the Apocalyptists," and Terry's "Biblical Apocalyptics." Milligan's "Revelation" in the Expositor's Bible has value. See also the articles by Charles on "Apocalyptics" and "Apocalypses" in Hasting's Bible Dictionary and the Encyclopedia Biblica.

"Do I imperil my eternal salvation because (using the reason that God gave me) I cannot help seeing inconsistencies in (1) the petition, "Lead us not into temptation," or (2) the saying attributed to God, "I create evil," (Isa. 45:7), and cannot believe (3) that he violated his own law in causing the sun and moon to stand still at Joshua's command, or (4) that he inspired the 37th chapter of Isaiah, or (5) in the matter of the immaculate conception?"

St. Louis, Mo. R. M. H.

This is a single paragraph taken from a letter chiefly concerned with the petition quoted from the Lord's Prayer. (1) The trouble with the questioner is his use of the literal method of interpretation, which has wrought such havoc in Bible study. The request of the prayer is made clear by the words that follow, "But deliver us from the evil." In accordance with the familiar law of Hebrew parallelism it is evident that the two expressions are meant to be identical in significance. No implication of God in evil is therefore possible. "God is not tempted of evil, neither tempteth he any man" (Jas. 1:13). (2) The Hebrews of the Old Testament time thought of God without any aid of the modern doctrine of second causes, and thus attributed to him all the events of life. The "evil" of the text is not moral evil, but physical calamities such as baffled the souls of the righteous. The prophets affirmed that God for the purposes of his divine government brought affliction upon men. In this sense he "created evil." (3) There is no need to interpret the account of the command of Joshua, quoted from the poetical Book of Jasher by the author of Joshua 10, as an actual event of the Battle of Beth-horon. It is a part of the poetical description, and is in this regard like many highly figurative passages in the Old Testament (cf. Hab. 3:11; Ps. 114:4; Jud. 5:20; Ps. 18:7-14, etc.) (4) There seems to be no difficulty in the passage that the questioner cites from Isaiah. Is it that he finds no need of inspiration in a simple historical narrative? Or has he referred to the wrong section of the book? If the former is the case, it must be remembered that inspiration is not some magical power creating a sublime and superhuman document, but rather the quality which resides in the soul of the prophet, making clear to him the divine purpose, and urging him forward in its accomplishment. Such a chapter might therefore be as appropriate in the work of an inspired man as one of the prophet's sermons on national sin, or an apostolic appeal to Christian living. (5) Does the questioner mean the immaculate conception, or the virgin birth? The former is the Roman Catholic dogma of the sinless conception and birth, of Mary, that she might be fitted to become the mother of our Lord. The virgin birth of Jesus is probably meant. No man is condemned for inability to believe that for which there is not convincing evidence. Here the experience of Christians has been varied. Some find difficulties in the virgin birth to whom all other facts of the life of Jesus are credible. It is perhaps sufficient to say that it does not occupy a place of any such importance in the Christian confession as the great redemptive facts of Christ's life. As Dr. Orr observes, "One is struck by observing how in approved text-books on the 'Evidences' attention is concentrated on the Resurrection, but little or nothing is said of the virgin birth." ("The Virgin Birth of Christ," p. 4.).

An uptown book-store in New York City is credited with this advertising couplet, put over a part of its book display:

For Satan trembles when he sees
Bibles sold as cheap as these.

The article by Dr. H. T. Morrison, of Springfield, Illinois, on the Tuberculosis congress was written in the midst of the services at Washington. So vital is such a movement to human welfare that it becomes almost if not quite an act of religion to participate in it. We felicitate ourselves on being able to present so adequate a statement to our readers.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE.

The Correspondent: "I understand you are a member of The Campbell Institute, a secret society professedly Christian, but in reality infidel. Its atheism propagated under cover has already done much harm. If you are manly, why don't you either renounce Christianity or the Campbell Institute? I speak the thought and the purturbed feelings of many lovers of the faith onee delivered."

This is a frank question. My answer ought to be equally frank.

As long as there is outspokenedness there is health. The honest and important thing is not so much to speak the truth as to speak what is in one's heart. The honest talker will reach the truth. There is spiritual exhileration in frank, even heated controversy. It is the man that shows me that I fear. My true friend when he differs will oppose me. The false friend will seek a common topic of conversation such as the weather. The chief spiritual danger that threatens our brotherhood today is not controversy or even rashness of utterance, it is rather guilty silences, Whenever religious men try to time their utterances to timid policies we shall find that a period of decay has already set in.

I am not advocating unnecessary bluntness. The man that always speaks his full mind is a bore and an insulter. But I do say, let us have rudeness in preference to subtility. The one is fair in its methods; the other is totally and always murderous. There should be accommodation; but there should not be stealthy and guilty accommodation. The poor in spirit know the difference. The outspoken heresy can be dealt with; but the heresy shut in the heart will prove the poison of death. Truth concealed turns into falsehood. The heresy preached is not the danger of the present; but the heresy unpreached. The study of the average minister is a front place. All the sages talk to him and he talks back without passion. All are in his communion. Between the study and the pulpit some jeopardize their souls by becoming metamorphosed into bigoted sectarians. The study and the pulpit must not be sundered too far.

The Campbell Institute a Secret Society.

I abhor secrecy in religion that looks toward self-advancement or of taking advantage of others. Such secrecy is unchristian and unmanly. The only permissible secrecy in religion is that of the closet, and that of not letting one hand know the good deeds of the other. To be suspected is to be made sorrowful. With another I might say: "I have lived in vain if such charges have cost a single friend." But they have cost me more than one. I have paid a heavy price; for friendship is most valuable and precious. "What shall a man be proud of if not of his friends?" Who of the Campbell Institute has profited by its secrecy? Some have stayed for years at their posts at great sacrifice. If today it becomes a society to boost one another it would be without a member tomorrow. The innate decency of every man would eschew such baseness of motives. If the Institute were to spend its sessions in planning and plotting to curtail the influence of others every man would forsake it. It is to be hoped its members have not thought long about Christian ethics to no avail.

I have been a member of the Campbell Institute from the beginning, although not one of its organizing spirits. I think I know of its good purpose and its fairmindedness. It is an academic society. It is an organized effort to prod its members to keep at their studies. It was started by students and has continued in the atmosphere of research. It is no more secret than Drake University is secret or the Illinois Christian Missionary Society. I am not writing with the constitution before me. I think I never read it. It was written by a member who loves to engage in such harmless pasttimes. But I am writing about The Campbell Institute as it is. If its members are arrogant, they are the losers. If they have the spirit of exclusiveness, they lack the spirit of Christ. If they assume the attitude of superior intelligence, they have broken with the true spirit of scholarship, humility. Its membership is composed of a hundred or so average men. A few might be considered well up in their chosen fields; but the most are common plodders in God's big world.

Is it Infidel?

Without assuming to speak for others, I shall make some confident assertions. Every member is a believer in Christ. Every one looks upon Him as the Son of God and Saviour of men. Every one believes this world is at heart spiritual. Every one is giving his life to enthrone Christ in the hearts of men. Through hardship and suffering many are keeping at their tasks because of the love of God that has been shed abroad in their hearts.

You might as well charge a mother with hatred of her child after she had given every moment of her life for its upbringing. If she were so charged she would likely recall all the years of night-watching and day-toiling she had lovingly and enthusiastically given for her child, and then feeling the gross injustice of the charge, she would burst into tears. Ah! are there more bitter tears? Yet they have a sweet reward. Christ experienced such sweet-bitter tears. Many of his disciples have had fellowship with him in these.

To accuse the members of the Campbell Institute as being infidels is to accuse the missionaries who gave up their lives in the service of the Gospel as having disbelieved in the Christ of that Gospel; and to accuse the soldiers who bled and died for their country as being traitors.

The Misunderstanding.

That there is misunderstsanding I am well aware. That the Institute is looked upon with suspicion and alarm by many good and sincere brethren is true. Wherein lies the cause and wherein the remedy? The misunderstanding has arisen from two sources, viz.: from some immature or perhaps partial utterances of the Campbell Institute, and from the overlooking of faith on the part of some of the brethren usually called conservative.

There are radicals and conservatives in the Campbell Institute. The radicals, who are the minority, can be easily misunderstood. In fact, they often fail to understand themselves. I think I know them. There are no more exuberantly human men among us. They have high glee in their religion. They joke about the transcendent things. To understand their theology one must understand their temper, yes, their jokes. Sometimes their jokes are taken seriously—then there is misunderstanding and trouble. These radicals have their surface theology and also their heart or deeper religion. If the public knows the first and not the second, there will be misunderstanding. The surface theologian explains religion as a development out of the dirt of the earth; but the real religious man knows it as God-given. The surface psychologist says love is simply animal passion; but the real home-loving man says love is Divine. The most radical surface man has a deeper life from which beautiful and helpful prayers ascend. The surface psychologist has loved, has known the joy and the hurt of love, and therefore knows it is God-given. The radicals are still young men, but they are growing older. The complexities of life are already weaving their entanglements about them. They have been analyzing. But they are beginning to look up and pray. Their problems are the common ones that are found both within and without academic walls—the problems that subdue and soften.

The misunderstanding is also caused in part by the overloading of faith. Faith was overloaded when it was demanded that Christians should believe the world was flat, that God would damn unbaptized infants, that men were predestined to be lost, no matter how good they should live, that the Sacramental bread and wine were the literal flesh and literal blood of Christ, and that God upheld the selling for indulgencies in sin.

They are not the wise friends of simple Christianity who demand a large system of belief. The creeds have burdened faith with too much. The glory of our position is its Apostolic Confession, so complete, yet so pivotal. Some have demanded much beside. Taking the traditional interpretations of some texts they have concluded in their obligatory system the adoptioin of their views of inspiration, the common definite interpretations of books long under controversy, etc.

Now many of the members of the Campbell Institute, standing as all should for independence of investigation and conclusion, cannot include in their system of belief some of these things. They are therefore labelled by these brethren infidels. I hold it is enough to believe in Christ and to be loyal to him. And I think we are not helping faith when we so burden it with a system that the reason of many earnest self-sacrificing Christians cannot accept the system. Luther rejected the epistles of James and other books, but no one thinks he was an infidel. James, to us, is most valuable. I wonder how Luther could have rejected it. Yet he did, and at the same time believed in Christ, and gave his life for Him. If we make up our minds to demand loyalty, but at the same time to grant freedom, there will be little incrimination in the future.

What Shall Be Done?

The Campbell Institute is nothing to die for. It is only an organization of a few men. It was made to serve, to help on the kingdom. Two men connected with a college resigned recently because they thought it hampered their work. They are not to be censured. Their work was of first importance. If the Institute hinders instead of helps, it has missed its purpose. No member should be more loyal to the Institute than to the general interests of the church.

I have thought for several years that time would right the misconceptions; but during the past year some serious happenings have aggravated the situation. However, I still believe in Father Time as a healer of wounds, and as a clarifier of every bedarkened condition. In the meantime I believe there should be frankness of discussion, so that there may be no misunderstanding.

Perhaps the Campbell Institute might evolve into something like a general ministerial association, not unlike the Congress. Perhaps it might die. If so, without any disregard to the institute, we might say "nothing has passed." The members still live. It is the Christianity of their hearts, and brains, and hands, that is worth while. Each must give an account of himself. Life is serious. The Christ awaits for larger enthronement.

I commend G. K. Chesterton's "Varied Types" published by Dodd, Mead & Co.

Let our sentence for the week be from him: "But there is a huge and bottomless evil compared with which all these (anarchy, pestilence, starvation) are fleabites, the most desolate curse that can fall upon men or nations, and it has no name unless we call it satisfaction."

Austin Station, Chicago. George A. Campbell.

A Triangular Congress.

By Rev. George B. Van Arsdale.

Three great religious bodies will meet soon in fraternal conference to discuss some of the problems of the age. Foremost among these problems to be discussed is the question of Christian union. Such an announcement is sufficient within itself to create interest among all Disciples. I refer to the joint congress to be held in the Hyde Park Baptist Church 56th St. and Lexington Ave., Chicago, Nov. 10, 11 and 12 of the present year. This is to be a congress of Bautists, Free Baptists and Disciples. Before entering upon a statement of the character and purpose of this meeting a bit of history may be in point. The latter part of last winter some of the leading ministers of the Baptist church in New York City discussed with some of our ministers of that city, the subject of a joint congress between the Baptists and Disciples. I have not all the facts of this preliminary conference, though they would be interesting as matters of history. It seems that this preliminary conference was the initial movement of the forthcoming meeting of which I am about to write. The writer5s relation to the matter merely grew out of the fact that he was elected secretary of the congress of the Disciples at Bloomington last spring. Brother J. P. Lichtenberger, of New York City, gave my name to the secretary of the Baptist congress, and asked him to write me relative to the arrangements. The Baptists have had an annual congress for the past twenty-five years, which meets in November. Dr. Theo. A. K. Gessler, of Landing, N. J., the secretary of the Baptist congress, wrote and asked me to take up the matter of holding such a joint meeting with the executive committee of our congress. I found every member of the committee enthusiastic and in favor of the matter. After lengthy correspondence and one meeting of our committee, the details of the program and speakers were arranged. The program speaks for itself, and will be found in this issue of this paper. It is the custom of the Baptists to hold their congress in the East, and in the fall of the year. The congress of the Disciples have been held in the Middle West, and in the spring. These facts necessitated some compromise in the matter, the Baptists yielding to the Disciples in the matter of place, and the Disciples yielding to the Baptists in question of time, though the arrangement called for a second congress of the Disciples within the year 1908. The committee, however, felt that the interests were of such vital importance that such a matter of mere detail should not be allowed to stand in the way.

As will be seen from the program, each of these three religious bodies has a representative in the discussion of every topic. The purpose of the meeting is identical with that of similar congresses among the Disciples and Baptists, save that in this instance the discussion has a larger range, taking in representatives of the three religious bodies. The meeting will have no legislative function, but will simply serve the purpose of a free discussion of the topics under consideration. It will be akin to the conference of Southern Baptists and Disciples held in Baltimore some months ago. It is reasonable to expect that these three days of discussion will mark an epoch in the movement of sentiment favorable to a closer union of these three religious bodies. Such a meeting will serve to help each of us to see the other's point of view, which is indispensable to our helping each other and approaching grounds of agreement. We anticipate that the discussions will reveal a surprisingly large number of points of agreement. It goes without saying that one of the most delightful features of the occasion will be the forming of personal acquaintances between the ministers of these three churches. The spirit manifested by the Baptists through their secretary, Dr. Gessler, leads us to believe that the spirit prompting the movement on their part was none other than the desire of a closer touch with the Disciples and Free Baptists, and a fraternal discussion of our common problems. Personally, I cannot look upon the movement with any other than the warmest endorsement, and with a high expectancy as to the results, not that I entertain such a fancy as that union of these bodies will be immediately effected. It is, indeed, doubtful if such an event is desirable until there is a closer acquaintance and a better understanding of each other. These latter are, indeed, the most desirable results to be expected, and the only normal ones. It is not my purpose in this article to call attention, however, to the advantages of such a meeting, they are too apparent to need any argument. It is rather my purpose simply to announce and call attention to it. With the meeting only five weeks distant, the announcement is indeed somewhat late, but the plans were not begun until the middle of the summer, and there have been many interruptions. I am not fearful of the outcome of the meeting, but I am exceedingly anxious that every minister of the Disciple brotherhood, for whom it is at all possible, should attend this joint congress. The meetings should be thoroughly representative of all three of the religious bodies. I have the faith that in fifty years from now this meeting will be looked upon as one of the history making events in the progress of Christian union. I should like to suggest some very practical things in regard to the matter. First, would it not be desirable that Disciples ministers everywhere should call attention of Baptist and Free Baptist ministers to the meeting and freely discuss its advantages with them. This will help to create warm fraternal relations locally. Second, write an article for your local daily about the matter and insert the program. This will help to create sentiment. Third, the meeting coming so cose after our National Convention, many ministers may feel that they are not able to stand the expense. I am quite confident that there are a few churches in which the following suggestion would not be received favorably. I mean that ministers should make this joint congress a matter of comment in your services, enlighten your congregations about the movement, tell them of its advantages, and tell them that you believe that both you and they should know more about it, that it is of God, and then ask your congregation to make possible this larger knowledge of the subject by helping you bear the expense of a trip to Chicago. It is natural to expect that the Disciples of Christ, who are so soon to celebrate a hundred years of our movement for Christian union, will gladly welcome this opportunity for a fraternal discussion with the two great religious bodies with whom we have so many points of agreement. Let us have a thoroughly representative attendance. We anticipate that this joint congress will be more largely attended than has been any single congress in the history of our brotherhood.

The Cool, Cool Rain.

Oh, the cool, cool rain on the dusty street,
With scents of the valley and plain,
And the freshened breeze in the thankful trees,
Whose wet leaves laugh in the rain!
How the panting lilies lean their lips
And quench their thirst as it beats and drips!

Oh, the cool, cool rain as it rushes down
From the broken heart of the cloud!
How it bathes the roofs in the blazing town
To the peal of the thunder loud!
How its rapid rivulets leap and play
And cool the steps of the burning day!

Oh, the cool, cool rain, with its brightening drops,
On the hill and the fervid vale!
Its welcome falls on the thirsty crops,
Its balm to the breathing gale!
Rejoice, O city, and sing, O plain,
In the fall and the call of the cooling rain!

THE SON OF JONATHAN.*

In the growing prosperity of David's house and throne it was not strange that the family of Saul should be forgotten. The feeble and temporary effort to provide that house with a kingdom had signally failed. The expedient of making Ishbosheth king had only been undertaken at the end of five years from Saul's death; and the murder of the weak young king ended after two years this unsuccessful project on the part of the friends of Saul's dynasty. The growing popularity of David, who now became king of the united nation, overshadowed the name of Israel's first monarch, and all the people, save perhaps a very small remnant of the partisans of Saul, became loyal and enthusiastic subjects of the new king.

David's Policy.

Nevertheless it was an act of policy on David's part to appease even this small remnant of Saul's admirers. It was necessary either to destroy all members of the late king's family or to make them his friends. It is one of the dangers of a new dynasty that it must face the survivors of the last government. It has been too frequently the custom of newly rising kings to make their thrones secure by the murder of all who might rise to dispute with them the claim to sovereignty. This was the case several times during the continuance of the kingdom of Israel after the revolt of the ten tribes.

Saul's Servant.

But David was unwilling to be cruel where diplomacy was of equal value. There was no member of the house of Saul who could compare with him in ability as a leader. The partisans of the older dynasty were thus deprived of a standard-bearer around whom they could rally. David could afford to be generous. More than this, his love for Jonathan was a genuine sentiment which it was a pleasure to gratify by kindness to anyone who sprung from that stock. Upon inquiry he learned that a servant of Saul's house was in possession of the facts regarding his master's family. On consulting him he learned that there was a son of Jonathan living on the east of the Jordan in the town of Lodebar. It was a town still further east than Mananaim, where the brief reign of Ishbosheth had taken place. He was apparently residing with some friend of the house of Saul, a certain Machir, the son of Ammiel.

Ish-bosheth.

David summoned this man to his presence. He was not a strong character as his later history shows. He was physically deformed from an accident at the time of the overthrow of Saul's house, which had left him a cripple. His name indicates the free use of the term "Baal" in the household of Saul as a compound in proper names. For "bosheth" is the later prophetic rendering of "Baal." In early days it was not considered a matter of reproach that a child should be given the name of the Phoenician Sun-god. Indeed the term "Baal" was used both in this sense and as a title for Jehovah, the true "master" or "lord" of the land, as the word implied. Such compounds with "Baal" are therefore not infrequently found in the early period of Israel. But in the days when prophetic teaching had made the conscience of the nation sensitive regarding the use of the name of the god of the north, these names were all changed in the prophetic records, the word "bosheth" (shame) being substituted everywhere for Baal. Of course no Hebrew parent would ever have given his son such a name as "Ishbosheth" (man of shame) or "Mephibosheth" (warrior of shame). These names were originally Ish-Baal and Mephi-Baal (man of Baal, champion of Baal).

David's Promise.

When David met the son of Jonathan he must have seen little in the form and face of his new client to remind him of the strong and brilliant friend whom he had known in other days. But it was at least a satisfaction to fulfill the promise he had made to Jonathan that he would protect any of his children whom it should be his privilege to find. That promise made long ago had significance to the writer of the narrative as finding fulfillment in this act of kindness. Perhaps the weakness of Mephibosheth's character, which voiced itself in his own words of self deprecation, made the conduct of David all the more striking. It would be hard to imagine Jonathan, the valiant and highminded son of Saul, speaking of himself in such words of dispraise as those used by his son. But the king did not despise the weak man whom fortune had thus thrown into his charge; he received him with generous good will and restored to him the personal land—holdings of his grandfather. It is probable that the old home at Bibeah, north of Jerusalem, was the property referred to. This would make an ample provision for the future of the new household.

Rewards of Generosity.

The conduct of David in finding and caring for this son of Jonathan is an admirable illustration of the imperfect rewards of good behavior which most people are likely to receive. Of all things we like to believe that our generous actions will elicit from the people we befriend some true sentiment of appreciation. Yet these are the very ones who most frequently disappoint us. It was so with David and Mephibosheth. When Absalom raised the standard of revolt against his father, the son of Jonathan took sides with the young usurper. The servant, Ziba, remained faithful; but the master turned traitor. Yet David had the satisfaction of doing the kindly and generous thing even if with his shrewd knowledge of human nature he discerned the weak and vascillating character of the man.

The True Reward.

We gain the values of good conduct not from the rewards which it brings in return for good, but even more from the fact of the good done by us. Jesus said of the kindly man, "This man shall be blessed in the doing of good." The action not only brings its reward, but it is its reward. David had the satisfaction of having performed his own part in a most admirable and generous compact. No man could rob him of that consciousness. No man by ungenerous and faithless conduct should ever be able to make us regret that we at least have done the thing which ennobles human nature and makes men worthy of the relations which they sustain to God.

The Prayer Meeting

Silas Jones.

Bearing One Another's Burdens. Topic, Oct. 21, Gal. 6:2-5; Rom. 15:1-3; Phil. 2:1-4.

The Christian faith strengthens men to bear their own burdens. Each man must have insight and courage to meet his own responsibilities before he can be of service to others. Men are comforted by the words of one who has borne his misfortunes with fortitude.

Self-importance and officiousness may be mistaken for a disposition to render aid to others. There is in the average man a desire to be seen. Take away the prospect of public parades and the patriotism of some of our militia would be gone. We like to let the other man see that we know how things ought to be done and we feel all the more important if we can point out to him a few things he has not discovered.

Mutual Assistance.

The only man on earth, if such a man exists or ever did exist, who owes nothing to society, is the one whose worth is represented by the symbol of zero. Our lives have meaning because we have received from others. Our language came to us by inheritance. Our methods of thought were imposed upon us by the society into which we were born. Even our morals and religion have been brought to us by others. A failure to make some return for the benefits received betrays a low order of intelligence or the basest ingratitude. We enter the church to give and to receive. Paul did not intnd to teach, however, that we should bear the burdens of others merely in order that we might receive help in bearing our burdens. "Bear ye one another's burdens" means that we are to help the man who needs us without thought of what we shall get in return. "Give, and it shall be given unto you" applies to those who give out of the generosity of their hearts and not after calculating carefully the possible benefits that will come to them. The grudging giver is the only one of whom it is certain that he will not receive again what he gives; rather, he will receive in kind.

The Debt of the Strong.

How are the strong to meet their obligations to the weak? Certainly they cannot attain to the Christian standard of duty by stopping the work of the church in order to please some man who is living a century behind the times. Paul went on with his preaching in spitc of the offence it gave to some of his Jewish brethren. There are communities in which no adequate provision is made for the instruction of the children in the Bible, and the explanation offered it that a few good people object to the lesson help or to Sunday-school work in general. You never enlarge the vision of the church by doing nothing. The duty of the strong to the weak is to make the weak strong. The coddling process increases the weakness. A definite campaign of education is needed in every church. If there is lack of vision today, we must plan for the next twenty-five years. Neither scolding nor inactivity will avail to strengthen the weak. That is done by teaching and practicing the gospel of Christ.

Mutual Love.

The apostle could appeal to the Philippians to make full his joy, being confident that if they were truly Christian in feeling, his joy would be their joy. "Knowledge puffeth up, but love buildeth up." Knowledge is apt to give a sense of superiority and a feeling that we have a right to use the weak for personal advantage. It is otherwise with love. It delights in what it shares with others. The ignorance of another is love's call to acts of helpfulness. The great man among disciples is he who excels in love. He probably has little to say about loving the brethren, but when they need his kindly ministry he is always on hand. The great church increases the amount of sympathy in the world. Beautiful buildings, pipe organs, and respectable members profit a church nothing if it scatters discord among men.

The International Congress on Tuberculosis.

By H. T. Morrison, Jr., M. D.

Last week there assembled in Washington, D. C., an international congress of such importance and with such purpose as to illicit interest from people of every type and station. This assembly's object was to eliminate or suppress the scourge of tuberculosis. It was attended by between 4,000 and 5,000 members. In the large, scarcely completed, national museum, the sessions were held and exhibits displayed. For the week preceding and following the congress, exhibits were on hand for inspection by the public as well as members of the congress.

Exhibits of various kinds and from many nations, states and cities, and individuals showed what was being done in eradicating disease and served as an object lesson of those situations and conditions to be combatted in successfully promoting man's health. New York City furnished in its exhibit an exact model of one of its blocks of tenements, in which reside 2,781 people, with narrow streets, high buildings in close apposition, and a minimum of light and ventilation. Such a place is a breeder of disease and rightly the municipality has within the past few years decreed against such dwellings and demands adequate streets, courts and alleys so that sunshine and air find easy access to all parts of the apartment. Alongside of this model was another of similar size to show the same block transformed under the building laws of 1901. The depression of the imaginative who had fancied himself living in the old crowded apartment was relieved in coming to the new building, and he now felt he could cease holding his breath and breathe freely again. If it was a relief to the eye-witness, what must have been the joy of the dweller!

In other exhibits were model tents and other apparatus for outdoor living, model play grounds, private and public sanatariums, specimens and pictures of lungs and other organs infected with the disease, showing the various stages, and in fact everything in connection with the disease which could be objectified in chart, model or picture. The exhibits were so constructed as to be instructive to laymen as well as doctors, and were worthy of days of study. Thousands of people viewed these exhibits and attended the illustrated popular lectures who will never have erased from memory the instruction afforded and will be enabled to live with vastly greater intelligence in an environment not always conducive to health to say the least.

To the physician the lectures were of prime importance. Aside from seeing and hearing men of world renown, whose names were as familiar as their own, it was certain that everything of importance, both old and new, on the subject of tuberculosis would be heard from the platform. He was sure also that certain emphasis would be given resulting from clinical experience and laboratory experimcnt, which would be of immense value in dealing with the disease. He was not disappointed. From every side tuberculosis was discussed—the surgical, medical, in children, bacteriologic and pathologic, and from the social and economic side.

The program was complete and held in seven sections. Morning and afternoon sections were held with a popular lecture at night for five days. All papers were limited to fifteen minutes regardless of the man or the importance of his subject (There were no preachers on the program!).

Several papers were of course attended with more interest than the rest. Intcrest in the question of the relation of bovine and human tuberculosis was carried from a preceding international congress where Dr. Koch, of Germany, contended earnestly for the distinctness of the two and the impossibility of transmission of bovine disease to man. The great scientist was on hand to renew the contention and fight for the conclusions he had reached. Respected as he was, and listened to with the greatest consideration, it was evident from the start that the vast majority of investigators, indeed, practically the entire congress, was bound by the facts of patient, and almost unlimited research by the other great scientists to conclude against the great German. On the last day this was distinctly manifest in a resolution setting forth their belief in the possibility of transmission to man, and of course as a corollary to this, the necessity for careful scrutiny of meats and milk.

Another question which met with universal interest was that of the use of tuberculin (a filtrate of a solution of dead tubercle bacilli). This substance discovered also by Koch nearly a dozen years ago, was thought for some time to give promise of being a specific for the cure of tuberculosis. Instead, its use was soon given up, and only within the last year or two has it been brought to light again. It is no longer held to be a specific for the disease, but is agreed to act beneficially in the treatment of certain cases of the malady. Its main importance now is due to definite reactions which it causes on tubercular patients which gives it extreme value as an aid to diagnosis. Anything or any method which makes possible an early discovery of this disease is of very great importance, due to the fact of the curability of a large per cent of incipient cases. Tuberculin has therefore been tested in many ways to discover its efficiency. Three methods of using for diagnosis were advocated in the congress. The one most favorably regarded was that introduced by Von Pirquet, an Austrian, about one year ago. The originator was present and was always encircled by a company of eager listeners and learners. His method is similar to that of vaccination, and is of value mostly, as its introducer claims, in children. The reaction which occurs shows a tubercular patient while a failure to react indicates freedom from the disease.

Another method introduced by Calmette, a Frenchman, within the past few months, was favored and presented by its discoverer. This method was known as the "Ophthaline Reaction," signifying a slight temporary inflamation resulting from a drop of a very weak tuberculin in the eye. While perhaps as accurate a test as that of the Von Pirquet method, some time will be required to show it quite as satisfactory.

The third method announced for the first time during the congress was that discovered by Dr. Detre, a Hungarian. His method was similar to that of Von Pirquet, but with the use of two tuberculins—one a bovine and the other a human. He claimed that by introducing the two simultaneously at different places on the arm, not only could the diagnosis of tuberculosis be accomplished, but as well could it be determined whether the patient was suffering from tuberculosis of the bovine or the human variety. Probably no lecturer at the congress received more attention than did the promoter of this method. This was due to perhaps two reasons, First, the reaction, if a fact is sufficiently important to compel interest, and second, the auto-advertizing of its originator was very remarkable for a scientist. So frequently did he gain access to the newspaper reporters, and manifest such extreme eagerness to be at the front that I question if his case was really given attention by the more thoughtful, though his discovery may prove true.

The congress was a significant assembly from several standpoints. Its representation included thirty-three nations, and probably every state in the Union. It represented a world-wide warfare against a human scourge.

Mr. Cortelyou, while presiding at the opening session, pronounced it a "great peace conference." This was referred to by Mr. McFarland, of Washington, on the closing day. The Italian delegate, while issuing a felicitous invitation for the congress to meet in Rome in 1911, referred to the American people as "cousins." Mr. McFarland was reminded of Artemus Ward when he went to see the Siamese twins. After looking them over carefully and observing thoughtfully the strong ligamentous band which united the two bodies, he remarked with some pride of discovery, "brothers, I presume." He wondered that the Italian delegate had conceived us so distantly related. For he said, "we are brothers, not only because the Common Father hath created of one blood all flesh, but also because we meet hand to hand and heart to heart against the common foes of human kind." There was inspiration in hearing the address of the Mexican, the Italian, and the Grecian, though few understood his words and the message they would convey. His presence and earnestness were full of meaning and he was understood though his message was not. Racial and political differences were not present. The modest, thoughtful words of a young negro doctor in the voluntary discussion were listened to with great consideration, even by the multitude of Southerners present. At the concluding session, when the Spaniard rose to respond to his nation's name, he was greeted with much more applause than other speakers who appeared without the prestige of a name made famous by unusual achievement.

It was a gathering of great scientists. Many men whose names are famous for great discoveries and whose researches have yielded benefits for ages to come, were there. They came to instruct and learn. The chief of all was Dr. Robert Koch, of Germany, who discovered the tiny organism which causes all tuberculosis, and the extinction of which would effectually eliminate this dread disease. His presence on the rostrum was the signal for an ovation at the introductory session. Many others who are the authors of text books which in their lines are classics, were also in attendance and participants.

The object of such an assembly merits the best heart and brain the world affords. It was called for the purpose of combatting a great enemy. The battle against tuberculosis is not a straw battle. The loss of life in the United States alone is more than 150,000 annually. The carnage of war is nothing compared to the mortality from this disease. More than 400 die every day in this country of tuberculosis. One-third of all people who die between 20 and 45, die of consumption, and 1-7 of all deaths are due to this cause. Of us who are now living, 8,000,000 are fated to die of tuberculosis if the present death rate shall go unchecked.

From the economic standpoint there is an estimated loss each year of $330,000,000 due to this malady.

And who shall measure the suffering and misery which follows in its wake! Who shall measure the ambitions and hopes destroyed, the home circles broken, and the destitution which it lavishes! Who are they who cannot tell of hearts wrung by its remorseless and relentless power! So that when the nations send their greatest scientists to confer to check the merciless advance of this malady on human life, no one will admit it a fictitious foe.

Statistics regarding this awful destroyer of human life are appalling, but gleams of sunshine and hope come from the progress made in recent years in checking its advance. One single item came to the writer's mind. In Maine the death rate diminished from 1892 to 1905, a period of thirteen years, 38.2 per cent. Doubtless many states can show a proportionate decline in mortality and some perhaps larger. The war is on in all parts of the world, and the hopes of science linked with undaunted and patient effort, backed by earnest co-operation from individuals, states and nations. will do more toward the extinction of this dread foe than our dreams dare tell.

In the Toils of Freedom.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"Faithful Unto Death."

A year had passed since the day that Amil stood watering the flowers in Lottie's window and the air was again redolent with the breath of spring. The cherry trees had put forth their glossy green leaves and white blossoms, and the peach trees were shedding showers of pink petals; there was scarcely a miner's cottage in the Black Acre that did not have a clump of daffodils or blue flags in its otherwise bare dooryard; over in the woods back of the culm heaps were the white of the dogwood and the pink of the wild crabapple tree; the sun that had coaxed the flowers into loveliness had also wooed the insects from their winter haunts, and the birds darting here and there gathering sticks and straws spoke of nest building. The whole world seemed glad, but away down from the gladness and sunshine, over a thousand feet into the black depths of the earth were hundreds of human lives and throbbing hearts, wild and panic stricken, as they called and cried to one another in their mad haste to escape from the deadly after damp.

A terrible explosion had occurred in rooms No. 11 and 12, a remote part of the Gordon Mine. Air pipes had been disconnected, and a door, used in directing the current of air, had been destroyed, giving the after damp a free circulation.

"Kid!" cried the fire boss as he rushed up to a little door boy who was standing at his post at the foot of the shaft wondering what was the meaning of the pull of air he had felt a little while before. "Kid, the door to the ninth left heading is torn down and the choke damp is spreading fast. I'm going to ask a hard thing of you, but I believe you can do it. I hate to send you for it may mean death, but it's the only chance to save the men in fourteen and fifteen. I have got to go and get some others out of a worse place. Prop your door open and go down the seventh heading and give the alarm. Can you do it?"

The boss needed no answer, for the boy looked up brave and fearless.

"Now, run, Kid, run! Run for your life and the lives of the men!"

The boy sprang to the door, set a block of coal against it, and ran at full speed down the gangway. The boss looked after him for an instant, and then, as he turned to go on his own more desperate errand, shook his head and said to himself: "Poor little kid! I'm afraid I've sent him to his death. He's such a little one, but there was no other way."

The "Kid" was little Amil. Lottie's prophecy had come true, and in a few weeks after Polly was placed in the factory Amil was set to work in the breaker. He had only been there a few months when his older brother, a door boy, was killed in the mine, and the father, thinking only of how he could use Amil to the best advantage, had seen the foreman of the mine and quietly arranged for Amil to take the place of the older lad as door boy.

The foreman was ambitious to secure a certain office in the union, and the Italian had a good deal of influence among his fellow countrymen, so the arrangement was easily made and the little fellow was sent down into the mine to watch the door and listen for the coming cars. He was a favorite with the miners and drivers and they all called him the "Kid."

Away he sped, shouting: "Run, men, run for your lives! The choke damp is coming!"

Not only did he go to rooms fourteen and fifteen, but he heard miners at work in a room still further on, and with never a thought for himself on he went until the last man had thrown down his tools and started for the cage. Amil's little legs flew after them. On, on they ran, the deadly gas growing thicker every step of the way. Would they be able to reach the cage?

The best he could do, Amil fell behind. His legs were short and he had run so far and shouted so much that he was out of breath. Still he kept on. At last he reached the shaft, but too late—the cage was gone. For an instant he looked wildly up at it as it shot upward, and fear and despair seized his heart; then, still watching the dim spot of light above him he began to sing:

"Onward, Christian soldiers, marching as to war."

The voice that Lottie had trained with so much care rose clear and true, with scarcely a tremble, to the ears of the men he had just saved.

"My God, we forgot the Kid! Hear him singin' down there!"

A hush fell over the men in the cage and many of them pulled off their caps, but they were powerless. Still the singing went on, but fainter now—

"With the cross of Jesus going on"—Then silence.

The men landed and, amid the tumult and excitement around them, stood with caps off looking down the shaft, but the deadly gas which began to pour out soon drove them away. It would have been death to try to go down again and they knew the Kid was past all suffering.

Two days passed before it was considered safe to venture again into the mine, then the fire boss went down and with tender hands lifted the body of little Amil and carried him in his arms to the top. As the men caught sight of the little figure and waxen face, which smiled even in death, his lips just apart as the song had died with him, every cap came off and many pairs of arms were stretched out to take him.

"Men, you owe your lives to the Kid. I never saw a braver act or one more cheerfully done. Take him home and call on me for anything that's needed."

"I never was so darned cut up in my life," said Lanky Bill as he told Jean about it afterward; "as when we hearn that song like an angel was a singin'. To think we big, strappin' fellers run away from the Kid just to save our own blamed necks, and left him to get along the best he could. I'll never forgive myself for such cowardice."

Lanky Bill was a tall, raw-boned southern mountaineer. He was never called by any other name; if he had any other no one knew it. He was rough and uncouth, but had a great love for children and was the friend of all the breaker and other boys about the mine.

"We carried him to that little shack of a house he called home, an' then we fellers didn't know what to do till I happened to think of the little teacher. You know that little crippled Lottie who runs the kindergarten? Well, she set a heap by the Kid, an' I knowed she would take a pile of comfort in fixin' him up for the fun'ral, so I went down an' tole her. She didn't cry soft like, as I tho't she would, but her face turned white an' she laid her head back agin that cheer o' hern an' closed her eyes. I tho't she'd die, an' I sot on the edge of my cheer an' looked at her. Skeered? You bet I was; but in a min'it she sot up an' begin to tell us what to do, but her face kept that white an' drawed like.

"She wanted the fun'ral under the trees in her yard. She said as how the Kid had loved the trees and flowers. I says, 'Miss Lottie, us fellers has put up the money to fix the Kid up, but we don't know how to do it.' She axed what they had got to put him in, an' when I tole her the dago had got a box, she jes' looked awful like an' says, 'Bill, take me down thar.' I up an' wheeled her down thar an' then she sent me to get the preacher's wife, an' laws! you ought to see what them two women done. They up an' kivered that box with white velvet an' the little children got pink crabapple blossoms, an' I do reckon the Kid was happy when they got him fixed up, if he ever was. They had him laid in thar in a kind of a soft, dove-colored robe; I guess that's what they called it; an' a scarlet geranium layin' on his breast; the little teacher had picked that out of her winder. Then that smile! I tell you, Mr. Jean, I jes' blubbered when I stood thar an' tho't how that little feller had stood watchin' us go up an' singing' about 'The cross of Jesus goin' on before.'

"Well, all the rest of the fellers that come up in that last cage felt jes' as I did, an' every blamed one of 'em said he was goin' to the fun'ral an' that I must go an' ask the company to let us off. When I got through tellin' the story about how the Kid lost his life, they said right off that we could go, an' Boss Gordon wiped his eyes a good deal, an' when I was leavin' he said, says he, 'Lanky Bill, take this an' use it for the little shaver,' and he handed me a $10 bill.

"Well, we got the little white hearse an' ponies, an' you never seed a purtier fun'ral than we put up for the Kid. We set the coffin on a bank of flowers that the children had fixed, an' the grass was green around it, an' the trees white with bloom overhead. Then the dooet from the big church sung low an' soft that song the Kid sung when he died.

"Us fellers was pall-bearers. We'd a knocked anybody down that offered to tech that coffin. There was Mike Pete, an' Guiseppe Ezzet, an' Andy Poser, an' Mickey Maloney that carried the Kid, then the rest of us was hon'ry pall bearers.

"Elder Hathaway said about the right thing at that fun'ral. Everybody cried when he tole the story of the little feller from the time he started to the kindergarten till he was killed. An' I want to tell you, he rubbed it in about the Kid bein' in the breaker an' then promoted to door boy all before he was eleven years old. I'd a-hated to stood in some of them fellers' shoes as he told about it.

"Yes, he's up thar on the hill. Been thar lately? Well, at the head of the Kid's grave is the neatest little stun you ever saw. Pure white, an' on it jes' these words—

"FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH."

CHAPTER XIX.

The winter and spring had passed and it was commencement day at Princeton. The campus was beautiful with its green turf and grand old trees with the sun glinting through their leaves. It was Thursday morning and the graduating exercises were to take place at ten o'clock. Soon the students formed on the campus for the grand march that was to take place before entering the auditorium. The procession was led by the president and dean of the college, then followed the faculty and the alumni, then the seniors in their caps and gowns, and in the lead of these was Jean, the president of his class; then followed the lower classmen in their order.

The long column marched into the auditorium, the president, dean and speakers of the day seating themselves on the platform, and the seniors passing into the choir gallery. The organ had just begun to pour forth the strains of the overture to Tannhauser when down the aisle came Aunt Mehetabel with her benevolent face, followed by a little woman in black with soft brown hair and a sad, sweet face. Then came Uncle Jasper with a man who stooped a little and walked with a halt in his steps. Jean had rather expected Uncle Jasper and Aunt Mehetabel, but the sight of his parents was a complete surprise to him, and as he watched them come in he wanted to shout for joy. There sat the dear little "mither" who had never been away from Minington since she went there nearly twenty years before. He could see the tears swimming in her eyes and a quiver around her mouth as she looked at him and saw his glad smile of recognition, and he knew they were tears of joy.

It was more than joy that Maidie felt; it was pride, thanksgiving and happiness beyond measure, for was not that her bonnie lad in the center of his class with the purple ribbon on his breast to show that he was one of those who would stand up and take the vows that would make him a minister of the gospel? Was it the ribbon Jean wore that seemed to cast a purple haze about her? She did not hear the president's words, nor was she conscious of the crowd about her, but she saw a little cottage nestled among the blue hills and a Scottish moor stretching far away. She was guiding Jean's first steps and listening to the prattle of his baby voice. What plans she had made for him then! Then the scene changed and it was a miner's cottage. She could again hear the lagging steps of her little boys as they came home exhausted from their day's work. Then the roar of the breaker seemed to drown everything else, and she felt again the old pain and saw the little mounds on the hillside where lay her two boys. Surely God had been good for he had snatched her little Jean from the gaping mouth of the black mine and made of him a very prince among men. Yes, there he was standing before her now, for the speaker had finished his address and the theological students had stepped to the platform and were speaking.

At the close of the exercises Jean left his classmates and went to find his friends. Maidie was the first to grasp his hand. Did she not have the first right? Scarcely less proud was Aunt Mehetabel, for to her, also, he had become a son. Jean was surprised when Mr. and Mrs. Hathaway came up and gave him their hearty congratulations. He looked beyond them in search of a girlish face, and Aunt Mehetabel, ever anticipating his slightest wish, inquired of Mrs. Hathaway if Evelyn had returned from the South.

Mrs. Hathaway, turning to Jean, said, "Evelyn was sorry that she was unable to get back before your graduation. She had expected to reach home Tuesday, but the death of one of her little pupils has kept her. I am sure she is sadly disappointed for she had planned to come to Princeton with us."

Jean said something about being sorry that anything had hindered her coming, but his heart leaped with joy for it was almost as good as seeing her to know that she had thought of him and of the day, and that she would have come with no more cordial invitation than the formal announcement card which was all he had ventured to send her.

"You will come to Minington soon, Jean?" asked Mr. Hathaway.

"Yes, next week. I am eager to begin my work there."

"Hello, Kirklin. You are wanted at the front," and Jean saw one of his classmates beckoning to him.

"You will have to excuse me for a little while, folks," and Jean turned to go.

"Say, Jean, we are all going to have dinner at the hotel at one-thirty and it is about one o'clock now," said Uncle Jasper.

"All right, I will be on hand."

He was soon surrounded by his friends, receiving their congratulations and eagerly discussing the plans for the class banquet which was to take place at seven o'clock in the evening.

It was a happy party that arrived at Crystalville the next day. Aunt Mehetabel and Jean had persuaded Hugh and Maidie to stop off for a few days. This was their first visit to the home of Jean's adoption, and Maidie's eyes were wide with wonder when she saw the palatial residence with its beautiful surroundings. She clung to Jean as he led her up the wide walk.

"Jean, Jean, I canna help wondering that you cared to come to the old hame so often since you had everything so grand and beautiful here."

"Mither, this is grand and beautiful just as you say, but it is nothing to the love of the little mither and the old home ties."

Maidie's cup of bliss seemed full to overflowing. Jean led her from place to place and showed her through the grounds, and when she grew tired, he would take her to the music room and place her in an easy chair, then he would go to the great pipe organ that filled one end of the room, and soothe and charm her with soft, sweet melodies, and sometimes the voice that had sung so sweetly in the old free kirk in Scotland, would join his rich baritone in the "Rowan Tree," or "Bonnie Doon."

They visited the glass factory and Jean showed them where he had worked when he first came to Crystalville. Nothing had changed except that other little boys were running back and forth carrying the molten glass and hot bottles. Maidie turned away heartsick.

"Can nothing be done to free these little boys from this terrible slavery?" she asked.

"Not as long as the glass factory owners control the legislature," replied Jean.

The days passed quickly for each hour was a delight, and Aunt Mehetabel was in her element planning delights and making Jean and his parents happy. At last the day came when he was to accompany them to Minington, and enter into his life work. It was a sad hour for Aunt Mehetabel, but not by word or sign did she show it. She would not mar this happy time by any demonstration of her own feelings. After all, was she not giving back to Hugh and Maidie their own? So she watched them depart with a smile, then carried her own sad heart to Him who had never failed her.

Jean had determined to again tell Evelyn of his love. The long months of separation had only convinced him that he could never give her up, and while there had not been a word nor a message exchanged between them since he last saw her, he felt in his heart that she loved him. So not many days passed before he called at the Hathaways and inquired for Evelyn. Mrs. Hathaway told him that she had gone to see Lottie, but had said she would stop at her father's study in the church to get a book that Lottie wanted, and he might find her there, as she had only been gone a few minutes. "Go and find her, Jean, for I know she is eager to see you," Mrs. Hathaway added.

He took her advice and went to the church. Not finding her in any of the lower rooms, he went to the organ and began playing. Mr. Hathaway had his study in an upstairs room of the church just off the gallery. Evelyn had gone there to find the book she wanted.

"That is Jean," she thought as the great organ poured forth the strains of Chopin's Opus 37, that beautiful nocturne that thrills and pleads and woos. Did not some one say that Chopin composed it while he was waiting for his lost love to come back? As the sweet cadences rose and fell, echoed and re-echoed through the church, Evelyn clasped her hands over her heart as though she would still its tumultous beating; then slowly rose from the floor where she was sitting.

"I love him, I love him, and I know he is calling me! Can I go to him? I sent him away from me. Oh, why did I do it when I love him so? I will go to him."

Slowly she moved toward the door, slowly she crept down the stairs, reluctant yet eager; something was drawing her, was it the music or was it Jean's soul speaking to her heart?

At last she stood in the door leading to the choir loft, timid, shaking like an aspen leaf but beautiful as a seraph in her dainty white gown with her arms showing to the elbows, the lace falling away from her exquisite neck, and the love look bright in her eyes looking out from under wet lashes. Jean did not see her till the last long chords had died away and he turned to leave the organ. Then a look of great and beautiful tenderness lit up his face and for a moment neither of them spoke, until Jean, stepping towards her, held out his arms and said, "Evelyn, sweetheart, come!" With a glad smile she came and Jean took her to his heart forever.

Neither of them knew how long they had been there when the door of the audience room opened and Mr. Hathaway came singing down the aisle. He did not see Jean and Evelyn till Evelyn spoke.

"Father."

"Why, I did not know any one was here," said Mr. Hathaway in surprise.

"Mr. Hathaway, won't you give us your blessing?" and Jean led Evelyn to the railing of the choir loft, and placing his arm about her they knelt by the railing, and her father, laying a hand on each of their heads said:

"The Lord bless thee and keep thee.

"The Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee.

"The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace."

"My children, this is what I have longed for. Go and tell your mother, for she will be glad, too, Jean," and Mr. Hathaway took Jean's hand. "I have always been proud of you, but will be prouder still to call you my son."

The three left the church together and went to the parsonage. Maidie was sitting with Mrs. Hathaway on the porch.

"How do you do, Mrs. Kirklin? This is splendid to find you here," said Mr. Hathaway. "Mother, I have brought you a new son, and these children have come for your blessing; and yours," turning to Maidie.

The surprise and joy were too much for her, she put her face in her hands and cried. Evelyn knelt beside her and putting her arms around her said, "Won't you let me call you 'Mither,' too?"

"Aye, lass, that I will. You have been a comfort and joy to me ever since I knew you," replied Maidie as soon as she could control her voice.

"Jean, I have always wanted a big boy like you—yes, come to think of it, just like you," said Mrs. Hathaway. "There is no one I would give my girlie up to as quickly as you."

Jean's reply came quickly, but with all the solemnity of a vow, "I will try to be worthy of the trust." Then after awhile, "How glad Aunt Mehetabel will be! Let's go down to Crystalville on the evening train and surprise them."

"The very thing," said Mr. Hathaway, "Mother, you can help Evelyn get her things ready, can't you?"

"Yes, Jean," replied Evelyn, "I should love to go above all things and if father and mother think they can spare me, I will."

"I do hate to spare you, Evelyn, for we have had you such a little while, but I know you want to see Jean's other home and I think you had better go," said Mrs. Hathaway.

"I want you all to take tea at my house," said Maidie, "and the children can go to the train from there."

Then she took her leave and hurried home to tell the good news to Hugh and prepare for the evening meal.

The Snows had been giving a chess party and the guests had just gone, but the welcome light shone far down the street as Jean and Evelyn came in sight. The evening was warm and Aunt Mehetabel was still sitting on the porch when they came up.

"Aunt Mehetabel, we have come for your blessing," and Jean led Evelyn up the marble steps and stood before the astonished lady.

"You blessed children! Come right into the house this minute where I can see you better. Jasper, for pity's sake, come here and see what I have got."

Uncle Jasper came pacing in from the other room and found Aunt Mehetabel kissing Evelyn and Jean and calling them all the endearing names she could think of. She rang for John and told him to prepare luncheon at once "for these tired children," and to tell Judith to put the north room in order for Evelyn. Aunt Mehetabel was one of those people who was never happy unless she was doing something for some one's comfort.

Jean could not sleep from sheer happiness, so he was up with the dawn and off for a tramp with Cap. Never had the world been so beautiful to him; the woods were full of music, and he wondered if the birds were as happy as he. It reminded him of the day, so many years ago, that he left Minington, and found himself free from the shadow of the coal mines.

When he returned from his walk he found Aunt Mehetabel and Evelyn gathering roses for the breakfast room. He had thought that nothing could be more beautiful than Evelyn when she came to him in the church the day before, but this morning as she stood among the roses with the sunshine touching her hair in glints of gold, and the happy love light gladdening her face, as she saw him coming, she was radiantly beautiful.

"Good morning, Jean," and Evelyn reached out her hand. Jean stooped and kissed her. Evelyn's face grew rosy but she looked none the less happy, and Aunt Mehetabel smiled as she leaned over to cut another rose. Cap trotted up and sniffed his approval of Evelyn.

"Cap is the most important member of the family, Evelyn," said Jean, "he has the right of way at all times."

"I am sure Cap and I will be good friends," and Evelyn stroked the long, silky ears. "I am enchanted with the place. I think, like Alice of Wonderland, I have dropped into Fairyland."

"I have been telling Evelyn," said Aunt Mehetabel, "about your first coming to this place. Evelyn, does it seem as if Jean could ever have been the little breaker boy you used to know?"

"Yes, Aunt Mehetabel, in many respects he is the same boy to me. I think I loved him then, and if all these splendid things you have given him had spoiled him, I would have been greatly surprised."

"Now, look here, I object! Let's get a better subject to talk about," said Jean.

"Evelyn, queen of the roses, you must have a rose in your hair. What color shall it be?" and Jean pretended to look her over critically.

"Nothing but a white one for my fair Evelyn. Aunt Mehetabel, the loveliest white rose you have gathered, please."

Aunt Mehetabel laughingly selected the rose and Jean, very awkwardly, but with charming effect, arranged it in Evelyn's hair.

"Now children, our breakfast will be served before we get these flowers arranged. Let us hurry right in."

Aunt Mehetabel bustled into the house while Jean and Evelyn followed more leisurely.

After breakfast Uncle Jasper took Evelyn with him to feed the deer and show her a young fawn of which he was very proud, and Aunt Mehetabel asked Jean to unlock the safe and bring her jewel case to his den, and that she would meet him there as soon as she had given some instructions in the kitchen. In a few minutes she joined him, and taking the jewel case she opened it and took from it a superb diamond ring.

"Jean, this was my mother's engagement ring. I have told you before that my father was a Scotch gentleman of great wealth and I have heard him say that he got for my mother the most beautiful diamond he could find in London. My mother died when Paul was two years old, and before she died she gave me this ring and told me to keep it for Paul, and when he found a woman he loved to give it to him."

Aunt Mehetabel paused and tears dimmed her eyes.

"As you know, Jean, he never needed it; but God gave me another in his place, and now, Jean, it is yours and I think you know what to do with it."

"Aunt Mehetabel, what can I say to thank you?"

"Now Jean, not a word, please. I will go and send Evelyn to you."

"Of this I feel sure," said Jean, "that I have chosen for my wife one who will do honor to your mother's memory, and this ring will mean more to both of us because of its associations."

Aunt Mehetabel found Evelyn and sent her to Jean, and when she next saw her the ring graced her beautiful hand.

New Truth—Its Demands Upon the Teacher.

By Edward B. Pollard.

"The problem of modern preaching," says a witty observer, "consists in the difficulty of telling the truth without scaring your grandmother." Grandmothers are easily frightened, and some bad boys delight in shocking the venerable old lady. The problem which confronts the preacher and also the conscientious, wide-awake teacher is often a more serious one than is sometimes supposed. The past few decades have seen considerable change both in the attitude of many toward religious truth and also in the emphasis given to it and the methods employed in dealing with it. That there are many new views advanced, differing, some of them, very widely from those current a generation ago, is quite manifest.

What is to be the teacher's or the preacher's attitude toward them? This is a more important question for him than for any other person for he is to decide the matter not for himself alone, but in the light of the responsibility he has as guide of the thoughts of others.

Attitude of the Combatant.

There are several attitudes he may take towards newly discovered truth, or toward that which knocks at his door as such. The first is the attitude of the combatant. "What is new is not true," says he, "and what is true is not new. Therefore the new is false, and hence I am against it." To this strenuous advocate of the old it must be conceded that truth is old, very old, and that there is nothing absolutely new under the sun. But that there is much difference in the apprehension of truth from age to age; that truth appears in new forms and combinations; that light once undiscerned breaks new upon the consciousness of men cannot be doubted except by one who simply closes his mind to all living influences. The defender of the old has his place in the world. We must have our conservatives. They help to hold the world of thinking in its proper orbit; so that in contending faithfully for the old forms of the once-for-all-delivered they doubtless do God's service. And yet the attitude of the combatant is not the ideal attitude toward new truth. To fight all change is to put one's self at issue with life. Arrested development, stagnation, mental and spiritual death would surely follow in the wake of this porcupine attitude of bristling antagonism to all which may differ from the accepted views of the past.

Attitude of the Indifferent.

But there is also the attitude of the mole, as well as that of the porcupine. The latter at least is conscious of the presence of something different from the opinions of the past. His antagonism means that he is immensely alert over this newcomer, this interloper, this pretender that threatens to spoil the peace and prosperity of Zion. This other man on the contrary is so satisfied with his present light, or it may be darkness, that he is willing to keep buried, oblivious to the fact that any new light is shining for him in the heavens. He is as blind as a bat to any new possibilities of knowing God better, or apprehending his truth more clearly. It is better to be a combatant than an indifferent non-combatant. The attitude of blind indifference and of self-satisfaction, which buries itself in profound darkness and does not know that the sun is shining and journeying ever toward the noon-day is worse, if anything, than the alertness of positive opposition. As a teacher he is the blind leading the blind. Give us the porcupine in preference to the mole.

Too Ready Conformity.

There is also the attitude of one who tries to adapt himself to each new view as he comes in touch with it. His opinions are determined by his environs. This is the chameleon type. He is fascinated by every strange notion, as he may read it in the latest out-put of the press. Ever learning, he never comes to a knowledge of the truth because truth for him is not a progressive, but a fluctuating, shifting variable, which today is, and tomorrow is cast on the ash-heap. His moving pictures are too rapid and jerky for real life. He cannot be a teacher of others because there is no theological constant in his thinking. He is a chameleon. Akin to this type is the man who, whenever a new view is expressed in philosophy or in science proceeds immediately to make his religious views conform. He at once imitates the fashion in the world of thinking. This may be called the simian or monkey attitude. "We must get in line with assured results of science," says one, hastily; without adequately thinking the matter through, nor remembering how fallible and evanescent many of the "latest results" of science have proved to be. There are those, who, conversant with the fact that religionists have so often in the past taken a stand against the views advanced by the scientists only to find that they must ingloriously fall back defeated (as was true in the case of Galileo and his unshakable theories concerning the earth and its rotations)—these become too ready to fall into line with current scientific speculations. They find, however, that they are after a while just as badly off because of their precipitous haste to conform to a new false theory as those were who held fast to an old false theory. While the current theology in every age will probably always be more or less influenced by the prevailing philosophy of that time; and our own ideas of God must always take into the account all evidence which the science of nature, God's handiwork, affords, yet theologians and preachers also who have sometimes been too eager to ape or affect the latest guesses of science, much to their detriment as constructive leaders of thought.

First Step in the Discovery of Truth.

What, then, is the proper attitude towards new truth? What is the sane and manlike way to deal with it? It might not be amiss first for one to ask "Is it really new?" Much error might be avoided were the inquirer to ask, "Is the theory or the opinion advanced something new, or simply an old error re-galvanized?" A study of the history of religious doctrine would be a fine disenchantment for many a hasty and false fascination. Having become convinced that the alleged new truth is really new and also true, there now arises the problem of convincing others of its truth.

Here emerges one of the most difficult problems of the preacher. There are some discoveries and some changes so radical in character, or which are regarded as so revolutionary in their nature that there enters into the problem of preaching them a very subtle question. We have heard preachers declare, "I am convinced of the truth of this (or that) position but it would never do to preach it." "Why not?" one inquires. "Because the people do not believe it, and it would cost me my pulpit and my standing as a minister." If this is all, it is sheer cowardice, and he who takes this stand is, of course, unworthy of religious leadership. He is not a leader at all, nor a teacher of truth, but simply a second-hand mouthpiece.

The Preacher, While Courageous, Must Be Helpful.

The more conscientious preacher, confronted with similar conditions, says, "My religious opinions have changed because of newly discovered evidence, but I fear that in preaching the new views I may seriously unsettle the faith of some, if not very many of my hearers. I am set for the strengthening and not for the unsettling of their faith, therefore I will be silent." This position has a show of wisdom, but is shallow. Of course, there may be some subjects upon which a preacher or a teacher may have opinions which are sufficiently unimportant and remote from the real life and needs of the people, that there is no special demand upon him to give them to others. Furthermore, we must greatly respect the man who in his teaching tenderly regards the safety of those of whom God has made him a teacher. On the other hand, one cannot thus easily throw off responsibility, saying, "I shall be silent concerning truth, for fear the faith of those in error may be shaken, and their religious safety endangered. For safety in error is no safety; and the most dangerous danger is that of unconscious security in the midst of danger. Besides, if a thing is true it will finally prevail; and it is always a serious pity whenever the masses learn the truth from other lips and other pens than those who should have been and are the natural teachers of that truth. Whatever was true in the teachings of Voltaire—and he did show clearly many of the errors and weaknesses of the current priestcraft of his day—would have been far better learned from sympathetic teachers of Christian truth. It would surely be vastly better for the people to learn their biblical criticism from a reverent teacher of scripture than from a modern Tom Paine.

False and True Teaching.

The policy of keeping quiet upon important subjects for fear of unsettling the faith of the young or disturbing the serenity of the old is as near-sighted as it is unworthy of the teacher of religious truth. Having been convinced that a certain new view is the correct one there are two ways to promulgate it.

The first is that of the iconoclast who starts in with the task of smashing the old as the first, best preparation for the establishment of the new. He gets himself into unnecessary trouble and fails to achieve his purpose. Men do not change their opinions as they change their coats. You may dynamite an old building to make place for a new, but it is dangerous to dynamite men's long-established and sacred religious opinions. It is found difficult to build anything but scepticism upon such debris. The plan of the iconoclast overlooks the true psychology.

What then is the safe and sane method in propagating new truth among those whose minds have long held an old error with a sacred devotion? The reply is by the method of a gradual displacement. It is the method of the true teacher, who by degrees leads the pupil from where he stands to where he should stand.

We have seen the old fashioned magic lantern with its slides—the picture which comes after pushing out the slide which preceded; and we have seen the modern double lantern with its method of "dissolving views." It is the latter and not the former which should be imitated if we would safely correct men's views on vital religious subjects. Two preachers come to believe that the views their people have held concerning the Bible are erroneous and harmful to religious character and to real Christian development. The one proceeds to batter down those views, and finds at last that he has succeeded in destroying the faith of many in the Bible as a revelation of divine truth at all. The other proceeds upon a different principle; he continually holds up the Bible in its correct light and by degrees finds he has succeeded in displacing the old bibliolatry by an enlarged conception of what the word of God is. All are helped and the faith of none is wrecked. Even the oldest grandmother has not been frightened during the process.

It is said of a certain London preacher that during his preaching the ushers are kept busy carrying out grandmothers in various stages of collapse! One man speaks the truth and men and women are shocked. Another announces the same truth and men are set to pondering, and are edified. The preacher has no right unnecessarily to endanger the faith of the sensitive or the weak by his rash haste to advance truth. Here the ancient maxim, "Make haste slowly," is the sum of wisdom.

Little Sister's Chance.

They thought Little Sister was asleep. Perhaps she was at first, but gradually mother's low tones and Big Sister's voice untangled themselves from Little Sister's dreams. It was comfortable in the sitting-room. The fire snapped and crackled, the clock ticked slowly, as if there could be no need for haste, while the baby talked to himself about his beautiful fists and toes. Outside the wind howled and snow swept around the house. Little Sister, lying upon the couch, heard mother say:

"Grandma wasn't lonely, was she?"

"Oh, no," answered Big Sister. "She is almost as happy as if it were summer."

"What was she doing?" asked mother.

"Looking over seed catalogues and making garden plans. Grandpa was reading."

There was silence for a moment, and Little Sister, with her eyes closed, could see the cottage next door surrounded by the flowers that grandma loved. Big Sister changed the subject.

"Well," said she, "Little Sister shall go to college."

The child on the couch was too sleepy to speak. Why must she ever go to college? Hadn't she been ill all winter and hadn't the doctor said that she mustn't be allowed to go to school for many months? Instead of opening her eyes, Little Sister merely tried to keep from slipping back into the land of dreams. She wished to hear more.

"There, sister dear, don't give up," said mother. "Another year everything may be changed and we may be able to manage so you can go to college."

"No, mother," was the reply. "how can it be? We thought the same thing last year. I am glad grandma doesn't realize that the money I earned teaching school paid for their coal, and, in fact, that it was every cent gone before the middle of winter. No, mother, we can't do it! I'll just have to keep right on teaching country schools, and we'll hope the boys will grow up and be a credit to the family. Maybe baby will be the president of the United States. And Little Sister shall go to college."

"You see," interrupted mother, "we had unusual expenses this winter. Grandpa and grandma both ill for six weeks, wasn't it? Then Jimmy had the whooping cough, and as for Little Sister, poor child, why she hasn't cost so much in all her life together as she did this particular winter when father had put every cent he could spare in a new business."

"It does seem," remarked Big Sister, "as if sometimes everything happens in a bunch. We are fortunate to be all alive and happy. All I say is, Little Sister shall have her chance."

A few months later grandma's garden began to think of summer. The sweet old lady and Little Sister were together from morning until night after the snow melted and the first robin came.

"Why, grandma," called Little Sister one day, "our garden is running away! It's trying to get to the woods, sure as anything. I met a tiny pansy straight on the path. It was yellow and it wouldn't even stop to bow! Just said: 'Don't step on me'!"

"Do you know what I would do if I were younger?" asked grandma when the two stopped laughing.

"No; what would you do?"

"Sit here on the steps beside me and I will tell you. To go through our wood-lot is a short cut to the village."

"Yes, I know that."

"Well, working people are the ones who usually take the short cuts. Every morning little Miss Brown, the dressmaker, goes that way and comes home at night. Then there's Mrs. O'Toole, who goes out to wash and scrub. She walks through the woods, and the little lame girl who works at the canning factory, and Jessie Carson, that delicate looking bookkeeper, and oh, ever so many others, and workingmen with dinner pails."

Little Sister nodded her curls almost into a tangle.

"Well," grandma continued, "it is a straight road from here to the bit of woods, but in the woods the road twists and turns, in and out and around the trees and across the brook, and what I would do, Little Sister, is this: At every bend of the road I would plant flowers—violets and pansies in the shady places, scarlet geraniums and poppies in the sunshiny patches. Then the walk would be a lovely one and would make every one happier who passes through the woods."

"Oh," exclaimed Little Sister, "let's do it! I'm younger, don't you see, and I can't go to school this summer, so if you'll tell me where to plant things, I'll do it. We'll help your garden run away, grandma. Big Sister says she guesses we're doing good in the world when we make it pleasanter for other folks."

As the weeks and months went by Little Sister's labors were rewarded. Flowers bloomed in the woods as if by magic; here a clump of daisies, there a bed of petunias. At every turn of the road old friends from grandma's garden greeted the passer-by.

One thing disappointed Little Sister. If the dressmaker or the bookkeeper appreciated the new beauty of the woods, they said nothing. Mrs. O'Toole's remarks were discouraging.

"Folks ain't got much to do that plant flowers in a place like this," she sniffed. "At our house the young ones raise vegetables!"

Vegetables, to be sure. Little Sister sat by the brook one afternoon and wondered why she and grandma didn't think to plant vegetables.

"After I went and made myself so expensive last winter that Big Sister couldn't go to college, I wonder why I didn't think of vegetables! I ought to be tending a potato patch and picking off potato bugs 'stead of watering honeysuckles out of a brook."

At that moment Little Sister remembered that grandpa had planted a big vegetable garden.

"So, there, Mrs. O'Toole!" she said aloud.

"But my name isn't Mrs. O'Toole," a voice replied. Across the brook Little Sister saw a beautiful woman and a boy.

The child stared. She didn't know what to say.

"Were you ever here before, little girl?" asked the woman.

"Yes'm," answered the child.

"Richard and I have been here every day for the last week. We think it is such a lovely place. We were attracted by the flowers. Do you know who owns the woods?"

"Yes'm."

"Do you suppose the place is for sale?"

"Yes'm, I know it is."

Little Sister's tones waxed eager. Hadn't father been trying to sell that piece of woods ever since she could remember?

"Will you tell me where to find the owner?" asked the stranger.

"Yes'm, I'll show you exactly where he is if you'll follow me."

"Won't we follow, though!" echoed the boy.

After leading mother and child through the village Little Sister pointed toward her father's place of business.

"You go in there to the office," said she, "and ask for my—ask for Mr. Edson, and—he's the man that owns the woods."

Back home flew Little Sister with the news. When father came at night his face was one broad smile. The stranger had offered him a price for that wood-lot that astonished the village.

"She intends to build a summer home on that high ground by the brook," said father. "Who would have thought," he continued, "that grandma and Little Sister would become such good real estate agents! The woman says she wouldn't have dreamed of the possibilities of that old road but for the flowers. That was landscape gardening that paid!"

"And—and now may Big Sister go to college?" demanded Little Sister.

"Indeed she may, this very autumn, and stay four years! Oh, yes," father added in answer to a look of dismay on the child's face, "she'll be with us vacations."

"And when you are a young lady," Big Sister declared, "you shall surely have your chance!"

"But, can't you see," laughed Little Sister, "I've had mine!"

The church at Carbondale, Illinois, has had nine additions the last two Sundays.

Texas Christian University, Waco, Texas, reports the largest enrollment in its history.

There have been two additions at Rossville, Illinois, recently. M. S. Metzle is the minister.

The church at Winnipeg, Manitoba, has trebled its Church Extension offering this year.

Clay T. Runyan has resigned at La Junta, Colo., and is now open to call for evangelistic service.

The territory of Mexico has held a good convention. F. F. Grim is the corresponding secretary of the territory.

J. F. Clay has completed the second year of his ministry in Canton, Kansas. The church had six additions one Sunday recently.

The church at Milestone, Sask., suffers a great loss in the resignation of A. R. Adams, who was our pioneer preacher in that section.

The church at Beard, Kentucky, has just held a successful revival. Prof. H. L. Calhoun, of the College of the Bible, was the evangelist.

Geo. S. Snively now makes his home at Greenville, Ill., to be with his parents in their declining years. He is open to call for evangelistic service.

Kansas Disciples will celebrate their Jubilee Year in convention at Topeka, Oct. 22-28. The program prepared is a feast of great good things.

The work at Quindaro Boulevard Mission in Kansas City is prospering. A meeting held recently resulted in twenty accessions. A church will be organized soon.

The church at Guthrie, Oklahoma, has built a large tabernacle 80x100 feet in which it is holding evangelistic meetings. John L. Brandt is the evangelist.

The great northwest is loyal to the organizations of the church. The congregation at Milestone, Sask., has doubled its apportionment to Church Extension.

R. Tibbs Maxey, general evangelist in Missouri, held a meeting recently in Corder. Twenty-seven were added to the church and an old church difference was settled.

The church at Olney, Ill., has recently redecorated its building and now has the handsomest place of worship in Olney. J. Fred Jones paid them a visit recently.

The church at Leesville, Missouri, has just closed a profitable evangelistic effort lasting three weeks. W. S. Hood, of Clinton, did the preaching. There were thirteen additions.

Dr. F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C., celebrated his thirty-third anniversary with the Vermont Avenue church recently. This is the longest pastorate in our brotherhood.

J. E. Teaney has closed his meeting at Hester, Missouri. Twenty were added to the church and the membership of the church brought to a more spiritual conception of our holy religion.

President Miner Lee Bates, of Hiram College, reports a 20 per cent increase in the attendance there this year. The equipment and faculty at Hiram is better able to do justice to its students than ever before.

Prosperity, Missouri, is a mining town. H. F. King, of Carterville, held a meeting there in the skating rink. The result was 47 additions to the church. The church is much strengthened and encouraged.

The first church building erected for the use of the Disciples in New Jersey will be dedicated soon. Z. T. Sweeney will be master of ceremonies on that occasion. The church is located at East Orange and S. N. D. Wells is the pastor.

The Tennessee state convention will not be held at Rockwood, as formerly planned, but has been changed to Chattanooga, Oct. 26-29.

The church at Blue Hill, Neb., is in a meeting. Edward Clutter is the evangelist and N. F. Horne is the minister.

The Century is grateful for a word of approval from Chas. E. Varney, Paw Paw, Michigan. Mr. Varney is in the lecture field, where he is widely known, but we trust some good church will entice him into the quieter, though in our opinion more useful walk of the Christian pastorate.

Christian University of Canton, Missouri, is enjoying a most marked increase in attendance this year. About sixty of the students are preparing for the gospel ministry. The great state of Missouri with its numerous churches will have a place waiting for each of these young men.

Rev. Louis S. Cupp, pastor of the Hyde Park church, of Kansas City, began his fourth year there Sunday, Oct. 4. The church reports 70 additions for last year, 352 additions for the past three years. The congregation raised $7,565 for local work last year, and $410 for missions. They begin a meeting Oct. 18, with Hamilton and Thomas as evangelists.

Rev. J. J. Haley will remove from California, where he has been living recently, to Eustis, Fla. In a letter to the editors he says to tell our readers that Eustis is the most ideal spot in the United States to spend a winter. "For fishing, boating, hunting, good preaching (this winter!), lovely scenery and a divine atmosphere, Eustis is ideal. Tell the brethren to come down."

Mr. and Mrs. Nelson H. Trimble, of Baltimore, Md., held a meeting recently at a little country church at Perry Hawkins, Md. The meeting was held in a grove and attended by both saint and sinner. Twenty-five came as a result of the meeting, nineteen making the good confession. The most remarkable result of the meeting was that two and possibly three of the young men who came during the meeting expect to enter the ministry.

The church at Flanagan, Ill., just closed a successful revival. The church was built up and greatly strengthened spiritually. The visible results of the meeting were eleven additions, ten being by baptism. John R. Golden was the evangelist. Charles E. McVay led the singing. Mr. McVay is now singing at Fremont, Neb.

Richard Martin, evangelist, of the "Martin family," just closed a remarkable meeting at Piedmont, Kan., where there was no church, no minister, and the gospel plea was unknown. He left a church of 60 members, a Sunday-school a Christian Endeavor, a Ladies' Aid, got two lots—will build church—and the plea is known by hundreds who never heard it before. Evangelist Richard Martin is now at Valparaiso, Neb.

Royal J. Dye writes: "The churches of Oregon have undertaken to raise $15,000 to build a mission steamboat for the Congo. We have a wonderful field open to us in the great Bolenge district. There are 5,000,000 people in this district alone. They speak one language—they are actually pleading for the Gospel. The great Basiri river and its tributaries have 1,000 miles of navigable waterways which this steamboat may ply. We are the only people working in this district. Some of our native evangelists who have been working at the most remote point report 700 people who have turned from the old life and are seeking the Gospel light."

TELEGRAMS.

Wichita, Kas., Oct. 4, 5, 1908.
Christian Century, 235 E. 40th St., Chicago.

In great meeting with Central Church. Brother Allen strong pastor. Most excellent organization. Services in church last week on account of cold weather. Tabernacle packed this afternoon and night; sixty-eight added; 515 to date. We raised $400 back indebtedness on church this morning and they gave us splendid thank offering tonight. 362 at Sunday-school the last two Sundays. Many grand, noble souls in this living link church. Brother and Sister Ullum have entered Yale. G. P. Rockwell and wife, and Van Camp are with us. Close this week; meet us at New Orleans. Chas. Reign Scoville. 9:35 a. m.

Centennial missionary offering today of Independence Boulevard Church five thousand dollars, total missionary offerings of year, nine thousand dollars.

Geo. H. Combs.

Fostoria, Ohio, Sept. 26-28, 1908.—One hundred and seventy-seven in twenty-six days of invitation in the conservative western reserve, Herbert Yeuell received an ovation. Each night the last week of the meeting the moment he stepped inside the building the ovation began. At the farewell service a purse of gold was presented to him. Greatest victory ever won by a single congregation in northwestern Ohio.

CHICAGO

There were two additions at the Armour Avenue Christian church (colored) the past month. Mr. Cottirain reports the church has had two successive rally Sundays.

Will F. Shaw reported two additions at the Sheffield avenue church last Sunday.

The Evanston church had a Harvest Home celebration last Sunday. The church was decorated with emblems of the fall time. The choir prepared special music. The program of the day included all the regular services, a sunrise prayer-meeting and a praise service in the afternoon. C. G. Kindred, of Englewood, and Will F. Shaw of the North Side church, spoke at the afternoon meeting. The church was packed at the evening service, and the Sunday-school attendance was 205. The collections for the day were nearly eighty dollars. Visitors were present from other churches, two coming from Batavia. Everything indicates a good year for the church.

C. M. Kreidler reports one addition at the West End church last Sunday. There have been five additions the last two weeks.

The Metropolitan church is instituting some institutional features in its work. A tennis court is being operated for the young people and some gymnasium classes will be organized this winter.

Rev. and Mrs. C. C. Morrison celebrated their second wedding anniversary last Saturday. As a token of their esteem, the Monroe street church presented Mrs. Morrison a ticket to accompany her husband to New Orleans to the International Convention of Christian churches.

E. J. Arnot preached at Batavia last Sunday.

There were three additions at the Memorial church last Sunday. Dr. Willett is now in his pulpit every Sunday.

A number of Disciples from Chicago are planning to attend the convention at New Orleans this week. Among those who are going are Dr. Willett, C. C. Morrison, O. F. Jordan and Mrs. F. L. Childs.

The church at South Chicago is arranging a union prayer-meeting with the Baptist church in the same neighborhood. This arrangement to last for two or three months. The design of this is to cultivate closer fellowship between the two churches.

The Disciples' Divinity House is opening this week. Both Dr. Willett and Dr. Gates are offering courses. Dr. Gates will give a course on "The History and Principles of Christian Union." Dr. Willett will give the following courses: "Deuteronomy," "A Survey of Hebrew History," "A History of Israel from Solomon to the Exile." Dr. Willett will have a Sunday morning class on the "Social Teachings of the Priests." This will be attended by undergraduates of the university.

A number of new men have arrived in Chicago to study in the Disciples' Divinity House. The new students are G. W. Sarvis, of Des Moines; Mrs. Sarvis, Luke Stewart, J. T. Arnot, E. J. Arnot, J. C. Williams, T. H. Conrad. Some of the former students who will be in residence are H. F. Burns, R. W. Gentry, C. E. Rainwater, A. J. Saunders, Mark Peckham, Guy Hoover, W. D. Endres and C. A. Exley.

F. C. Cothran was a caller at the Christian Century office this week. He took home a copy of "Historical Documents" which should be in the library of every preacher in our brotherhood.

Geo. A. Campbell is preaching at the evening services of the combined church in Austin this month. Next month Rev. Mr. Martin, the Congregational preacher, will take the evening services and Mr. Campbell will preach at the morning services.

R. W. Gentry resigned as assistant pastor of the Memorial church. This was according to the union agreement. Rev. R. N. Van Doren, editor of the Baptist Standard, will probably be called to succeed Mr. Gentry. Dr. Willett and Rev. Mr. Van Doren will make a strong team for the work of the Memorial church.

On Nov. 12, at Chicago, the Baptist Brotherhood Convention will assemble, and one of their main themes is the relation of Baptist laymen to the evangelization of the sixty-one millions of non-Christians who constitute the field of that church.

DAVID WALK.

The passing of Rev. David Walk has been recorded in the secular press. He was one of the "old guard," a public servant of Christ for fifty-six years. His death took place in Galveston, Texas, Sept. 15. Some of our strongest churches have been his pastorates—Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Kansas City and the Linden Street church of Kansas City. He was one of the last of the pioneer preachers. Among his associates were Campbell, Longan, Johnson, Errett, W. T. Moore and J. W. McGarvey. His last two years were spent for the most part in Chicago.

We are in receipt of a copy of the Christian Banner, the state paper of Michigan. A good statement is made of the state of our plea in Michigan. Attention is called to important cities such as Jackson, Bay City, Niles and Port Huron, where we have no church. In Detroit we have five churches, two of them coöperating in the missionary enterprises. There are two churches in Grand Rapids. It is apparent that our people have not yet attacked the city problem in Michigan as should be done.

W. M. Mindell had a great meeting at Oldfield, Missouri. There were thirty confessions and five other additions. There had been no church in this town but one will now be organized.

G. H. Bassett and Oscar Marks held a two weeks' meeting at Keytesville, Missouri, with twenty-nine additions.

We are in receipt of a souvenir brochure of recent Baptist and Christian church buildings constructed by Geo. W. Kramer, architect, of New York City. Mr. Kramer has done more than any man among the Disciples to develop good taste in the matter of church architecture. His recent achievement in the beautiful Euclid Ave. Church in Cleveland is a conspicuous illustration of his work.

A. A. Doak arranged all day services Sept. 27 in the church at Colfax, Washington. The attendance in the Bible-school was 103. S. P. Schooling, of Pullman, Washington, preached acceptably both morning and evening. A platform meeting was held in the afternoon. There was one baptism and four other accessions for the day. The additions for two Sundays are twenty-two. It is a great joy to the struggling church in this county-seat town to experience this growth.

Our crowded columns will not allow us this week to fulfil the promise made in last week's issue to begin our series of editorials on the "Means of Grace." The articles will be forthcoming in subsequent issues.

November 22 is Children's Day for Home Missions. For years this day has been growing in favor with the Bible schools, and with the present scheme of co-operation between the state superintendents and George B. Ranshaw, of the Home Board, there is bright prospect that this year the schools will give Home Missions the emphasis long deserved, but never oefore accorded to this important and fundamental interest.

A number of suggestive and helpful leaflets pertaining to the proper and profitable observance of Children's Day for Home Missions have been issued by the American Christian Missionary Society. A very lively campaign is being waged with the high aim of enlisting every school in the support of state and national home missions. State superintendents are pushing the schools along this line with an enthusiasm suggestive of the late teacher-training campaign. Of one thing there seems little doubt. More Bible schools will observe Children's Day in November than ever lined up in a single year for Home Missions.

Despite the tight times the Sunday-schools made a gain of $504.04 in their support of Home Missions last year. The campaign for the Centennial Year is now thoroughly organized and national and state secretaries are throwing wonderful energy into the preparation for the day. No less than a half

LIFE'S ROAD

Smoothed by Change of Food.

Worry is a big load to carry and an unnecessary one. When accompanied by indigestion it certainly is cause for the blues.

But the whole trouble may be easily thrown off and life's road be made easy and comfortable by proper eating and the cultivation of good cheer. Hear what a Troy woman says:

"Two years ago I made the acquaintance of Grape-Nuts and have used the food once a day and sometimes twice, ever since.

"At the time I began to use it life was a burden. I was for years afflicted with bilious sick headache, caused by indigestion, and nothing seemed to relieve me.

"The trouble became so severe I had to leave my work for days at a time.

"My nerves were in such a state I could not sleep and the doctor said I was on the verge of nervous prostration. I saw an adv. concerning Grape-Nuts and bought a package for trial.

"What Grape-Nuts has done for me is certainly marvelous. I can now sleep like a child, am entirely free from the old trouble and have not had a headache in over a year. I feel like a new person. I have recommended it to others. One man I knew ate nothing but Grape-Nuts, while working on the ice all winter, and said he never felt better in his life."

"There's a Reason."

dozen states have announced a determination to realize the Centennial motto, "Every School in Line for 1909." Sunday-school superintendents everywhere are requested to fall into line.

KENTUCKY WORK AND WORKERS IN SEPTEMBER.

J. W. Masters was in Harlan county twenty days, holding a meeting at Baxter, in addition to being at the dedication of the house of worship at Harlan Court House. He has accomplished a splendid work in building the house at that county seat. He baptized eight people during the month.

W. J. Cocke had a fine month as to results in several ways. Thirty added, twenty-four by confession and baptism. He is in a meeting now at Pembroke, and the latter part of the month is not included in above statement.

J. W. Edwards added three in Hardin county in a needy field. He is working in some destitute fields.

Two added is the work of A. Sanders in Big Sandy Valley. He announces that Carey E. Morgan has agreed to rededicate the house of worship.

Robert Kirby added eight in Cumberland and Adair counties.

Louis A. Kohler was two Sundays at Bromley. Work about as usual.

The work at Jackson moves on about as it has for some months. C. M. Summers, the preacher, says that the financial part of it is hard to keep up.

There was one addition in J. B. Flinchum's Breathitt county work.

Forty-two additions constitute a part of the splendid results of the work of Z. Ball during the past month.

There were thirteen added at Latonia during August and September at regular services. Audiences fine and work excellent in every way.

D. G. Combs had thirteen additions during the month. He is now in the evangelistic field and is in great demand in Eastern Kentucky.

Two additions at Jellico, and Raymond G. Sherrer reports matters as moving on very well.

H. H. Thompson reports six added, five of them by baptism. He has held a meeting at Mouth of Marrowbone, not far from Hellier, and will be at the latter place in October for meeting. Elkhorn City will also have his help in a meeting very soon.

It is noticeable that a considerable number of the workers have not indicated the results of the month's work. Only about half of the men have told us what they are doing. We insist that every man shall report.

H. W. Elliott was at work all the month. While a number of our strong churches failed to help us up to the time of the Hopkinsville convention and many of the smaller churches that we hoped to have help from, failed us, still we were able to report an advance over the past year in amount paid by the churches and also in the number contributing. The receipts of the month to time of convention amounted to $1,007.56.

We are now hard at work on another year. Already letters have been sent out relative to the November offering. Matter is in the hands of the printer to be used for stimulating interest in our state work. A leaflet entitled: "Greater Kentucky Missions" will be ready in a few days for broadcast distribution. Letters to be used by the preacher or officers and coin pockets can be had for the asking. We hope that the brethren will order this material freely and use it diligently.

A Great Blunder to Put Off the State Offering.

Too much emphasis cannot be laid on the necessity of taking the offering at the time appointed by the churches that expect to take a special offering for the work. A few churches have adopted a missionary plan other than days set apart; but the great majority expect to take an offering for this work especially, if they expect to help it at all. Put it off now and it gets in the way of every thing else, or else is pushed out of the way by every thing else. Let the whole church in Kentucky move forward in November and make it a really great month for our work.

LAYMEN'S MOVEMENT PROGRESS.

By J. Campbell White, General Secretary.

Remarkable progress continues to characterize the development of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Not only is the world ripe for a great advance on the part of the church, but the men of the church seem eager for something more worth while than material gain to which to devote their best intelligence and energy.

At the present moment, a national campaign is on in Canada, under the auspices of the movement. At twenty centers, from Sydney on the Atlantic, to Victoria, on the Pacific, campaigns are being conducted during September and October. The one question being considered at all of these centers is this: Will Canada evangelize her share of the world?

At this writing, six of the twenty campaigns have been held. Without exception they have been marked by intense interest and profound conviction. Every city visited, at each of which there were representatives present from the surrounding district, clear and unequivocal answers have been given to the above question which unifies the whole series. It is estimated by Canadian missionary leaders that the churches of the Dominion, numbering about 900,000 communicants, should evangelize forty millions of people in the non-Christian world. The various denominations in Canada, and one city after another, are seriously accepting their proportion of this responsibility, involving as it does in many cases, the trebling or quadrupling of their aggregate missionary offerings.

Every Missionary Board in Canada is cooperating to the full extent of its power, in this interdenominational national campaign. One or more of the secretaries of each board is making the trip to the Pacific coast, to participate in the meetings. A large number of business men, at their own expense, are traveling long distances to assist in enlisting the laymen of all Canada in this splendid enterprise. At least four of them are taking the trip all the way from Toronto to Vancouver in this way. One of the most prominent and successful business men of Toronto has publicily declared that he will never add another dollar to his capital, but will hereafter devote his whole income to the extension of the Kingdom of Christ.

A splendid contributioin to the success of the meetings in the Maratime Provinces was made by Mr. D. F. Wilber, the American Consul-General at Halifax. He gave a week of his time to attending four of the city campaigns. His story is very remarkable. Three years ago he went to Singapore as the American Consul-General, as he himself says, "a man of the world!" During his two years' residence there, the evidence of the transforming power of the gospel upon the heathen all about him, was so overwhelming, that both he and his wife surrendered their own lives to Christ, and now count it their chief joy to promote the world-wide kingdom. It was a very discerning remark he made to me during the week we spent together, when he said, "Nothing is doing so much to produce cordial relations between Canada and the United States, as this Laymen's Missionary Movement."

It was thought best to have the Canadian national campaign during the period preceding the presidential election in the United States. As soon as the election excitement is over, the schedule of Laymen's Movement Campaigns in the United States will begin. On Nov. 10 and 11, at St. Louis, the laymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church are gathering to launch their denominational Laymen's Missionary Movement, the object of which is to add a million dollars annually for the next four years, to the foreign missionary offerings of that church.

On Nov. 14, at Boston, the General Committee of the Laymen's Movement, consisting of over 100 laymen from all parts of the United States and Canada, will hold its annual meeting. Many of the members of the committee will remain to assist in the great interdenominational campaign under the auspices of the movement, to be held in Boston, Nov. 15 to 22.

On Dec. 3-6, the first Interdenominational State Convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement will be held at Atlanta. All denominations are co-operating to bring together their best laymen from all parts of

NO GUSHER

But Tells Facts About Postum.

"We have used Postum for the past eight years," writes a Wis., lady, "and drink it three times a day. We never tire of it.

"For several years I could scarcely eat anything on account of dyspepsia, bloating after meals, palpitation, sick headache—in fact was in such misery and distress I tried living on hot water and toast for nearly a year.

"I had quit coffee, the cause of my trouble, and was using hot water, but this was not nourishing.

"Hearing of Postum I began drinking it and my ailments disappeared, and now I can eat anything I want without trouble.

"My parents and husband had about the same experience. Mother would often suffer after eating, while yet drinking coffee. My husband was a great coffee drinker and suffered from indigestion and headache.

"After he stopped coffee and began Postum both ailments left him. He will not drink anything else now and we have it three times a day. I could write more but am no gusher—only state plain facts."

the state. The movement has now reached the stage when it can only meet the demands upon it by dealing with states as units. Four state conventions are already fixed for Georgia, Iowa, Minnesota and Wisconsin. Several others will be held during the winter. It is expected in this way to be able to propagate the spirit of the movement most rapidly and effectively.

The movement has now eight secretaries giving their time to answering a fraction of the calls that come for the presentation of the work. Three of these are secretaries of the general movement, Mr. Herbert K. Caskey, of Philadelphia, having joined the force recently. One secretary is employed by the Canadian council of the movement. Two are engaged in the movement in the Southern Presbyterian Church, and one each in the Southern Methodist and Southern Baptist Laymen's Movements. At least two other denominational movements are now seeking suitable secretaries.

Thus on every hand, the spirit of the movement spreads, further and faster than any one can trace or record. God is at work, and we can only see or understand a fraction of his product in the lives of his people.

My confidence grows stronger as the providential indications multiply, that the greatest missionary development of human history is upon us. It will be accompanied by the greatest revival which the church has ever experienced. By undertaking to save the world, the church itself will be saved from materialism, formalism, commercialism, and indifference to the will of God.

BIBLE SCHOOL RALLY IN ST. LOUIS.

On Bible Study Day, Sept. 27, J. H. Bryan spoke in the forenoon at the Fourth church, St. Louis, and I spoke at the same hour at Compton Heights, at the united services of Bible school and church. In the afternoon during a rally of all the churches in St. Louis, at Compton Heights church, at which J. H. Hardin, J. H. Bryan, Earl Wilfley, and others, made addresses on Teacher-Training, the Adult Bible Class movement, etc. There was good attendance of representatives of all our churches in the city, but on account of the continuous rain some were not represented. During the hour following, the churches indicated their purpose to enlist Teacher-Training classes with the numbers here given: Compton Heights 100, Clifton Heights 40, Fourth Church 100, First Church 50, Hamilton Avenue 40, with encouraging indications from other points that they will be in line. It was a happy day closing with an address at night by Bryan at Compton Heights, Hardin at night at the Fourth Church. There were many evidences of increasing interest in the minds of our St. Louis brethren on the subject of our Bible school work. During the afternoon rally the St. Louis Officers' and Teachers' Union which I organized two years ago, was resuscitated, with every indication that it will live and thrive from this on. It will soon be unanimous in St. Louis.

COUNTY CAMPAIGNS MAKE IT UNANIMOUS.

October 1st J. H. Bryan, our Adult Bible Class superintendent and field man, will begin a month's Bible school campaign among the churches of Clay county, to make it unanimous in that county. The county board will pay his salary and expenses for four weeks. Clay is one of the most important counties in the state, or any other state, and a victory there will mean a world of good to the Bible school cause everywhere.

In November Brother Bryan will go to Lincoln county for a similar canvass of that great county. In May he will make a similar canvass of good old Shelby county on like terms; and historic Clark county speaks of wanting him for a month. Other counties may take the hint, and if they desire to undertake such a campaign, let them write me about the matter at once. If we cannot make Missouri unanimous all at once, we propose to fight it out by counties.

CHURCH EXTENSION RECEIPTS.

Comparative Statement for the Last Seven Days of September as Compared With Last Year.

Churches:

For last year	$14,377.22
For this year	11,236.64
A falling off of	$ 3,140.58

Individuals:

For last year	$7,205.25
For this year	2,776.41
A falling off of	$4,318.41

It will be noticed that there has been a total falling off in receipts as compared with last year, of $7,459.42. This can be accounted for by a bequest which was received last year amounting to $6,655.

During the last week of September there was a falling off of only 19 in the number of contributing churches as compared with last year. Nearly every church that sent an offering made one of the following excuses: Drouth, short crops, hard times, September's heat, people not returned from vacations, heavy rains and the presidential election.

It is hoped that the churches will continue to do their best with offerings in October. Many of our very best churches have not responded at all. They will certainly be heard from in October because they are regular contributors.

The day that this is written, Sept. 30, our books have closed, showing a falling behind in the total of our receipts from new sources of $5,016.11. This is not so bad for hard times. In the number of loans closed and the amount paid in closing these loans, we have had the biggest year in our history. Eighty-seven loans were closed, aggregating $170,325.

Remit to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

THE BOOKS CLOSED.

The missionary year of the Foregn Society closed Sept. 30.

It is well known that during practically the whole year the work was somewhat hindered by the financial depression and political agitation. However, the year has been one full of richest blessings, both at home and on the mission fields.

The churches, as churches, have taken no backward step; 3,457, a gain of 42, responded to the call. They gave $128,347.00, an increase over the previous year of $4,879.00. All will be glad also to learn of 24 new living-link churches, the largest number in any one year in our history. The Christian Endeavor societies, bequests, miscellaneous receipts, all show an increase. The number of personal offerins was almost doubled. There was a loss, however, in the amount received from this source. We regret to report a small loss in both the number and amount from the Sunday-schools.

The total number of offerings of all classes reached the splendid figures of 9,898, showing a gain in number of offerings of 748, which is an unusual gain. This increase in different gifts indicates clearly an ever increasing interest.

A heavy loss was sustained in annuity gifts. Only $7,700.00 was received from this source, a loss of $28,550.00. The financial depression made it impossible for a number of friends to command their funds, who expected to give in this way. Last year we had some exceptionally large gifts on this plan.

The total receipts of the year reached $274,324.00, a loss of $31,210.00.

Notwithstanding this loss it is a pleasure to report the unprecedented month of September, when the regular receipts reached the splendid sum of $68,606.00, a gain of $5,450. It is a pleasure also to report this, the greatest month of receipts in the history of the Foreign Society.

This statement would not be complete without mentioning the important fact that twenty-four new missionaries were sent to the field, and that this is by far the largest number ever before sent out in any one year.

The faithfulness of the missionaries, the new stations opened, the great increase in the attendance in the schools and colleges, the expansion of the native evangelistic staff, the increased enlargement and efficiency of the medical work, together with the growing interest at home, all combine to make this the greatest, all-around record our people have ever made in the regions beyond. beyond.

The Christian Center is an interesting institutional work, one of the few in our entire brotherhood. It is located in Baltimore, Md., on North Fulton avenue. Some features are worthy of special note. There are two Bible schools, one using the International lessons, the other using the Blakeslee. It will be interesting to watch and see which is the more successful. The church provides access to library facilities of 200,000 volumes. The church has a Savings Bank for the children. There is a reading room that is open every day. A weekly paper is circulated free of charge. Such a program ought to be a compelling one in a city like Baltimore. Mr. and Mrs. Nelson H. Trimble are the ministers.

FIRST OF ALL.

This is the Centennial Year! We have something to do. It also happens to be the twentieth century and nothing goes without printer's ink.

One hundred years! Yes, and your word printed will go a hundred times as far and reach a hundred times as many people as if you merely say it. Again, journalism divides the expense of ordinary printed matter by a hundred and multiplies its power by another hundred. I am not arguing, I am stating facts. If you are not ready to accept them, go back into the thirteenth century and vegetate.

First of all in the centennial advance we must have means of communication. Make the circulation of Christian newspapers unanimous! Go after subscribers like politicians hunt votes, like anglers seek Bass, like salesmen pursue orders. Don't depend upon paid solicitors. Use them where you can. Give them the honor due their worthy and fruitful labor. But no country was ever saved by Mercenaries. The cause cannot triumph without the white-hot enthusiasm of volunteers in the cause of truth.

This is a work for Evangelists. You know what a soul-saving and soul-keeping power is the Christian press. Magnify it!

Here is a supreme task for pastors and elders. Let the unfailing weekly visits of the papers help you to shepherd the flock over which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers. Multiply one pastoral call on the head of the household into fifty-two times as many as there are persons in that home. It will find every member every week. But if it fails once or forty times, it will not get discouraged!

What a chance for the deacons! The man who reads, pays. The man who knows, works. The disciple who had a church paper in his former home, brings his letter at once to the church when he moves!

For a glorious centennial with realized aims in Evangelism, Bible schools, Missions, Education, Benevolence and all the grace and power of Christian living, let everybody devote the first days of October to putting this paper into every home. Begin now and never stop until you have done it! Organize for it as you would to build a church or work up a revival!

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

THE CENTENNIAL SESSION AT NEW ORLEANS.

In addition to the address of Hugh McLellan of Richmond, Ky., there will be a rapid fire presentation of the Centennial from every angle. These specches of from two to five minutes each will not be a few impromptu remarks, but thoroughly prepared, concentrated and electrical messages from men who count in the Kingdom of God.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

"Our responsibility as a people in this crisis is very great. We have come to champion the cause of Christian unity. I wonder if we understand what it means to espouse a great cause like this in an age like this. What with our frequent narrowness and intolerance and delight in unnecessary sharp words that sting and rankle, I wonder if we understand. In our war upon sectarianism, we ourselves are in danger of becoming the narrowest of sects, eaten up with the canker of self-righteousness. What an infinite task is this we have set for ourselves, to bring into one all of the factions of the kingdom with its extremes of narrow dogmatism and ultra latitudinarianism. There must be in the united church a tolerance for great diversity of thought and life if it is to claim all that is Christian. . . . . How shall we appeal to others to abandon their cherished traditions to unite with us in the life that is in Christ, if we ourselves be not ready. It is well to create a great centennial enthusiasm, but our greatest need is to be "clothed with power from on high." If I had one prayer to make, it would not be for funds or numbers; it would be for a larger measure of the spirit of Christ. . . . . Ah, it is not a time for counting triumphs; it is a time for penitance and prayer."—Rev. C. M. Chilton at New Orleans.

RALLY DAY AT ST. LOUIS, MICH.

A day of blessing marked a visit to the St. Louis Church on Oct. 4th. A change of spirit and condition was strongly evident during the day. It was Rally Day in reality and all departments of the church made a healthy showing. Bills were paid and the business situation was greatly improved. A good cheer service in the afternoon gave the pastors and the Mayor of the city, Mr. L. B. Alger an opportunity to bring greetings. This was done in a very happy way. The joy of the day especially centered in the baptism of nine candidates in the river in the afternoon. The service was an impressive one and Brother and Sister Bussing and their earnest helpers deserve much credit for this healthy condition of the church at this point. It shows the value of plan and business execution in the Master's work. The outlook for the future of this church is good.

WILL AID THE ANTI-OPIUM CAMPAIGN IN CHINA.

The International Reform Bureau, whose headquarters are at Washington, D. C., which has been the chief ally of the British Anti-Opium Federation and the Missionaries in securing Anti-Opium reforms for China and the Philippines, has appointed as a special secretary for China and the Chinese, Rev. E. W. Thwing, new superintendent of the Chinese mission work in Hawaii. He has been granted several months' leave of absence by the Hawaiian Board of Missions to tour China and aid its government and people in the great fight for the suppression of opium.

Mr. Thwing speaks both Chinese and Japanese fluently, and by public addresses and private interviews, and also by a Press Bureau will assist China in its splendid effort against opium smoking. He will also, by the publications of the opinions of eminent medical men in the hospitals of China, which the Reform Bureau has collected, seek to dislodge the fallacy that long periods are needed to "taper off" with opium eating in the guise of "pills" and "cures," and he will also bring scientific testimony from Germany and the United States as to the harmfulness of beer and cigarettes which foreigners are seeking to crowd into China as substitutes for opium. His tour will, no doubt, contribute to the effectiveness of the international Conference on opium, which President Roosevelt has called to meet in Shanghai on January 1, 1909, to which he will bring direct information as to conditions and sentiment in many parts of China.

For Jellies and Preserves

On the proper sealing of your jellies and preserves depends their "keeping." Metal and glass caps too often leak; tying with paper is next to useless; old lids are often insecure.

Simply pour Pure Refined Paraffine over the tops of your jellies, or dip the closed end of the jar (after cooling) in melted

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

The New Orleans Convention.

Last year after the Norfolk convention many people woke up, rubbed their eyes and realized that the decision to take the National Convention to New Orleans in 1908 was a dangerous if not fatal error. It had been decided on the strength of a single speech. The merits of the question of location were forgotten. Through the likening of the infant church in New Orleans to a baby needing the especial care of its mother the brotherhood voted to come to New Orleans and look after its foundling. But this sentiment no sooner prevailed that it was regretted. Was not this to be the last convention before the Centennial? And New Orleans is so far away from the main population of Disciples that the attendance will be lamentably small. Besides, the task of caring for such a convention is too big for the infant congregation there.

But the die was cast. And now we are in New Oreans. And "we" are a great host. Fully three thousand people are here. The streets teem with the delegates, the modest blue badges appear everywhere. The big hotels are full. You can hear the clerks tell guests that step up to register, "We have not a room left." The leaders expected fifteen hundred at the most, with a more likely prediction of about one thousand. Nobody but the little New Orleans church and its optimistic pastor had expectations equal to the multitude that has come. They probably measured their expectations by the work and wit they had put into the preparation for the convention. They tell us how the little company of one hundred members worked day and night to get the house set in order for our coming, how the pastor gave up his vacation the past summer, how every last member had something to do and how far into the nights for weeks they toiled and planned.

And they made good. No city was ever better prepared for entertaining our convention than this. If Pittsburg can make us as comfortable next year we shall be thankful. The hotels were ready and their rates were reasonable. The newspapers were ready and have so far shown more than ordinary intelligence in reporting our doings. The convention hall was ready and it is an ideal hall, just the right size and a joy to eye and ear.

The campaign of advertising carried on by Pastor W. M. Taylor prodding up preachers and church officers and editors of our papers was masterfully conceived and executed. That is the real secret of the attendance at this gathering. Mr. Taylor kept the mails busy and the newspapers busy whetting the appetite of the people for a great good time. Did we say appetite? Well, that was a good word, for the New Orleans committee had been telling us for wecks about the restaurants and hotels of their city until our appetites were keen and our mouths watering in anticipation of their matchless cuisine.

Many came a day ahead of the convention and spent the time in seeing the sights of the town. And New Orleans is an immensely interesting place for visitors from the north. It is perhaps the most European of all cities of our country. The French quarter attracts everybody first of all. It abounds with objects of interest. Old buildings dating back a century and more; old curio shops, the French market, the St. Louis Cathedral, the Cabildo, the Jackson statue and the French restaurants—these the visitor tries first of all to see. Later he takes a "Seeing New Orleans" automobile or the street car and makes the trip up beautiful St. Charles street where the city's finest residences are. Stonewall Jackson's grave in one of the cemeteries is only one feature of interest in their sacred gardens waving with glorious palms and magnolias. Some took the trip to Lake Pontehatrain. Many crossed the river to Algiers to see the huge dry docks, second largest in the world.

But sight seeing was an incident; the convention and its big enterprises were more absorbing than the quaint sights of this exotie city. The sessions were well attended from the first night when the big M. E. church was packed to hear Rev. W. G. Menzies, of India, speak for the C. W. B. M. The Women's sessions were inspiring. Their program was full. It ran on schedule and with dignity. Their reports had the ring of Centennial triumph in them. Mrs. J. J. Zigler of New Orleans welcomed the women to the city. Rev. C H.. Winders, of Indianapolis, in an address entitled "While he was yet Young" urged the strategic importance of ehidhood in missions and all Christian work. The introduction of the missionaries and the charge to the newly eleeted officers by Rev. W. F. Richardson of Kansas City was followed by an address by Mrs. N. E. Atkinson, ex-president of the C. W. B. M., which is pronounced by many the most exalted address of this week of remarkable speechmaking. Mrs. Atkinson out of her long experience as leader of this mighty work brought forth both reminiscence and counsel. Her tribute to Mrs. Helen E. Moses brought heaven near. The charm of her voice has not abated with the years and her elevated thought lacks no element of vigor despite the long service of her brain.

Our purpose is to give the convention to our readers in paragraphs which will perhaps more vividly set it forth than any panoramic statement could. Our greatest wish is that all our readers might have enjoyed the stimulus of this gathering, and brought home to their congregations a hope and consecration which one learns here.

Outgrown Ideas of Mr. Moninger's Book.

The book on "The New Testament Church," by Herbert Moninger, A. M., B. D., furnishes a good illustration of what would happen if the dogmatic atmosphere of the Christian Standard should pervade our entire brotherhood and infect our young men. Mr. Moninger is a young man with some university training. His popularity in Sunday-school circles is a merited tribute to his genial character. He has many friends who are interested in his future and in this circle we claim a place. Mr. Moninger's book is not an adequate expression of Mr. Moninger, however. It was written to meet the demands of an exacting employer who is now engaged in building up a constituency among the "antis" to replace those who have been lost through hostility to missions and education. "The New Testament Church" was written to sell in this constituency. Even to the emphasis upon the use of a small "d" in writing the proper name "Disciples of Christ," it has all the ear-marks of an antiquated and impossible point of view that had some currency among the circuit riders of our pioneer days. Mr. Moninger with his university equipment and experience in Sunday-school work could write a better book than this. But no better book could ever seeure the approval of his employer. We may thus see how the genius of our younger men may be smothered by the Othello of a thoroughly alarmed dogmatism.

The fact of a doctrine being old does not decrease its value. Some of Plato's ideas still rule in the world of thought. The New Testament loses none of its value through age. But the clinging to old and out-grown forms of thought is bad for any people. We wish to note that in "The New Testament Church" there are many archaisms, statements of things no longer made by our representative men.

"The New Testament Church" presents briefly a point of view regarding the Old Testament and a mode of dividing it. It calls the Old Testament "a prophetic photograph of Christ." Were that true, the coming of Christ would have little significance. If Jesus' doctrine of love, his view of the kingdom, his matchless character had been anticipated by the Old Testament, he would have found scant welcome at the hands of the race. Jewish rabbis hold this very view of the Old Testament, of course. They say that Jesus was a borrower and an imitator. They insist that his ideas came from Judaism. As against the view of Mr. Moninger and the Jewish rabbis, we prefer the view that Jesus brought something new to the world and that no photograph of him had ever been taken. The Old Testament prophets sketched the outlines of a Messianic figure, but Jesus was greater than all their forecasts.

"The New Testament Church" suggests a curious division of the Old Testament. It is true this division was known in certain circles in days gone by, but even there new statements have come to prevail. The book states that the Old Testament should be divided into three parts, historical writings, devotional writings and prophetic writings. If the Old Testament is to be divided on the basis of its literary character we must find in the book, poetry, narrative, preaching, apocalypse, etc. If we are to divide the Old Testament on the basis of authorship we must mention the work of priest, prophet and sage. Mr. Moninger's collection of "devotional" books is an interesting one. Who ever uses the Song of Solomon for a devotional book? As a collection of wedding hymns it had value, but not to lead to prayer and the works of piety. Or if the Song of Solomon is a drama to prove that woman's love may be proof against the allurements of wealth or position, it has value but not the value of a prayer-meeting talk. Who reads the book of Ecclesiastes for devotional purposes? It is the wail of a soul who has sunk deep in the slough of doubt. As an indication of a tendency among the Hebrews of a certain period it has value but the value is not the same as that of a chapter of Thomas A. Kempis. Prof. McGarvey was once rash enough to say that Ecclesiastes and the song of Solomon should not be regarded as a part of the canon. But Mr. Moninger has presented an even less justifiable statement.

The arguments that are used in the book for the defence of the plea are outgrown and ineffective. A great plea like that of the Disciples should have adequate presentation and the book that is to teach it to our future teachers should not limp. The argument of immersion being the "safe" course is fallacious. Of course people should be brought into the church in the proper way but they must have reasons that are convincing. Our baptism is not everywhere received. It is not everywhere recognized. A number of Baptists in the South would reimmerse us. Even some of our "antis" would reimmerse the progressives. The Dunkards and the Dowieites receive only trine immersion. There is no baptism that it universally received.

The book also betrays its archaic point of view in its treatment of the church. The church of Mr. Moninger's book is a skeleton of offices and functions with no meat on its bones. It is not a living, growing thing, but a piece of statuary set up for inspection. He says much of the name of the "divine" creed (can anything but a person be divine?), of a definite form of organization, but nothing of the great task of the church to promote morality, to correct social abuses and to usher in the kingdom of God. Mr. Moninger presents a static church. History shows a dynamic church.

We do not wish to take undue space with a single theme this week and forego further discussion of the archaisms in "The New Testament Church." We find it an uncongenial task to lay bare the nature of the work but feel the service is due our future teachers. We hope Mr. Moninger may be free some day to do the work his training enables him to do. He could write us a very much better book and the brotherhood should see that he does it for his sake and theirs.

Next week we shall consider a more serious matter in connection with the book.

Convention Notes.

No gathering was ever held among the Disciples for which more thorough preparation was made by the local committee than for the New Orleans Convention. W. M. Taylor, the pastor of the Soniat Ave. Church, and chairman of the organizing force, has spent a year of tireless effort in behalf of the meeting. It is not too much to say that the arrangements were as nearly perfect as they could be. Bro. Taylor, his wife and the other members of the local group of Disciples were unceasing in their efforts to promote the comfort of their guests.

The sessions of the convention were held for the most part in the Athenaeum, a building of comfortable and artistic character on St. Charles St., near the Lee Monument, some ten squares from the official headquarters of the St. Charles Hotel. The hall seats about three thousand and was tastefully decorated with flags and the mottoes of the missionary boards. In the lower room the newspaper, missionary societies and colleges had their booths. Sessions of the Christian Women's Board of Missions were held in the Methodist church nearly opposite, a smaller auditorium well adopted to the purpose.

It was a matter of common remark that as a rule the addresses of the convention were of an unusually high order. A comparatively new feature was the use of manuscript by so many of the speakers. Old convention-goers among the Disciples are not accustomed to this. In fact, most of the preaching and public speaking among us has been of the extempore order. It is an encouraging sign that our men are coming to use manuscript and do it with effectiveness. What is lost in directness of appeal may be more than made up in precision, dignity and literary finish. Little is gained and much is lost by shouting and violent gesticulation. An ideal use of manuscript was seen in the address of I. J. Spencer, who had his material, but rarely glanced at it.

Few changes were made in the personnel of the administrative offices among the Disciples. The election of Mrs. Alwater to succeed Mrs. Helen E. Moses was a worthy and expected recognition of a faithful co-worker of the lamented leader. The secretarial force of the Home Board was left unchanged, but the members were given coördinate rather than specific duties—Wright, Ranshaw and Denton being named merely as "secretaries." Another improvement in the official list of the Home Board was the widening of the circle of the Acting Board to include such men as Presidents Howe of Indianapolis and Crossfield of Kentucky, and Pastor Priest of Columbus.

The choice of C. S. Medbury of Des Moines as President of the Centennial Convention at Pittsburg was a merited honor.

The meetings of the Foreign and Home Boards in executive sessions were uneventful. The single item in the former which departed from the usual order was the choice of a committee to confer with a similar committee of the Home Board regarding plans for a mission building in Cincinnati, to be the home of the two societies. This is a much-needed structure, and should be pushed without delay. The Home Board threshed over its new constitution, and after completing the much-needed dress, whimsically decided to leave it for adoption next year. Lovers of the old-fashioned debating exercises among the Disciples will regret to see this new constitution actually adopted, if it ever is. For thereby they will lose one of the most harmless and prolific occasions of the amiable pastime of useless discussion.

A recommendation of the Acting Board that one of the two assistant secretaries be placed in charge of evangelism was the theme of another highly animated debate. It was finally decided that this was inexpedient, inasmuch as the secretaries were already pressed for time with their regular duties. The work was left in the hands of a standing committee on evangelism, the survival of the former Board of Evangelism.

By resolution of the Home Board the Church Extension Board becomes an independent organization. This step was taken to facilitate business, which has hitherto required the official sanction of the Cincinnati office. It is now possible for the Church Extension Board at Kansas City to execute its own legal papers, thus saving much time.

The Morning Mission Study Class which was to have been conducted by Prof. C. T. Paul, was taken by Secretary Corey of the Foreign Society, who made it a daily hour of uplift and inspiration to all who attended.

The official convention program was a handsome booklet of 144 pages, containing not only the order of events in the daily sessions, but the convention hymns, the pulpit assigments for the convention Sunday, statements regarding the Disciples and their various interests, and descriptive features of New Orleans with information as to routes. It was embellished with portraits and other illustrations, and had upon its cover the symbolic crescent of New Orleans and the state seal of Louisiana.

One of the humorous experiences of the delegates was the receipt of letters from home addressed to New Orleans, Mississippi or Alabama. Evidently Northerners are not particularly strong on the geography of the far South.

The weather during the convention was perfect. No compact with the meteorological department could have secured a finer brand. The sun shone bright and warm every day. Residents of New Orleans assured us that the city had just emerged from a long period of rain, which would have been fatal to such a gathering. But the date of convention was most opportune. Every one agreed with President McLean that it was no mistake when the Norfolk Convention chose New Orleans for this year.

During the session of Tuesday morning a telegram was sent to Dr. J. H. Garrison of St. Louis regretting his enforced absence on account of illness, and expressing sympathy.

Secretary Warren, of the Centennial Committee, read a letter of welcome from the mayor of Pittsburg, a similar communication from the Chamber of Commerce of that city, and a telegram from the United Ministerial Associations there, cordially inviting the hosts to that city next year.

The convention sermon was delivered on Tuesday morning by F. W. Burnham of Springfield, Ill., on the theme, "Compulsions—Inward and Outward." It was clear, dignified, masterful. It closed with a telling illustration of the subject, drawn from Mr. Burnham's experience as a railroad man in the far west, where an engineer, after a perilous run to make up time assured him that he had no time to think of fear, for he had but six minutes in which to make the seven miles to Helena.

On Monday evening, C. M. Chilton of St. Joseph, Mo., gave a fine address on "The Men of America for the Man of Galilee." It was a virile appeal to the manhood of the age to take up the tasks of the Son of Man.

President Lang's address was that of a practica business man who is also a devoted Christian. It was full of sound judgment on the conduct of work in the churches and in the mission fields.

A motion to promise the convention to Topeka, Kas., in 1910 was tabled, on the ground that it is unwise to pledge the sessions to any city more than one year in advance.

Conversations with the brethren at New Orleans revealed a keen interest in the ideal of the Christian Century. The men and women of light and leading perceive with pain the unscrupulous effort of a certain newspaper to manipulate the brotherhood into a sectarian and intolerant temper. The prospect of going up to Pittsburg with dissension in our ranks, or, as an alternative, of going up united on a narrow sectarian creed, is repugnant to every mind that has caught the spirit of our plea. Scores of men and women assured us of their belief that the new Christian Century has begun its work in the nick of time and bade us Godspeed. Our issue of last week was in keen demand at our booth and many brethren received its message with outspoken approval. It will be our aim to provide a constantly improving service of news and of spiritual teaching as the weeks pass.

An interesting coincidence was the virtual identity of the leading editorial of the Christian Evangelist last week with that of the Christian Century. The fact that our St. Louis contemporary, so clear in its perception of values, feels the sad contradiction between the sectarian and anti-missionary propaganda of one of our influential newspapers and our triumphal ascent to Pittsburg to celebrate our hundredth year of pleading for Christian union makes us all the more convinced of the importance of our note sounded last week. The greatest aim of this our Centennial year should be to show the world that we ourselves are one. Our plea for the union of others is ridiculous if there is back-biting and dissension among ourselves. "United, we are a great and irresistible force in Christendom, with a sublime mission to accomplish. Divided, we are a contradiction to our own plea and utterly incapable of doing the work to which God has called us."

The admirable singing of the Netz Sisters' quartet and Miss Una Dell Berry was a feature of the convention. Mr. W. E. M. Hackleman had charge of the congregational and chorus singing. We have no superior director in our ranks. We would characterize him as a "noiseless" leader. He knows how to get others to sing without making much fuss himself, and this always helps the dignity and smoothness of a service. Besides, Mr. Hackleman is using more and more the worthy hymns of the church in preference to the weaker modern compositions, and so his influence is educative in the standards of church music. Our own taste would have suggested the removal of the caps worn by the men of the chorus during the service or at least the adoption of a more appropriate type of headgear.

The Home Board has appropriated a thousand dollars for the opening of an institutional work among the incoming foreigners in New York City conditioned on the New York missionary society contributing a like sum. This action is significant in that it is the first institutional work that has ever been undertaken by the American Christian Missionary Society.

Our people have discovered a Russian church in New York City that occupies essentially the position of the Disciples of Christ. It is said they represent a million adherents in Russia. They are quite as much interested in us as we are in them.

The Des Moines churches ran a special train to New Orleans, gathering up a quite a company of ministers and laymen from the state of Iowa and enroute.

In announcing Dr. Willett as the preacher for his evening service, Rev. Dr. Alexander of the Prytania Presbyterian Church in New Orleans, spoke of him as "in the forefront of the leaders among the Disciples of Christ, and, not only so, but numbered among the leading scholars of the world." The congregation that filled the great church at five o'clock heard a masterful sermon by Dr. Willett on "The Questions of the Age and Their Answers."

Rev. H. E. Van Horn, of Des Moines, Iowa, was the preacher at a Sunday morning service in a New Orleans Methodist church. At the close of the sermon the pastor christened two babies. Mr. Van Horn's friends are congratulating him on the prompt response his message received!

The ladies of the First M. E. Church, across the street from the Atheneum, served an excellent lunch to convention people each day of the meetings.

The exhibits of the publishing houses and colleges in the headquarters at the Atheneum were augmented with an interesting museum of objects brought from the Congo country and the Philippines. Dr. Royal J. Dye of Africa was incessant in his efforts to show his "goods." People gathered in groups to enjoy the "continuous performance" of his instructing and interesting descriptions.

The banquets held by the colleges and other groups at New Orleans proved themselves a distraction, if not a nuisance. So many announcements were rushed into the convention sessions that President Long was compelled to speak his protest on the ground that the important business of the convention was being interfered with. New Orleans offered so many attractions to sight-seers that the consciences of the delegates had to be appealed to by President McLean to prevail on them to be present at all sessions and on time. Attendants at our conventions should bear in mind that the matter of utmost importance is the convention itself. Banquets and sight-seeing should be indulged in in the margins and recesses of time, while the right of way is given to the serious interests of the Lord's work.

The address by Dr. Charles Reign Scoville was one of the significant things of the convention. The evangelist appeared in a role not often assumed. He spoke in behalf of the Benevolent Society. Moreover he appeared with a carefully prepared manuscript in his hand from which his address was read. The atmosphere was electric while he held the platform. We regret that we had to leave too soon afterward to procure a copy of the speech. But our hope is to present it to our readers shortly. Many pronounced it one of the most thoughtful productions of the sessions.

When the complimentary resolutions were being considered everybody wanted to get up and tell his appreciation of New Orleans hospitality and that of the little church there. Dr. W. T. Moore secured the floor however and said:

"I hope I may never be called to New Orleans to preach your funeral but if you ever need me and send for me I promise to come and preach you straight to heaven!"

"Last year when Mr. Taylor told me that New Orleans wished to entertain the convention in 1908, I said it would not be possible for the little church to care for us. But when I saw Mrs. Taylor I said it was possible."—Mrs. T. R. Ayars.

It was regrettable that the good order of the Communion service was broken down in the effort to raise the money for ministerial relief. The service had proceeded with quietness and reverence; the deacons had been well instructed in their task of distributing the emblems to the multitude. The talks and prayers and songs all contributed to impress and uplift the soul. Mr. Long's proposal to double the day's offering by his own gift was made with modesty and good taste, yet appealingly. Every soul was touched with the opportunity to aid the aged, needy ministers. In our judgment and that of many whose observations we heard it would have been better to have closed the meeting then, without breaking its spell, than to have let the "rough house" condition set in for the sake of the additional collection. The good influence of a solemn communion service in which the Lord is tenderly remembered by his loving disciples and from which the people disperse in quietness and reverence is of more worth than dollars. Our conventions should see to it that this one service is simply a service of reverent worship free from hand clapping and auctioneering or any matter that destroys the quietness and solemnity of adoration.

Now is the time when the churches that sent their pastors to the convention will get more than their money's worth. Every preacher should go to every state and national convention. And his church should always pay his expenses. There can be no better investment. His sermons will be better; his influence will be wider; the church's standing will be higher; the sense of being a part of a great brotherhood will be more vivid and his own spiritual life will be enriched. Besides, it is a simple debt to the brotherhood to loan your pastor for the time that he may contribute his judgment to the forming of that body of opinion in which our conventions are so important a factor.

Again and again in the lobbies and on the platform mention was made of the generous and intelligent treatment accorded the convention by the papers of New Orleans. An average of two pages each day was given in an illustrated write up of the exercises by both The Picayune and The Times-Democrat, and the afternoon papers were equally liberal. The art of advertizing our convention through the Associated press has not yet been learned by aur leaders. It is a lesson that we should not fail to know well by our Centennial gathering next year.

We can think of only one detail that would have added to the convenience of the delegates of the convention had it been provided. An inexpensive program setting forth the succession of events would have been more usable from hour to hour than the larger booklet which was so easily mislaid and in which the program of exercises was divided into many sections and scattered through many pages.

This great convention so beautifully entertained, so admirably managed, treated by the press more generously than any convention we ever held was made possible by Church Extension. (Opening words of Burras A. Jenkins in his Church Extension address.)

Burras A. Jenkins told a story of a party of folks who made a long difficult trip to a small Kansas town to attend a service in an evangelistic meeting he was conducting. "If people would travel so far under such discomfort to hear me preach," he added, "how far would they go to hear a really sound man?"

An interesting number not set down on the convention program was the wedding of Professor Harold D. Hughes of the University of Missouri and Miss Lulu Lego, an attorney, of Champaign, Ill. The ceremony occurred in the Rest Room of Convention Hall and was performed by Rev. Stephen E. Fisher of Champaign, Ill., assisted by Rev. J. Fred Jones.

An episode graphically characteristic of a convention of Disciples of Christ was the exception taken to the phrase "our honored father, Alexander Campbell," printed in the report of the Benevolent Association. A motion was made, seconded and passed instanter to take out this expression. The Disciples have not lost their sensitiveness to the form of sound speech and refuse in a wholesome temper to acknowledge any man as master or "father" of the Church of Christ.

The Christian Standard and the Convention.

At the time that we go to press this week, the International Convention of the Churches of Christ is in session. The convention has great significance to our brotherhood. Large plans of missionary expansion are being discussed. The greatest optimism concerning our future prevails. Best of all, the spirit of fraternity was never more marked in any convention. Despite efforts made prior to the convention to raise theological issues, they have been entirely absent. The convention has but one mind and that is to speed the coming of the kingdom of God.

In the midst of this situation, we have our conservative journal of Cincinnati with its policy of hostility toward the societies. The owner of the journal did not write against the convention as he first considered doing, but has carried out his threat of not attending. It is to be regretted that he is not there. There is much he could learn of the temper of the Disciples. Before the convention, he published less than any other of our leading journals concerning the convention. The local committee had their reports condensed and garbled. This very week an issue of the paper is being circulated in the convention. It has a strong word of commendation of an "anti" brother connected with the "Firm Foundation" in Texas but has no word for any of our missionaries who have risked their lives across the sea and are now back to render account of their stewardship. He has no expression of interest in the great convention now assembled in New Orleans, but in place of that has an editorial on a county coöperation plan somewhere in Indiana. The commercial instinct, however, is keener than the interest in some other matters. Agents are at the convention selling the products of the company. It is well. No convention would be complete without every type of journalism represented at the booths. So keen is the business instinct of the journal that some of the books published by its company were on sale on the Lord's day of the convention as well as on the days when other men ply commerce. It will be interesting to note whether the coming issue of the paper will crowd out the account of the convention with more praises of "anti" preachers, whether it will forget the significance of a gathering of thousands for the intolerant criticisms on the personnel of the centennial program.

It has already become apparent to members of the church of all theological persuasions that the interests of the kingdom are of far more importance than the vaporings of an obscure and belated journalism. We will continue to send out missionaries at home and abroad. We will use the methods that experience has indicated as being the most perfect mode of fulfilling the ideal of the Great Commission. Our secretaries may sometimes have to waste time meeting the small criticisms that have come from our conservative journal. Where no principle is involved, they may even humor our petulant journalistic child. But no journal shall ever get in the road of the Great Commission and live. The missionary ideal of Jesus Christ is as fixed in our church as the law of gravitation. It is as all-compelling as wind and tide. Woe be to any puny force that sets itself against the movement to take the world for Jesus Christ.

The Convention Communion Service.

An established feature of our national conventions is the Sunday afternoon celebration of the Lord's Supper. It is one of the most characteristic events of our great annual gatherings. From the first the brotherhood of Disciples has made much of this beautiful feast of memory. No Lord's Day passes by without a spreading of the Master's table. It has ever been observed in the simplest form and spirit. This simplicity characterizes our great gatherings in National Convention. At New Orleans the Atheneum was filled with a multitude, gathering in the quietest reverence. The President of the Home Society, Mr. R. A. Long, presided. Talks were made by J. B. Briney and W. T. Moore, each of whom also offered a prayer of thanksgiving.

It was a magnificent picture that we beheld; the chorus banking the platform, the fifty deacons solemnly walking two abreast to their respective sections of the house bearing the broken loaf and the cup, the honored patriarchs sitting at the table of Christ and offering for the waiting worshippers their priestly prayers—the moment was heavy with the presence of God. The great choir gave wings to our aspirations, the song by the Netz Sisters threw about us the weird yet not unnatural shadows of Gethsemane and Calvary. Our hearts were hushed. Christ was near. It seemed easy to "keep in memory" his wondrous life and death of mercy. Every soul rose to the heights where division cannot abide—the heights of love. J. B. Briney spoke a word of fine insight when he said that our salvation was not assured unless to the full principles of our obedience we added the obedience of memory. The Lord's Supper is a means provided by our Master by which we may keep in memory the facts of the gospel and make them vital in our experience.

Then the emblems were passed to us all while our hearts, constrained by the love of Christ, yearned for some sweet task to do for his sake. Then came the announcement of Mr. Long asking for an offering for aged and broken ministers. Nothing could have been more opportune. The soil of our hearts was ready for just this seed and it brought forth fruit forthwith. The president's generous and modest proposal to double the offering of the day made a total collection of two thousand dollars for Ministerial Relief. Thus were blended in one beautiful service the vision and the task. Thus the vast throng gathered from the ends of our country bore its simple testimony to the power and glory of the Cross.

The Church's Message to the Men of this Day.

By Arthur Holmes.

In the judgment of the world the average church does not contribute to the practical efficiency of men. No one seeking a position, urges the church membership as evidence of superior fitness for any line of work.

Neither in the production of character is the church rated an important factor. A baptismal certificate counts for less than political influence; a receipt for pew-rent less than one for house-rent.

In general, the moral worth of church members may be counted a little higher than that of others, but still each individual case must be tested before final acceptance. Even in religion churchmen are not unique. Lack of church membership does not infallibly mark lack of belief in essential Christian doctrines. Evangelists advertise this fact when they will call for response from those "who are Christians but not church members."

On the whole the church seems to play no direct and vigorous part in the worldy affairs of men. Politics are shunned by it; dolges are indifferent to it; labor unions are ignored by it; athletics neglected by it; sports frowned upon by it. It appears to be out of touch with the problems of today; distant from the lively interests of flesh-and-blood men in this present world. Besides the message of personal salvation in a world to come, what message can it give for this world? The message almost announces itself.

The principle of individualism preached in 1776, and our present industrial methods made possible by the inventions of 1760-1785, have shown their impracticability. Society itself, through its slow evolution from dominence by the autocrat, the aristocracy and the middle class is coming to recognize a new class. Workingmen in their struggles from slavery up, are taking a place in society never possessed before. The change furnishes the church with her opportunity.

Her opportunity lies in the fact that the method of this revolution is educational. East side Jews of New York City read more solid books proportionately than any other people in this country, and nearly every Jew of them is a revolutionist. Labor unions are colleges of oratory and parliamentary training schools. One radical body, in one city, held as many street-meetings a week as the most evangelistic denomination did all summer.

With such methods the church is familiar. Her open pulpit enables her to take the leading part in the campaign. Never before in the history of the world did means and end fall together more opportunely. In a few decades, out of all this present travail is to emerge a new social order of some kind. Whether it shall be grounded upon principles final and lasting, or upon those like the present ones—human makeshifts, blind-gropings, temporary expedients—will depend upon the church's daring and abilitiy to press home her divine plan of social salvation.

That plan was enunciated by the Master. It is nothing more nor less than the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth—prayed for a billion times, the consummation of gospel preaching, the end of the mission of the Son of God. For two thousand years it has remained dormant as an earthly force. Now it begins to emerge from its symbolic trappings and is putting forth its claims as a perfectly feasible and divinely appointed world-order. It presents itself as a community of men and women actuated in all their conduct by brotherly love, controlled in all their activities by the Golden Rule.

The Kingdom of God—an old term with a new content—is, then, the message for the average church striving to touch men. Let it first be studied long and devoutly by the preacher. When he sees its implications and extensions his homiletic vision will be marvelously enriched and broadened.

Positively set forth, it will surely attract men, for it touches their interests at every point. Urged in business, it will be revolutionary; in politics, it will be the final reform; in the industrial world, the universal arbitrator. It furnishes the middle ground for employer and employe. It provides a new and broader basis for the adjustment of their difficulties by removing the cause of their antagonism. In the place of individual self-seeking it puts fraternal helpfulness. In the place of insane and wasteful competition it puts rational co-operation. It reduces the scramble for a mere livelihood to the minimum and urges as the chief incentive to activity, the acquisition of eternal values. It condemns the cynicism of making economic success depend upon men's worse motives and positively preaches the optimism of men's essential goodness. It enlivens the struggle for righteousness by drawing the center of interest away from a spectral and inane eternity to a vivid and eternal now. It transforms the minister from a shadow of the things to come, clothes him with flesh and blood, and sets him down in the turmoil of this day as a vigorous force, an arbiter of men's most urgent interests, a prophet with an idealistic message whose details may not be worked out until long after he is gone, but whose consummation is as certain to his mind as to the mind of his Master two thousand years ago.

Mrs. F. H. S. Ayars, of St. Louis, in beginning her address as president of the Benevolent Association uttered one of the most beautiful sentiments of the convention. She called attention to the sights of interest in the quaint city that was entertaining us. Especially was she interested in the statues of the city, with those of Jackson and Lee standing out most conspicuous. New Orleans, like ancient Athens, seems to be given to making altars to her heroes—altars to the gods of war and of peace. "But as I passed by," she went on, "I beheld an altar to an Unknown God, the God of the Common life. It is the statue of Margaret, a plain baker and milk woman who accumulated a large fortune and gave the greater portion to the children of the poor. The sculptor made her face plain. He clad her figure in working clothes. But did you see the look in her eye? Did you not feel with the child the warmth of the arm with which she held it? This altar is the humanest altar in New Orleans. It is the altar to the greatest God of all. And my message to you today is to declare the God whom you ignorantly worship."

"Our plea is especially adapted to the Philippines. The old Jerusalem gospel is the best force to shatter the old Roman presumption."—Rev. Herman P. Williams, Missionary to the Philippines.

"It is our business to make the Bible known, not to criticise it, nor yet to dramatically defend it with an eye to the galleries, but simply to teach it."—Rev. F. W. Burnham, Springfield, Ill.

Mr. R. A. Long, of Kansas City, came to the convention in his private car. His presidential address was a nearnest and suggestive statement of the need of enlisting themen of our churches in missions. Here, it was felt by all who heard him, is the ideal layman, a man who possesses not only a generous heart but who makes himself intelligent on the things of the church, so that he may share in the responsibility for its proper guidance. George H. Combs is a great preacher. But a great preacher is not just an individual, he is a situation. That Kansas City church, with the intelligence and tenderness of R. A. Long to lead it, supplies the supplemental factor necessary to make a great preacher. Pastors need laymen who are able to make suggestions, who have ideas, who think of things to do, who point out tasks for their minister and think of ways and tokens by which they may show their appreciation of him. This is the kind of church the Independence Boulevard congregation is. And any church may become as great and useful if its laymen will go at things in the same way.

The Compulsion of Responsibility.

Synopsis of Convention Sermon delivered by Rev. F. W. Burnham of Springfield at the New Orleans Convention.

Before every death is a life and beneath a great life are the mainsprings of activity. If we turn back to view the record of Jesus' life we shall find it crowded with work. By Jacob's well, though athirst and aweary with his journey, he makes his need a means to the rescue of a soul almost drowned in sin. After the transfiguration, while his disciples would build booths for rest upon the mount, he hastens down to heal the paralytic boy, and when they would pause to theorize of sin and its evolution He opens blinded eyes. Such was his constant labor. Of only one day do we read in which he failed to accomplish his full purpose. "In Nazareth he did not many mighty works because of their unbelief." If we look for a motive power sufficient to hold life up to such strenuous exertions we may find it expressed in the response which Jesus made to the dogmatic speculation of his disciples as to whose sin caused the begger to be born blind. Note the scene.

It was evening. As the sun sank behind the hills into the great sea the Sabbath day was closing. It had been a trying day for the Master. He had again met the Pharisees and Sadducees in the temple. He had tried to bring them to a knowledge of the truth, but, meeting only stubborn opposition and wilful blindness he so charged their sin home upon them, that, in their rage, they took up stones to drive him from the temple area. Having escaped them he was about to pass out of the city, overwhelmed with grief and sick at heart with the world's darkness and misery, when the sight of a poor blind beggar arrested his thought and revived his energy. He paused and looked upon the beggar. Here, at least, He could cause the light to shine, and here, its illuminating rays would be welcome. While, therefore, his disciples raised the question as to "whose sin" Jesus yielded to the urgent motive that swayed his soul, turned aside their untimely question, and welcomed the present duty with the words "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work."

Jesus said "I must work" and followed the word with the deed. The word is one of the soul-keys to this life. It was the expression of that inward motive which was moving him in his daily tasks. If the multitudes turned away and forsook him because of his severe teaching, still He must give them the truth. If nine out of ten lepers healed by his divine power forgot to thank him or give praise to God, still he must heal the sick, bind up the broken-hearted, and proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord. If Jerusalem rejected him, and refused the salvation He brought to her gates, yet He must weep for her sin and preach deliverance to her captives. When friends forsook him, and enemies, with triumphant wickedness, adding injury to insult wreaked cruel vengeance upon him, He still must endure unto the end. And when, at last, a lost and ruined world denied him the lowest place and crucified its Prince of Peace it was still his sense of oughtness which made his endure the cross and despise its shame.

Next to "I will," "I must" embraces the greatest fact of the human soul—its response to a compelling motive. Yet it is a familiar phrase and may express a varied necessity. The slave, with the crack of the lash in his ears says, "I must," and sullenly goes to his task. His is the necessity of obedience born of fear. The farmer says, "I must" and tills the soil and reaps the harvest. His must springs from desire. So also the politician says, "I must," and by the force of ambition becomes all things to all men for an office. By the power of invincible genius the artist says, "I must," and paints his picture though he die in poverty waiting the tardy recognition of a fickle world.

How great the power of this sense of compulsion was and how readily Jesus yielded to it, we can only estimate as we comprehend the magnitude of the work laid upon him—a work so great and a sense of responsibility so compelling, as Henry Churchill King suggests, as would simply topple any other brain that the world has even known into insanity—and as we realize the completeness with which he met the Father's will. The sense and urgency of this responsibility seems never to have been absent from him. Many of his words well up from this hidden power, as familiar scenes bring the truth before his mind. A sower goes forth to sow and the sight reminds him that he must sow the good seeds of the kingdom and he breathes that lesson into a parable. Fishermen at their nets call up his mission of catching men. The pearl merchant gathering pearls thrusts upon his mind the fact that the truth and life he holds in trust are the world's pearls of great price. A wandering sheep recalls his Father's anxious care for the lost; the shepherds with their herds, His larger pastorship; the folding of his sheep at night and His mighty task of gathering the children of men home to the fold.

Now, I suggest that the difference between success and failure, in the lives of many men, is largely due to their possessing or lacking this sense of responsibility as a motive power. A successful life as we have seen in Jesus' example, consists of accepting and meeting with steadfast resolution, life's responsibilities as they come.

If one, inexperienced in such matters, were to go into the great mercantile establishments of our larger cities, and should attempt to find the proprietor he would likely meet with some surprises. Perhaps upon entering he would be pleased to think that his search would be brief. There would meet him at the door, a well-dressed, courteous gentleman having an air of importance about him as he graciously receives the stranger. "This is the proprietor, no doubt," thinks our friend. He is asked to follow this guide and they walk back into the building. As they pass along, he sees numbers of men quietly working, any one of whom he thinks might be the man he is seeking. But they are all passed by. Finally, at a far corner of the building, seated in a little office with an electric light burning above his head, papers books and files stacked up on every side, with a face set with marks of strenuous effort, a man is pointed out hard at work making notes with pen while he dictates to a stenographer. The stranger is told to wait here an opportunity to speak to the proprietor, with the added word, to "make it short for he is a busy man." He waits in meditative wonder. Here before him is the man who owns and controls this entire enterprise. He may say to any one or all of the leisurely-working employes that tomorrow he may go, and he goeth. He dictates their hours of service and the wages they shall receive for their toil—they are his men. He himself is absolutely free. No one tells him that he must work today, yet here he is, the busiest man of them all. No one is driven to his work or executes it with such energy. What power holds him here and impels the enginery of his being? Responsibility! A great business has been built up. Mighty interests are at stake. The ramifications of his commerce are multitudinous and he must work. It is his response to this motive power that makes success.

Distinguish, now, this compulsion of responsibility from the compulsion of necessity from without—the inward sense of duty from mere conformity to the requirements of the occasion. The one is expression of life, the other repression. The one is expansive, the other contractive. The one is liberty, fresh and inspiring the other is bondage stringent and chafing. The one is compulsion from without, as when the mill-wheel turns from the pressure of water flowing over it; the other is compulsion from within as when the electric motor turns with lightning speed to release its pent-up energy. By compulsion from without, the unwilling laborer goes jaded and unstrung, self-whipped to his task. By compulsion from within, Henry Ward Beecher was wont to seek his cellar Sunday afternoons to shovel sand for an hour as a safety escape for the excess of vital energy within him. By compulsion from without, the nominal Christian, belated, seeks a place in the congregation at the hour of worship or grudgingly yields up a miserable pittance for the support of God's kingdom. By compulsion from within the Aposte Paul counted all things as loss forthe excellency of the knowldege of Christ, and became all things to all men that he might bring others to Christ. By compulsion from without, we spend days and weeks dawdling over the tasks of an hour. By compulsion from within, Jesus compressed the work of a life into three brief years saying as He toiled, "I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day; the night cometh when no man can work."

Now in the realm of religion this compulsion from within is the dynamic of Christianity. This very sense of moral obligation is the creation of God's own handiwork within us, and to it he appeals both for our personal rescue from sin and for the proclamation of the gospel unto the ends of the world.

When Jesus commissioned his apostles to preach the gospel to every creature, hanging upon their proclamation the awful consequence that he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be condemned, he relied upon each individual's response to the call of duty in the accomplishment of His own destiny. If in the presence of the clear testimony as to God's will which Jesus brings, there is no yielding to the sense of obligation, a man can not be saved. The compulsion of responsibility will inevitably be felt when the proclamation of the gospel with its facts, commands and promises has been made. If a man resists this compulsion he does so at his own peril. Jesus said, "And this is condemnation, that light is come into the world and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil."

And this principle, you will see, applies not only to the matter of primary obedience, but also to the whole process of the development of the godly life. It seems to me that this is what Paul meant when he wrote to the Galatians, "I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you."

This compulsion of responsibility is what gives to love its power, so that love becomes the fulfilling of the law. Without it love si a mere sentiment. With it love is the fulness of out-going life, active, potent, complete. Even divine love felt the power of responsibility toward a perishing world and sent the Only Begotten Son to redeem it. It is of the highest importance that every Christian cultivate this sense and habit of responding to the compulsive power of duty.

As this compulsion of responsibility is the centripetal force of righteousness which binds the individual soul to God, so it is also the centrifugal force of missionary zeal, which sends the redeemed man to carry the good news to others. When Jesus gave the great commission to the disciples He prefaced the statement of their two-fold duty with a sentence which would ever remind them of their responsibility to him. "All authority is given unto me, both in heaven and on earth, go ye therefore."

Now I come to answer the question which I presume you have all along been asking, "What has all this to do with this convention and thework of the American Christian Missionary Society?" Much in every way.

First, it ought to help us to see that the work to which God has called us—the work about which we are here to take counsel together, is not something which can be lightly neglected, carelessly done, or left entirely to others. Said the ancient prophet, Jeremiah, "Cursed be he that doth the work of the Lord negligently." There is a compulsion in all this work of God that we must learn to feel, until it makes us do it faithfully and zealously.

Secondly, it ought to help us to understand that the accomplishment of life's great purposes, the fulfillment of its highest mission, is not to be the result of some one mighty effort nor a thing to be attained by spasmodic efforts and intermitting energies; but must be the legitimate result of constant, purposeful response to a divine and God-nurtured motive power within us. Missionary life, purpose and thought and giving must be a constant abiding portion of the total Christian life, if the enterprises of the kingdom are to normally develop and live. In the work of the A. C. M. S. there is need that every church, and every individual, do his best for the Lord, do it now, and keep doing it. If there is to be a glorious future for our work or we are to have a splendid consummation for our day of toil, it must come this way. Today is the day of opportunity. "The night cometh."

A further answer to the query will be found in the definite work, the responsibilities of which center in this convention. What are the duties toward which we should here feel the sense of responsibility?

1. We stand responsible to God and to man to the full extent of our ability for the evangelization of America. The addresses from this platform, as well as the mottoes about the walls, will enforce this obligation. The rapid increase of our population, the growth of our cities with all their perils and their problems, which, as Josiah Strong has well said, constitute a challenge to Christian service and Christian statesmanship. The settling up of our western states, the open doors in the east, the new south with its new opportunities, the success of our reformation movement, the ripe fields of our island possessions, the holding of our outposts until reinforcements can come, all these and more, indicate a responsibility whose compulsion none can escape.

2. Since the only means which God has chosen for making known his will to the people of the present age is the testimony He has given through His Son, Jesus Christ, and since He has entrusted the preservation, interpretation and proclamation of that testimony to the faithfulness of the man who believes it, therefore, we stand responsible to Him for providing the best possible means of attaining that end. We must care for the word of God, not criticise it, nor, as I think, dramatically—with an eye to the gallery—defend it; but faithfully and humbly teach it.

3. For those of us who are preachers and teachers, we must so declare the testimony which God has given of His Son, and so interpret the message of the gospel, and so exemplify the spirit of the Master unto our people, that there be a growing, instead of a declining sense of man's responsibility to his Maker and Redeemer. It seems to me that the crime of our age is the slackening regard for authority, both divine and human. We owe it to our fellow men, to our age and to our God, to help stem this tide of lawlessness.

An incident in my experience as a telegraph operator will serve to give emphasis to the present duty. The east-bound passenger train on the Rocky Mountain division of the Northern Pacific, due at Clough Junction, half way down the Mullen Pass, to Helena, at eight o'clock, p. m., was one summer night about two hours late. Being a trans-continental train carrying government mails, it was important that as much as possible of this time be made up. The track was cleared by the dispatcher's orders and a special schedule of high speed issued for the train. We were all anxious and eager to see the results. We listened attentively to the clicking of the instruments on our table, as one after another, the operators reported the train out of their station. Up the grade on the other side of the divide the great engine struggled heroically, keeping to the schedule and steadily whittling down the time. Then the summit was passed and down the grade she plunged. Presently the clicking indicated that Butler, the station above us, had been reached. The night operator and I stepped out on the platform to see her pass. We could hear the roar of the on-coming train as of distant thunder. Then a flash like a meteor darted across the darkened west, as the train shot out of one tunnel, across dizzy curving trestles and into another. As she came into sight again we could see that, the retainers being set, which applies a precautionary pressure of four pounds to the square inch on the wheels, the sparks were flying from the breaks so that the train seemed to travel on a bed of stars. Rounding the mountain side immediately above us her light flashed along the railsas she headed down the straight piece of track that passed our station. On she came, thundering, swaying, plunging, almost leaping, as, spurning the grade with her whirling wheels she flew toward her destination. Instinctively we stepped inside to avoid the rushing tempest, and in an instant was lost from view around the curve below.

The next day the engineer who pulled that train stopped at my station on his way up the mountain. Speaking of the run of the night before I asked him if he wasn't afraid of making such terrific speed on those dangerous curves. His reply I shall never forget, "Afraid my boy!" said he "Afraid, why I haven't any time to be afraid; when we went by here we had six minutes to make Helena, seven miles away, and we had to get there."

Brethren, Servants of the Living God, Engineers of the Gospel train, the schedule of our speed is high, God's track is clear, the limit is set, there is no time to lose or be afraid, our supreme duty is to get there.

A DOZEN INSTANCES OF PROVERBIAL INCONSISTENCY.

"Consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds."—Emerson.

Many hands make light work. Also—Too many cooks spoil the broth.

Everything comes to him who waits. But then—He who would find must seek.

All truths are not to be told. And yet—Tell the truth and shame the devil.

Be sure you are right, then go ahead. Though—Nothing venture, nothing have.

No jealousy, no love. Though—In jealousy there is more self-love than love.

The face is the index of the mind. Yet—A fair skin oft covers a crooked soul.

The end justifies the means. But one should—Never do evil that good may come of it.

Good fortune ever fights on the side of the prudent. And just as truly—Fortune favors the bold.

Birds of a feather flock together. But how about—Two birds of prey do not keep each other company.

He who hunts two hares at once will catch neither. Yet—It is always good to have two irons in the fire.

The middle path is the safe path. But how about—The neutral is soused from above and singed from below.

Finally: A proverb is one man's wit and all men's wisdom. Though—A formal fool speaks nought but proverbs.

Origin of the Union Congress.

The writer made the following suggestion in an address at the Baptist Congress at Baltimore a year ago:

"Why may we not have joint sessions of the Congresses of the Baptists and of the Disciples? The two organizations stand related alike to the respective denominations. Both are voluntary associations and have no organic relations with the churches. In fact, the Disciples copied our Congress from the Baptists, even to the name Congress. Joint Congresses would be another occasion for cultivating acquaintance. My plan is that we do everything to ereate occasions for mingling together. We already agree, and are one in essential faith and practice. All that is left to do is the breaking down of surviving prejudices through acquaintance, the proclamation of union as an immediate obligation, and the consummation of local unions wherever conditions are ripe for them."

As a result of private conferences with the Executive Committee of the Baptist Congress in which the desirableness of holding joint congresses was affirmed by all, the Baptist Committee met December 9, 1907, in New York, and issued the following invitation:

"Resolved, That the Free Baptists and Disciples of Christ be invited to unite with us in the work of the Congress and that we ask the appointment of one or more representative men from each of these bodies to meet with this committee to consider the feasibility of such a union and to arrange necessary details." To represent the Disciples, J. P. Lichtenberger and M. L. Bates were appointed by the President of the Disciples' Congress, W. F. Richardson. After the Joint Congress had been agreed upon in the conferenees of these committees, the arrangement of a program was turned over to the Program Committee of the Congress, of which George B. Van Arsdall is Secretary. The above program is thus the joint product of committees of the three bodies.

Baptist Fraternity.

It will thus be seen that the Disciples' participation in this Congress is due to the fraternal spirit of the Executive Committee of the Baptist Congress. On that committee are the following representative Baptists: Rev. Henry M. Saunders, D. D., who is chairman; Rev. James M. Bruce, C. D. Case, Ph. D., Norman Fox, D. D., Frank M. Goodchild, D. D., W. A. Granger, D. D., Rufus P. Johnson, D. D., William M. Lawrence, D. D., Albert G. Lawson, D. D., Robert McDonald, D. D., Rev. E. T. Tomlinson, Ph. D., Rev. A. S. Wishart. The two men upon whom fall the principle part of the work in connection with the Congress are Theo. A. R. Gessler, D. D., the secretary, and W. B. Mattison, D. D., the treasurer. The larger number of these men live in or near New York City, where all the meetings of the committee are held. This committee is a self-perpetuating body, and continues from year to year unchanged, except as members resign, move away, or die: unlike the Managing Committee of the Disciples' Congress, which is appointed newly each year by the Congress. There are many advantages in the Baptist plan of organization, notably the connectedness of management, which provides for a better distribution of speakers, and a wider representation of themes in a series of annual programs. This committee has all the records of previous meetings and knows who have been on the program and what themes were discussed. It has a formal membership of people who pay a regular fee of five dollars or less toward the expenses of the meetings. It spends as much as $1,000 on each meeting. The traveling and entertainment expenses of all the speakers are paid, thus insuring the appearance of every speaker in a way that can not be done when each one is permitted to bear his own expenses. The meetings of the Disciples' Congress seldom cost the committee in charge more than $150 or $200. Another item of expense in the Baptist Congress is the stenographical report of all the addresses or talks made, and their publication in book form.

This Congress seems a most admirable and providential opportunity for the cultivation of acquaintance between Baptists and Disciples, and for the discussion of the problem of union between the three bodies. This is the first union congress, but it is the hope of both Baptists and Disciples connected with it, that it shall become a permanent organization. There has been an effort in recent meetings of the Disciples' Congress to change the annual to a biennial meeting. If a joint congress with the Baptists could be consummated, to meet once in two years, then both bodies could hold annual meetings within their own ranks on alternate years. Some such arrangement as this—biennial joint congresses and biennial denominational congresses on alternate years—may result from this meeting. It would certainly be an ideal place for closer relations, and constitute one of the first steps toward the organic union of the three bodies.

Place of Meeting.

The Memorial Church of Christ, the union church of which Prof. H. L. Willett is minister, has been selected as the place of meeting. No place could be more fitting for the first of these union congresses than that church which was among the first to be dedicated to the union of these great religious communions. There the Baptists who attend the Congress will be at home and there likewise will Disciples be at home, for it is the common home of nearly one thousand Baptists and Disciples who have found it a good and pleasant thing to dwell together in unity.

Our New Serial.

We begin within two weeks a new serial story by the popular author of St. Cuthbert's—Mr. Robt. E. Knowles, entitled "The Dawn at Shanty Bay." Mr. Knowles is so well known and his former books have been so favorably received that nothing more need be said than that this story is fully up to his high standard.

This is a pathetic but entrancing story of a stern Scotchman who struggled against his heart's desire for many years. Tell your friends that now is a good time to begin a new subscription. Send for our special offer.

humanity in the name of the one Master? A devout man, denied the privilege of the communion by a church that was zealous for its opinions, asked to be excused for his blunder on the ground that he thought it was the Lord's Supper that was being celebrated. He had no desire to intrude himself into a private feast. There is a great deal to be said about making the Lord's Supper a private affair. Any church that is careless about its whole duty is in a measure giving the supper the character of a private feast. The man who is doing his full amount of work honors his Lord when he partakes of the loaf and of the cup. Before we conclude that a church is holding up the lamp of the gospel in its community because it meets every Lord's Day to break bread we must inquire concerning its understanding of the commission to make disciples of all the nations; we must ask whether wicked men fear it or not when they plan injustice. The man in the world cannot understand the significance of the Lord's Supper, at least we need not be alarmed if he sees no purpose to be served by it, but he does know how much we weigh morally and he judges our religious observances by our manner of life. Do we not provoke the Lord to jealousy if we come to his table and yet refuse to do his work? Is there any conduct more disgraceful and horrible than that of men who observe the form of the ordinances of the Lord and manifest none of the spirit which the ordinances were designed to represent?

"Many Among You are Weak and Sickly."

The proper observance of the Lord's Supper is a means of spiritual culture. This is to be assumed among Disciples of Christ. If Paul were with us today, he would have to repeat some of his warnings. Not a few churches are weak and sickly because they are neglecting to use the means of grace provided for them. One is tempted to doubt that we have power to sit down and think seriously for ten minutes on the death of Christ and its meaning for us. We must have some sort of aid besides the silent loaf and cup. Do we not need to cultivate the habit of meditation? If we will only see it, we are highly favored when we are permitted to sit with our brethren and think upon the great themes of the gospel. Perhaps one reason that some have never been able to derive any benefit from the Lord's Supper is that they have associated it with a spirit of contention. A tirade against brethren whose opinions are repugnant to the elder in charge is hardly an aid to devotion, but it is sometimes heard. It has not been long since I heard an anti-missionary, anti-organ, anti-Sunday-school elder deliver at the table a speech full of reproaches for those who do not agree with him. Then harm is done by the careless way in which this ordinance is observed. There ought to be some limit to the amount of noise a deacon is allowed to make when he serves the congregation. The people ought not to begin to gather up their wraps before the service is ended. Awkwardness is not to be considered a virtue at the Lord's table. "Let all things be done decently and in order?"

CHAPTER XX.

The Heart in the Black Acre.

"Jean, I do not know what plans you and Evelyn have made regarding your marriage, but I have a suggestion or two to make."

Uncle Jasper and Jean had been going over some business matters together. Jean had telephoned for Uncle Jasper's lawyer to call for the purpose of making out some papers, and they were now waiting for him.

"We have no definite plans, but I am urging Evelyn to an early marriage," replied Jean.

"I think you are right there, Jean, I do not believe in long engagements. Then, too, you are now in your twenty-sixth year and ready to begin your life work. I think now that the Settlement House will be ready to open by midsummer. We will have it fully equipped in every particular, and in full running order when the formal opening is made. My plan is this—that you and Evelyn be married on the day it is opened, go directly from the church to the Settlement House, and, as husband and wife, receive those people whom you are going to try to help."

"Splendid, Uncle Jasper! I believe Evelyn will agree to that."

"The building is for the people of the Black Acre. The heart of the Black Acre has always been their greatest curse, and now, with God's help, we will make it their greatest blessing. It is your inheritance, Jean, and I see great possibilities for you in it. It will mean hard work, as hard as though you were down in the mine, but I will amply endow it so you will never be hampered as to means, and you will win in the end.

"As soon as it can be arranged, I want you and Mr. Hathaway, Evelyn and Lottie to go to Philadelphia and select the books for the library. Our aim will be to make it one of the best working libraries in the state. We want it to meet the needs of every man, woman and child in the Black Acre."

"I don't know whether I told you that I was in correspondence with a number of furniture and gymnasium fixture dealers, and I expect some of their agents on next week to take list of what we want along those lines and make us some prices," said Jean.

"I will leave all that to you, young man, and Evelyn will be excellent help. But here is Mr. Cartwright."

The next few weeks were busy ones for Jean and Evelyn. They spent much of their time in the Settlement House, selecting and arranging the furniture, overseeing the decorators, etc. Mrs. Hathaway complained that she could hardly get possession of Evelyn long enough to fit on the dresses the dressmaker was so busy making.

There was one suite of rooms of which Uncle Jasper carried the keys. Mysterious crates and packages found their way to them

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett.

Please name some books which set forth the principles and methods of the historical and critical study of the Bible.

P. S. W.

Batten, "The Old Testament from the Modern Point of View" (Pott & Co., $1.25); Horton, "Revelation and the Bible" (Macmillan, $2.00); Kent, "The Origin and Permanent Value of the Old Testament" (Scribner, $1.25); Bennett and Adeney, "Introduction to the Bible" (Whittaker, $2.00).

Do you regard the Book of Job as historical? What is its purpose and value? Name some helpful works on Job. F.

Three views have been held regarding the historicity of the book. One is that it is a record of fact throughout. A second is that it is purely a work of the imagination. The third holds it to be a poetic embellishment of an ancient story, and thus based on fact. This is the most satisfactory view. The purpose of the work was to explain the mystery of suffering as it falls upon the innocent. Its value as an aid to faith among the Hebrews in an age of trial like the exile must have been very great. Yet its answer is not final, nor even the most satisfactory which the Old Testament offered. The prophets, especially those whose message is contained in Isaiah 40-55, presented the highest view of the matter to be found before the coming of Christ. Among the best works on Job are Gibson (in the Westminster Commentary Series), Genung, "Epic of the Inner Life," Chryor, "Job and Solomon," Peete, "Job" (in the Century Bible), and the articles on the book in Hasting's Bible Dictionary and the Encyclopaedia Biblica.

Is there a book which treats of the influence of the Bible upon English literature, and gives examples from the best writers?

Chicago. R.B.

Cook, "The Bible and English Prose Style," (Heath) would probably give what you want. Henry Van Dyke has a work on the biblical quotations of Tennyson, "Shakespeare's use of the Bible" is the title of a work by Mary A. Wadsworth.

Do you regard the Apocrypha as valuable matter for study? What is the best form in which to secure it? Student.

There are many of the apocryphal books which have a high value. The best of them are The Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus and Maccabees. The romances of Tobit and Judith are not without interest and the Apocalypses of II Esdras and Baruch were highly prized by Jews and Christians. The apocryphal books are issued by the Oxford and Cambridge presses in a form corresponding to the Revised Version of the Bible. The cost in cloth is 50 cents.

and Jean and Evelyn wondered a good many times why they did not have access there, but not a word was said in their hearing to indicate for what they were to be used.

The last of July found the Settlement House completed, and the formal opening was to take place the fourth of August. A dainty invitation, surmounted by a lithograph of the beautiful building, was sent to every home in the Black Acre, and a general invitation given to the people of Minington.

The eventful day came at last and the work in the breaker and at the spindles was not quite so hard, for the little toilers were in eager anticipation because they were all going to the "big doin's" in the heart of the Black Acre, and many extra pieces of "finery" had been washed, aired or otherwise put in readiness for the great occasion.

It was early evening when a wedding procession slowly wended its way through the doors of Grace Church. The wedding march from Lohengrin sounded soft and distant. Mr. Hathaway was in the lead, then followed little Margaret Hannibal, a cherub in loveliness with her dainty white slippers, gauzy dress and a wreath of daisies crowning her yellow hair, carrying the wedding ring. Next came the beautiful bride leaning on the arm of the man she loved. They stopped at the altar, the same altar at which they had plighted their love, and the tones of the organ softened into a melodious whisper as Mr. Hathaway spoke the words that united Jean and Evelyn in marriage. The ceremony over, the wedding party entered the carriages that were in waiting, and were taken to the new Settlement House.

The heart of the Black Acre was ablaze with light from the magnificent building which stood in bold relief against the black culm heaps and tall breakers; the front of the building at the point of the heart, and the sides following the lines of the lot, with a colonnade of brown stone pillars surrounding the whole structure. The motto, "Here Let No Man Be Stranger," shone in letters of light over the wide arch spanning the doors which were thrown open and in the broad corridor, under tall palms and white jessamine stood Jean and Evelyn. Never did bride look more beautiful; her white gown fell about her in soft folds, and rare lace obscured but slightly her fair arms and neck. Pressing towards them were brawny men and toil-hardened women; uncouth and common, yet Evelyn knew almost every one of them. She had been in their homes, carried flowers to their sick and soothed their dying. She was still "Miss Evelyn" to them, and many a horny hand pressed her soft white one and voices with foreign accent faltered their congratulations. Jean's hand they grasped as a comrade. He was again one of them for he would live and work side by side with them in the Black Acre.

The wonderful building opened a new world to these people of the mines. Their astonishment grew to bewilderment as they passed from one department to another. First was a large library with its stacks of books, and alcoves provided with tables and writing materials; here were also all the leading periodicals and daily papers of the day.

Next came the kindergarten department with its rows of low tables and little red chairs, its windows filled with red geraniums and its walls covered with pictures of birds and animals. Arranged on low shelves around the room was the children's own library, the books just right for little hands to reach and for little minds to enjoy. Then the gymnasiums and bath rooms, the sewing room, and the kitchen for the cooking class. Behind a lunch counter was the genial, happy face of Penny; the same Penny as of old with always a jolly word for every one. For three years he had been the chef on a Pullman diner, but at Jean's earnest request he accepted this place in the Settlement House.

On the other side was the music room and just beyond it the chapel that would seat a thousand people, provided with a splendid pipe organ. The building was divided at the rear, leaving a court. This was made into a casino and covered with a glass dome. Extending around it was an immense gallery with seats for thousands. Here was ample room for indoor base ball, basket ball, polo, races and other athletic games.

The people were conducted through all the departments and their uses explained. Warm lunches, lemonade and ice cream were served to all while bands discoursed sweet music in different parts of the building. Finally the tones of the pipe organ drew the crowd to the chapel and Mr. Hathaway stood before them and in a few well chosen words, dedicated the magnificent building, with all its equipments, to the people of the Black Acre. And when the organist struck the deep chords of the doxology, a thousand voices broke forth in the grand old hymn, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

Little Margaret came tripping down the wide stairs and over to Jean and Evelyn.

"Aunt Mehetabel says you are to come right up stairs with me."

"Evelyn, I imagine Aunt Mehetabel has designs on us. Margaret, you are not leading us into a trap, are you?" said Jean, laughing.

"Oh, they said I must not tell a thing, but it is just beautiful up there," and Margaret tripped away, leaving Jean and Evelyn to follow. Aunt Mehetabel met them at the head of the stairs.

"You dear children, how tired you must be! I wanted to send for you half an hour ago, but Mr. Hathaway said the late comers would be so disappointed if they did not see you."

"Yes, I would not have missed meeting them all for anything. I believe we have won them to us tonight with a bond of sympathy and respect that would have taken months to accomplish," said Evelyn.

Jean looked anxiously at Evelyn.

"Little wife, you are very tired. Aunt Mehetabel, can't she rest just a little?"

"Yes, I want you both to rest a little while before the wedding dinner is served," and she led them through a wide reception hall and into a room rich in oriental draperies, and lit with a dull red glow. She had closed the door and left them alone before either of them had recovered their amazement enough to realize what had happened.

"Jean, Jean, where are we? How beautiful, oh, how beautiful!" and Evelyn sank into the easy depths of a luxurious chair and put her face in her hands, overcome with surprise and joy.

"Little wife," said Jean, as he knelt beside her, "if you had known Uncle Jasper and Aunt Mehetabel as I have, you would not wonder at it. But I did not expect this; it seems too much."

"How good everybody has been to us! Oh, Jean, I am so happy! Did you see those breaker boys and little factory girls stand and look at us tonight with their big, hungry eyes? To think, Jean, that I ever dreamed that I could go into this work alone!"

Evelyn clasped her husband's hands and the tears stood in her eyes.

"Oh, if I can only measure up to the standard of what your wife should be, Jean, and prove a real helpmate in this splendid work, how glad and happy I shall be!"

"Then, sweetheart, you will be happy for my little wife has always been my good angel, leading me on to higher and nobler things; and with her love to cheer and bless me, I care not what odds may come. We will never speak of the old heart ache again, my darling, but thank God that we belong to each other forever."

There came a knock at the door and Judith, Aunt Mehetabel's maid, came in and said that she had brought some fresh flowers for Mrs. Kirklin and dinner would be served in a few minutes.

"And this is the secret of the forbidden rooms!" exclaimed Jean as Uncle Jasper entered to conduct them to the beautiful drawing room where the wedding guests were assembled.

"I confess, Uncle Jasper," said Evelyn, "that I was like Blue Beard's wife and wanted to see in these rooms more than any of the others. How beautiful they are! I cannot realize they are ours."

As they entered the room, their many friends laid claim to the happy couple and the tables were soon filled. Doctor Jones claimed the seat at the left of the bride, and Maidie sat beside her boy with a proud, happy look on her face. There were present friends of the Snows and Hathaways, and college chums of both Jean and Evelyn. Joy was in every heart and a key note of happiness was sounded there that night that made sweet music through the years to come.

It was a merry party that left Minington for the Catskills in Jasper Snow's private car.

"Only two weeks for us, Evelyn," said Jean, "I must not leave the work here any longer than possible; then, too, your father must have a chance for his vacation."

"Father said he would join mother as soon as we got back. How eager I am to get into the work!" said Evelyn.

"I almost believe you would rather stay than go, Evelyn."

"No, for I know how much you need the rest, and a vacation at Aunt Mehetabel's cottage means just solid comfort."

"What a delight it will be to Mither! Dear little Mither! She has never had many such pleasures," and Jean let his glance rest lovingly on the face of his mother who sat beside Hugh across the aisle.

Sorrow Turned to Joy.

As thou learnest this lesson, to carry all thy sorrows to God, and lie at thy Saviour's feet, and spread thy grief before him, thou wilt find a calm come over thee, thou knowest not whence; thou wilt see through the clouds a bright opening, small perhaps and quickly closed, but telling of eternal rest, and everlasting day, and of the depth of the love of God. Thy heart will still rise and sink, but it will rise and sink, not restlessly, nor waywardly, not in violent gusts of passion; but resting in stillness on the bosom of the ocean of the love of God. Then shalt thou learn, not to endure only patiently, but, in everything against thy will, humbly and quickly to see and to love the loving will of God. Thy faith and thy love and thy hope will grow, the more thou seest the work of God with thee; thou wilt joy in thy sorrow, and thy sorrow will be turned into joy.—Edward B. Pusey.

Hal Baxter's Don't Care.

It was a delightfully warm day in early spring. On a dry goods box, in front of the open door of the woodshed, sat Hal Baxter and Dick Wheeler, talking over the first baseball game of the season. It was to be played at Fountain—two miles from the home of the two boys—on the following Tuesday.

"So you are going?" and Dick Wheeler leaned over, and worked his heel in the soft ground before him.

"Yes; why shouldn't I!" exclaimed Hal, in surprise. "It's the first game of the season—and it's going to be dandy."

"That may be; but I wouldn't want to go," replied Dick, slowly.

"And why not?"

"Because it's just before school closes, and I wouldn't want to miss that much time," answered Dick. "That's why."

"O, I don't care! That doesn't make any difference so far as I am concerned," and Hal looked over toward the kitchen, where his mother stood by the window kneading her Saturday's bread.

"It would—to me," persisted Dick, rising to go.

"And it would to me!" This remark of Hal's Uncle Robert, who was painting some screens in the further end of the shed, was unobserved by the two boys. "And that's just the matter with Hal," continued his uncle, to himself. "It's too often that he doesn't care!"

Mr. Baxter took a step back, to examine his work in a better light.

"That's one of Hal's worst habits; in fact, the worst," declared his Uncle Robert, retouching the side of the screen nearest to him with a little more paint. "And I think it grows upon him. A boy should care about such things, and about what people think of him.

"I've heard Hal say—again and again—that he didn't care what people said of him. That's a mistake—and a grave one, too! There isn't any one—but that should care; and especially a boy like Hal. And I wonder how he can be made to see it?"

It was a self-put question, and one that Robert Baxter, for the good of his nephew, meant to answer.

For the next four weeks, he "kept tab"—as he put it—on Hal and his doings. And at the end of that time he felt that he had proof enough to convince his nephew that he should have more regard for the opinion of other people, and for what they said.

"Hal," cautioned his uncle, one morning, "don't you use a little too much slang?"

"I?" in evident surprise.

"Yes."

"No; I guess not," and Hal looked down to the floor.

"What kind of training would strangers think you have, my boy, if they should sometime hear your English?"

"I don't know, Uncle Robert, as I'd care," replied Hal, coloring.

"Hal!"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you realize how much you are losing?" asked Uncle Robert, gravely. "Just how much you are losing by that 'don't care' habit of yours?"

"Why, no; I haven't thought I was losing anything."

"But you are. Look here a moment; it won't take long," and the boy's uncle took from his pocket a small memorandum.

Hal watched him curiously.

"I have some items here that will bear out my assertion—that you are being robbed, Hal, of a good deal of real pleasure—and merely by your 'don't cares'!"

"Why I—"

"Listen. You remember how badly you felt that you were not invited by Winthrop Smith on the ride to Moose Falls? The reason was—as I found out—because he overheard you say one day that you didn't care for picnics of any kind."

"But I—I didn't mean—of that sort," protested Hal.

"You made no exception when you said what you did," replied Mr. Baxter. "It was a straight out-and-out 'don't care.'"

"Well, I—"

"Again," continued Uncle Robert, not minding the interruption, "you recollect what you said when I wanted you to deny to Mrs. Troxell the report that you were with the Holbrook boys the time they went into her yard for some of her early strawberries. It was, 'I don't care what she thinks!' And you didn't do what I wished. Your not setting yourself right was the reason why you didn't receive an invitation to Harriet Thurston's lawn party."

"How did you—"

"Find out? Never mind; but I did."

Mr. Baxter turned to another leaf in his notebook.

"As I remember it, you were woefully disappointed that Harold Preston didn't come to see you last week when he was at Thord Hilton's. 'Twas because of a remark you made when he was there the last time—and he couldn't possibly have visited you then.

"You told his cousin that you didn't care if he never came to see you—that you didn't want him to."

"I—I didn't suppose any one would go and tell!"

"That's not the question," resumed Uncle Robert. "You shouldn't have made such a remark—you knew at the time that it wasn't true."

"But I—I was provoked that he didn't come to see me—then!" was Hal's feeble defense.

"Then—"

"Have you any more of the 'don't cares'?" interrupted Hal, moving uneasily in his chair.

"Yes—a number."

"I—I think three—like those you've mentioned—are all the proof I need, Uncle Robert, to make me see that I—do care!" exclaimed Hal.

"Do you think they're enough—to keep you from using the expression again, my boy?"

"Try me, Uncle Robert, and—see!"

Mr. Baxter did; and found that Hal was absolutely cured of his "don't care" habit.—Selected.

A Humorist's Castles that Tumbled Down.

My favorite castle in Spain? Dear me, it would be hard to tell. My father had a wonderful tenor voice (as New Yorkers whose memories go back behind the fifties can testify), and when I was a child I was quite sure that his voice would descend to me and that I should captivate the world. My voice took the form of a beautiful swan and it grew and grew and grew, but when it changed it turned out to be an ugly duck.

That castle dissolved and left not a wrack behind, but I knew that I had another string in my bow—I could become one of the greatest caricaturists that the world ever laughed at.

My father was not opposed to my studying art, but my teacher, not recognizing my transcendent ability, kept me at stupid casts instead of letting me caricature him and my fellow students—and they couldn't call in the fire department in time to save that castle in Spain.

Then I thought that to be a great comedian would not be at all bad, and I practiced making faces in my mirror—faces from which I sometimes fled in affright and sometimes stayed to laugh at so infectiously that I couldn't stop.

But although I learned to recite and to "mug," and got engagements at lodges and Sunday-school entertainments, no great manager ever came running to me to ask me to take Nat Goodwin's place, and after a few years I sold that castle in Spain and haven't seen it since.

But meantime I had built another one. I would be an amalgam of all the great humorists who ever lived, and on stepping-stones of their dead selves I would rise to higher things—and I began to write for Puck and other papers.

Every once in a while I would pause in my climbing to give some one a chance to put the laurel wreath on my brow, but either the wreath was mislaid or the person who was to place it had been called away, for my brow is yet innocent of any wreath, and although I am still using one or two rooms in that castle, I now feel that at any moment the landlord may pen me a polite dismissal.

I may write the great American novel, but I have no leanings that way and I fancy that this is my last residence in Spain. When they dispossess me this time I will refuse to follow the example of Holmes's pet nautilus and will build me no more mansions.

But what fun I have had in the various edifices—and how the people have applauded my efforts as singer, caricaturist, actor and humorist! It's been worth striving for—in my mind.—Charles Battell Loomis in The Circle.

The Three Old Ladies.

There was an old lady all dressed in silk,
Who lived on lemons and buttermilk;
And, thinking this world was a sour old place,
She carried its acid all over her face.

Another old lady, all dressed in patches,
Lived upon nothing but lucifer matches;
So the world, it made her strangle and cough,
And sure as you rubbed her you set her off.

And another old lady, all sunny and neat,
Who lived upon sugar, and everything sweet,
Exclaimed, when she heard of their troubles, "I never!
For the world is so nice I could live on forever."

Now, children, take your choice
Of the food your hearts shall eat;
There are sourish thoughts, and brimstone thoughts,
And thoughts all good and sweet;

And whatever the heart feeds on,
Dear children, trust to me,
Is precisely what this queer old world
Will seem to you to be.

—Mary Mapes Dodge.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

By F. Emory Lyon.

A recent census gives the number of penal institutions of the country as 1,337, including federal prisons, state penitentiaries, reformatories, city work-houses and county jails. The number of inmates confined in these institutions at a given time was 81,772, or 100 to every 100,000 of the population. This ratio does not show an increase of crime in proportion to the population, but a considerable decrease from that shown in a similar census of 1890.

All who have more than superficially observed the individual delinquent, and the circumstances surrounding the commission of crime, quickly conclude that its source lies deeper than the human perversity of the victim. The causes of crime are many, and one of them lies in the institution which society has created for its correction. A recent investigation in Illinois shows that of the 102 county jails of the state two-thirds were built more than twenty-five years ago. This means that these institutions are entirely void of modern sanitary facilities, or adequate ventilation for the confinement of human beings. Nevertheless, these institutions received for one year 15,965 men and boys. More than one-fifth of this number were released without indictment, merely being accused of crime. About the same number were finally held guiltless after trial, but were subject to the same jail treatment as those who were convicted.

Moreover, these institutions were made schools of crime by the promiscuous association of men in idleness, by the detention in some cases of boys under fourteen years of age. No community ought to be indifferent to the possibilities of such an institution. The greater problem of an ideal prison system is only beginning to be solved. It is still a question whether all the progress that has been made in the reformation and training of offenders is not counteracted by the depressing influences of long imprisonment, and the recurring abuses and brutalities in many places.

The recent agitation in the temperance field has clearly shown the connection between intemperance and crime. Too strong emphasis cannot be laid upon this relation, though statistics are misleading as taken from individual reports. It is but natural that the offender should endeavor to justify himself on the ground of intoxication. The real causes of crime are often deeper and broader than any individual impulse, or even the imperfections of a bad prison system.

The fact that the recent industrial depression immediately increased the population of various penal institutions, in some cases to a very marked degree, shows that commercial and industrial conditions have a marked bearing on the problem. It might be difficult to say whether hard times, or too great prosperity, furnish the greater temptation to crime. Certain it is that the undue flaunting of wealth, and the social distinctions of class, are factors in the problem. The statement, "he might have made a man of me once," spoken by a penitent prodigal, concerning his brother, of better education and higher station, is indicative of the greater responsibility of the stronger and more intelligent for the welfare of the weaker.

This, then, is the growing responsibility of the Christian Church, and the above suggestions are intended for the consideration of ministers of all denominations on Prison Sunday, October 25. Each pastor has in his library abundant material touching upon these questions, and they are vitally related to the whole mission of the church.

The Central Howard Association is the voice and agency of the churches of the Central West along this line. It wields an influence over more than 15,000 inmates of prisons and reformatories. It influences them by correspondence, by personal interview, through its trade, study department, and by its annual Christmas message of encouragement and hope. It secures employment for more than 1,000 men annually, and its workers are giving their lives to winning men to manhood and the Christian life, with the result that about 80 per cent each year become good citizens. No such work can be a matter of indifference to any pastor, and the association calls upon all ministers, as far as possible, to speak upon the subject October 25. The Central Howard Association has its headquarters at 160 Adams street, Chicago, and will send its reports to any pastors or young people's societies desiring to observe Prison Sunday.

OUR MISSION WORK.

The Lord is working with his people now as in the first century. The government of Japan is now openly friendly to missions. The Emperor contributes to the work. Japan leads the Orient commercially, politically and educationally. China has entered upon an era of reform. That is most astonishing to those who know her best. China has made more progress in the last five years than any other nation in the world. There is in China now the greaest opportunity that the church has known, since the Reformation, if not since Pentecost. In India the national spirit is asserting itself. This spirit will break down caste—the greatest hindrance to the triumph of the gospel in India. The Congo Free State is passing from the hands of Leopold to Belgium. The Sultan of Turkey has become the liberator of his people. The Christians and Turks are rejoicing together. In all fields there is a rising tide of sentiment in favor of Christian union. No subject receives such personal, and persistent and enthusiastic attention. There is a most earnest desire in the hearts of the missionaries that the denominationalism of the West shall not be fastened upon the East.

Among the most urgent needs are two training schools—one in Africa and one in the Philippines. In both missions there are many evangelists but these are poorly equipped for the work. Their knowledge of the Scriptures is very limited. They must be taught and trained if they are to do their best. Homes and chapels are needed in many fields. Fifty thousand dollars could be wisely expended in supplying homes and other equipment for the missionaries now at work. The supreme need of the society is the need for believing prayer. United and believing prayer will avail much. A praying church will be an evangelistic church. It will be an omnipotent church. In order that the church may pray intelligently and believingly, mission study classes have been organized and much literature has been sold.

We are now entering upon the hundredth year of our history as a people. If the centennial celebration is to be all that is desired, the society must have a larger income than in any previous year. It may help us to know that two American societies are planning to raise six millions each a year. Others are planning to double their incomes, and others still to greatly increase them. The men in the churches are coming to realize as never before that this is a man's job, and they are giving on an unprecedented scale. Moreover, they are reading about the work and praying for it as never before. Some visit the fields that they may see the work with their own eyes and know what is being done and what remains to be done. They bring back only one report. They say that the task is great and that the difficulties are numerous and serious; but they also say, "Let us go up and possess the land, for we are well able to do this." By enlisting all the churches and the entire membership, we can do a work that will honor and please our Lord and that will send a thrill of gladness around the world. "We can do it if we will." Let us say rather, "We can do it, and we will." The Lord help us to so say and to so do!"

MORE OR LESS PUNGENT.

Easy to Beat.

Mrs. S.——was in a Richmond hospital, and she was lonely, so welcomed the advent of a very black and very languid maid, who came in one morning to wipe up the floor. Some one new to talk to, so no time was lost.

"I have not seen you working around here before. Aren't you a new girl?"

Edmonia willingly let the cloth slip back into the bucket, and sat flat upon the floor before answering.

"Yas'm, I's new. I's jest washin' up de floor; but I don't work, I's edjikated."

"And where were you educated?" was the next question.

"In a seminary." Then, with a burst of confidence: "There was me an' another girl workin' in a house. She was cook and I was chambermaid, and we had great times about who would git de prize, but I beat." Then, after a pause, "She was easy to beat, 'cause she got smothered to death with gas de night before de 'zaminations come off."—Harper's Magazine.

A MATTER OF BUSINESS

The business side of the Christian Century is a matter in which we wish our readers to share quite as truly as in the editorial policy. This week we are grateful to be able to report the receipt of congratulatory words from our friends, so many that we could not print them. At New Orleans we were reassured by scores of our brethren that our recent issues had sounded a true note and one that they had been praying to hear for a long time. Too long has our brotherhood been exploited by an unscrupulous newspaper propaganda. Too long have the men who know better been silent. The timid policy of the middle-of-the-road journal that goes on its fearful way hoping to make capital out of the unguided revolt of a disgusted brotherhood came under hardly less condemnation than the newspaper that makes itself a pope. Our plainness of speech for the past three weeks has apparently met with the heartiest approval of those who love fair play, not to speak of our fair plea.

The protest against Professor Willett's resigning from the Centennial program has come to the Christian Century in a great chorus. The question, as one conservative brother (and a prominent leader) puts it, "is whether we shall go to Pittsburg bound or free." "What," he asks, "is the use of going to Pittsburg to celebrate our hundred years' freedom from the bondage of human creeds if we go up bound to the creed formulated by a newspaper editor?"

Much Encouragement.

Well, that may seem a little aside from business, but it is in line with the business we have in hand. Our last issues have wakened many old-time subscribers. They have sent us letters of appreciation and asked us to put their names on the list.

One brother, whose account had become five years old and was put into the hands of an attorney for collection, refused to pay attention to the first kindly statement of the account. But when he got another letter from the attorney saying that he meant to collect the account any way, he wrote back enclosing a check to cover a year in advance, and, instead of being angry, offered his thanks to the lawyer for his business-like methods!

New Orleans brought us a fine list of new subscribers. Our editorial staff was there—Morrison, Willett and Jordan. The best men of the church bade them Godspeed. They brought back the spendid report printed in this issue. They assured everybody who stopped at the Christian Century booth that their paper would be a newspaper. Doesn't this issue prove it?

We must have a little time to get our problems worked out. But the first thing we shall do is to develop our news service. We have the promise of a dozen men in as many great cities of the country to send us letters from their cities interpreting the significant religious events of their communities. We will have a score of such. They are among the brainiest leaders of the church.

Besides this we want our friends to volunteer with news. Brethren may write us frankly. We will not always print the news and sign the sender's name. All our news will be carefully edited. So you can send us the facts without seeming to blow your own horn.

Meantime our friends are asking, "How can we help?" We love to hear that question. In these early days of our paper we need helpers. We simply cannot do the work alone. If you are in sympathy with the ideals of the Christian Century it seems to us it is your duty to help. We considered it our duty before we had any connection with the paper.

The Century A Mutual Enterprise.

George A. Campbell has promised to help every week with his superb articles on the "Religious Life." Dr. Everett Gates and Professor Silas Jones are already helping with their exposition of Christian Union and the Prayer Meeting topics, respectively. You can help if you have something aching in your soul to say and will say it quick! Not many long articles will go into the Christian Century. So our correspondents will boil things down.

You can help by speaking a good word for us and getting a subscriber. "Each one win one"—why isn't that a handsome motto for us? Bring some one into our family of readers. We need him and we will do him good.

You can encourage our agent in soliciting subscribers. One pastor this week wrote us saying he would speak of the paper to his congregation next Sunday and asked us to send an agent to his members next week. We expect 100 subscribers in that church. And we will get them, too.

We do not want to keep you too long talking business, for we want you to listen to us many times again. But we are sure you will be interested in reading some of the letters that we have received this week. We have not space for many so will only give samples, so to speak. Perhaps we need not give you the names of the brethren who write us this way. We are not sure from their contents whether they were written for publication or not. Here is one from the pastor of a leading church in Illinois:

"The last issue of the Christian Century is the most hopeful thing I have seen. I have been long convinced that we needed something militant on this issue while preserving the spirit of good Christians and refusing to indulge in personalities. A firmer note could not be struck than you have sounded in the last issue of the Century, and may strength be given to your arm and generosity and kindliness to your heart while you denounce with prophetic wisdom and fire the paralyzing pharisaism that has become an obsession with the ——— crowd. Count on me in any way possible."

Here is an appreciative word from a Chicago pastor:

"I am delighted with the first number of 'The New Christian Century'—its subject, matter, literary style and Christian spirit; with its frankness and courage. I believe the situation calls for that sort of a paper, and that the time is at hand for its appearance. I believe that you will win on this line, and shall deem it a privilege to render any assistance I may be able."

This one comes from Maryland:

"I was glad to read your (Prof. Willett's) reply to Brother Sweeny's letter in the Century. I wrote the Standard a letter on this controversy, but it has not appeared and it has been several weeks now, and it may not appear. But I cannot see how the continuance of this controversy will do good. I wish that the really greater issues might smother it. I wish the ——— were less pugilistic, but it has been so now for so many years that it will require some very radical changes to be otherwise. We folk away from the field of battle will have to wait with long patience. The Disciples are now passing through a critical period and every move leves its influence. My lines of thought are a little different from yours in some fields, but this does not disturb my fellowship. We are the Lord's, and have a distinct mission that holds pre-eminence over everything else. With kindest regards, etc."

This comes from one of the big cities of Ohio:

"I want to congratulate the editorial force in charge on the new aspect and promising future of the Christian Century. I trust it may be able to accomplish that needed work for which it declares. I have acted as news correspondent for my city for some time, but not very faithfully. If I can be of service to you in this capacity in the future, I will be glad to do it or to render any other assistance which I might be able to give. With best wishes."

Sends both Words and Deeds.

The following is found in a letter presenting us with twelve trial subscribers. It comes from New York State:

"The tone and make-up of the last issue pleases me very much. Brother Oeschger's Church Irenic should have a large reading. We do seem to be facing a time in our history when clear thinking is very necessary. I wish the circulation of the Century might be doubled in the next few months to offset the pernicious influence of the ——."

A preacher of a strong church in Iowa:

"Thank God! A free paper has been born. I have just read the first copy—The New Christian Century—it has the right ring. That editorial, "Yet Another Centennial Aim," hits the nail squarely on head. The ministry all over the country ought to cheer you on in this enterprise. For months, yes, for years, I have been sick at heart, ashamed and humiliated at what has been occurring in the ———— (we do not print either the adjective or the noun), and that we had no paper to take up our defense and save us from such ruin. Oh, how disappointing the ——— has been in this matter. Gird up your loins and save us from the pit of opinionism into which low, mercenary journalism would lead us. This is the time to go on united in a mighty service for the salvation of the world, and cursed be the man that halts the procession for a wrangle over mere opinions. I do not see face to face with you on some things, but we love the same Lord and Saviour and are working for the triumph of his cause, and that is unity without the slavery of uniformity. May God's blessing attend you!"

From a well known New England minister: "If there ever was a time when the Christian Century was needed it is now. I will be glad to contribute something occasionally. I hope the Christian Century will always stick to its policy of preaching positive truth, without fear or favor. We shall gain nothing by controversy with such an organ as the ———. I am with you for a free preaching of the Christian gospel."

CONSTITUTION OF MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION ORGANIZED AT NEW ORLEANS.

Preamble.

We, the ministers of the churches of Christ, in order to increase our number, strengthen our fellowship, improve our efficiency and lengthen our service, hereby band ourselves together, and adopt the following:

Article I.

The name of this organization shall be "The Ministerial Association of the Churches of Christ (Disciples)."

Article II.

In the prosecution of its purposes it shall:

Section 1. Seek out and follow up young men of such piety and talents as indicate fitness for the ministry and lead the church and the home in concerted prayer and effort that the finest of their youth, and enough, may be consecrated to this supreme task.

Section 2. Seek the co-operation of all existing organizations of like faith and character and promote the formation of others ineligible fields.

Section 3. Assist in an advisory way churches to secure suitable ministers and ministers suitable churches.

Article III.

Its members shall consist of all members of City, County, District or State Associations of like purpose and character, and of eligible men living outside the territory of all local organizations.

Article IV.

Its officers shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, who shall be elected annually, and whose duties shall be such as usually devolve upon like officers in similar organizations.

Article V.

The Officers of this Association, together with three other men elected at the same time, shall constitute the Executive Committee, which shall manage the affairs of the organization between its Conventions.

Article VI.

This Association shall meet semi-annually in connection with the sessions of the American Christian Missionary Society and of the Congress of the Disciples of Christ unless it shall appoint another time and place.

Article VII.

This Constitution may be amended at any regular meeting of the Association by a vote of two-thirds of the members present; provided such amendment shall have been first recommended by the Executive Committee, or a year's notice shall have been given.

By-Laws.

1. To meet necessary expenses each member under sixty-five years of age shall be expected to pay to the Treasure on or before the 30th of September, one dollar per year in advance.

2. The Executive Committee may publish a monthly Bulletin of the Association at such subscription price as may be necessary to maintain it.

3. The officer of the Association shall be located in the City of Indianapolis, Indiana.

The following Officers and Executive Committee were named:

President—A. B. Phieputt, Indianapolis.
Vice President—W. H. Allen, Muncie, Ind.
Secretary—A. L. Orcutt, Indianapolis.
Treasurer—C. H. Winders, Indianapolis.
T. W. Grafton, Anderson, Ind.
R. W. Abberley, Rushville, Ind.
L. C. Howe, New Castle, Penn.

NO LIQUOR WILL BE SOLD ON THE GROUNDS.

Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition Decides To Go "Dry." First Time That the Experiment Has Been Tried, But the Directors Figure They Can Make Money by This Action.

Seattle: An experiment in connection with a great international exposition is to be tried next year when the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition is held in Seattle and it will be watched with more than usual interest by church and temperance people and members of the prohibition party. For the first time in the history of expositions, the sale of intoxicating liquors on the grounds or near them will be absolutely prohibited.

The management of expositions in the past have always advanced the claim that it would be impossible to make an exposition pay expenses unless the visitors could get their beer, wine or whiskey. It would be pointed out that the cosmopolitan character of the visitors, many of whom would be from foreign countries, made it a necessity for the restaurants and cafes and open air resorts to have wines and liquors for sale with meals. As the exposition managements took a percentage of the earnings of every restaurant and resort on the grounds, it was desirable to have the receipts as large as possible. At many expositions the receipts thus obtained have amounted to as high as $7,500 a day, there being many places under the title of summer or beer gardens which would give concerts or vaudeville entertainments and sell beer or wine to the audiences. The sale of the beer and wine was the chief end of the enterprise.

In the case of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific exposition in 1909, a different view of the matter is taken. The exposition was financed by the people of Seattle, and the stockholders naturally wish to get a dividend in part if not for all of their subscriptions. Therefore every dollar that could be obtained would help and yet the stockholders and directors have decided that they can get their dividend without the sale of liquor upon the grounds. At first it was much doubted if it was a feasible plan. To be sure the law as it stood prevented the sale of liquors, for the exposition grounds are part of the campus of the University of Washington and the state law provides that liquors shall not be sold within two miles of the university campus. Those who wished to have liquors sold, claimed that the legislature was favorable to granting a special permit to cover the time of the exposition being open. A canvas of the nominees named at the recent primary indicates that the legislators are willing to do everything the directors might ask in this regard.

However, after a careful investigation and close figuring, it was unanimously agreed that the directors would not ask the legislature for this privilege, that the law should stand and that for the first time an exposition will try the experiment of going "dry."

The restaurants and cafes will serve non-alcoholic drinks and mineral waters. The exposition grounds will be supplied direct from a fine mineral spring through galvanized iron pipes. The resorts on the Pay Streak, the mile long amusement street at the lower end of the grounds, will also stick to the non-intoxicating beverages when they have occasion to serve liquid refreshments.

The mineral water concerns are taking advantage of the exceptional opportunities offered to exploit their products and at least a dozen of the leading springs of the west will have exhibits on the grounds, some of them serving the waters free. The managers shrewdly figure that if they can get people accustomed to minteral waters, they will largely profit by the change from alcoholic drinks.

The directors of the exposition are exploiting the fact of the great fair being "dry" and scores of church, temperance, social and fraternal organizations have rallied to their support, commending the exposition for its action and expressing the intention of doing everything possible to advertise the fair and boost the attendance.

Wanted:—A singing evangelist to assist in a meeting at Shelbyville, Ind., beginning November 8 or 15. Address all letters to J. P. Myers, minister.

Gospel Shot.—Tracts that bring results. Samples, 10 cents. C. F. Ladd, Rock Falls, Illinois.

Oklahoma Christian University reports through E. V. Zollars, its president, an enrollment of about 300 for the first term of the new year. The school has been in difficult straits of late, financially, but it is certain now to come through. Three splendid buildings have been erected for this young institution, and the typical enterprising spirit of the west will probably make of it a college of much worth.

H. D. C. MacLachlan, of the Seventh St. Church, Richmond, Va., is developing a system of Sunday-school work which he embodies in a manual setting forth the ideals and mechanism of the school. Mr. MasLachlan is a specialist in religious education. His teacher training articles will begin in the Christian Century in two weeks.

Americanization.

"What is meant by naturalization?"

"Naturalization is the process by means of which an evicted Irish tenant becomes an American policeman."—Cleveland Leader.

WITH THE WORKERS.

Dr. Royal J. Dye is building a home in Eureka where his wife and two daughters will reside when Dr. Dye returns to Africa. The daughters are seven and nine years old. This illustrates one of the deepest experiences of pathos through which our missionaries pass.

Professor A. C. Gray has taken up his work in Eureka College with vigor and encouragement. He was formerly pastor of the Ann Arbor, Mich., church, taking his master's degree in the university while there.

Eureka College reports a gratifying increase in attendance at the opening of this year.

R. E. Orahood, of Clarendon, Ark., resigned the church there recently. The brethren are looking for a new minister. H. H. McCarty, of Little Rock, Ark., will hold a protracted meeting for the Clarendon church in November. Mr. A. S. Bayne, an elder in the church, attended the New Orleans convention and joined the Century family of readers.

Last week the Foreign Christian Missionary Society received $500 from a sister in West Virginia, on the annuity plan. She requests that this money be used in Japan, under the direction of Mrs. Dr. Nina Stevens.

The churches, as churches, acquitted themselves most creditably during the month of September in their contributions for foreign missions. They gave $29,062 in that month, a gain over the corresponding month last year of $9,163.

Last week the Foreign Society received $600 from G. H. Watters, Pomona, Cal., who supports Mrs. E. R. Moon in Africa. She goes out at once to that distant field to join Dr. Royal J. Dye and others in the work.

Frank Coop of Southport, England, is already planning to attend the centennial convention at Pittsburg in October, 1909. No doubt a large number of the brethren will be here from that land.

Charles C. Chapman, Fullerton, Cal., has just given $600 to the Foreign Society for the support of a missionary on the foreign field. It will be remembered that last year he gave $5,000 for a hospital in Nantungchow, China. He is a successful business man and is always liberal in every good word and work.

During the centennial year the Foreign Society hopes to found two new Bible colleges; one at Vigan, province of Luzon, Philippine Islands, and the other at Bolenge, Upper Congo, Africa. These two enterprises will involve an outlay of between $40,000 and $50,000. An effort will be made to raise this money in special, personal gifts. It is proposed to make an effort to get 100 friends to give at least $500 each.

Secretary F. M. Rains will dedicate new churches as follows: Chester, Neb., October 18th; Mt. Healthy, Ohio, October 25th; Indian Creek, Ky., November 1st; Robinson, Ill., November 29th.

Rev. Isaac S. Bussing received twelve into the fellowsnip of the St. Louis, Mich., church, October 11.

The meeting at Fremont, Neb., conducted by the minister, Rev. I. H. Fuller, and Charles E. McVay, song evangelist, is drawing large audiences. There were two baptisms last night. Mr. McVay has a children's chorus of sixty voices. The adult chorus is also a large one. The meeting will close October 28 with a song recital to be given by the singer. Mr. McVay has an open daate for December.

Rev. Albert Buxton reports one baptism at Salt Lake City, October 4.

Rev. J. Frank Hollingsworth, pastor of the church in Ludlow, Ill., reports, on October 12, the opening of a promising meeting in his church with six added the first week. Miss Loretta Collins of Normal, Ill., is assisting as song leader.

We are presenting this week on our cover page an extract from the masterful New Orleans address of Rev. C. M. Chilton, pastor of the Central Church of St. Joseph, Mo. Next week we will print practically his entire address which is considered one of the masterpieces of the convention.

The Christian Worker, published by the Central Church of Des Moines, Iowa, has suspended publication. The pastor, Finis Idleman, believes that other papers of a general character will do the work needed better than the local paper.

Roscoe Hill, who spent four years in Cuba as a missionary of the Foreign Society, returned to the States recently and will pursue studies in the University of Chicago next winter.

Harry C. Holmes, who has recently taken the church at Lawrenceville, Ill., is doing a fine work. A parsonage, and an enlargement of the church building are the early fruits of ministry there. He has a strong grip on his people, who greatly love him.

The Third Church in Danville, Ill., S. S. Jones, pastor, has just organized a teacher training class with over a hundred members. Dr. W. C. Swartz is the instructor.

The Stanley-Miller Evangelists have been engaged by the church at Humboldt, Neb., for a meeting during January. Other churches in Nebraska or Kansas would do well to secure them for a meeting while in that part of the country. Address Dr. D. F. Stanley, Little Rock, Ark., for a date.

Ground was broken October 7, for a new church house for the North Park Christian Church of Indianapolis, Ind. It will be a modern structure in every respect. Rev. Austin Hunter is the pastor.

The temporary Union Church of Austin, Chicago, comprising the Congregational and Christian congregations sends us a neatly printed invitation to attend Harvest Home Services on Sunday, October 18. Dr. J. J. Martin and Rev. George A. Campbell, pastors, will both preach.

The First Church of Lincoln, Neb., Rev. H. H. Harmon, pastor, prints a weekly paper called "The Church at Work." The issue of October 9, is filled with figures reporting the year's work in every department of the church. Over $4,000 was raised for current expenses and $1,081.73 for missions and benevolences. Miss Griffith is supported by the church in India, through the Foreign Society. The clerk's report shows a total membership of 1064 of whom 516 were added during the past year, 259 of them by conversion. It will be remembered that C. R. Scoville held a great meeting in Lincoln during the year in which Mr. Harmon and his church were most active participants. They are now in process of erecting a splendid structure at Fourteenth and M streets which they hope to enter soon. Mr. Harmon is greatly loved by his church and respected by his colleague pastors in the city.

Since the last report of the Board of Church Extension they have received seven gifts on Annuity Plan; $500 from a friend in Missouri; $200 from a friend in Ohio; $500 each from friends in Michigan; $500 from Brother J. P. Roe of Iowa and two others of $700 and $800 each. This makes $3,700 received on the Annuity Plan during the last two weeks. This last is the 235th gift to the Board of Church Extension on the Annuity Plan. We hope to hear from many other friends. Remember that Annuity money builds churches like the other fund. For information concerning this Plan, address G. W. Muckley, corresponding secretary, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

MEXICAN DIET

Not Conducive to American Energy.

"After about thirteen years in Mexico, where I was on a Mexican diet into which coffee and greasy food enter largely, I found that everything I ate distressed me," writes a man from our neighboring republic.

"Nervous break-down with pain in the heart caused me to give up mental work. After trying various stomach remedies without benefit, I found relief, at last, by eating Grape-Nuts and cream.

"I could digest Grape-Nuts, and the heart and nervous symptoms soon improved to such an extent that I could do some brain work and a fair day's manual labor.

"When away from home I get out of sorts from eating wrong food, but at home a few days on Grape-Nuts puts me right again.

"I once worked ten consecutive hours on a dike without much fatigue, by having a small box of Grape-Nuts in my pocket and eating a little dry, whenever I felt faint. I can now teach all day without fatigue, after a breakfast of Grape-Nuts and cream, stewed fruit, toast and Postum.

"That old dull feeling, when I tried to live on my former diet, has disappeared and the delightful sensation of being fully nourished is present now. And the smile on our 18 months' old boy at a sight of a Grape-Nuts package is worth seeing." "There's a Reason."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The church at Niantic, Ill., is doing good things recently. They enrolled 314 in the Bible school October 4, an increase of 200 over two years ago. Collection $6.86. The offering for state missions on that day was $110.80. State Secretary J. Fred Jones was with them. Church extension offering the week before was $40. Rev. J. Will Walters is the enterprising pastor.

The call of Dr. W. T. Moore printed on another page asking for the names of old Bethany students should be answered at once by those whom it concerns. The Bethany feature of the Centennial may be made its proudest one if the friends of the old school will rally to its aid this year.

Do not fail to read the series of articles by Mr. Arthur Holmes of the Philadelphia Y. M. C. A., on Men's Work. If you overlooked his "The Workingman's Soul" in last week's issue turn to it again and read it.

A little less than nine years ago a work was started in East Orange, N. J. With the aid of the Home and Church Extension Boards a pastor was sent there and a temporary building erected. They became self-supporting in less than five years and the old building outgrown. Their new building costing $50,000 is now nearly completed and will be dedicated Nov. 29th, Z. T. Sweeney officiating. The house is built of white brick and will seat 1,200 people. They have a Bible school of over 250 and a membership of about the same number.

East Orange is a residence suburb of New York City and this is the first church organized in the state.

It now bids fair to be one of our strongest congregations in the East and we rejoice in the success attained. Rev. L. N. D. Wells is the pastor. The church will extend a hearty welcome to any who can attend their dedicatory services.

Carthage, Mo., Oct. 12, 1908.

Christian Century:—I am home again, after a month's absence, from the Snake River country of Southern Idaho, where I went to purchase a home on which to live when I am too old to preach. I got the home, 160 acres of Carey lands, with a perpetual water right at $20.50 per acre, on ten annual payments. With continued good health, I shall soon have a home on which my wife and I can live in comfort.

While on this trip I have been studying conditions and gathering data for a Christian colony in Southern Idaho.

I find the conditions very favorable to such an enterprise and to this end I invite correspondence with members of the Christian church who contemplate making homes in the west.

I should be pleased to correspond with some singer who would be willing to help me in a meeting in this country, for expenses and entertainment.

My next meeting will be in Orchard, Mo., from which place I go to Maysville, same state. I have an open date for a January meeting. Can furnish singer if desired.

S. J. Vance, Evangelist.

The District Convention of Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia met with the Whitney Ave. Church, Washington, the last of September. Important addresses were made by George Brown, of India, Mrs. Ida Harrison and Marion Stevenson. A fine attendance made it one of the best conventions the district ever enjoyed.

Rev. A. F. Sanderson began his sixth year with the Central Church, Houston, Texas, last month. The church is a living link in both Foreign and Home Societies, supporting Justin Brown in China and W. O. Stevens in Texas. In the six years, Mr. Sanderson's pastorate has resulted in 450 additions to the church without a revival meeting. A new feature has been introduced in the Sunday-school by the use of regular kindergarten methods. Miss Madeline Darrow, a graduate of Chicago Kindergarten Institute, is in charge of this work and assistant pastor of the church.

The Whitney Ave. Church, Washington, D. C., Rev. Walter F. Smith, pastor, is one of the prosperous young churches of that city. Additions are received regularly. A splendid field lies around them. Lately more than two hundred houses have been built in that section and as many more are under construction.

The Women's Missionary Societies of the Central and University Churches of Waco, Texas, have assumed the support of H. H. Guy in work among the Japanese on our Pacific Coast. This makes the two auxiliaries a living link of the C. W. B. M.

H. D. C. MacLachlan, of the Seventh St. Church, Richmond, Va., is developing a system of Sunday-school work which he embodies in a manual setting forth the ideals and mechanism of the school. Mr. MacLachlan is a specialist in religious education. His teacher training articles will begin in the Christian Century in two weeks.

The Independence Boul. Church, of Kansas City, is on the lookout for a Sunday-school superintendent who will devote his whole time to this important work.

SPRINGFIELD'S SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY.

The First Church of Springfield, Ill., celebrated the consummation of seventy-five years of history the first Sunday in October. Rev. F. W. Burnham, the pastor, preached the special sermon at the morning service. In the afternoon a union meeting of our three churches of the city was held, at which letters from former pastors were read, and other interesting exercises conducted. In the evening, a history of the church was read by the granddaughter of one of the original twelve who organized the congregation. Music of an especially creditable character was a feature of the day. An elaborate souvenir program has been sent us from which we infer the good taste and high character of the exercises. The First Church is one of the noblest in our brotherhood. Its membership includes some of the choicest spirits it has ever been our pleasure to know. The two-year-old pastorate of Mr. Burnham is being crowned with increase and blessing. Those who heard the convention sermon in New Orleans could not fail to discern in the Springfield pastor's eloquent sincerity the secret of his success on his home field. The Christian Century takes especial pleasure in extending congratulations both to church and pastor.

Dr. E. A. Layton, missionary to China, who is spending a year's furlough in this country, has taken a residence in Austin, Chicago, for in Waco, Texas, and has taken charge of the ing. The doctor will visit among the churches and speak on behalf of the missionary cause, also spending much of his time in graduate study at one of the medical colleges of the city.

Rev. J. E. Davis, of Beatrice, Neb., keeps a book table in the vestibule of his church from which are sold the most helpful books. This is a commendable plan. A pastor can hardly do a better service to his people than to enlist them in reading books that instruct and uplift the soul.

W.F. Lintt, who formerly was engaged in evangelistic singing, has gone into business in Waco, Texas, and has taken charge of the Central Church music. The congregation is already feeling the impetus of his leadership.

HOW SHALL CHRISTIAN MEN VOTE?

As individuals and as a nation we should set high ideals of Christian character and morals in the selection of the President, even if we sometimes fail in successfully establishing the wisest verdict.

There is enough talent and power among the Christian men of America in our different churches, if consecrated to God and to the spread of his kingdom, to revolutionize the world, and to prepare the people for the coming of Christ, and yet shall it be said that we Christian men in America have selected for the highest office in the gift of any nation, a man for the Presidency of these United States who is opposed to the Divinity of Christ, instead of selecting a man whose public and private life and character stands for the uplift of Christian people and

A POLICEMAN'S LOT
May Be a Happy One After All.

An Ill. Ex. Chief of Police found an easy and safe way out of the ills caused by coffee. He says:

"I suffered intensely from heart trouble and nervousness for five years, and though treated by some of the best physicians in this city, did not get permanent relief until I changed from coffee to Postum.

"A friend of my family was visiting at our house and seeing my condition, insisted that coffee was at the bottom of my trouble. I confess I was skeptical but promised to try Postum in place of coffee.

"It was nearly three weeks before I noticed much of any change, as my case was a bad one. Then I saw that my nervousness was gradually disappearing. A little later I was able to sleep a part of the night on my left side, something I had been unable to do for five years at least.

"I kept on using Postum, and the result is, so far as heart trouble and nervousness are concerned, I am a well man.

"The best proof is that I am writing this with my own hand, a thing I was unable to do for several years prior to the change from coffee to Postum."

Should not every Christian voter, irrespective of his political affiliations unite in an effort to remove this threatened reproach to our Christian America?

I am just a commission merchant, not a minister, but I am convinced, that man is the best citizen, who, with singlesness of purpose stands firmly for his conscientious convictions on public questions, and who will have his right of suffrage represent the Christian conscience of American manhood and not the uncurbed passions of prejudice and expediency. IN GEORGIA.

On November 9th the Georgia state convention will convene at Fitzgerald for a three days' session. Augusta, which was to entertain the gathering, was forced at the last moment to give it up, on account of the disastrous floods in the summer, which have crippled the city in many ways. The united Fitzgerald church is fully able to handle the convention, and will be supplemented by the efforts of the Business League, which encourages all such meetings.

If you want to spend the winter South, where there is a beautiful Christian church, excellent music, live organizations, and in an ideal climate, the church at Fitzgerald, Ga., invites consideration. If you will write the pastor, E. Everett Hollingworth, 403 North Main street, he will send information and reply to all letters.

A MISSIONARY NOTE.

Our native evangelists from the far Bosira river, 250 miles from Bolenge, Africa, send reports of remarkable interest. At one place where they have but recently gone they report 700 people who are turning from the old life of sin and earnestly seeking to know the truth concerning Christ. This is the point where the proposed station is to be opened by our northern California churches. They have pledged $10,000 as a special centennial offering for this new work. While our California brethren have been planning for this great work, the Lord has been opening up the way for its accomplishment. As encouraging reports likewise come from Mbala Lunzi on the great Momboyo river, where the southern California brethren are to put another $10,000 into a station. This is surely the nick of time for us on the Congo.

FOURTEENTH ANNIVERSARY.

Rev. S. S. Jones celebrated the fourteenth year of his pastorate in Danville the second Sunday in September. Mr. Jones was pastor of the First Church nearly eight years, and after supplying the Second Church four months he established the Third Church, of which he has been pastor six years. At the time of his coming to Danville our people had one church with 200 members and a small frame building. Now there are four churches with three good buildings, and the fourth on the way. The combined membership of the four churches is 2,400.

Additions under Mr. Jones' leadership during the fourteen years, nearly 1,900, a total number of additions in all our churches of over 3,000. In numbers, these churches outrank all Protestant bodies in the city except one. The pastor of the First Church is M. B. Ainsworth; of the Second Church, Andrew Scott; the Fourth Church is at present without a pastor. A mission Bible school is now being started in South Danville, which will some day become a church. Mr. Jones reports 499 weddings and 631 funerals. Such a report only suggests the more important elements of this fine pastorate—the spiritual toil and instruction and growth. May the years continue to bring a deepening and broadening success to this splendid servant of Christ.

FIRST INTERNATIONAL STUDENT BIBLE CONFERENCE.

In many respects what promises to be one of the most important and far-reaching gatherings ever held in connection with the student movement will take place in Columbus, Ohio, October 22-25. The United Church Brotherhoods of Columbus will entertain the International Student Bible Conference. Considerable attention will be given to the organization and development of Bible study work among men in the churches. College graduates specially are appealed to to take responsibility in this great work. The well-known "Association Quartette" will furnish music. The following men will take part in the program: Pres. Henry Churchill King, Oberlin College; Dr. Booker T. Washington, Tuskegee Institute; Chancellor Frank Strong, Kansas University; Col. Charles W. Larned, U. S. Military Academy; Prof. James Hardy Ropes, Harvard University.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT.

Church Extension Receipts for First Twenty-Three Days of September.

Churches.

For last year	$4,914 56
For this year	3,891 50
A falling off of	$1,023 06

Individuals.

For last year	$7,531 46
For this year	4,230 56
A falling off of	$3,300 90

It will be noted for the first twenty-three days of September there was a falling off of $4,323.96 in the receipts as compared with the first twenty-three days of September, 1907. Thus far 265 churches have sent contributions which is a falling behind in the number of contributing churches of 104. This is a serious loss to be accounted for probably on account of the stringent times; the falling off in receipts is due to the fact that but few of our strong churches have been heard from, and that last year during this same period we received a personal gift of $6,000.

The Board earnestly beseeches the churches to remember Church Extension in October if the offering has not been taken in September. There are now on file more than $100,000 of applications which are very worthy and ought to be answered. Make remittances to G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Secretary, 500 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Bad Breath and Sour Stomach

Stopped At Once With Pure Willow Charcoal, the Greatest Gas Absorber Known.

There is no necessity to suffer the humiliation, chagrin and discomfort of bad breath, biliousness, sour stomach, gastritis, sluggish liver, etc., when a little lozenge of charcoal will cleanse the stomach and make it pure and sweet.

Do not drug yourself when a simple little natural charcoal made from fragrant willow branches, sweetened with honey, will add tone to your stomach, liver and intestines, rapidly absorb gases and stop foul odors of all kinds.

Charcoal will absorb one hundred times its own volume in gas. A box full of charcoal placed in a bed room will keep the air of such a room pure and sweet.

A little charcoal lozenge dissolved on the tongue after meals will also keep the stomach fresh and clean. Charcoal is justly called the scrubbing brush for the stomach. The old monks of medieval times cured bad cases of stomach trouble, cast out devils from the system of man by feeding such a man charcoal.

Scientific men of today believe in the great strength of charcoal for the cure of human ills. Too much of it cannot harm one. The system craves it just like an animal needs and craves salt every so often. Charcoal goes into the stomach gently and is welcome, it settles down through the action of the stomach, and filters through all the food, absorbing gas, aiding digestion and giving tone to the juices, so that when the food goes into the intestines, and there meets other digestive fluids, the charcoal holds the impurities and thus keeps them from the blood.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made from pure willow. They are prepared fragrant by the use of honey and sweetened so they please the taste and are easily dissolved.

They have an enormous sale, thus stamping them with the approval of the public. Every druggist sells them, 25 cents per box. Go to your druggist today and buy a box; then after your next meal take two or three of them and judge for yourself of their merit.

Several taken at bedtime will prove to you in the morning that they have been at work all night, for your bad breath will not be so bad after all.

Send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

THE TWENTIETH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF CHURCH EXTENSION.

By G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Sec'y.

The Twentieth Annual Report of the Board of Church Extension of the Christian church was made by the Corresponding Secretary, G. W. Muckley of Kansas City, Mo. Kansas City is the headquarters of this board which does its work throughout the United States and Canada. Mr. Muckley's report showed that 87 homeless congregations had been housed during the year in loans aggregating $170,325. This is nearly $50,000 more than has been loaned in any previous year. These loans were scattered over 28 states and territories, including Saskatchewan and Ontario.

The receipts for the year, including new money, interest and returns on loans, amounted to $151,601.88. The total in the Church Extension Fund now amounts to $689,730.80, and 1196 congregations have been assisted to build during the twenty years' work of this Board which began its labors in October, 1888, with the small fund of $10,662, which has grown to the splendid proportions of nearly $700,000. Loans have been made in all but six states of the Union, ten loans having been made in Louisiana aggregating $17,275, in Canada and in Hawaii.

One of the pleasing features of Church Extension is that the fund is permanent and the money is loaned to be returned in five equal annual installments. The missions borrowing this money pay 4 per cent interest which covers the expenses of administration and the procuring of new money. As an exhibition of the loyalty of the mission churches to the above plan, Mr. Muckley reported that since the beginning, 634 churches have paid their loans in full, and $794,728.44 has been returned on loans. Last year 59 churches paid their loans in full.

This Board takes Annuity money. There have been 234 gifts to the Annuity Fund, and the Fund now amounts to nearly $225,000. Nearly 150 churches have been built by the Annuity Fund which is loaned at 6 per cent to help churches build, and the Annuitant receives the interest during his life time. This Annuity feature is very popular for people can administer upon their own estate, and see their money work while they live.

The Christian Endeavor Societies and the Sunday-schools have created Named Loan Funds which are growing in power. The Board now has 27 special Named Funds, which have been created by churches and individuals. The Centennial aim is to reach 50. A Named Fund consists of $5,000 to be paid in during a period of ten years, and is kept in the name of the donor.

A Great Statement in Finance.

In conclusion Mr. Muckley showed that the Church Extension Plan had worked admirably; that there had been paid back on loans nearly $800,000 which had been reloaned to help build churches. Added to this is the permanent fund of nearly $700,000 which was loaned originally. These two sums amount to nearly a million and a half of dollars, which is the amount the Board has handled in loans to nearly 1200 churches in 43 states and territories, Canada and Hawaii, with the slight loss of but $563 where congregations voluntarily deeded their property to the Board for debts against them after they had decided they could not carry on their work. A great financier of a trust company in the East said that this is the greatest record in the history of finance. This record was made by the loyalty of the mission churches in returning the money to the Board to go out again. Mr. Muckley then appealed to the churches to help reach the Centennial aim of a million dollars for Church Extension by the time of the Centennial Celebration to be held in Pittsburg, Pa., in October, 1909, which will require the raising of $310,269.20 on the part of the brotherhood to complete the million dollar fund.

OLD BETHANY COLLEGE STUDENTS, ATTENTION!

It is most desirable to have as complete a list of the names and addresses for our Centennial celebration of old Bethany College students as can possibly be obtained. We ought to have a grand rally of these students at that time, and to know something of what they are doing. Indeed, this is absolutely necessary if the Bethany feature of our Centennial shall be what it ought to be.

In order to secure this end, I desire to make the following request:

(1) Let some student of Bethany (whether a graduate or not) take it upon himself to find out the names and addresses of all the old students within his reach, especially in his town or county where he lives. This can be done without much effort, and it will greatly facilitate our work for Bethany, if these names and addresses can be secured as early as possible.

(2) Let every one who undertakes this matter send me a list of the names and addresses secured. No one need wait for some one else to do it. It matters not if a half dozen, or a dozen, are engaged in the same business within the same county. This will make the matter more certain and facilitate the result.

(3) It is not necessary that this matter shall be taken up by an old student of the college. Any one may undertake to supply these names. It may be that some sister of an old student, or some one connected by fleshly ties, will do this. Many women can help in this matter if they will at once go to work. But it would be better still, if some Christian woman or man, who recognizes the great work Bethany College has done for our cause, will feel interested enough in the matter to inaugurate this quest. Of course, I expect the old college students to be most interested in the matter, but there are others also who can help. Just so the work is done, it makes little difference about who shall do it.

Now do not put this important work off for a convenient season. It is imperative that I should have these names and addresses at as early a moment as possible. If you have been a student, the moment you see this send me your name and address, and then add to the list as many more as you can obtain.

A REVIEW OF THE YEAR'S WORK OF THE FOREIGN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

We come to the close of the missionary year with the deepest gratitude to the Lord of heaven and earth. Although the panic has affected the receipts, yet we have every reason for encouragement. The churches have made a remarkable showing. They have given nearly five thousand dollars more than last year. There has been an increase in the number of contributing churches also. The Sunday-schools show a small loss. The Endeavor Societies show a gain. There has been a very decided gain in the number of individual offerings. The falling off has been in special gifts. Twenty-four churches have undertaken to support their own missionary on the field. This shows that the interest in the work has been deep and widespread. All things considered, this has been the best year in the history of the society.

As in other years, the society has had the cordial and generous support of Canada, England and Australia. This coöperation has been most helpful and most delightful. It makes the society international in its character. The work on the field has been carried on as in other years. The gospel has been preached far and near, in the churches and schools, along the streets, in the temples, in the theaters, on the trains, at the wells and on the steamships. The missionaries have gone on long tours and have brought the claims of the Christ to the attention of hundreds of thousands. The sick have been healed, the lame have been made to walk, the blind to see, the sufferings of the lepers have been relieved. The number treated exceeds 127,000. Educational work has been carried on in the kindergarten, in the primary and middle schools, and in the colleges. The Bible is a text-book in all these institutions. Both sexes are taught. Literary work has been carried on, on a larger scale than ever before. Books, magazines, weekly papers, tracts and leaflets without number have been published. The printed page can go where no missionary has yet gone or can go. The different publications of the society are like leaves from the Tree of Life, and are for the healing of the nations.

In China one new station and four outstations have been opened. The colporteurs have sold gospels and tracts through wide regions. The college in Nanking has been full to overflowing. A large percentage of the pupils are Christians. Dr. Macklin received $3,000 from a Chinese friend to buy land adjoining the hospital. The most significant event of the year in Japan was the completion and dedication of the woman's college in Tokyo. A high school department has been added. This has doubled the work of the teachers. Drake College has done good work. The graduates number twelve. A. W. Place has been asked to teach two hours a week in Waseda University; the subject is "Christianity and the Social Problem." In India a church has been finished and dedicated at Damoh. The Lathrop Cooley Bible College has been dedicated. This is a spacious and handsome building. The mission press does much outside work. This brings the mission into touch with many of the leading people in Jubbulpore. There is no limit to what could be done in the Philippines if there were men enough at hand to engage in the work. A large proportion of the converts serve as evangelists. A fine

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

EDITORIAL

Peace—But How?

The note sounded by the Christian Century of October 10 has brought a chorus of "amens" from scores of brethren. It will be remembered that our editorial on "Another Centennial Aim" set up the great task of realizing unity within our own ranks as the paramount aim of this our Centennial year. Our convention of next year will quite certainly be the greatest religious convocation ever held in America. On all sides at New Orleans we heard enthusiastic expression of purpose to go to Pittsburg. But throughout the chorus of enthusiasm it was not difficult to detect a minor strain. There was a note of sadness and humiliation. That triumphant address of C. M. Chilton's which we print this week illustrates the mixture of major and minor, of victory and penitence, which characterized the temper of the great convention in the Southland. Mr. Chilton wonders if we are ready for a celebration. He sees that to plead for the union of God's children lays a heavy burden upon the people who make this plea. We who plead for union, are we united? We who claim for our platform that it is big enough and catholic enough to bring all of Christ's followers into fellowship, are we able to maintain fellowship among ourselves? "How shall we appeal to others," he asks, "to abandon their cherished traditions to unite with us in the life that is in Christ, if we ourselves be not ready? It is well to create a great Centennial enthusiasm, but our greatest need is to be 'clothed with power from on high.' Ah, it is not a time for counting triumphs; it is a time for penitence and prayer."

The Judgment of the Heart.

In many other addresses and in conversations with the brethren in the lobbies we caught the same note of self-humiliation. The heart of the church seems not wholly convinced of its victory. The figures are big—a million and a quarter of people, thirty millions of property, a million a year for missions, twenty colleges, a hundred thousand in training to become teachers of the young, an evangelistic motive and method that sweeps three thousand a week into our churches—the figures are vast, but the heart cannot accept them at their face value. For the heart sets store on different sorts of value than the head. The heart of our movement asks after quality. How fares the plea for union? asks the heart. Is the plea being commended to the world? Is the divided and broken church of Christ turning its face toward us to find its way back to unity and union again? And does our practice as well as our speech exhibit the unity for which their souls are yearning? These are the questions the heart asks.

And what makes the heart bleed is the discovery that when the divided churches look at us they curl the lip or laugh or pass us by without even an inquiry as to what it is we are saying. And why is our plea treated thus? Because in the ninety-nine years of our history we have not yet convinced the world that we are not just another sect added to the already too many sects of Christendom.

What do we more than others in the actual practice of Christian union? Do we lead or follow? Who can name one significant union enterprise of this century in which we have taken initiative? No truer words were spoken at New Orleans than these by Mr. Chilton: "In our war upon sectarianism we ourselves are in danger of becoming the narrowest of sects, eaten up with the canker of self-righteousness." This is a hard thing to say. The great-souled pastor of St. Joseph must have suffered inward travail ere he gave utterance to such a sentence. But why is it not much better to speak out the truth and let us all together face the facts as they actually are than through false sensitiveness to keep them buried in our soul?

Two Simple Facts.

This is a simple fact: that the century of our history has seen the Disciples of Christ do but one significant thing for Christian union and that is to gather a million and a quarter of people together on the New Testament basis. This is another simple fact: that it remains yet to be declared whether or not this first fact bears any significant relation to the problem of Christian union. Most certainly, none of us expect union to come about by all "joining us." Obviously, then our main function must be to lead others by our constant testimony and by our example.

"Follow with us," we say to Christ's separated people. "But are we following Christ?" asks the heart. Dare we ask others to stand upon the platform we occupy when we ourselves are torn with unseemly strife? Do we commend our basis of union to the religious world with its wide variety of views when one section of our own brotherhood demands the excision of another section and for no cause save a difference of speculative opinion? If our century-old contention that Christ's authority and divinity are a sufficient basis of fellowship is not capable of holding together our own brethren in mutual consideration and love, how can we hope to commend that basis to the creed-bound sects who fling back at us their "I told you so's"?

Our Centennial Task.

Here then is the evident task of this our Centennial year—to establish peace among the brethren whose essential mission is the proclamation of peace and unity. But how shall we bring about this peace? Shall we just cry "peace, peace"? That is what our leaders have been doing for years. Our missionary societies are sensitive lest their offerings be cut down. And so they cry peace, peace. A prominent newspaper waits to see how much of "modern" teaching our brotherhood will stand, and in the meantime it cries peace, peace. One brave soul a year ago laid the axe at the root of the tree. In a series of two or three articles A. McLean exposed the true inwardness of the Christian Standard office. Back of the editorial writers he went to the man who employs the editorial writers and in the hearing of the startled brotherhood said, "Thou art the man!"

Here was God's opportunity for the Disciples of Christ to rid themselves of an influence that is a constant menace to our Zion and a cause of shame to all our high-minded brethren. The Norfolk convention followed. The editor of the Christian Standard and his employes sat in the gallery of that convention as onlookers, hardly as participants. No men were so lonesome in that company as they. And still the "spiritual" brethren said peace, peace. And the missionary secretaries, responsible to the brotherhood for their holy enterprise, said peace, peace. And the business manager of the religious newspaper conferred with his editor and whispered in his ear, peace, peace. Thus the moment passed.

Business Sagacity.

Meanwhile the sagacious brain of the owner of the Christian Standard was doing double duty. What is it, he asked himself, that the Disciples of Christ will respond to more heartily and in larger numbers than to anything else? His answer was obvious: the appeal for Bible study. Go to, then, we shall exploit Bible study. Happily a young man was ready. He had some university training. He was a popular speaker. His face made anybody that looked into it trust him and follow him. So Herbert Moninger entered into the employ of Russell Errett.

The rest of the story everybody knows. The wonderful success of the teacher training idea, the pages and pages of advertising given the movement in the Christian Standard, the marvelous skill with which the welfare of the paper has been linked with the progress of the Bible study work, the increase of the paper's circulation and the re-establishment of its tottering business. In short, Moninger eclipsed McLean. And the virtues of the former veiled, if it did not bury, the revelations of moral heresy made by the latter.

It was a master stroke of business to employ Herbert Moninger. And we would not regard the business success that followed with anything but joy had the real animus of the owner of the Standard not again revealed itself. For a time we thought he sincerely would use his regained prestige to establish his paper on justice and freedom and make it a moral and spiritual leader. That its character has not been changed is now only too plain. Week after week its pages teem with misrepresentation. Relentlessly it hounds a group of the noblest men of our brotherhood. By tentative proposals it is trying the temper of its constituency on the matter of withdrawing support from our missionary societies. In our victorious march to Pittsburg, by an authority self-invested, it calls a halt in the procession until certain comrades are thrown out of the ranks. If the orders are not executed it threatens to throw the ranks into confusion and bring shame to our faces and our cause in the eyes of the millions who witness our triumphal demonstration.

Truth and Honor at Stake.

Is this a time to say peace, peace? Can real men be silent now? Shall the interests of truth and shall men's honor be sacrificed to the timid fear of a reduced collection for missions in this our Centennial year? The heart answers No, a thousand times. Better go to Pittsburg with liberty than with a big collection. Better go to Pittsburg with our glorious plea exemplified in our practice than with grand words about unity and freedom on our lips and supine submission to a creed made by a moral heretic in our practice.

Peace, then. Yet not by huddling our problems out of sight but by bravely carrying them into the light where they can be reckoned with. Peace! but not at the cost of the only principles upon which permanent unity can be maintained.

Peace! May God grant it to our Israel early in this our year of celebration. But may God give us something better than peace—courage to stand fast in our liberty wherein Christ hath made us free!

Mr. Moninger's Higher Criticism.

There have been some exceedingly interesting interpretations of the images in the book of Daniel. Commentators with imagination have seen in them the full setting forth of universal history. We have a new interpretation to suggest, however, for the image that had the legs of iron and the feet of clay. This image can refer to nothing else than the recent work on "The New Testament Church." This book is just such a combination of incongruous elements. In one part, as we saw last week, we have the most old-fashioned ideas and point of view. In another we have a decidedly modern turn, just such as we might expect from a man with modern training. How account for such incongruity? We will not suggest that Mr. Moninger has no consistent point of view. He has been too practically efficient for that. There seems but one explanation at hand and that is the atmosphere of the office where he writes. J. A. Lord entered that office so radical that he would receive the unimmersed. He leaves to do field work so conservative that he uses the small "d" and is opposed to the title "Rev." That office has a most marked influence over the men that enter it.

We noted last week that on the subjects where the brotherhood has traditions, the book takes the ultra-conservative point of view. On matters, however, where we never spoke dogmatically, the book proceeds just as we would expect when we remember that the author studied at the feet of the higher critics in Yale and understands their point of view. We note that in the chapters on the gospels and Acts, Mr. Moninger uses the methods and the point of view of the higher criticism, such higher criticism as evangelical scholars have been using the past quarter of a century.

In the quotation of authorities, we note in these chapters, the frequent use of Mr. McClymont and the Cambridge Bible. The character of both of these sources is perfectly well known. Mr. McClymont is the author of a splendid little teacher-training text book published by Revell called "The New Testament and Its Writers." In this little hand-book he uses a method and proceeds from a point of view that accords with that of the great universities. Mr. McClymont is one of the writers of the Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible. There are few of the statements of Mr. Moninger in his work on the gospels that do not find a parallel in Mr. McClymont's work. The Cambridge Bible is also quoted. The point of view of this work is too well-known to need any statement.

Mr. Moninger uses the methods of higher criticism to reach some important conclusions. These conclusions are in most cases the generally accepted ones. The method of Prof. McGarvey is here set aside, however. The clear statements of Holy Scripture are not accepted because of some a priori view on the subject of inspiration but are proved by historical and literary evidence. One of the good illustrations of the methods of the higher criticism is to be found on pages 44 and 45.

Here we find the following method used to determine the authorship of the book of Acts: First, he gathers from the book that the book was written by a certain sort of man. Secondly, he shows that this man could not be any of the other possible candidates for the position of author of the book. Thirdly, he shows that the facts all fit Luke. This is an admirable mode of procedure, just such an one as is the method used by Mr. Lumby in the Cambridge Bible and such a method as is regarded as the particular ear-mark of the higher criticism. The higher critics accept the facts of the Bible and form a doctrine of inspiration to fit the facts.

We do not complain that Mr. Moninger has used the higher criticism. He has done the cause a service by showing that the methods of the higher criticism may and often do lead to conservative results. But we wish that his book had proceeded uniformly by some fixed method. It will not do to pursue historical inquiry in one section and drop into dogmatism in another. Literary chop sooy is even more baffling to the curiosity than the usual oriental article.

Next week, we shall study the lean skeleton of the church which a theological imagination has drawn and put it side by side with the church of the New Testament and with the church of our own times.

Deceptive Advertising.

Certainly the time has come for a reformation of the spirit and methods of journalism among the Disciples of Christ. We cannot now think of any denomination whose representative papers resort to the unprincipled methods of getting business such as are employed by the leading papers of our brotherhood. When we contemplate it we almost fall into the conviction expressed recently by R. J. Campbell that the church would be better off if there were no "religious" journals at all.

We have taken occasion to remind the brethren of the gross perversion of Christian morality of which a notorious Cincinnati "religious" paper is guilty. We shall probably feel compelled to make further disclosures of that journal's true inwardness as the time passes. Just now, however, we are chagrined at receiving in the mail a copy of an advertising circular sent out by the Christian Evangelist of St. Louis. It was sent us by one of our subscribers. Our surprise is somewhat mollified when we reflect that the editor of that paper could have no hand in the scheme. We cannot believe that J. H. Garrison composed the circular or approved it. It could only have come from the business office where Dr. Garrison's broader sympathies do not prevail. Moreover, he has been ill recently and therefore it is the more likely that he had no part in it.

The circular is a small bit of paper announcing the trial subscription offer of the Evangelist. Among other virtues it sets down most prominently that the paper is

"A DEFENDER OF THE FAITH."

"Jude's admonition," it continues, "'to contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered unto the saints,' is fully understood and carefully heeded by the editor of the Christian Evangelist, as the brief editorial printed on the reverse side of this sheet will evidence: but in reproving and rebuking those who err, a Christ-like courtesy is shown, such as becometh those who have learned the spirit of the Master."

Turning the circular over we find this heading: "Editorial by J. H. Garrison in the Christian Evangelist, October 1, 1908." The editorial, with the question which prompted it, is as follows:

"'Professor Willett claims that his views on miracles represent the scholars of today on that subject. Is this your understanding?'

"It is not our understanding. No doubt his views do represent a certain class of scholars, or school of thinkers, but the great leaders of thought in the various evangelical bodies hold to a very different view. They accept, without question, the miraculous element of the Bible, including the virgin birth of Christ, his unique sonship, his sacrificial death and his resurrection from the dead. In fact, Christianity has never made any progress in the world except by men who have held to these great fundamental facts, with all the miraculous which they involve. More than that, the church is never going to get away from the miraculous. It can not do that and hold to the Christ of the New Testament. There is, we should say, in scholarly circles a decided reaction against the tendency which manifested itself a few years ago to get rid of the miraculous at all hazards. The feeling is growing that 'there is more in heaven and on earth than is dreamed of in our philosophy,' and men are less ready to deny the possibility of what they do not understand. Long after the schools of thought that balk at the miraculous have 'had their day and ceased to be,' the Church, resting secure on its own divine foundation, will go singing on its triumphant way, trusting in an omnipotent Savior who conquered death and brought life and immortality to light in the gospel."

Our friend who sends us this interesting circular remarks facetiously that Herod and Pilate have joined hands. "'Down Willett,'" he says, "seems to be the war cry now. Cincinnati and St. Louis may be able to find cause for the amicable adjustment of their enmities. Brother Oeschger would better write some more 'Irenics.'" We do not feel facetious about it. We are deeply in earnest in ealling attention to the ethical point involved in the use of anothr man's personality as a whipping boy for advertising purposes. The disingenuousness of it is the more apparent when it is done in the name of "Christ-like courtesy." Does the Christian Evangelist eonsider such use of Dr. Willett's personality an act of "Christian courtesy"? We firmly believe that Dr. Garrison agrees with the great majority of our thoughtful men that the Christian Standard's attack on Professor Willett is tyrannous and un-Christian. Why, then, will he allow the agents of his eompany to make capital out of the prejudices of people whose only information is the misrepresentation of the Christian Stanard?

But this does not seem to us the worst phase of the matter. Dr. Garrison should know that his editorial eontains false implications. The "views" of Professor Willett are set up as "very different" from the "great leaders of evangelical thought." In what respect are these views different. The editorial says that these leaders believe in the miraculous element of the Bible, including the virgin birth of Christ, his unique sonship, his sacrificial death and his resurrection from the dead.

Will Dr. Garrison point out the occasion in which Dr. Willett has ever denied his belief in those facts? We have heard him in public speech for many years, we have read the editorial columns of the Christian Century and all his writings and we have never heard or seen any such denial. On the contrary again and again in reeent issues of this paper, Dr. Willett has pronounced his belief in the miraeles, in the virgin birth, the unique sonship of Jesus, his saerificial death and his resurrection. We say plainly that the editorial is deceptive. It is a play to the galleries. The business manager's use of it is designed to catch the uninformed and the prejudiced.

We are surprised, we repeat, and chagrined, that the Christian Evangelist should lend itself by such subterranean methods to the furtherance of an untruth which is today working mischief in the affairs of our brotherhood. C. C. M.

The National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church.

The splendid work done by the Associaition has been such as should thrill with joy every heart. In the year that has just closed it has given Christian hospital care and nursing to 275; cared for sixty-five aged, indigent disciples of Christ; aided to self-support 130 destitute women; placed 150 homeless ehildren in Christian families; furnished home love to 641 homeless little ones; and has 350 under its care at the present time. It has raised $122,301.64 for the support of the ministry and increasing of the permanent funds, a gain of $25,322.14 over last year.

Since the beginning it has made a fruitful use of the funds entrusted to its care. It has prepared fifteen young women for the noble profession of nursing. It has nursed and healed in its hospitals, 875 of the poor, homeless sick in the name of the Great Physician; "I was sick and ye visited me." It has, like a nursing mother, tenderly cared for 114 aged brethren of our Lord, sheltering them from the humility of the poorhouse: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these my brethren." It has inspired to new hope and self-support, 780 discouraged, destitute women, saving them from ruin: "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord." It has furnished temporary aid to 946 widowed parents until they could repair the wreckage eaused by death: "Bear ye one anothers' burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ." It has been father and mother to 5,435 children left orphans, or worse, at a tender age. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and the widow in their afflietion." It has placed in childless homes, 3,150 of these homeless children: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

It has prepared hundreds for useful service; among the number is a bank teller, a secretary to a United States Senator, a civil engineer, a minister of the gospel, nurses, teachers and heads of Christian families. The magnificent work done by out great brotherhood through the Benevolent Association promises to soon silence the criticism that the church does not care for the poor, and to take the credit of first place in charity from the Roman Catholics and to lead all Christian men interested in lodges to seek the fullest and truest exemplification of the brotherhood of man through the Church of Christ.

The Promise of Christianity.

No attentive reading of the New Testament can miss the obvious conelusion that the early church lived in an atmosphere of high hopes and glowing expectations as to what should soon be accomplished in human society by the new faith. To the believers in the Master, the world was moving out of the darkness of paganism into the light of the cross. The dawn was in the east. Night's candles had burned out, and rosy day stood tiptoe on the misty mountain tops.

What did that early church expect? It is not difficult to enumerate at least a part of the anticipations which filled the souls of its adherents. We probably penetrate but a little way into the happy sense of confidence which filled the minds of the disciples of the first generations. But even that little is revealing. Their hopes were very bright. Their confidence in the speedy accomplishment of great changes in the world through the ministry of Christianity was supreme. Have those hopes been realized? Has the promise of early Christianity been fulfilled?

Among those eonfident forecasts of the first Christians was the coming of Christ. The pages of the New Testament are full of this hope. The Master's own words seemed to justify the belief that he would soon return to abide with his people. With earnest enthusiasm they gave witness to this promise. No immaterial and bodiless coming would satisfy their desires. They wished to see the Lord again in the flesh. As time went by there were notes of wonder and anxiety in their speech. Their enemies taunted them with the delay. Where tarried he? Where was the promise of his coming? They knew that he would not fail, but they began to see that his coming was not to be immediate, and the growing centuries have impressed upon the church the deepening consciousness that it is not to be merely bodily and spectacular. The Christ has always been coming to his people as they gave him place and room. To devout and yearning souls he comes today in the fellowship of the spiritual life. "I am with you always," is his fulfilled promise.

Another of the hopes of the early church was the present and visible establishment of the kingdom of God in the world. Apocalyptic dreams had made them confident that the world powers were to fall very soon, and Christianity was to be enthroned upon their ruins. Their resentment against Rome and all its persecuting power, which had ravaged the fair fields of the church and swept away great companies of the faithful in the fiery chariot of martyrdom, could be satisfied with nothing less than the overthrow of the harlot of the seven hills. Yet the years slipped away, the profligate emperors came and went, and Rome still endured. Not till centuries had passed were the hopes of the early church brought to pass by the change of the empire to nominal adherance to faith. And the historian still ponders over that change with the inquiry in his mind whether it was not the greatest misfortune that ever befell the church that Constantine should become its patron and protector.

The early Christians looked with confidence to the speedy submission of the world to the cross. The kingdoms of the earth were to become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Anointed. Wars were to cease to the ends of the earth. Men were to beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks. Nature was to be no longer hostile but kindly and protecting. The beasts were to live at peace with each other and with man. There should be no harm or destruction in all the holy place of Christ's domain. How little these hopes came to fruition in the lengthening centuries. Not yet after twenty cycles can we say that they are realized. The promise of early Christianity seems to tarry long in its fulfillment.

Yet it must be remembered that the expectations of men outstrip the purposes of God. We demand immediate results, because our lives are short and we fear for the accomplishment of that which we cannot see. With God it is not so. All times are in his hand, and though he seems to work slowly, his ways are sure. Men love to work sudden revelations. They invoke irruption and catastrophe. God plants seeds and waits for them to grow. Elijah thought the short and drastic method of the sword was best. God taught him that the still small voice of conviction and persuasion is better. The early Christians loved to dream of the overthrow of the bloody city which had been the scene of their tortures. God took the slower and surer way of evangelism and education. The crusades satisfied the militant passion in the church and sent legions of European warriors to fling their lives away under Syrian suns. The futility of the whole vast enterprise was seen when the last of the Knights of St. John sailed sadly away from Acre to the west.

It is not by watchers for literal fulfillments of prophecy or lovers of the violent and catastrophic that the promise of early Christianity will be realized. It is rather by those who watch the gradual but inevitable changes which the faith has wrought in the world that the triumph of the cross is perceived. The downfall of slavery and polygamy, the restraint of war, the elevation of woman, the care of childhood, the far-flung work of evangelism and education in lands over which paganism has reigned with unbroken sway till now, the slow yet sure transformation of business and social ideals by Christian spirit, and the awakening of the modern conscience to a sense of religious responsibilities are all signs of promise that hang out like the banners of God.

There are hindrances and obstacles enough to perplex the most confident and to appall the wavering. There is the heathenism of the non-Christian peoples and the heathenism almost as formidable and far less excusable in Christian lands. There are formality, legalism and literalism in the church making hollow and meaningless its claims to spiritual power. There is indifference, the deadliest foe of the faith, lurking within its ranks and thwarting much of the best effort made in behalf of its great mission. The church is still too much infected with pagan form and spirit to do its most effective work.

Yet these are the very hindrances which the Master taught his followers to expect and withstand. Not in a day was the victory to come. Not with blare of trumpets does the church come to her success, but with quietness and prayer, with watchfulness of spirit to see the signs of the times, and with recognition of the long time through which the purposes of God mature to their ultimate triumph. The time may be long but for each of us it is short. We are not held to account for results, but for faithfulness. To him who has faith the promise of early Christianity is certain of fulfillment.

Men and the Church.

BY REV. C. M. CHILTON.

(Delivered a the New Orleans Convention.)

One of the most magnificent religious movements of our time is the current awakening of religious interests among the laymen of the church. This movement is not confined to any denomination or group, nor has it any common origin or form of activity. It is appearing spontaneously wherever there are progressive Christian communities. It seems to come from the depths of the growing spiritual life of the church. What we have thus far is not an agitation that promises any immediate radical changes, but a gentle tide, as gentle as the dew, that is drifting multitudes of men Godward.

A problem that confronts us upon the threshold of this movement is that of organization. Various societies, clubs and brotherhoods have sprung up. Usually they enjoy a brief period of enthusiasm with banquets, lectures and other forms of entertainment. Sometimes, however, the interest flags, and after a more or less prolonged illness, death ensues, though for a long period it continues to have a name to live. Many are experimenting and seeking to find a plan that will insure a permanent interest.

The Church God's Provision for Men.

Meanwhile the church itself is offering to us the plan of God for the organization of Christian men. And it may be that in looking for another we are in danger of sending adrift the whole movement. If Christianity itself in its essential life and work cannot be made attractive to the men of this age then it is perhaps hardly worh while to resort to other means.

The church is essentially a masculine organization. Our religion from the first was cast in a masculine mold and the masculine impress is upon every feature of it. It has a place for women and children in its perfect provision for human life, but man is recognized as the spiritual leader of society. It is instructive that from its very beginning God himself is conceived as masculine. From the first the sacred covenant and its affairs were committed to men. The patriarchs, judges, priests, prophets and kings were men. The sacred writings were written by men and breathe the masculine spirit. John the Baptist was a rugged man of the hills, having "his raiment of camel's hair and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his meat was locusts and wild honey."

Christ's Manhood.

Our Savior came as a man, the one truly Kingly man that has lived, who wore the crown of royalty upon his soul and emblazoned in his person all the graces of a perfect humanity. Matthias Claudius says of him, "A Redeemer from sin! A Savior such as the Bible depicts our Lord Jesus to have been, who went about doing good, yet had himself no place where he might lay his head: who spared no pains, and refused no shame: who humbled himself even to death upon the cross, that he might finish his work: who came into the world to save the world: who was therein scourged and tormented, and departed thence with a crown of thorns upon his head! Didst thou ever hear of such a thing, and do not thy hands fall down on thy lap! It is truly a mystery and we do not understand it: but it comes from God and from heaven, for it bears the stamp of heaven and overflows with divine mercy. One might well suffer oneself to be branded and broken on the wheel for the mere idea, and he who can be stirred to laughter or mockery must be mad. He whose heart is in the right place lies in the dust, rejoices and prays."

The Loyalty of the Twelve.

The teachings of Jesus are masculine: they mainly concern the problems of men. His parables for the most part were of men and his miracles of men. Men responded to his call and were ever in the foreground of the great scenes of his life. He chose twelve to be his apostles and it is to the proof of his power that they were held to him, save one, by an unfailing devotion until death. They worshiped him. He trained them for leadership and at the last committed his sacred cause into their hands. Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit the church was an organization of men. The apostles, its elders and deacons and evangelists were men. Pentecost was distinctively a men's meeting. Apostolic Christianity was truly masculine. Its most typical figure was St. Paul, a veritable second Ulysses, who loved to picture the true life in the images of warfare and the arena. And so the church has come down to us through the centuries.

Our first task then, is to bring the men of today to know and love the church itself as Christ's own organization for his men. Whatever auxiliary organizations may prove to be necessary it is well first to exhaust the resources of the church itself by the fullest amplification of its powers and functions. We have not yet begun to know the church in its vast wealth of service and helpfulness for men. The idea is capable of an infinitely richer interpretation in every feature than it has ever been given. It is designed to awaken to music every chord of the human heart.

The Ideal of the Church.

Let us contemplate the ideal of the church. First is its material expression, the house of God. The Greek religion inspired the noblest painting and sculpture and architecture of antiquity. Our holy religion offers a far richer inspiration in its wealth of tradition and truth and emotion. The ideal church will be grander than Karnak and more beautiful than the Parthenon. And there is the invisible presence of God and church and the Holy Spirit filling the house and making it sacred far beyond every other earthly shrine, and the very image of the heavenly. And there is the life divine, pure as the crystal river that flows from under the throne. and sins, though they "be red like crimson" are become "as white as snow." Is it not a beautiful idealization, the vision of the coming of God's children upon the Lord's day in sweetest fellowship to worship and to cultivate the life of God in their souls, their elders and deacons leading them like shepherds and afterwards going out with the glow of the altar upon them to purify the life currents of the world? And what beautiful and impressive services with their simple religious melodies and prayers and solemn instructions from God's word. And the ordinances, baptism and the supper, with their simple yet sublime symbolism. Do we grasp their profound significance? I fear in our reaction from Rome we have needs to set out upon a search for the holy grail and the sacred tomb. These ordinances are beautiful gems to adorn the beauty of the bride of Christ. They ever reflect his humility and glory. And the Bible, that holy book from whose pages shines a light that is from heaven. Its writings are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness:

that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. And over all these sacred elements leading on like a pillar of fire, the hope of immortality.

Man Essentially a Spiritual Being.

Man is a composite being. He is a thinking animal with carnal nature, and needs to be fed and clothed and educated. But he is infinitely more; he is a spiritual being made in the image of God and endowed with all of the potentialities of eternal life. Between these lower and higher natures is a ceaseless struggle and man becomes a sinner. It is as a spiritual being that man comes to his own and it is only in happy relations with God and his kingdom that we can think of him with satisfaction. In this character alone he rises to true dignity and worthfulness. We can only think of the end of the world as being realized in the character values which God is gathering as increasing harvests into his garners from its advancing generations in their growing moral life. In the harmony of the divine plan, the world is so constituted that the basic foundations of all true social life and progress lie in the moral nature of man. As he grows morally, civilizations rise, but as he declines, their lights grow dim. So to make provision for man as a spiritual being and to bring him to his eternal own is the final crowning work of the world. In the last analysis, lives, institutions and civilization will be measured by what they do for man in his character—his religious, his eternal relations. Without this, however brilliantly his career and however great the civilizations that produced him, he is a sinner and has missed the mark; he is unsaved and—whatever future worlds may do for him —disinherited.

Now the church is God's own method in Christ for the accomplishment of this final saving work; it is his enterprise for the salvation of man in that highest sense of "deliverance from evil, communion with God and eternal life." If we did not have the church, men would, in the exercise of their higher aspirations, feel themselves under the necessity of creating an institution like it to do the work for which it stands, and this they have actually done. It is this that lifts the church far above every other institution and gives infinite significance to all of its enterprises. It was for this that Jesus came to establish it and send it forth in love to become the widening base of operation for the supernatural working within the natural for the regeneration of men; and for nineteen hundred years the gospel has proven itself the "power of God unto salvation." Wherever it is preached in its purity a new divine life begins to appear. Jesus would send us out with this evangel with its heavenly life to the ends of the earth. He seeks to awaken in us such an appreciation of its value that there is no rest for us so long as a single soul remains in ignorance of it. He holds before us as an uplifted image the vision of a redeemed humanity.

The One Truly Masculine Task.

We have come to the one truly masculine task of the world, a task that staggers forth and challenges all the heroic in us, one so huge that races and civilizations are but items of it and all the ages are required for its accomplishment. The Kingdom of the Spirit is indeed the world-task: too great for any age, it will itself determine the boundaries of the ages, and the limits of time. Before it all other enterprises, as of government, commerce, or education, sink into insignificance; their highest mission would seem to be to make way for it and to prepare men for its accomplishment.

What the church of today needs is a baptism of fire from heaven. It is well to restore words and institutions, but the world is waiting for a restoration of the Christ life, that pure and unspeakably beautiful life that loves and groans and toils and sacrifices and suffers and dies for lost humanity, that rejoices in Gethsemane and Calvaries.

But there must first be peace. A divided church will not win this age. First, because it will not be able to attain unto the kingdom which is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit. But more, the very spirit of the age is against it; its centralizing drift with its constant play of unifying forces is more and more disinclining men to become sectaries. Feeling intuitively the broad fraternity that lies at the base of human life, they will not receive a church that comes to them in strife and division. Furthermore, they are not interested in the questions in which division grounds itself. Religion only appeals to them in its spiritual values and these are lost in sectarian strife. Denominationalism is costing the evangelization of the men of America; a divided church cannot overcome the tremendous forces of evil in our modern world.

Tolerance a Characteristic of United Church.

Our responsibility as a people in this crisis is very great. We have come to champion the cause of Christian unity. I wonder if we understand what it means to espouse a great cause like this in an age like this. What with our frequent narrowness and intolerance and delight in unnecessary sharp words that sting and rankle, I wonder if we understand. In our war upon sectarianism, we ourselves are in danger of becoming the narrowest of sects, eaten up with the canker of self-righteousness. What an infinite task is this we have set for ourselves, to bring into one all of the factions of the kingdom with its extremes of narrow dogmatism and ultra latitudinarianism. There must be in the united church a tolerance for great diversity of thought and life if it is to claim all that is Christian. May we hope to grow into that loyalty, that deep grasp of essentials, that breadth of charity, yea, into that fulness of the Christian spirit which must be ours if we are to become a great unifying force in Christendom? In the first hundred years of our history we have made rapid progress, but we have far to travel yet before the world will receive us seriously in the character we have assumed. How shall we appeal to others to abandon their cherished traditions to unite with us in the life that is in Christ, if we ourselves be not ready. It is well to creat a great Centennial enthusiasm, but our greater need is to be "clothed with power from on high." If I had one prayer to make, it would not be for funds or numbers; it would be for a larger measure of the spirit of Christ—that a great consuming love, love for God and man, love for every lost soul, love even for our enemies, a self-denying Christlike love might fill our hearts, a love in whose sacred flame every sinful thought burns to ashes, a love that will not be satisfied till it has found its Calvary and offered itself there for God and humanity. Oh, that we might forsake all trivialities and utterly abandon ourselves to the great work of Christ lifting up the ensign of a truly apostolic church in the minds of the world. Ah, it is not a time for counting triumphs; it is a time for penitence and prayer.

Our Part in the Coming Unity.

Meanwhile a thousand providences are urging us on. A hundred years ago the ideal of the united church was met with scorn and ridicule, but its cause has grown until it has overflowed all banks and we are today in the midst of a great world drift in the direction of unity. Brethren, our problem would seem to be, not, shall unity be accomplished, but shall we have an honorable part in its accomplishment. The church is already well entered upon the first stages of its realization. How long shall be required for its consummation no prophet can foretell, but as sure as God is on his throne this movement shall not be stayed till the prayer of our Lord is fulfilled.

In that era of conquest that is coming on, oh, so slowly, we shall look for a new race of men, a nobler race, for if it is true that men make eras, it is also true that eras make men. Caesar of the Julian house was a scheming politician and played the game of ambition in Rome. He was deeply in debt and counted a man of little honor. But he finally secured command of the armies in Gaul and in that great region of the west where the empires of Europe were forming in an atmosphere of destinies and great policies, he grew into the most gigantic figure of the Roman world. Ages make men. And if a semi-materialistic age like this has brought forth a race of titans, what shall we expect from an age of faith. Surely, then, society shall begin to see clearly, and men shall love one another, and governments shall serve, and there shall be happiness, and the children shall sing, and architecture, and sculpture, and painting, and music and poetry shall burst into their blossom, and his servants shall serve him, and the prophet's dream shall be fulfilled.

Happy Children on the Farm.

A barn with doors facing southward,
Broad eaves where the swallows nest,
Billows of hay, summer-scented,
Deep stalls where the horses rest;
Bins rich with grain from the uplands,
Eggs that were treasures to find,
Kittens and chickens and children,
Grandfather busy and kind;
Swallows and pigeons a-flutter,
Dogs always ready for play,
Sunbeams adrift in the rafters,
Dens hollowed out in the hay;
Frolics of hiding and seeking,
Musical patter of rain,—
Oh, the delightings of childhood!
Would we might find them again!

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates.

A NEW BASIS OF FELLOWSHIP.

From all appearances it looks as if there was a movement on foot at Lexington and Cincinnati to create a new basis of Christian fellowship among the disciples. No one from either of these places has ventured to write out the various articles of the creed on the basis of which they have been for several years extending or withdrawing the hand of fellowship. The most recent article to be added to the creed of Lexington and Cincinnati runs about as follows: "I believe in the historicity of all the miracles recorded in the Old Testament." Because Prof. Herbert L. Willett said last summer in a lecture on the miracles of the Old Testament that he did not believe Joshua made the sun stand still, or that God sent two she-bears out of the wood to tear the forty and two boys that made fun of the prophet Elisha's bald pate, they have pronounced him an "infidel," and no longer regard him as a Christian. They have also set up a demand that his name be taken off the program of the Centennial Convention, at Pittsburg, next year. In order to make their demand effective they have stirred up a few preachers over the country to boycott the missionary societies if the secretaries do not use their influence to force the professor off the program.

It does not seem to satisfy Lexington and Cincinnati that Prof. Willett believes with all his heart and shows in his daily life of devotion to the cause of Christ, that he believes that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the Living God, and the Savior of the World." This confession of faith does not seem to be enough. He must also believe in the historicity of all Old Testament events and miracles, and the meaning put upon them at Lexington. The disciples have been at work for a century trying to unite the Christian world in one fellowship upon the simple New Testament terms of union and communion—faith in Christ and obedience to him in all things. It looks now as if one of the most interesting features of their centenial celebration would be a movement emanating from Lexington and Cincinnati to change the custom of the disciples, and inaugurate the second century of their history by the formulation of a new basis of fellowship. They are starting in to test the matter on Prof. Willett, who has not been loved over much in these two quarters for ten or fifteen years.

Alexander Campbell's Creed.

Alexander Campbell said in 1826: "So long as any man, woman or child declares that Jesus is the Messiah, the Savior of men; and so long as he exhibits a willingness to obey him in all things according to his knowledge, so long will I receive him as a Christian brother and treat him as such."

Again in 1837 he declared that he was willing to receive and treat as a Christian anyone who "believes in his heart that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the Son of God; repents of his sins, and obeys him in all things according to his measure of knowledge of his will."

Prof. Willett is a member, in good standing and full fellowship, and the minister, of a Church of nearly one thousand members in Chicago, all of whom believe him to be a Christian and entitled to Christian fellowship. They do not all agree with him, any more than they agree with each other, in many opinions; but they have not discovered anything wrong, either in his faith or life, during a ministry of two or three years, and an acquaintanceship of fifteen years, and yet it has been discovered by persons living in Cincinnati and Lexington, from brief newspaper reports of a lecture, that Prof. Willett has denied the faith and is as bad as an infidel.

From what marvelously small data these anatomists of our faith are able to build up an infidel—a real, live infidel. That reminds one of the marvelous skill of a comparative anatomist of two centuries ago, who was reputed to be able to take a single bone of a fossil form and tell the name of the animal to which it belonged. He was given a bone to examine, and declared at once that it once belonged to the body of a human infant. It was, as a matter of fact, a bone from the body of a salamander.

The Lexington Creed.

A new creed, or test of fellowship, has been growing up and taking form in Lexington during the last few years, which is being offered the Disciples for adoption. As reported in the Cincinnati paper a few have adopted it. A few have written in declaring that they do not regard "Willett" as a Christian any longer, and will not come to the Pittsburg convention if he is on the program. The great majority of the Disciples, the leading pastors and teachers, have not been heard from. They probably will be heard from if Cincinnati insists on deciding for the brotherhood who are "representative Disciples," and making up the Pittsburg program. If it becomes necessary for them to speak out, their speech will seem to Cincinnati and Lexington "like the rushing of a mighty wind," as compared with the gentle zehpyr they have bottled up and are piping through the pages of the Christian Standard.

The Lexington Creed, as it has been gradually built up, and is being circulated for subscription among the Disciples, is about as follows:

1. "I believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God.
2. "I believe that Moses wrote every word of the Pentateuch.
3. "I believe that the Prophet Isaiah wrote every word of the book bearing his name.
4. "I believe that the whale actually swallowed Jonah.
5. "I believe that Daniel was cast into the lions' den.
6. "I believe that Joshua made the sun stand still.
7. "I believe that God sent the she-bears to tear the boys who made fun of Elisha.
8. "I believe that the accounts in Genesis of the creation of the heavens and earth, of man and woman, the story of the Garden of Eden and the fall of man, of the flood, and the sacrifice of Isaac, actually took place as recorded.
9. "I believe the ten plagues were sent by God, as special miracles, to aid the Israelites in their escape from Egypt.
10. "I believe that all the books of the Old Testament were written at the time and by the persons tradition teaches.
11. "I believe that the use of the organ in public worship is unscriptural.
12. "I believe that anyone who does not believe all these things is an infidel and unworthy of Christian fellowship."

These are the articles in the creed that Lexington has been making a test of fellowship for several years. It has been used on professors and ministers chiefly, as a test of their fitness to teach and preach. How soon it will be applied to boys and girls in the Sunday School who apply for membership in the Church, it is hard to say. Compare this Lexington confession of faith with the confession of faith Alexander Campbell deemed sufficient for Christian fellowship, and it will be seen how far Lexington is out of agreement with the fathers.

Does it promote union?

The most serious consideration for the hierarchs of Lexington and Cincinnati is as to the effect of their movement upon the unity of the brotherhood. They will get a few people over the country to adopt their confession of faith, and be persuaded that those who do not confess every article are infidels and ought to be treated as such. This movement has already produced two divisions, the one in Grand Rapids, Mich., and the other at Austin, Ill. In both of these churches there were members who thought that it was not enough for their minister to believe that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God to entitle him to fellowship, so they stirred up dissension and demanded the resignation of their minister. A large part of the membership of both congregations were quite satisfied with their pastors, and with the simple New Testament creed of the Disciples, and resisted the effort to change the terms of fellowship. Divisions followed.

Such will be the result wherever this Lexington creed is propagated. The great majority of the Disciples will not be carried away by this movement to add to the New Testament basis of union, no matter if it is supported by a great, swelling pretense of superior loyalty to the word of God, and to the plea of the Disciples.

If this propaganda of new tests of fellowship does not promote union among the Disciples, how can it be expected to promote union among all the people of God in other Churches? Suppose in some conference between Baptists and Disciples, looking to a union, a Lexington convert presents his creed as a basis of union, insisting upon its acceptance in every article. How long will negotiations for union be carried on? It will be difficult enough to secure union upon the simple New Testament confession of faith, for which the Disciples have been pleading through all their history. The Lexington Creed is the most finished implement for defeating union that has appeared since the House of Bishops put forth the "Quadrilateral Basis." In fact it is well understood that the negotiations between Free Baptists and Disciples were abruptly terminated

By George A. Campbell

The Correspondent: "What a surprise the editorial and your announcements in last Christian Century gave me! What a firm, positive front the paper presents to all gainsayers and investigators. I predict the Century will make the most interesting reading of any of our journals for the next year, if it will now as 'frankly,' dignifiedly and brotherly consider and diseuss vital questions affecting the Bible, as it announces its willingness to do.

"I enelose you a few questions to draw out of you information I desire as to your positions. I am sure now that there will only be given me the most direct and honest of answers.

1. "Do you believe that mankind was physieally generated from monkeys or any other beasts inferior to mankind?

2. "If you do, do you believe that God has ever delivered to mankind a message or revelation in the words of the spoken or written language of any nation past or present?

3. "If God ever made such revelation to man, do you believe that he foretold to Noah that the flood was coming to drown the world and that he told him how to make the ark to save his family? Or do you doubt that there was such a flood and such a revelation to Noah regarding it?

4. "If mankind were generated from monkeys or other beasts, then a time must have come when they had intellectual capacity to receive a revelation from God. Of all the reported verbal messages in the Bible from God to mankind, whieh do you regard as the first authentie revelation of God to man?

"Will you please publish and answer these questions in the Christian Century as 'frankly' as I ask them?"

A Good Preacher.

The correspondent is a religious preacher. It is heartening to meet sueh. He believes his Gospel. With rare devotion he is giving his life for the spread of faith. My hand and heart are his. He can believe what he likes about the relation of men and monkeys without disturbing in the least my Christian regard and good wishes. That he is a Christian man is enough for me. In these days our systems must not be too rapid. Nor must they be arbitrarily imposed on others. It is well for us to stay close to the Confession of Christ as the essential unifying element. This is a mighty old and a mighty big world. When men go far in the great fields of history, geology, anthropology, cosmogony, etc., they are fortunate if they bring back their results with subdued and reverent spirits. There should be no seetarianism in science.

Scholars Indefinite.

The correspondent charges scholars with being indefinite. They may be. Often I do not understand them; but the fault is usually mine. I am not prepared to understand them. Therefore the frequent misrepresentation of the learned men. They, doubtless, are in fact to blame for not simplifying their message. They are often too contentedly academic.

Therefore I think if we eommon people had done more investigating in the fields of the scholars and the scholars had done more kindly investigating of us, we would understand each other better. It is quite as difficult for us to converse in foreign and unknown thoughts as in foreign and unknown tongues. Then temperament and assoeiations are large faetors in our failure to understand one another. I cannot understand the musician, and to the musician I am a sad prodigy. Some prosaie people think all poets are mad. Willett and McGarvey will both go to heaven when they die; but until they are translated they simply can't appreeiate the positions of each other. And both are hard students. It devolves upon middlemen to keep them both sane. Many of us seem to be working at the task. Perhaps the world makes progress by strong men emphasizing not the whole of truth but parts of the whole. Certainly it is the rare, intense soul that sees truth whole.

Then again the religious seholar may be indefinite beeause of the vast field of his thought. Everybody agrees on mathematieal truths. They are axiomatie. But when you come to discuss inspiration, God, the soul, the atonement and such mighty themes, you find the greatest difficulty of transferring your exact thought to others. Language is not exaet. Words have many shades of meaning to many people. The field is intangible.

If men are not clear because they wish to cover their meaning, then they are culpable and without exeuse.

But as to the questions:

Evolution.

1. No: the monkey is not the physieal aneestor of man. There have been vast periods of evolution and the world over men have come to be what they are through tremendous epochs. But there have been marked breaks in the development. All along the way God has written the history of this marvelous and purposeful development. Years ago when a belated scientist tried to disprove evolution he expected to be complimented by his Christian friend, Charles Kensley. But he was to be disappointed, for Kensley simply wrote and asked him "why then did God write all the lies on the rocks and in the deposits of the earth?" (I quote from memory). I do not know the language that scientists are reading on and in God's earth. But I eannot ignore their testimony. Just what truths of detail there is in evolution we may not yet know. But that there have been vast and continuous development is assured. But there have been at least three mighty breaks in the chain of evolution. Between no life and plant life, between plant life and animal life, between animal life and human life, are chasms to delight the imagination. As to the method of bridging these I do not know. As to the power I have no doubt. God breathed into man the breath of life. In every step of the way there has been the handiwork of an unseen artist with transcendent wisdom and purpose. That artist we know as God.

2. Yes, God has done so and is doing so wherever his Bible is read. This revelation usually first came to the souls of men, and later found its way through the pen to the page. I do not mean by this to endorse the theory of verbal inspiration.

The Flood.

3. I do not think the flood was universal, but God made a revelation to Noah by means of the flood. Pages would be needed to give reasons for this position. Perhaps it would be best not to so briefly answer such questions. There are volumes bearing on this story of the flood. No one should be dogmatie without at least consulting all views.

4. The first revelation of God was to Adam—the first man. He knew God. He knew good from evil. He knew the pangs of evil doing. He hoped to regain Eden. Thus began with the first man the sweep of our redemptive history in whose glory and power and hope we are present aetors!

Austin Sta., Chicago.

Have you ever said, "Oh, how ean I keep that sunlight, and be sure that I shall have it to use while working?" Is not God, who made the sun to shine, willing and able to let his light and his presenee so shine through me that I ean walk all the day with God nearer to me than anything in nature? Please God he can do it, and he does it so seldom only beeause I am so filled with other thoughts that I do not give God time to make himself known, to enter and take possession.—Andrew Murray.

because of the impression made by the wide-spread circulation of the Cincinnati journal among the Free Baptists, as a representative journal of the Disciples. The Free Baptists did not want any of its spirit or its articles of faith.

All hope of a union of the Baptists and Disciples, or any other union, would go glimmering, if the spirit or the creed of Lexington should possess the Disciples. May they be permanently delivered from it.

OUR NEW SERIAL

We begin next week a new serial story by the popular author of St. Cuthbert's—Mr. Robt. E. Knowles, entitled "The Down at Shanty Bay.". Mr. Knowles is so well known and his former books have been so favorably received that nothing more need be said than that this story is fully up to his high standard.

This is a pathetic but entrancing story of a stern Scotchman who struggled against his heart's desire for many years. Tell your friends that now is a good time to begin a new subscription.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett.

My dear Brother Willett:—The Christian Century of September 24, containing my letter and your reply, came during my absence, and I have not been able to give it consideration until today. I beg to thank you for the reply, and the only reason that I further trespass upon your time is that some matters may be made clear that have not been made so by your first letter.

As the lawyers say, let us "make up the issue"; I think I can safely say that you and I are agreed upon the following propositions:

First: That the inspiration of a prophet enabled him to predict events that were beyond human fore-sight.

Second: That the Old Testament scriptures contain a correct account of the career of Abraham, Jacob and Joseph, so far as they deal with those careers.

Third: That the four gospels were written by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John.

Fourth: Jesus promised the apostles that the Holy Spirit should call to their remembrance all that he had spoken to them, and that the Holy Spirit did so call to their remembrance.

Fifth: That Jesus was born of a Virgin, conceived by the Holy Spirit as represented in the gospels of Matthew and Luke.

Sixth: God bore witness to the preaching of the apostles, "both with signs and wonders and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost" according to his own will.

I am thankful that we are in substantial agreement on these great propositions. If I have not stated our agreement correctly, you will please correct me in your reply to this, as I have no disposition to misrepresent you.

Concerning the answers to my other questions, I regret to say that your letter is not satisfactory.

Allow me to quote again from your letter of September third. "The objection which has most weight in our day and which unless removed will stand as a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of miracles is the apparent chasm which separates the phenomena from the uniform course of events in human experience, and under the reign of law." That quotation is not, as you seem to think, an excerpt from a statement giving two definitions of miracles. It is not even in the same paragraph. It is the opening sentence of your article on miracles, and no fair-minded reader can help but understand it as a general statement on the subject of miracles. What I want to know is: Must the apparent chasm between the phenomena of miracles and the uniform course of events in human experience be removed, or will it prove a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of miracles? This is a question that you have not answered and the one that presses for answer. While doing this, I would be pleased to have you suggest what will bridge the chasm between miracles and human experience.

Recurring to my second question, you say I am not correct in interpreting you, since I ignore the very point of the argument. Well, that may be, but I did not intend so. I will quote a little more fully from you and endeavor to make myself better understood. In your article of September third, speaking of miracles, you say: "There are two views which for the sake of discussion may be set in contrast. One asserts that miracle is the intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law. The other asserts that miracle is the unusual but normal activity of a perfect life in the domain of nature." It cannot be denied that you have set these two theories in a very clear contrast. I ask your readers to study them a little. Speaking of the first view, you say: "According to this theory, there are two realms of life, the natural and the supernatural. The order of life native to the higher realm is superior to and independent of the laws of the lower realm. A being belonging to the supernatural realm may therefore employ the forces of nature in whatever manner he elects." You then proceed to give your view of this theory, here it is: "This theory encounters no difficulty in the mind of one who accepts the earlier view of the world, but it is in direct conflict with all modern conceptions and is either giving away to more satisfactory explanations of the facts or to the total rejection of the miraculous." To further emphasize your disapproval, you say: "If this view is all that stands between unreflective belief and blank denial, the case looks unpromising for miracle." To illustrate this false theory, you take Jesus as an example, and say, it represents him as "a visitant to the world, but his normal residence was in heaven, whose supernatural character he bore in his earthly life and with whose power he was clothed. His miracles were the manifestations of this superior life, the setting aside of nature in obedience to a higher law." In the next sentence, you say this theory is in direct conflict with all modern conceptions and is giving way to more satisfactory explanations of the facts, or to the total rejection of the miraculous.

Now, my dear brother, are you not aware that that quotation is exactly what ninety-nine per cent of the preachers and teachers of Christianity today teach concerning Jesus? Are you not still further aware that ninety-nine per cent of all the preaching of Jesus since the day of Pentecost has so represented him? And yet you say, "it is in direct conflict with all modern conceptions and must give way to more satisfactory explanations of the facts or lead to a total rejection of the miraculous." If logic counts for anything, you declare that the universal teaching of the Universal church concerning Jesus is in direct conflict with modern conceptions and must be explained in a more satisfactory way or it will lead to a total denial of the miraculous. That is repudiation of Christianity on a larger scale than I have ever seen it taught before.

I do not believe you have studied that position carefully and I ask you to think over it a little. Nevertheless, that position seems to be bolstered and defended by other statements you make, such as the following: "The redemptive facts of Jesus' life are independent of miracles." "His wonderful deeds were an aid to his followers in the creation and nourishment of their faith in him, and in their immediate work of evangelization." "They were evidences of his power to those who saw them." "They were revelations of his love to those whom he had healed." "Such a value the miracles no longer possess." "Their significance was lost beyond the circle of those who saw them." These quotations plainly declare that men believed in Jesus in the Apostolic Age, because they believed in his miracles. But miracles have no value to produce faith in the evangelization of the world to Christ in the present age.

Now, my dear brother, is it not a fact that all of the evangelization of the Christian era has been carried forward by men because they believed in the miracles of Jesus Christ? Have not all the great apologists, defenders and fathers based their defence of Christianity upon the bed rock of his miraculous character and doings? Are not all of the great religious bodies which acknowledge his name firmly bound to his miracles in their teachings and labors today? Is it not a further fact that all the missionary work done in heathen lands today is being accomplished by preaching a Savior who performed miracles? Is it not a crowning fact that all religious bodies who have endeavored to eliminate the miracles from the character and works of Jesus Christ have utterly failed in their evangelizatioin of the world to him? In view of these facts, how can you say, "such a value the miracles no longer possess."

My third question was: Is the resurrection independent of miracle?

In reply you say: "It is well to keep in mind the context." But you quote nothing from the context that answers the question. Again I ask: Is the resurrection independent of miracle? Your writings indicate that you believe it is. You say: "He lived the normal, natural life of a man at its highest point." "He employed law at its highest level." "His word was with power because the secret of nature was his own." "The resurrection of our Lord was no departure from this principle; it was the inevitable manifestation of the divine fulness of life in him. Death had no dominion over him. It was impossible that he should be holden of it." "The works which are recorded of him are the natural fruits on the tree of such a life as he lived." Do not these statements corborate your position, that the "redemptive facts in the life of Jesus are independent of miracle"? Therefore, to make my question still plainer, I ask, was the resurrection of Jesus accomplished by the "intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law," or was it werely "the natural fruit of a normal, natural life at its highest point." "the employment of law at its highest level"? There are several other interesting questions which we can settle in another letter, but we will thresh out this subject of miracles first.

Yours for the truth,

Columbus, Ind. Z. T. Sweeney.

Brother Sweeney has enumerated several propositions on which he and I are in substantial agreement. He might have gone still further and pointed out that on the fact of miracle we are also in agreement. As to the presence of miracles, signs, wonders in the life of Jesus, I should insist as strongly as he. All that I have written and spoken on this subject will emphasize this fact.

His difficulty arises over his interpretation of miracle. As I understand, he would define miracle to be an intervention in the realm of nature by a superior power, which sets at defiance the usual laws of nature and acts upon principles quite independent of the order of the world. By this theory the "supernatural" is conceived as a thing apart from the general order of life, and operates in contrast to and violation of the processes of the universe. To this theory of miracle there appear to me to be objections so serious as to practically discredit it. Among them are the fact that it is unbiblical, for the word "supernatural" in the sense of a power in violation of the order of nature is foreign to the Scriptures, and is the invention of a metaphysical theory which attempted to account for the miracles. In the second place this view is quite contrary to the interpretation of the universe which has come to be all but generally accepted, that both the facts of the natural world and the character of God as revealed in the universe and the Scriptures forbid the acceptance of a principle of disorder and caprice in the interest of the spiritual education of the race. This it is which prevents many men from accepting the miracles today. It is not so much the facts themselves, but the theory by which those facts are explained by some of the teachers of the Christian faith. And I should affirm with emphasis that whenever miracle is identified with this theory, it will stand as a fatal objection to the acceptance of Christianity on the part of large classes of men.

Services to Attract Men.

BY ARTHUR HOLMES.

What contribution can the average church, say of 500 members, in a residential neighborhood, make to men, largely workingmen, of its community?

The services within the building naturally come to mind. They should be varied and enriched. They may conform to three or more types: evangelistic, educational or cultural, and devotional. The first aims to save men. Its effect is to move them to act. "Life" is the key-note of such meetings: Suggestion is the underlying psychological factor, and suggestion to "come" the one specific and vital element. Hence, the malleability of crowd psychology is to be sought; intellectual elements should be vigorously eliminated; iterative, rythmetical choruses should be sung; emotions be touched; ventilation should be good; lights bright; aisles all converging to one point in front; all movements made from rear toward front; and above all the other confusion, the insistent, mandatory invitation should ring out.

Such services will not fail to reach and bring into a congregation large numbers of workingmen, especially if the meetings are held for men alone. After they are in the church educational services are in order. A regular study should inspire and direct them into some specific Christian work and should definitely help them to meet their daily life's duties.

The methods of Christian work will be taken up later. Study courses can be arranged for different ages of men, though some topics are of common interest. Personal duties like prayer, daily devotions; social duties, like church attendance, Christian citizenship, business honesty and morality; home duties, like filial obedience or parental care; courtesy, patience, thrift, diligence, culture, are all objects of church concern.

Such studies as these would best be carried on in groups, either in the church or homes, and on some other day than Sunday.

Besides, cultural work, the church has a real contribution to make to the craving of men's religious natures. Call it what you will, analyze it as aestheticism, asceticism, sentimentalism, or the feeling of correlation or partnership with a "universal," rationalize away the need for God, for worship, and still there remains the need of the average man for that particular consciousness called spiritual or holy.

A service for worship demands the stained glass, cloistered, twilight effect, a large, well-carpeted, high-vaulted room, a deep-toned organ, and reverential quietude. No blasts of music, no announcements, no appeals to do anything, no straining after effects of any kind should mar the atmosphere. The collection should be omitted in favor of an offering at the door. The whole service should be the simple, serious, dignified worship of God by the choicest hymns, by quiet talks on spiritual joys, by the intermingling of meaningful, occasional prayers, ended with the holiest and closest communion with God through the bread and wine.

Hymns like the following are of the right kind:

> Jesus calls us from the worship
> Of the vain world's golden store;
> From each idol that would keep us,
> Saying, "Christian love me more."

Or,

> Hold thou thy cross before my closing eyes,
> Shine through the gloom and point me to the skies.
> Heaven's morning breaks, and earth's vain shadows flee,
> In life, in death, O Lord, abide with me.

Prayers from the Psalms or the Book of Common Prayer are well adapted to such a meeting.

Readings from the Bible or from the "Imitation of Christ" produce lasting impressions.

In these hurly-burly days of hustling everything, the frequent service of this kind will find its appeal. Unsupplemented with good works, it soon drifts into the emptiness of mere perfunctoriness. It must draw its inspiration from the strenuous life and find its justification in preparation for that life. If it is admitted to the hearts of its promoters as a masquerade for increasing membership or drawing a crowd, God will curse it with a withering curse, and they that come, when invited the next time, will be as the chaff which the wind driveth away.

But a fact is one thing, and a theory which undertakes to explain the fact is quite another. Men may believe the fact, and still not find it possible to accept the particular explanation of it. The atonement is a fact of revelation, of the work of Christ and of Christian experience. Theories of the atonement have come and gone, and few today would accept the interpretations of it which former times regarded as convincing and indisputable. Yet the fact of the atonement is as impressive today as ever in the teaching and life of the church. The same might be said of inspiration, or the nature of Christ. Theories change but facts abide.

It is equally true of the miraculous in the life of the Lord. The theory that miracle was a suspension of law, a violation of the order of things, occasioned no difficulty in former generations, when men had not concerned themselves so much with the character of the divine work as revealed both in nature and the Scriptures. That this theory no longer satisfies Christian faith one may easily discover by an examination of the very considerable literature which has been produced, not by skeptics and scorners of the Bible, but by the men who are most concerned to make intelligible to this generation the facts of our faith.

To them miracle is a fact of the Bible to be interpreted not as a violation of law but as its higher employment. That which contradicts the usual experience of men may be only the use of the same laws at another level. There is no need of an explanation which makes more difficult the problem, as the older theory seems to do.

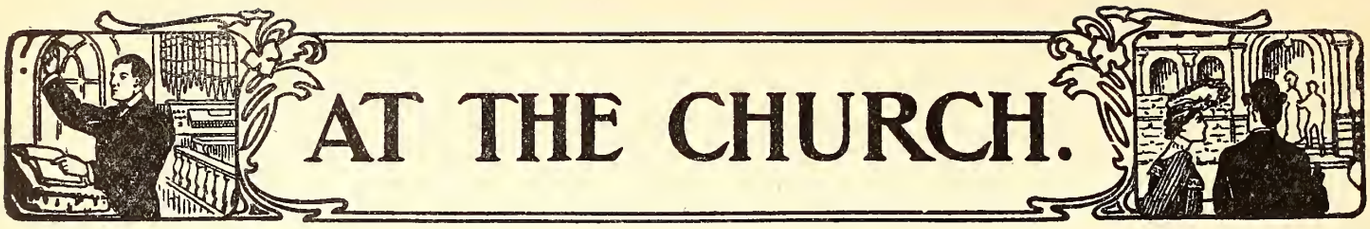
And now to answer some of Brother Sweeney's particular questions, I should say that the apparent chasm between the phenomena of miracles and the order of nature which is created by such a view as he seems to hold, must be removed or it will be a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of miracle by an increasing number of students of nature and the Bible.

The ninety-nine per cent of the preachers and teachers of Christianity will continue, no doubt, as from the first, to believe in the miracles, but they will not continue to believe, nor do they today, in the theory of miracle which he sets forth, and which is so rapidly being discredited.

Men did not believe in Jesus in the apostolic age because they believed in the miracles. That the miracles had value as aid to faith is to be kept in mind, but they were far less important than many other features of his work. Indeed, it is one of the most outstanding facts of Jesus' life that he wrought no miracle for the purpose of convincing men of his Messiahship. That was one of the subtle temptatioins which he resisted in the end. He wrought miracles to help men, and thus he revealed the life of God in him, the divine compassion and love.

The evangelization of the world has been carried on by men who believed in the miracles of Jesus, and will continue to be so accomplished. But not with the fact of the miracles as the chief element of faith, and by no means with the miracles as the prominent factor in evangelism. To identify one of the elements of men's faith, and that a matter of secondary importance, with the theme of their lives or the motive which impels them is a serious misinterpretation of facts.

The final question was answered in my former response to Brother Sweeney's inquiries. The resurrection of Jesus was not only a miracle, in the full biblical meaning of that term, but was the most impressive of the miracles as employed in early Christian preaching. Nor is there the least difficulty in applying to it the explanation to which I have referred all the time as the one which removes the chief difficulties and assists the student to understand not only its truth but its necessity. The resurrection was the supreme manifestation of the life of Christ. It was the inevitable result of his nature and character. It was the triumph of the perfect life over the power of death, and the pledge that all who attain his life, through the redemptive power of the gospel, shall share with him in the victory over the last great foe. Here lies the unique significance of the life of our Lord. It is the proof that the perfect life is lived at altitudes to which our own imperfect natures do not attain as yet, and that it is the promise and the effort of the Master to draw us to these higher planes by the call of the cross and the saving power of his atonement.



The Sunday-School Lesson.

Herbert L. Willett.

THE REBEL SON OF DAVID.

The sin which stands as such a dark spot on the life of the great king of Israel was pardoned through intercession and penitence. But the wounds which it made, like all the scars which evil carves in human lives, remained. Never to the end of his career did he escape from the penalties of that unforgetable incident in his life. It may be possible to rise from our dead selves to higher things, but we can never make the past just what it might have been if we had not marred it. The prodigal son was welcomed by his father from the far land. But no penitence and amendment could ever undue the memory of his life with the swine and the husks.

Family Troubles.

In the prophetic account of David's career, given in the books of Samuel and Kings, the sin of the king is followed by the narrative of the disasters which followed it, and which seem in the mind of the writer to be its direct results. Among those were the unhappy fate of Tamer at the hands of her half-brother Amnon, the murder of Amnon by her brother Absalom, the flight of Absalom to his mother's clan in Geshur, and his long exile there, ending in the artifice of Joab to bring him home. Then follows closely the story of his rebellion against his father David.

The King's Conscience.

Whether the king saw in these tragic events the sad consequences of his own misconduct we do not know. It is at least significant that the authors of Chronicles, the priestly record, make no mention of any of these events. Their purpose was to show the glory of the reign of David, and such an object would have been marred by the facts as they transpired. It may even be asked whether there really was any relation between the conduct of David and that of his son. Is it not too much to say that the king's sin had loosened the cords of moral restraint in the court, and left the way open for such evils as followed? This may be true. Yet the relaxation of discipline in the royal family could hardly fail to result from David's own sense of violated law. No doubt he felt this far more keenly than any other of the court, and his conscience made him sensitive and hesitant where there he should have been prompt and severe.

Absalom's Motives.

Absalom, after the long years of exile, had been summoned home from his banishment by his father, but was never really accorded a welcome. Perhaps the king knew that Absalom was regarded as his favorite son, and the nation might think he was forgetting the young man's sins out of partiality. But by still further diplomacy on the part of Joab the prince was fully restored to his place in the court. Whether the sense of injury rankled in his heart, and he determined to be avenged for the years of his banishment, or his naturally restless disposition sought self-advantage at the expense of David's declining activity it is apparent that he plotted from the first to seize the kingship at the earliest moment.

Popular Display.

To this end he equipped himself with a retinue of servants and a royal outfit. Horses and chariots with outrunners were the signs of the highest power, and the means of striking the popular imagination. Oriental people love the display of monarchy, and are content to pay the price if their passion for royal shows can be gratified. The very fact that David took less interest than once in such displays of his rank gave Absalom the opportunity he desired. It was but a step from this popular admiration to the successful attempt upon his father's throne.

Absalom's Duplicity.

This step was taken in a most diplomatic manner. He thought it well to impress the people not only with his own splendor but also with his interest in their affairs. He frequented the approaches to the court, where men came to have their causes heard, and by adroit show of interest in their complaints and indirect accusation of his father, that he was indifferent to the public welfare, succeeded in gaining the good will of many who otherwise had no cause of complaint against the king. Thus the plans of the conspirator flourished in the very gates of the palace.

The Rally at Hebron.

At length Absalom decided that the time had come for the bold final effort. It would not do to openly rebel in Jerusalem, where the strength of David lay. It must be at a distance, where there would be ample room for all the plans to be matured, and the partisans of the new movement to gather. Hebron was chosen as the scene of the attempt. This was no doubt owing to its remoteness from the central section of the land, where the troops of the king were in garrison. It was also the city which had been the capital of the tribe of Judah where David first reigned, and Absalom may have counted on the resentment of its people against the removal of power from them, to cause their favorable action in his behalf.

The Stand and Revolt.

When he finally took leave of the king it was upon the pretext that he had a vow to pay in the sacred city of the south. For four years (not forty, of course, as the text reads) he had laid his plans and was now prepared to act. The king suspected nothing. The secret designs of Absalom and his party had been kept well. David bade him farewell without suspicion and with a parting blessing. Little did the ageing king know that at that very moment spies were leaving the city in all directions with commission to proclaim Absalom the moment the trumpets should be sounded from hilltop to hilltop throughout the land. Besides this, the prince had invited a company of prominent men from Jerusalem to accompany him to Hebron with the understanding that they were to be his guests at a festival gathering there. They did not know that he counted on them to come over to his side the moment his standard was raised.

New Recruits.

When they arrived at Hebron the preparation for the feast was made. Sacrifices were offered, to secure the favor of God upon the new enterprise. It was then that Absalom determined to invite to his side the most conspicuous man in David's court, Ahithophel of Giloh, who had the ear of the king as did no other of his counsellors. To secure such a man would effectually break down the spirit and confidence of the king. The project seemed most favorable. New men were appearing at every moment, and the cause of the young pretender seemed most promising.

The Shadow of Failure.

But there was much ground to be traversed before Absalom could reach the throne. There were men as wise and faithful as Ahithophel who could not be seduced from the king. There were old and trained warriors who would fight for him to the death. The king had not lost all his friends nor his courage. The rebellion was doomed to failure from the first, although it looked most serious for a time. But the chief point for reflection, as the first chapter in this tragic story is closed, is the unhappy ambition of a brilliant young man who might have been king by peaceful methods if he had not hasted unduly to exalt himself. Patience and loyalty would have prevailed where headlong ambition met only defeat and death.

Two texts ought to be read together: "Do not sound a trumpet before you," and "Let your light so shine." God wants you to be ambitious, to have good works that somebody can see; light travels faster than sound, and so with Christians you see the flash before you hear the report if they are of the right sort. The ambition is not that men may praise you, but that they may glorify your Father which is in heaven.—A. J. Gordon.

The Federal Council.

THE FIRST MEETING OF "THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA," TO BE HELD IN PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 2-8, 1908.

By Rev. E. B. Sanford, D. D., Secretary of the Executive Committee of Arrangements.

The Plan of Federation recommended by the Inter-Church Conference of 1905, having received the official approval of thirty national assemblies, representing an aggregate church membership of over fifteen millions, is now the working constitution of the "Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America." From this time, on, attention will be turned with increasing interest to the first meeting of this great Council that will hold its sessions December 2-8 in the city of Philadelphia. This Council is unique in its character. The four hundred delegates that will take part in its deliberations will be charged with definite and official responsibility. Within limitations that are carefully marked by its constitution, the Council will consider and give voice and guidance in matters that pertain to common service and the duty and welfare of all the churches.

Under a compact that recognizes "the essential oneness of the Christian Churches in Jesus Christ as their Divine Lord and Saviour" the Council will come together to promote the spirit of fellowship, service and coöperation. Its special function will be to consider methods and suggest plans, through which the churches that hold to Christ as the Head may "prosecute work that can be done better in union than in separation."

The Conference of 1905 appointed an "organizing committee to carry forward the work made necessary by the adoption of the Plan of Federation; report to be made to the Federal Council in 1908." Each of the thirty constituent bodies in the fellowship of the Conference is represented on this committee. In a spirit of unity and devotion that has realized the responsibility of their important service, this committee has given constant and careful attention to its duties.

The program of the first meeting of the Federal Council is substantially complete. For several months past, delegates to the Council have been assigned work on the important committees whose reports and appended resolutions will be made the basis of the discussions and recommendations approved by the Council. Today, in every part of the land, men eminent in leadership and qualifications for special tasks, are giving their thought to the work assigned them in preparation for the deliberations of the Council.

The mention of some of these committees and their chairmen, will deepen general interest. The Committee on "Organization and Development" of the executive side of the future work of the Council, has the Rev. Bishop E. R. Hendrix, of Kansas City, as its chairman. Bishop Hendrix acted as chairman of the Business Committee of the Inter-Church Conference of 1905. Since 1886 he has filled the office of Bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, with its membership of one and a half millions. Recognized as a leader in the counsels of American Methodism, with its constituency of upwards of five millions, he has found an honored place in the esteem of those who share in the joy and responsibility of bringing the forces of our Protestant Christianity into closer relations. The Council will receive a mesage, from the Committee on Organization, that will reveal that men of vision realize that only through practical activities and wise superintendence can we hope to make the spirit of unity a potent force.

"Methods of Coöperation in Home Missions" will be brought to the front in a report of the Committee of which Rev. Edgar P. Hill, D. D., of Chicago, an honored delegate from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, is chairman. Those conversant with the work of this committee anticipate that its report will not only have the support of the Council, but prove the beginning of activities that will vastly strengthen the work of the Home Mission Boards of all the churches.

"Coöperation in Foreign Missions" is in the hands of a committee of which Dr. William E. Barton, Secretary of the American Board, is chairman.

The report on "Family Life" will be submitted by the Rt. Rev. William C. Doane, D. D., of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The report on "Temperance" is in charge of a committee headed by the Rev. Bishop Luther B. Wilson, D. D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Honored Baptist leaders, in the persons of Rev. O. P. Gifford, D. D., and Mr. William N. Hartshorn, are at the head, respectively, of the committees on "State Federations" and "Methods of Religious Instruction in Sunday-schools."

The Rev. George U. Wenner, of the Lutheran Church, will report for the committee on "Week-day Religious Instruction in the Public Schools."

"The Church and the Labor Problem" will be brought forward by the Rev. Frank Mason North, D. D., Secretary of the National City Evangelization Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and a Congregational delegate, the Rev. O. S. Davis, D. D., of Connecticut, whose pastoral work has given him wide reputation as a specialist, will present the message regarding "The Church and the Immigrant Problem."

Evening mass meetings will be held in the Academy of Music. The Essential Unity of the Churches as illustrated in work at home and abroad will be the theme of addresses by Rev. Dr. S. P. Cadman, Robert Speer and Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, D. D. Union in Evangelistic work will be presented by Rev. Charles L. Goodell, D. D., Bishop William S. Bell and J. W. Chapman.

Governor Charles E. Hughes will speak on "Civic Righteousness," and on Sunday afternoon of December 6, great mass meetings will be held in charge of Rev. Charles Stelzle, and leaders in the Brotherhood movement.

Last, but not least, it is sufficient assurance that all the details of this great Council will be carefully looked after, since the Rev. Dr. William H. Roberts, Chairman of the General Executive Committee, and last year Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, has also accepted the chairmanship of th local committee of arrangements at Philadelphia that is composed of representatives from thirty denominations.

From the opening to the close of this Federal Council, the key note of all the reports and discussions will be that of practical coöperation and united service. We bespeak the prayerful support in preparation for this meeting, both of the ministry and laity of the churches.

Think of the value of the unit. Every stone helps to make a wall. The honeycomb is built cell by cell. The railway is composed of one tie and one rail at a time. The entire nation is constituted of each individual combining with all others. Two-thirds of the United States are composed of young persons.

IN THE TOILS OF FREEDOM

BY ELLA N. WOOD

A Story of the Coal Breakers and the Cotton Mills.

CHAPTER XXI.

The Toils of Freedom.

It is Christmas eve and the air is crisp with frost, but there are happy faces and joyful greetings as the people hurry along.

Down near the foot of one of the great culm heaps is a miner's cottage, rude and weather worn. It is the home of Nick Svelderski.

"I wish Doctor Jones would come, this suffering is terrible."

It was Lottie who spoke. She was sitting in her wheel chair beside a cot on which lay the wasted form of little Polly Svelderski. Evelyn was bending over the sick child, trying to quiet the restless head by bathing it with ice water. Over by the stove sat the mother, crying and talking to two older children, a boy of twelve and a girl of fourteen, who stood by the stove in their work clothes. A crippled boy older than these sat on the other side. Mrs. McFee had just taken the younger children home with her. From an adjoining room came the heavy breathing of the sick girl's father who was sleeping off his intoxication.

The child's head rolled ceaselessly back and forth on the pillow, and the little arms waved to and fro while the fingers tied imaginary knots.

"The poor little darling thinks she is at work at the spindles. How long has she kept this up?" asked Evelyn.

"I have been here all the afternoon," said Lottie, "and she has never stopped since I came. I tried to talk to her at first and coax her to rest, but she said, 'Oh, I must not stop or the fo'woman will see me.' She has not known me or noticed anything for an hour, but keeps up that ceaseless motion."

"How long has she been sick?" inquired Evelyn.

"I was here about a month ago and Polly was looking very thin and her mother told me that she was not well and would not eat much. I begged her then to take Polly out of the factory and let her come to the kindergarten again, but she shook her head emphatically and said that Nick would not let Polly quit work. About two weeks ago she took sick and the disease went at once to her spine and head."

Evelyn and Lottie silently watched the little sufferer.

"Oh mutter, mutter, don't send me by the fact'ry today! My head hurt much, an' the threads break all the time. Oh, don't make me go, pappy."

The mind of the sick girl wandered, and the plaintive pleading of the voice wrung the hearts of the watchers. Did it penetrate the conscience of the father and mother?

"The thread breaks all the time, and see, see! The fo'woman is comin' an' she sure will shake me, an' oh, it hurts me so! Oh, oh!"

"There, there, Polly, the forewoman will not come, and we won't let anything hurt you, dear," and Evelyn tried to soothe the agonized child, listening eagerly for the doctor's steps.

After a few minutes Polly grew calm and seemed to listen to what Evelyn was saying, and looking searchingly into her face said, "Be you Jesus? Teake said as how Jesus loved little childers."

"No, Polly, I am not Jesus, but he is close by and he loves you."

"Teake used to sing a Jesus song. Oh, mutter, let me go by the kindergarten an' hear Teake sing!"

Evelyn looked at Lottie and saw that her face was white and

"Safe in the arms of Jesus,
Safe on his gentle breast—"

Lottie's voice was shaken with the grief she felt, but the song was soft and sweet and Polly fixed her gaze on the face she had loved so much.

"Hark, 'tis the voice of angels, Borne in a song to me—"

A spasm of pain passed over Polly's face, her whole body stiffened, and for a moment they thought that the end had come, but not so; the head again began its ceaseless rolling and the hands to tie the imaginary knots.

The door opened and Doctor Jones entered. He stood and looked at his little patient and shook his head.

"This is bad, bad! I think Polly will spend Christmas in heaven. Poor little tired hands! The old doctor will give her something to rest them till the angels come to lead her home, so he will."

The good doctor chatted away to the unconscious girl as though she were a tired baby and his soothing medicine soon quieted the tired head and restless hands.

"It will soon be over," said the doctor turning to Evelyn, "and there is nothing more that can be done."

Mrs. Kirklin and Mrs. McFee came in to stay the night and watch by the sick child.

The doctor, accompanied by Evelyn and Lottie, turned sorrowfully away from the little house by the culm heap, the doctor wheeling Lottie's chair.

"Such a thing as this uses me up completely," said Doctor Jones as they walked along. "That child was literally killed in the factory. I knew Polly was doomed when I first set eyes on her.

"I don't blame that ignorant mother, she doesn't know any better, but I do blame the brute of a father who works his children to death that he may have more whisky to drink. But infinitely more do I blame the men who employ these children and who buy up the legislature so that no laws can be passed to hinder them. God pity their poor, shriveled-up souls!

"Excuse me, ladies but you know the old doctor is a crank and I always get mad clear through when I have the horrible side of this subject brought before me as I have tonight."

"Doctor, it is no wonder," said Evelyn. "It breaks my heart to think of the condition of our children. Is there ever going to be any cure for it, do you think?"

" Yes, every year brings us a step nearer to righting this wrong. President Roosevelt, in his last message to congress, spoke very plainly on the child labor situation, and urged better laws to correct this evil. Governor Folk of Missouri is also intensely interested in child labor and the National Consumers' League is doing much to keep up the agitation. But we must have the people. When the people say child labor must cease, it will, but not until then. But here we are at the Settlement House."

The building had been put in Christmas trim with holly and evergreen, and the star of Bethlehem gleamed from the dome.

The gymnasium had been cleared and row after row of tables were filled with a bountiful Christmas dinner. Men, women and children surrounded them and were served by the young women's cooking class, white aproned and white capped. In the kindergarten department was still a happier scene. The little tables were crowded with the children of the Black Acre. At each end of the room was a splendid Christmas tree, so the wee tots ate in happy anticipation, for was not Santa Claus going to "gin out" the Christmas gifts after supper? Here Lottie reigned supreme. She was superintendent of the kindergarten department and had two assistants. When Doctor Jones wheeled her chair into the room, the children greeted her with a merry shout of, "Teake, Teake!" There were sixty regular attendants at the kindergarten, and this part of the work was an assured success.

After supper came a polo game in the casino, between the driver boys of the two collieries, and nobody but "Mr. Jean" could umpire this game to the satisfaction of the players. Then a stereopticon entertainment in the chapel, reproducing the pictures of the Child Christ as painted by the great masters, with the settlement glee club to accompany them with appropriate music.

At last it was all over. The clock had struck twelve and the chimes of Grace Church were pealing forth the grand old song, "Joy to the World, the Lord has Come!"

"Evelyn, the whole thing was just great tonight; I never saw a happier or more orderly crowd of people than we had here."

Evelyn was sitting by the open fire watching the flames climb up the chimney and Jean was leaning against the mantel.

"The Settlement House has only been in operation five months and we can see splendid results already. Garry McFee told me that there were scarcely any men to be found in the saloons tonight. You remember Tim Murphy used to keep the worst dive there was in the heart of the Black Acre; he came up to me tonight and shook hands and said, 'Kirklin, you have got the right idee in this shop you are running; it beats the —— hell dive I've run for the last ten years clear out of sight. You've run four saloons out of town already, and I guess if you keep putting up such ——fine amoosements you will run them all out.' This was a great speech for Tim to make and he wound up by saying that such a good dinner and red hot polo game would capture the devil himself."

"Yes, Tim is more interested in this work than he would be willing to confess, but I shall look for our best results among the breaker boys," said Evelyn. "You are getting a splendid hold on them, Jean. Every single one of them would swear by you now."

"I think my little wife is getting a pretty good hold on them, too. I counted a hundred and fifty in the boys' department last Sunday."

Evelyn was superintendent of the boys' department of the settlement Sunday-school.

"I do like that work with the boys. We have three clubs organized now and I believe they take more pride in them than they do in their 'junior local union.'

"Do you know, Jean, that I am wonderfully encouraged about the night school? I find, though, that books are not much use, for the children are too tired and sleepy to study; but by using the blackboard, object teaching and some of the kindergarten methods, we can appeal to them and really arouse their minds to a sort of interest in their work."

"Evelyn, sweetheart, I remember one mind you awakened. God grant that you may inspire many of these labor bound boys and girls to a longing for better things as you did me."

The red light burns dim as Evelyn and Jean stand by the fire with a great love lighting up their faces. As they look into the embers, they see a picture of the Black Acre; familiar and dear to one because he had been a part of it for so many years, familiar and dear to the other because she had looked on it all her life with a great pity and longing, but it is the Black Acre transformed with a new heart that is throbbing with a great love for the children who are caught in the toils of freedom.

"Do you hear the children weeping, O my brother?
They are weeping bitterly,
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In this country of the free."

Biblical Baseball.

A Canton theological student interested in baseball wrote a thesis on "Baseball among the Ancients," from which are gleaned the following facts.:

Abraham made a sacrifice.

The Prodigal Son made a home run.

Cain made a base hit when he killed Abel.

David was a great long-distance thrower.

Moses shut out the Egyptians at the Red Sea.

Moses made his first run when he slew the Egyptian.

The devil was the first coacher. Eve stole first—Adam second.

Whe Isaac met Rebecca she was out walking with a pitcher.

Samson struck out a great many times when he beat the Philistines.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

Why Do We Worry?

Why do we worry about the nest?
We only stay for a day,
Or a month, or a year, at the Lord's behest,
In this habitat of clay.

Why do we worry about the road,
With its hill or deep ravine?
In a dismal path or a heavy load,
We are helped by hands unseen.

Why do we worry about the years
That our feet have not yet trod?
Who labors with courage and trust, nor fears,
Has fellowship with God.

The best will come in the great "To be,"
It is ours to serve and wait;
And the wonderful future we soon shall see.
For death is but the gate. —Sarah K. Bolton.

The Divine Philosophy of Living by the Day.

By A. R. E. Wyant.

This philosophy is expressed in a significant little Hebrew phrase. At the dedication of the temple, King Solomon prays that the Lord will maintain the cause of his people Israel "as every day shall require." But the marginal reading, which is a literal translation of the vigorous Hebrew idiom, is much more expressive,—"the thing of a day in its day" (1 Kings 8:59). In this hour of his greatest spiritual illumination, Solomon perceived God's plan of blessing. Life is made up of day-sections, and grace and strength are given for only one day at a time. This leads us to recognize

Our Daily Dependence on God.

He is both the giver and the sustainer of life. We could not live a moment but for the present working of a present God. He is here in his world "upholding all things by the word of his power." We do not draw a breath that is not given of God. Not a thought passes through the mind, nor an emotion thrills the heart, without the operation of the upholding power of God. The Lord Jesus loves to have us recognize our dependence upon him, and has taught us to pray, "Give us day by day our daily bread." We are the children of God's daily care and tenderness, and should not be anxious about tomorrow. We may think and plan for the future, but we must not be anxious about it. We shall best provide for the contingencies of the future by faithfully performing the duties of today. Thus, only by accepting Christ's policy of life, shall we escape "The heavy trouble, the bewildering care that weights us down who live and earn our bread." God's gifts are adapted to each day's needs both in kind and quantity, and are always timely in their arrival. The skilful physician adapts his medicine to the needs of his patient. The form of treatment is adapted to the kind of disease. The Great Physician never gives the wrong medicine. Whatever the need of the soul, he knows the healing grace that should be applied. He supplies life's necessities "as every day shall require." Forgetting this, we bring upon ourselves no end of trouble by being over-anxious for the morrow. This philosophy of life will Help Us in Our Work.

Some things can never be done if they are not done today. No Christian service is accomplished by delay. The hardest task can be more easily done when divided into day-sections. It is the long stretches that weary us. But really there are no long stretches, for life comes only a day at a time. The burden will not seem so heavy if we remember that we must carry it only one day at a time and a faithful discharge of the duties of today will enable us to perform more easily the same duties tomorrow. But let us also remember that if we fail to bear the burdens of each day in its day, we are heaping up an Atlas load that may crush us in the future. This philosophy, if accepted in both theory and practice, is a sure

Antidote for Anxiety and Worry.

There are many who believe that God is the author of all the sickness and sorrows and sufferings of life. But it must be admitted that there is one kind of trouble in the world which God never sends, and which never brings a blessing with it. It is the borrowed trouble which people get by worrying about tomorrow instead of being content to bear the burden of today. Most of the worry in this world is over trouble that never comes; and what is more foolish than to brood over troubles in anticipation of their coming? More people are killed by worry than by work. "Preventive medicine" is the great aim of true physicians today, and I present this divine philosophy of life as a safeguard against that neurotic degeneracy which threatens many today. Most of us are capable of a great deal of hard work if we do not get to worrying about it. Do the task of the day in its day and you will be free from the grinding worry of accumulated duty. This Christian philosophy also best enables us to Meet Our Temptations.

God will be our helper in every time of temptation if we call upon him. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." Do today's duty, fight today's temptation, and do not weaken and distract yourself by being anxious about tomorrow, for to anticipate the cares of tomorrow doubles the burden today. This divine philosophy of living by the day will best enable us to Encounter Life's Uncertainties.

If we live each day as if it were our last day, we shall always be prepared, and shall have no vain regrets if it should be. If we live each day aright, we shall not meet God unprepared, if suddenly taken away by some unforeseen accident or catastrophe on land or sea. We shall still enjoy God's presence. "What do you think of dying?" said a friend to an old Scotchman. "It matters not," replied he, "because if I die I shall go and be with Christ; and if I live Christ will be with me." This plan of living will best enable us to Endure Earth's Griefs and Sorrows.

We are sometimes surprised how bravely some Christian woman, who is physically weak, bears up under the most severe afflictions. But God's promise is "as thy days so thy strength shall be," and "my grace is sufficient for thee." He is with us in health and prosperity and gives us living grace, and only when we fall into sickness and death draws nigh, does he give us dying grace. "The thing of a day in its day." If you accept this divine philosophy, it will bring into your life the sweet content and perfect trust which reliance on God's providence alone can give. Then you can sing and pray:

"My times are in Thy hand!
My God, I wish them there;
My life, my soul, my all I leave
Entirely to Thy care."

"Lord, for tomorrow and its needs, I do not pray,
But keep me, guide me, hold me, Lord, just for today."

Crowns on Fools' Brows.

By W. C. Bitting.

1 Sam. 26:21, "Behold, I have played the fool."

To hold a place in life without having the qualities that fit one for that place is the great tragedy of playing the fool. Saul had a throne, but only a silly soul. He wore a crown without a king's brow in it. It is pathetic that so many royal heads and hearts seem never to get their coronations. It is more pathetic that crowns seem to light on heads that they do not fit.

Saul's folly was that he did not put enough high motive into his life. He was stingy with his best selfhood. He was a specialist in vibration between the highest and the most selfish ideals. One son he named Jonathan—the gift of Jehovah. Another Melchishua—the help of Moloch. Another Ishbaal—the man of Baal. He would be friendly with all the gods he knew. He was so prudential that he was unprincipled.

His downfall came from aspiring to too high a destiny, one for which he was not suited. Disparity between what we are and what we undertake is the sure prophet of failure. We are not all so honest in confession as was Saul, but we play the fool just as brilliantly. The world sees the comedy, and we feel the tragedy of it. External exaltation with inner abasement, a high position stolen by a low soul—this is the drama entitled "Playing the Fool."

It is to fill a place in life without having the fitness for it. True life is self-expression. What about the self? That is one question. What about the vocation? That is the other. Does the self fit into the vocation? There are two fits from which no one recovers—misfits and counterfeits. Saul had an attack of both at the same time. He has never been lonely. Every unveiled incompetence, each revealed lack of preparation uncovers a fool. We do shoddy work only because we have second-grade souls.

It is to fill a place without having the spirit of it, even though we have the fitness. Every function in life has its appropriate spirit. A song is not a matter of sounds, but of heart. A prayer is not classic English; it is genuine yearning. A sermon is not to save rhetoric, but to help men. Balaam wore a prophet's name, but lacked his spirit. The uniform does not make a patriot. How much of the spirit that belongs to our daily calling do we possess? That settles our folly or sense.

It is to fill a place in life without the significance of its social ministry. Saul saw no meaning to his throne beyond his personal purpose. What does our position mean to the good of the world? Each occupation is the end to a long series of beginnings, and the beginning of a long series of endings. Not one is isolated. The fool knows not this.

It is to fill an opportunity without using it. The chance to shape a realm was Saul's. Of what use is fitness, spirit and a true interpretation of our place in life if we do not use them? Open doors are curses unless we go through them. Every man is offered a crown, but it invariably topples off fools' brows. Some persons have a collection of diadems that they have gathered along life's way, every one of which has fallen from a fool's brow.

Here is part of the cast in the drama "Playing the Fool," continuous performance in every city, home and business. The preacher who has the crown of his sacred calling without its qualifications, spirit, meaning; parents without parental love, and children destitute of filial spirit; mechanical teachers, whether in secular or Sunday-schools; employers who grind subordinates; employes who render seamy service; friends of fashion whose relations are snipped by trifles; youths who squander manhood, forgetting that payday comes at last, and "nature's credit clerk is no philanthropist;" church members who use a holy relation as a ladder up which to climb into personal ambitions; editors who drench their columns with slop, and boast of forming public opinion; professional men who handle our bodies and business without competent training; a host of minor characters who enter into life's serious business with only a holiday spirit; every man, some time or other. Alas!

St. Louis, Mo.

Spirit-Appointed Pastors.

By. C. M. Carter.

One of the rank heresies among the people of God today is that churches have a right to call their own pastors. Baptists, especially, claim to be living under the authority of the New Testament, and they declare the Bible to be their only rule of faith and practice—and then proceed to ignore their own acknowledged law. Not once by direction or even intimation in all the word of God is any right committed to a church to call its pastor. Instead the right is retained directly and absolutely in the hands of the Holy Spirit himself. "Paul, an apostle (not from men, neither through man, but through Jesus Christ, and God the Father);" "Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God." Here are two out of a number of passages showing the call men may have to the general work of the ministry. In Acts 20:38 Paul makes this call specific; to the bishops of the church at Ephesus he says, "Take heed unto . . . all the flock, in which the Holy Spirit hath made you bishops." Again in Acts 16: 6-10 is given the experience of Paul in the immediate direction of his ministry and personal acts by the Holy Spirit: "Having been forbidden of the Holy Spirit to speak the word in Asia; and when they were come over against Mysia, they assayed to go into Bithynia; and the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not." After the man of Macedonia appeared, Luke says, "And when he (Paul) had seen the vision, straightway we sought to go forth into Macedonia, concluding that God had called us to preach the gospel unto them." Again, "The Holy Spirit said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. . . . So they, being sent forth by the Holy Spirit, went down to Selucia."

The Spirit Directs as Well as Calls.

It seems to be the clear teachings of the Bible that the Holy Spirit calls men into the ministry, and then leads them while in the ministry. Painful only can be the doctrine that the Holy Spirit will lead one into the strenuous, grinding, heart wearing work of the ministry and then leave him at the threshold to bear his burdens of work and decisions alone. Nay, nay, the Spirit is too wise and loving. He stands ready to direct, and expects to give to each one his specific work as well as help him in it. And this means that he calls men into the ministry and will if permitted call them to their particular fields of labor.

And have not churches failed here to their own lack of growth, and have not ministers failed here to their own lack of power? Is there not a prevalent rationalism among ministers and churches which, while reverent, is weakening because it substitutes an assumed knowledge of conditions for faith and human reason for the wisdom of the Holy Spirit? Only the Spirit can know who will fit and where, for only the Spirit can know all the needs and conditions and the special fitness of any man to meet them. And the wisdom of the Spirit is a storehouse always open to those who will take from it.

Not long ago the chairman of a pulpit committee came to the pastor of another church and said, "I think, as do others of our pulpit committee, that you are the man to be pastor of our church." The reply was, "Have you laid this matter before the Lord? Have you prayed earnestly about it?" "No, I cannot say that I have." "Has your committee made this a matter of profoundly earnest prayer to know the mind of the Spirit?" "No, I suppose not." "Has your church given a day to special prayer, or even a prayer-meeting evening in laying this before the Lord to know his will, and to ask him to send his own selected man to be your pastor?" "I am obliged to say that this has not been done." "Then, my brother, suppose you go home and do these things, and my judgment is you will never think of me again, but God will clearly point out the right man to you." Is that a strange and peculiar case? Or is it really a typical case? Are churches laying their needs before the Lord, or are they ignoring him, counting their "good business sense" all sufficient? Are they hunting men called of the Holy Spirit, or are they hunting men who will "draw"? Are they seeking luminous stars to drag down from heaven, or are they looking for messengers sent of heaven? The blunders of spying committees are sometimes so great as to be amusing were they not so painful. A spying committee moved by a desire to find the man called of God and so seeking under the lead of the Spirit may be most useful; but the spies who forget to pray may make strange choices!

What is the Duty of a Church?

First, to inquire earnestly of the Lord to know his will in the matter. And, then, when the members of the church believe the right man has been made known, their duty is to vote, not to call a pastor, but that in their most unselfish and prayerful judgment this is the man not called of men but of God to be their pastor. Then the coming man will have not only his divine commission to his work but will also have that commission recognized as divine by the church. With what exalted courage may one undertake a work when he has the full assurance in his soul, "I am here because God put me here." And with what confidence may a church follow the lead of a bishop called after prayer and clearly indicated as the one called not only into the ministry but called also specifically by the Spirit to the leadership of this individual church! Doubtless many churches and many ministers are unconsciously led, but what mighty strength in conscious leadership.

I am fully persuaded that if our churches would leave their pulpits wholly in the hands of the Spirit, he would fill them to the very best advantage with his own chosen men, and if ministers would leave their fields of work absolutely to the selection of the Spirit he would place them to the very best advantage, and move them at the proper time, and all to the vast increase or the kingdom and the saving of souls. This does not mean the exclusion of means nor discourage the use of "sanctified common sense," but it does plead for a far more complete reliance upon the wisdom of the Holy Spirit and less upon the shrewdness of men. It does mean the far greater honoring of the Holy Spirit than is done today in most of our churches. It does mean to assert that no pastor (or bishop, as the Spirit names the earthly leader of a church) is rightly selected who is not Spirit-appointed, and that the only right or duty of the church is to seek to know the mind of the Spirit. The Holy Spirit is today the commander-in-chief of the Lord's hosts; and only too often is he ignored or bossed around by those who claim to be reborn by his own power. It is the duty of the church not to give orders, but to receive orders, and to obey them. Mighty will be the onward march of the church militant when it moves in perfect obedience to the orders the ignored Spirit is willing and waiting to give, not only in methods of work, but in selecting, appointing, locating, and directing his subordinate officers.

Muncie, Ind.

Its need of salvation is the secret of the world's sadness.

When you set out for a journey, it is well to have a destination.

When we dedicate our lives to the Master we dedicate them also to his work.

To know the present time and what it bids us do is ever the sum of knowledge for all of us.

Self-denial is as precious as it is earnest, if wrought for the glory of God and the welfare of others.

If we would "buy the truth" we must pay the price which Paul intimates when he wrote to Timothy, "Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them."

They say the world has an eagle eye for anything inconsistent, and it has an eagle eye, sharp for inconsistencies in the unworthy. But the eagle winks before the sun, and the burning iris of its eye shrinks abashed before the unsullied purity of noon. Let your light sistency of your godly life, may come to inquire and to say they so shine before men that others, awed and charmed by the conhave been with Jesus.—Punshon.

VICTORY'S WAR CRY.

Roll on, thou temperance billow.
Lash thou the rocky shore
Of sin's wild opposition,
Till "Drink" shall be no more.

Lift high thy crested white-caps,
Send forth thy thundering voice,
Until our states and nation
Shout victory and rejoice.

Oh, Thou who rules the ages,
Thy benediction bring,
To home and helpless childhood,
Thou everlasting king.

A MATTER OF BUSINESS

We said last week that we wished our readers to regard the New Christian Century as a mutual enterprise, a sort of family affair. If we are to make good in this sentiment we must tell you certain things about the business office so that you can enter fully into our plan and problems.

We do not have any secrets. We are not willing to seem to be what we are not. There will be no bluff in our business management. So we want our readers to know that we are not rich, that our capital is not ample enough to warrant any big feat in journalism. It may not be good business policy to speak out frankly this way, but that is going to be our policy whether it is good business or not.

It is the plan of the business management to adopt a conservative policy. We intend to live within our means. For the beginning we will print a 24-page paper once a month and a 16-page paper the rest of the month. As our capital increases and our subscriptions and adverstising increase, the 24-page paper will be the weekly order. Our friends can see, therefore, how vitally what they do for us will help the cause they love. We believe the cause the paper represents is right and we believe it will draw to itself hosts of friends who will make its success a certainty.

A Fair Chance.

We want our friends and readers to know, however, that it is our firm conviction that the Christian Century has never had a fair chance to prosper. Its ideals have never been adequately exploited. We say these things because some of our friends are warning us that the Century can never be established on a firm business basis. We believe it can be established. We believe there are sufficient friends of the noble ideals which this paper represents to support it.

Therefore we want you to know what our position is. It is the purpose of the present owners of the Century, as has already been announced, to organize a company to promote the paper and a publishing business. They heartily solicit the aid of other Disciples of Christ, who, either from business motives or for a love of the cause which the Christian Century will plead, may wish to have a part in this good work.

The Old Christian Century.

We bought the Christian Century just as it was about to pass out of existence. It seemed to us an act of guilty neglect to allow the paper to die. It had been the symbol of the progressive cause among the Disciples for years.

Its failure to succeed was due, not to the unpopularity of the cause it represented, but to a lack of business management and a lack of editorial attention. This is not a reflection upon any of the men who have had business or editorial connection with the old Century. Least of all is it a reflection upon Professor Willett. He never agreed, nor did the company expect him, to make the paper the first thing in his thought and plan. Therefore, the failure of the former company was not chargeable to him.

Chicago the Natural Location.

Chicago, we all feel, must have a paper published in the interests of the Disciples. This city is the natural place for a paper of enterprise and progress to be published. Within a radius of five hundred miles from this city nearly one-half of our brotherhood lives. But our subscribers extend through New England and the Pacific states as well as in this Mississippi Valley. We are receiving letters of appreciation from men and women living in the extremes of the country who have been yearning for a Christian paper that would bravely meet the problems of the time in Christ's spirit.

There is no question in our mind that the Christian Century can be firmly established.

Our Subscription Campaign.

Meanwhile we are getting ready for a vigorous subscription campaign. Chicago is the natural place to begin. One church has been already entered and the prospects are good for one hundred subscribers. Two more churches will be entered this week. Our goal is

TWO THOUSAND SUBSCRIBERS IN CHICAGO.

We are willing to make such terms to our city churches as will make it profitable for them to place the paper in every home. Write or phone the office for information.

A Work of Love.

Editing and supporting the Christian Century on the part of those now connected with it is a work of love. While we have no doubt that the New Christian Century Co. will prove a business success in the event that a sufficient amount of money is enlisted to boost it in these beginning days, yet not one of us has gone into the enterprise for financial consideration. The editors are all pastors of churches in this city. Their congregations take pleasure in loaning their pastors for a part of their time to the general cause which the paper represents.

On this account we feel like speaking frankly with all our friends, disclosing to them not only the splendid opportunity but the evident duty to aid in every way possible to lift the Christian Century to a position of great usefulness. Chicago has been misrepresented to our brotherhood. Without being the organ of a partisan view it will be one function of this paper to interpret Chicago to the brotherhood outside this city.

Chicago Page.

The Chicago page will be a feature of each issue. We mean to print the happenings of our own churches, the important things taking place in our sister churches around us, and, more important than either of these, to interpret the social and moral movements of this city in the light of the Christian gospel. Our Chicago page will itself alone be worth the price of the paper.

We do not wish to make the impression by our Chicago campaign that we will confine our subscription efforts to this city. We are only beginning here, which is the natural thing to do. A down-state pastor asks us to send an agent into his church to secure subscriptions. We mean to do this or else show him a better way than to have our agent do the work. We will push our subscriptions from coast to coast.

We Want News.

One of the helpful things our friends can do is to send in news and to send it often. Our readers want to know what is being done in your church and city. Send the facts. You need not fear that your name will be signed, as if you were "blowing your own horn." Our purpose is to make the Christian Century a newspaper. All our news will be carefully edited and the facts will be stated, often without the signature of the sender. Send in the news of other churches than your own in your city and in your part of the world. Anything that you know about the ongoing of Christ's work will be interesting to the members of the Christian Century family.

A Letter That Helps.

We received this letter among many others recently, which exhibits the spirit which we think will be discovered in the hearts of hundreds of men and women. Upon this kind of spirit we base our hopes of the ultimate success of our paper.

"Dear Christian Century:—Your last issue did my heart good. I have been waiting and praying for some one to speak who could speak. The silence of so many who could speak has oppressed me for long. But you have spoken and I feel as if I myself had spoken and the world had heard. I am hopeful of great things for you. What can I do to make your paper reach the eyes and hearts of our brotherhood? I feel that I am a part of your enterprise and share responsibility with you for it. I well know that you will have grave difficulties. When you write me you may assume that I have a sort of conscience on the subject of the Century and you may appeal to it as you wish. May God speed you and raise up many helpers with you."

Let Chicago set an example to the rest of the brotherhood by presenting two thousand subscribers to the Christian Century.

THE CENTENNIAL PROGRAM.

Only one day's sessions have yet been provided for, and that not completely. Within a short while the Committee hopes to announce a provisional arrangement and list of speakers for the entire convention. Meanwhile the following statement is submitted to the brotherhood.

"By unanimous action of the General Centennial Committee, Professor Herbert L. Willett was selected with thirty-nine others to speak on the Centennial Program. After the recent discussion as to his views, by a misunderstanding of conversation and correspondence the report gained currency that in the interest of peace Professor Willett had declined to speak. At New Orleans the Committee learned that he only meant to leave the matter with it for final action. On the 19th of October, after Professor Willett at the Committee's request had met with it in Pittsburg and made a statement of his reasons for not voluntarily withdrawing from the Program, by a vote of eight to three the Committee laid upon the table a motion demanding his resignation. In neither case did the Committee consider itself an ecclesiastical court to pass upon Professor Willett's theological views.

The following members of the Committee were present: A. McLean, T. W. Phillips, Geo. B. Ranshaw, (Proxy for W. J. Wright), R. S. Latimer, Mrs. Ida W. Harrison, J. G. Slayter, G. W. Muckley, Wallace Tharp, J. H. Mohorter, O. H. Philips, W. R. Warren."

CHICAGO

One good Chicago Disciple, a member of the Englewood Church, sent a subscription last week for a friend in Iowa. That helps as much as if the paper remained in Chicago.

The interest in the presidential campaign in Chicago is being eclipsed by the interest in a contest over a minor office, that of prosecuting attorney of Cook county. Last Monday the matter was discussed in the meeting of the Christian ministers of the city. It was taken up at a larger meeting in Y. M. C. A. Hall at the noon hour. It is the subject of a special meeting in Evanston this week which will be attented by every minister in that suburb.

It may seem to some that the interest in this matter is out of proportion to the importance of the office. But underneath the personalities involved, there lies the whole question of the value of our legal institutions. Shall an officer who takes his oath of office make mental reservations? Shall he decide to enforce the laws that are popular and disregard the enforcement of those less popular? It becomes evident that if we place the privilege of such discrimination in the hands of the men who are set to the enforcement of law, they become endowed with a power which is dangerous to our Anglo-Saxon liberties. It is this very tendency to discriminate in the enforcement of law that is the basis of bribery and corruption in the exercise of the functions of public service.

The situation grows out of the work of the present state's attorney, Mr. Healy. Mr. Healy, supported by the best legal advice of the city, decided that the law against the opening of tippling houses on Sunday was still in force. He has brought suit after suit against violators of the law. The guilty parties have escaped by being able to hang every jury. On every jury was some man who was favorable to the liquor interests and who cast his vote regardless of the law and the testimony. The frequent prosecutions led to intense activity on the part of the United Societies, the organized liquor interests of the city. In the primaries, they induced many Democrats to vote against Mr. Healy and thus secured the nomination of Mr. Wayman. The frauds were being proven day by day. But at the time when the candidates must file their papers, the judge declared that inasmuch as not enough fraudulent votes had yet been proven to throw out Mr. Wayman he must be declared the Republican candidate. Mr. Wayman has made the pledge demanded of him by the United Societies. Mr. Kern, the Democratic candidate has made the same pledge. The friends of law-enforcement in the city of both the old parties feel compelled to bolt their party tickets. Two men who are running are under pledge to enforce the law. One is the candidate of the newly formed Independence party. The other is the Prohibition candidate, Mr. Street. Mr. Wayman is said to be personally a clean man but under pledge to the liquor interests. Mr. Kern is not recommended personally and in addition has made the same pledge. Mr. Street is clean, capable and is definitely pledged to the enforcement of law without favors to vested interest.

It is claimed by some that Mr. Street cannot be elected. Therefore every vote to him is a vote for Mr. Kern who seems the least desirable candidate. It is asserted on the other hand that the saloon men, while wishing the nomination of Mr. Wayman will throw their support to Mr. Kern. It seems probable that Mr. Kern will be elected as the better citizens will never rally to Mr. Wayman's support. The probability of this may seem remote but strange things are happening in politics these days. In any event the man who voted for Mr. Street and was on the losing side would be better off than the man who voted for a wrong candidate and helped to elect him.

The question of legislative candidates is also an important one this year. The liquor interests have lost so heavily by the recently enacted local option law that they are determined to have it repealed at all hazards. Every church member should read the recommendations of the Anti-Saloon league before going to the polls. It would be a calamity to lose by indifference this year what we have won by a whole generation of fighting.

The preachers meeting this week was held at the Palmer House. The time was occupied with reports from the national convention. These were made by A. T. Campbell, O. F. Jordan and C. C. Morrison. All the speakers expressed the greatest gratification over the spirit of the great gathering held recently in New Orleans. All agreed that our brotherhood is growing in liberality and in fraternity. Those present felt that the morning was spent in an unusually helpful way.

There was one addition by letter at Englewood Sunday. C. G. Kindred has not yet gained his usual strength. We hope he can be induced to recruit his energies before starting into another hard year's work.

Help get Two Thousand Chicago Subscribers for the Christian Century.

Mr. E. M. Bowman of the Bowman Dairy Company was present at the preachers' meeting to speak on the financing of the coming Congress of Baptists and Disciples. The expense has been equitably distributed between the two bodies. The total amount to be raised is $500. The report of all the speeches will be taken stenographically and printed. As the national convention was held so far south, it is believed that many of our men who did not go to New Orleans will go to the Congress held in the Memorial church in Chicago.

Luke Stewart, one of the students at the University of Chicago, preached at Batavia last Sunday. The Sunday previous he preached at the Northwest mission.

Dr. Errett Gates went out to Morocco, Indiana to spend Sunday and preached both morning and evening. Though not having a regular pastorate, he preaches nearly every Sunday. He has been a most valuable bishop to many a weak church.

A Sunday-school contest is now on between the Sunday-schools in Oak Park and West End churches. They have a system of counting points. Last Sunday the result was 218 points for Oak Park and 177 for West End.

The Episcopal church is now in convention in Chicago considering the missionary problem. The modern spirit is finding its way into this denomination as well as into the others. The old wooden dogma of the Historic Episcopate is making way for a view of the Christian ministry that is human and vital. The words of Dr. James S. Stone, of St. James Church, Chicago, are worth pondering by ministers of all denominations:

"If the age be robust, energetic, faithful. It will produce a robust, energetic, and faithful clergy; and when the laity realize that the line of real living priesthood lies not between them and the clergy but between Christian people and non-Christian people, they will also realize that they have a part in the work of the church not inferior to that part which they have assigned to the clergy.

"The ideal church will care less and less for opinions and more and more for life and real work, and if she is saving souls, alleviating sorrow, adjusting inequalities, defending the weak against the strong, struggling against evil in every form, making this common life happier, inspiring men to duty, guarding the training of little children, then the world will pass by other claims and regard her as Christ's Holy Catholic Church. Her clergy will still discharge their functions, but her laity will do more for the uplifting of the downtrodden, for the redemption of the masses, for purification of all life."

Many Baptist pastors of Chicago are out of the city this week attending the state convention of their denomination in session at Decatur, Illinois. The Baptitst have 1,200 churches, 1,100 pastors and 141,000 members in the state of Illinois. With this mighty host they are a great power for righteousness.

The ministers of Chicago will learn with regret that Alva W. Taylor of Eureka has declined the call to the Irving Park church. His presence here would have lead us all in certain efforts especially in the direction of the sociological church. He has given up for the time at least his intense desire to fight evil in its most aggrevated form in the city. Idolized by his church he will continue to bless the students of Eureka College who wait on his ministry and will continue to win the men of his community to Christ as he has done so abundantly in the past.

O. F. Jordan has offered to teach a class in shorthand and typewriting this winter in the Evanston Church. There is no night school in a population of twenty-five thousand, though other educational facilities are of the best. He proposes to test the matter and see whether there is a demand for this sort of thing.

Have you heard of our special offer to churches that will join in our campaign for two thousand Chicago subscribers? Write or phone us about it.

The Douglas Park church observed Rally Day last Sunday. The house was packed at night. Harry F. Burns is the pastor. His ministry at Douglas Park is being greatly blessed.

The Jackson boulevard church also observed Rally Day last Sunday. There were five additions by letter, one baptism and two confessions of faith. The church raised $1,085 to apply on their mortgage. The church owes nothing now save their remaining mortgage of $7,000. This summer is the first in a long time that the church has not shown a deficit.

WITH THE WORKERS

The organized activities of the church in southern California show good progress for the year. Three new churches have been organized, Tucson, Oceanside and a Japanese work in Los Angeles. Three others were brought to self-support, those at Anaheim, Imperial and Rialto. The churches in this section are well supplied with pastors. Of the sixty-seven churches in southern California, there are only three that are not ministered to by located pastors. These churches have had 1,336 added by primary obedience and 2,263 otherwise. The missionary offerings have averaged two dollars per member. The conttributions for the work of the local churches have averaged fifteen dollars per member. This certainly indicates that our group in southern California is one of the most virile in the brotherhood.

Our churches in New England that are able to support pastors are now all supplied. This is very fundamental to the success of the cause there. Two new buildings are in the course of erection, one at Bridgeport, Conn., and one at West Rupert, Vt. A new work has been started at Providence, R. I., during the year that is considered one of the most important enterprises in a missionary way which has been undertaken during the year.

Our work in Michigan is making good progress. Our people entered this state at an early period. We have not grown here as elsewhere. Various causes are assigned. Some say our belated development is due to the fact that we did not undertake work in the cities. Others say that it is due to the fact that in Michigan our plea has often had the most radically conservative interpretation so that it failed to make the impression it has done were more liberally interpreted. Whatever be the cause of our failures, we are now entering the cities and our ministers are now interpreting our message more liberally. We are growing. Traverse City church is only ten years old but has five hundred members. The Woodward Avenue church in Detroit is young but has a $27,000 building all paid for. The church at the "Soo" is only a year old but they have purchased a building and employed a good preacher. F. P. Arthur is the corresponding secretary of the state.

J. W. Davis reports having held a meeting at Amoret, Missouri, with twenty-one additions to the church.

The church at Ukiah, California, is gathering in the harvest of its past sowings and had sixteen additions one Sunday morning recently.

The church at Michigan City, Indiana, is but a year old. A meeting was held there recently by Evangelist Snodgrass with 88 additions. This means the doubling of the membership.

The enrollment of Drake University reported thus far in the year is 1,074. The various departments of the university are in a flourishing condition.

The church at Findlay, Ohio, has recently dedicated a ten thousand dollar building. F. M. Rains was master of ceremonies on dedication day. Six thousand dollars were needed and almost all of the amount was raised. The pastor G. H. Sims, will hold a meeting soon and hopes to build up the membership of the church substantially.

This week the state convention of Kansas is in session. It is planned to make this convention one of the largest and most inspiring in the history of the state. This is called the Jubilee convention.

The state convention of North Carolina will be held at Kinston, November 17-19. A good program has been prepared. The convention will be held by the delegate system which is being so widely adopted now among our people.

A church has been organized at Blanchard, Oklahoma. The congregation is now busy getting ready to build a new church building. After that they will hold a series of evangelistic services under the leadership of W. H. Kindred.

It is commended in Holy Scripture member the Lord in the days of youth-time but we count it no little triumph when the appeal of the gospel will change the point of view of those in old age. A woman 74 years of age has joined the church in Madisonville, Kentucky.

The Independence Boulevard church of which Geo. H. Combs is pastor in Kansas City recently took a missionary offering of $5,000 on a single Sunday. This brings the total missionary offerings of the year up to $9,000. Such a record is probably without precedent in our history.

The state convention of Kentucky held the latter part of September was one of the best attended in years. One of the features of the convention was the launching of a plan by which the state society will undertake the raising of $15,000 for evangelistic work during the centennial year. Every church in the state is urged to hold a meeting during the year.

A great meeting in Wichita, Kansas has brought in 601 additions to the church. This will bring the church into the lead among the Protestant forces of the cities and will make it the largest Christian church in Kansas. With these new people properly assimilated and made part of the working force, the church will have a tremendous opportunity of doing good.

Herbert Yeuell has just concluded an unusally helpful meeting with the church at Fostoria, Ohio. The field is a difficult one on account of the large number of churches to the population and the poor equipment of our church. The meeting was held in a tabernacle and resulted in 127 additions. The preacher was favored with many tokens of the regard of the people, among them being a purse of gold.

The West Virginia convention held recently reported $2,481 raised by the state society. Five evangelists were in state employ who had 280 additions by primary obedience and 389 otherwise. One of the most interesting features of the convention was a discussion of union with the Baptitsts. Dr. Purington of the West Virginia University and Mr. Brooks conducted the discussion in the most fraternal spirit. Dr. Purington insisted that the principles which the Baptists had regarded fundamental to their movement were held by the Disciples as well.

Evangelist Cottingham held a meeting at Bethel, Missouri, recently with twenty additons to the church.

Evangelist H. G. Bennett has held a meeting for the church at Sciota, Illinois, where C. B. Dabney is pastor. The church speaks appreciatingly of the work of the Evangelist.

A church has been organized at Holly, Colorado, through the efforts of J. R. Robertson and J. F. Fox. The usual auxiliaries were set going and the young church enters upon its service to the community with bright prospects.

The state convention of Wisconsin was held in Milwaukee recently. We have only thirty churches and missions in the entire state. The larger number of these do not have a located ministry. They are scattered over the different parts of the state so that they can have but little fellowship except in conection with the state convention. H. F. Barstow Ladysmith has been the coresponding secretary for several years. In that time a more perfect state organization has been formed and a substantial increase of membership in the state has taken place.

The meeting at Tuscola, Illinois, is making good progress. Brooks brothers are leading in the effort. The pastor, Mr. Lindenmeyer, is recovering from a severe illness. His two little daughters have just made the good confession in the meeting now in progress. The prospects are bright for a most substantial addition to the working force of the church.

Evangelists Wilhite and Gates are now in a meeting in the Fourth church in St. Louis, Mo. The meeting began with a marked manifestation of interest and without doubt will close with great blessing to all departments of the work.

A FOOD LESSON
That the Teacher Won't Forget.

Teaching school is sometimes very arduous work. If the teacher is not robust and in good health, she can't do her best for her scholars or for her own satisfaction.

When it becomes a question of proper food for brain work, as in school teaching, many teachers have found Grape-Nuts ideal.

"I have been for many years a teacher, and several months ago found myself in such a condition that I feared I should have to give up work," writes a N. Y. teacher.

"So nervous was I, that dizziness and spells of faintness were frequent and my head and stomach gave me much trouble.

"Several physicians who treated me gave me only temporary relief and the old ails returned.

"About three months ago I dropped all medicine and began eating Grape-Nuts morning and night. Now, my head is clear, pain in stomach entirely gone, and I have gained in flesh. I am not only continuing in school but have engaged to teach another year.

"I owe my restored health, a brighter outlook on life, and relief from doctor bills, to Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The pastor of the church at Fremont, Nebraska, has begun a meeting with his church with the avowed object of working for the spiritual uplift of his own. This is a type of special service that should become common among us.

C. L. McKim has just finished an evangelistic effort at Garwin, Iowa. There were 22 additions and a great spiritual uplift to the church. Ideals for the future of the church work have been enlarged and the people have been blessed in every way.

The church in Utica, Mississippi, has just concluded an evangelistic enterprise under the leadership of Mr. and Mrs. John A. Stevens. Twenty-six were added to the church and a remarkable feature of the meeting was the fact that twenty of those added were men.

Harry H. Martindale has held a meeting in the Sugar Creek church in Indiana, which has resulted in 24 confessions of faith. Mr. Martindale is a junior in Butler college and has not been preaching long. His ministry is opening with promise.

Evangelist W. S. Johnson, has held a meeting with the church at Elliott, Iowa, which has resulted in 48 additions to the church. The pastor, J. Edward Cressmer, speaks in the highest terms of his work. The church is now stronger numerically, financially and spiritually.

The Galesburg (Ill.) Church is on the eve of an evangelistic effort which promises much for our cause in that city. The meetings began Sunday, Oct. 25. The pastor Rev. J. A. Barnett will do the preaching and will be assisted by Singing Evangelist Wm. Leigh, of Akron, Ohio.

Richard Martin has just concluded a most worthy effort in a town where no Christian church had previously existed. He went to Piedmont, Kansas, and held a meeting out of doors. A church of sixty members was organized with the usual auxiliaries. A lot has been purchased on which to build a church.

The Central church of Texarkana, Texas has just concluded a series of special services lead by Evangelist Wilhite. The church has received fifty-seven additions but more than that it has received a spiritual uplift almost unparalleled in the history of the church. The church speaks in the most appreciative way of the work of the evangelist.

David Shields remains with the church at Salina, Kansas, where his lengthy pastorate has been so abundantly blessed. There were ninety added to the church the past year of his ministry. A large sum has been raised recently to finance the evangelistic enterprise which is being undertaken soon under the leadership of Evangelist Wilhite.

The church at Rockford, Illinois, has closed a prosperous year under the ministry of W. D. Ward. The church raised two thousand dollars for all purposes besides the work of the auxiliaries. A dwelling house at the corner of Peach and Court streets will be remodeled into a chapel to serve the congregation for a few years as the old stone church at the corner of Church and Chestnut streets has been sold.

A church has been organized in another section of Kansas City which will be called the Quindaro Boulevard Christian church. Kansas City is showing more ready acceptance of the plea of the Disciples of Christ than most of the cities of the country. This is undoubtedly due in part to the efficient local organization for the extension of the work.

Think what a medium of communication among our Chicago Disciples if the Christian Century reached two thousand homes.

The church at New London, Iowa, has just completed a successful evangelistic effort. A tent was pitched and for a part of the time the meetings were held there. For the remainder of the time they were held in the opera house. Evangelist Wilkinson did the preaching. The pastor of the church is J. W. Ellis. The brethren recently gathered at his home and left substantial tokens of their esteem.

Evangelist Murphy has just concluded a good piece of work in Frederick, Oklahoma. A meeting was held in which thirty-three were added to the church. Two men over sixty years of age gave the remainder of their lives to the service of the Master. Nearly a thousand dollars was raised for the construction of a church building. Mr. Murphy will hold his next meeting in Harting, Oklahoma.

Pastor Case of the Crescent, Oklahoma church, began a meeting and after a period of successful effort called to his assistance Evangelist Ingold. Eighty-three were added to the church as a result of the combined effort. The work of the pastor is much appreciated in the community.

The First Church, at Milwaukee, Wis., Claire L. Waite, minister, has just closed a notable year. During the year $4,200 (four thousand two hundred dollars) was raised. The offering for Home Missions exceeded the best previous offering by $200, and the offering for Foreign Missions exceeded the best previous offering by over $150. During the year the Second Church was organized by a swarm from the First Church, under the direction of R. A. Nourse, a business man, and with the full coöperation of the brethren of the First Church.

There has been a very encouraging gain in membership, but the most hopeful feature of all is the tone of harmony, spirituality, and aggressiveness which prevails in a remarkable degree. During the past summer the congregation united with the other churches of the community in a series of Sunday evining services. Invitations have also been recently sent out from the Bible School to fifteen neighboring Bible Schools to form a union "teacher-training" class.

Chester, Nebr. Oct. 19: New seventeen thousand dollar church dedicated here yesterday by F. M. Rains, the prince of dedicators. All the debt provided for. Have never seen such generous givers or such devotion. We have begun a meeting for Charles Cobbey the beloved minister in the new church. Splendid spiritual feeling already. We look for good ingathering. Salem, Ohio, next.

Small and St. John.

Oklahoma Christian University has two hundred students this year. This is a most creditable showing for so young a school.

J. M. Blalock has just begun a pastorate with the church at Elk City, Oklahoma. There were additions to the church on his first Sunday with the congregation and the indications are that both pastor and church will be blessed in the work.

THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELISTS is a voluntary organization of nearly two hundred of the leading evangelists and gospel singers of the United States from all denominations for the purpose of raising the standard of evangelistic work and of promoting it in the churches of America.

Its membership is composed of men and women whose Christian characters were thoroughly investigated before they were admitted to membership. Their membership in the Association is a guarantee of their integrity and trustworthiness.

Pastors desiring the services of accredited workers will be furnished with a complete list of the members upon application to the secretary, Rev. Henry W. Stough, 125 Scott St., Wheaton, Ill.

The officers for the ensuing year are: president, Rev. W. B. Biederwolf; vice presidents, Revs. J. Wilbur Chapman, Henry Ostrom, John H. Elliott, James H. Cole; secretary and treasurer, Rev. Henry W. Stough.

—Dr. A. C. Dixon of the Moody Bible Institute strongly affirms the value of the sometimes berated gospel songs. They create an atmosphere, they touch hearts, they are effective agents in winning men to Christ, he asserts out of wide experience. Each month the Institute holds a gospel song service and always with crowded house and results.

NOT A MIRACLE
Just Plain Cause and Effect.

There are some quite remarkable things happening every day, which seem almost miraculous.

Some persons would not believe that a man could suffer from coffee drinking so severely as to cause spells of unconsciousness. And to find complete relief in changing from coffee to Postum is well worth recording.

"I used to be a great coffee drinker, so much so that it was killing me by inches. My heart became so weak I would fall and lie unconscious for an hour at a time. The spells caught me sometimes two or three times a day.

"My friends, and even the doctor, told me it was drinking coffee that caused the trouble. I would not believe it, and still drank coffee until I could not leave my room.

"Then my doctor, who drinks Postum himself, persuaded me to stop coffee and try Postum. After much hesitation I concluded to try it. That was eight months ago. Since then I have had but few of those spells, none for more than four months.

"I feel better, sleep better and am better every way. I now drink nothing but Postum and touch no coffee, and as I am seventy years of age all my friends think the improvement quite remarkable."

"There's a reason."

Important Books

We are the publishers of some of the best known works pertaining to the Disciples' Plea for a united church. These important books — important in more ways than one—should be read and owned by every member of the household of faith.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo, cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes.

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement, it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I should like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union, collated and edited by Charles A. Young. 12mo, cloth, 364 pages, illustrated, postpaid $1.00, is an important contribution to contemporary religious literature. It presents the living principles of the church in convenient form.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Indiana, a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially realized may come to fruition that these ch[illegible] are given their present form."

Early Views and Separation of Baptist and Disciples, by Errett Gates. 8vo., cloth, gold side and back stamp, A limited number in paper binding will be mailed postpaid for 25 cents until stock is sold out.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, Pa.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, Mass.

The Christian Century Company

A CHANGE OF PLACE OF MEETING.

The place of meeting of the Joint Congress of Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples to be held in Chicago, November 10, 11 and 12 next, has been changed from the Hyde Park Baptist Church to the Memorial Church of Christ, Oakwood boulevard, near Cottage Grove avenue. It is eminently fitting that such a meeting should be held in such a place. The Memorial Church is the most recent and conspicuous instance of the effort to bring Disciple and Baptist churches together.

As is well known, the Memorial Baptist and First Church of Christ have recently united and the conditions and spirit of the union seem to be among the most happy and promising of any such efforts. The meeting of the Congress with a congregation that is a living and practical exhibition of the aims and ideals of the Congress itself is a happy thought of the Baptist portion of the committee with whom it originated.

Although the announcement of the Congress has come even later than we anticipated because of added delays, there is already a general interest manifest throughout the brotherhood. It is a busy season of the year and many interests are demanding our attention in our local work, but this great movement for union must not be neglected by the people whose very existence has its justification in the effort to attain this very end. This is our great opportunity to give practical demonstration of the integrity of our motive and justification to our plea as a religious people.

To fail to be represented in large numbers at this meeting and to manifest a hearty and sympathetic attitude toward this overture from our Baptist brethren would indeed be a sad comment on our movement. We do not indeed anticipate any such result, but we speak these urgent words because the limited time has prevented our getting the full significance of the meeting of the joint congress before the brethren as we could wish we might have been able to do. Will not the churches generally see to it that the attendance of their respective ministers is made possible? Every man who attends will receive a mighty stimulus for his local work by his presence at this meeting. The question has been asked me if this meeting will take the place of the regular congress of the Disciples for 1909. That will probably be decided by the brethren in attendance. Presumably the interests of the Centennial will be given first place in our thought for next year and the regular congress postponed until 1910, but that will be for action by those in attendance at Chicago.

A feature of the meeting of which I have not spoken will be the report of the joint committee on union of the Disciples and Baptists, of which Brother I. J. Spencer is chairman. It would be fitting that this committee should report to the joint congress and we are anticipating they will be prepared to make a report.

A final word: Read the program which appears with this notice and ask the question, Can you afford to let such an opportunity go by? To reach the place of meeting, take a Cottage Grove avenue car, get off at Oakwood boulevard, walk west one block to the Memorial Church of Christ.

G. B. Van Arsdall,
Secretary of Disciples' Congress.

The Beauty Of Firm Flesh

Lies In The Power Of Rich Blood To Keep It Ever Clear And Clean.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers Free.

The secret of firm, strong, supple flesh is—good, rich, constant flowing, blood. When hollow cheeks appear and hidden pigments make the eyes look like burnt holes in a blanket, the blood is sick and out of tune.

The effect of impure and pure blood is seen at once on the face.

Impurities fill it with poisons, the flesh abhors, and the lungs cannot eliminate, as they should.

It needs a purifier. Stuart's Calcium Wafers give to the blood through the same channels as food all the strength and stimulus necessary to remove the impurities and to make rich corpuscles which will feed the body or fight its enemies.

Time was when poor blood purifiers had to be used, such as herbs and roots powdered minerals, etc., but thanks to latter day achievement the Stuart process gives to the system the full rich strength of Calcium Sulphide, the greatest blood purifier known to science.

These little powerful wafers are prepared by one of the most noted expert pharmaceutical chemists in the world and so far as science is concerned no expense has been spared to make them perfect.

They contain Quassia, Golden Seal and Eucalyptus, each a most powerful aid to the blood of man.

Thousands of people use these wafers with religious zeal, and their testimonial evidence is an unfailing source of interest to one who reads it.

Melancholy marks every suffering woman, yet one should be armed with this knowledge and make up one's mind to try Stuart's Calcium Wafers at once. Every druggist carries them. Price 50c, or send us your name and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

The Quarterly Rally of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society was held at the First Methodist Church building last Sunday afternoon. A good crowd was present. C. C. Morrison made the formal address of the occasion and Dr. H. L. Willett reported the national convention. Instead of dealing with details of missionary operation, Mr. Morrison sounded the high note of a proper point of view for the work. Pledges were taken in the meeting for the Chicago work which amounted to a goodly sum. The largest delegation came from one of the missions, Douglas Park. The nominating committee this year is W. F. Shaw, W. S. Brannum and Mr. Thomas. They will report at a meeting of the general board which is held early in November. The A. C. M. S. and the C. W. B. M., each contribute $2,000 to the Chicago work, allowing the Chicago Christian Missionary Society a minister.

Parker Stockdale is not afraid to undertake some subjects that are full of inflammible material as is evidenced by the following sermon topics for October and November. "Miracle and Reality," "Miracle and Christ," "Miracle and New Testament Literature," "Miracle and Tvery-day Life," "Miracle and Life Eternal." Any man who succeeds in discussing these themes without finding dissenteds will be a wonder. But Parker Stockdale is not afraid of difficult tasks.

A number of pastors have assured us that they will do all they can to put the Christian Century in every home in their churches.

The church in South Chicago had a good day last Sunday. The Sunday-school was largely attended and there was one addition to the church by letter.

The Evanston Sunday School had 159 in attendance last Sunday. A representative of the Blakeslee Bible series made a short talk on their lesson helps. The teachers have for some time been anxious to have lesson helps that were pedagogically more correct. Without doubt this series will be tried in a part of the school the coming year. The young men's classes have been amalgamated and will fit up a room for some othletic practice this winter.

CHRISTIAN FINANCE ASSOCIATION, 2 Maiden Lane, New York

VACATION IMPRESSIONS OF AN EVANGELIST.

We left the delightful people and climate of Prince Edward Island, Canada, as soon as our meeting closed at Charlottetown, and hurried home to be with mother and Lima friends. Brother Billy and wife, who had charge of the music, stopped at Lubec, Maine, for their vacation.

It has been a joy to be at home with mother and old friends. The fellowship has more than compensated for the health-giving tonic of the sea.

I have taken my vacation as usual in preaching, preaching, preaching. Ever since I entered the evangelistic field, many of the churches of this district have work waiting for me on my "Summer Returns." This welcome, based on twelve years of acquaintance, is a precious heritage. The money side of it is small, but the "bond of affection" is more precious than gold and silver.

For some of these churches I have held as many as nine protracted meetings. Those that happen to be without a settled minister, we keep at until one is secured. If I were financially able I would give all my time to this kind of work.

What is needed is a wise evangelist in every district, one who can supply and look after matters while the state secretary and pulpit supply committee are finding the kind of a man his recommendation suggests.

The state secretary is too busy a man to do the detail work required and our college presidents are too far away from the scene of action to always know just what is needed. A district evangelist in this way can do the work of a presiding elder minus the ecclesiastical authority.

The churches are suffering from the lack of immediate relief. An ounce of wise action is worth more than tons of theorizing.

Some of our papers are helping solve the problem in a small way through their few evangelists; but to adequately meet the needs, we should have hundreds of men at work. Here is a chance for some of our wealthy brethren to immortalize their names by supporting a coterie of men competent to do this work.

In my early ministry I spent four years as settled minister with country churches in this vicinity before taking up the work in Lima. During that time I received many calls at $1,000 salary, but stayed by the "stuff" at $13 per Sunday.

In that four years' work I saw three handsome church buildings completed and hundreds confess Christ. When I took the work at Groon Hill, Ohio, I had another call better than $1,000 a year. I wrote my spiritual adviser, Brother J. V. Updike, "What shall I do?" He immediately replied, "Accept Groon Hill and stay there for years." I did so. It stung my pride a little for I had spent four years in one of the best colleges of Ohio.

When the call came to take up the work in Lima, I realized the village church had made me efficient and sufficient for it. Without that training and experience I never could have done the work required in the Lima venture. We built a handsome new brick church here and in one meeting had 208 additions.

We have had a delightful fellowship with Homer Carpenter of the Wayne St. Church and Brother Verl Wilson, one of my successors at the South Side Church.

The Wayne St. people are preparing to build one of the best church edifices in the city.

Brother Wilson is meeting with splendid success in his work on the south side. Both are strong, aggressive men and the cause in Lima never had a more hopeful outlook.

These vacation trips home have shown me there is more gratitude in the average congregation for the ex-minister than they get credit for. I am away from home most of the year in my evangelistic work and when I return on my vacation trips I find their hospitality unchanging and unstinted. I wouldn't exchange this deathless affection of my brethren and friends for all the sickly sentimentality of a "rush in and rush out" gallery applause.

There is also a sadness in this last vacation visit. The Lima cemetery holds the form of my dear father in the gospel, Brother J. V. Updike. How precious his memory! The young preacher's friend! He used to kiss me as the son of his own flesh and blood. I hold in memory a package of his precious love letters as Paul to Timothy. Yet I am only one of an army of young men who remember him in the same spirit. Brother George Sims, his son-in-law, who is doing such splendid work in Findlay, Ohio, said to me, "Lima must always be a sacred spot to me for its cemetery holds the 'Dearest of the Dear' to me."

I am just writing my singer, Brother Bilby, that I feel stronger for the work of the coming year because of this sacred fellowship. They have given me a stronger hold on God and a deeper love for his cause.

Clarence Dumont Mitchell.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

*Sharp C. M. May'09

In response to a multitude of requests, Professor Willett has agreed to make a personal statement of his convictions with respect to the matters entering into the current controversy. A prefatory statement is made in this issue of the Christian Century. Three other articles will appear in successive issues. For Professor Willett's sake and the brotherhood's sake, and for the truth's sake we desire to give this personal confession of faith the widest publicity possible. We desire also to give wide publicity to the discussion that will follow upon the conclusion of his series.

Therefore we will send the Christian Century for the next six months beginning with October 31 to any new subscriber for 50 cents, payable strictly in advance.

One subscription for six months free with a club of five; for one year free with a club of ten.

This is an opportunity for our readers to enlarge our family circle and to advance the ideals for which our paper stands.

Dear Christian Endeavorers:

Through your Corresponding Secretary, I am addressing you this personal appeal. At our State Convention, in Chicago this year, it was decided that we would make no appeal this year to the Christian Endeavor Societies of Illinois, to support any particular mission. But this brings to us as Christian Endeavorers a very great responsibility. We must do more for the cause of Illinois Missions than we have ever done. Our motto is, "A personal contribution from every member of every Christian Endeavor Society in Illinois for Illinois Missions."

The first Sunday in November is the day upon which this offering is taken. There is only one week left in which to prepare for this service. Please make this week count for the most possible. See that every member of your Endeavor Society gets an envelope and a strong, urgent appeal to make a contribution. You have it within your power to add to the enthusiasm of the day. The Endeavor Society exists for the Church. Its motto is "For Christ and the Church." Prove that you are loyal to this motto by giving liberally in the name of our Master and through the channels of His Church.

The needs are great. We could use to good advantage ten times the amount of money that even a liberal offering will bring forth. I am writing this letter with the abiding faith that the young people will help make "Illinois Day" one of the greatest days on the calendar of our religious activities.

Very sincerely,

H. H. Peters, State Superintendent.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

EDITORIAL

My Confession of Faith.

When in 1857 John Henry Newman published his "Apologia pro Vita Sua," he confessed that it was not an unmixed pleasure to feel constrained to employ so much the personal and intimate tone in what he had to say. His reason for so doing, as he said, was that his opinions had been much questioned, and not a little controversy had centered about him. The fear that such a frank expression of his views might savor of undue self-esteem in the presumption that his brethren were especially concerned to know his opinions on various questions in discussion, was more than balanced by the reflection that when the soundness of any Christian teacher is challenged, it is not only his privilege but his duty to make himself understood.

Such considerations have led me to present, in this and certain articles which are to follow, some statements in reference to my beliefs and teachings on important biblical themes and upon questions relative to the history and purpose of the Disciples of Christ. My motives in thus setting forth my convictions should not be difficult of interpretation to any informed member of the Christian church. In the fellowship of the Disciples I have spent my entire life. As pastor and teacher twenty years and more have passed since I graduated from the oldest of our colleges and entered the ministry. During the entire period since that time I have been actively engaged in the interests of this brotherhood.

Through these years I have preached regularly in a few pulpits, spoken on occasion in many others, taught much of the time in class-rooms, devoted to the disciplines of biblical literature and history, and the history and purposes of the Disciples of Christ, and enjoyed the privilege of assisting in the graduate instruction of more than two hundred and fifty of our young men who after graduating from some one of our colleges desired further study as a more thorough equipment for their work as teachers and preachers.

I have spoken to many groups of Disciples, as well as others, upon public platforms, during the past fifteen years, on Bible themes and other topics dealing with Christian history and progress. In the religious press of the brotherhood, chiefly in the columns of the Christian Century, I have written on almost every phase of the religious life. In all this time I have received the most generous hospitality and recognition at the hands of my brethren. If in the considerable period of my public work among the Disciples I have ever suffered personal discourtesies at the hands of any, they have been quite forgotten in the wealth of generous and unmerited appreciation which has come to me.

It cannot seem strange, therefore, to any thoughtful mind, that when I am charged in certain quarters with being unsound in the faith, disloyal to the Bible and out of harmony with the ideals and efforts of our brotherhood, the accusation should occasion both surprise and profound regret. A man does not usually spend the best years of his life in propagating the teachings of a book in which he does not believe. Nor will he so far violate his sense of proper association as to abide in and labor for a religious communion with whose program he is not in something more than casual sympathy.

That the charges referred to are far from the truth is no mere private opinion of my own but is the conviction of a great company of my brethren whose assurances of love and confidence are valued beyond all power of record. The life and utterances of a man who has the questionable fortune to live largely in the public view are not difficult of discernment or interpretation. If I were ever tempted to believe the unbrotherly things said of me by some men in whose integrity and veracity it would be a pleasure still to believe if the facts would but permit, I should be quickly set right by the judgment of brethren in whose wisdom I have far greater confidence than in my own. It is not for these friends that I write what is here set down, though it is done at the request of some of them and because they deem it wise in the present moment.

Nor do I speak in hope of convincing the men who during years past have used and practiced arts of direct attack and covert insinuation to misinterpret my convictions and statements. With such men and methods time and the spirit of fairness in a brotherhood like that of the Disciples always deal amply and justly. The motives which have led to this propaganda of detraction have never been obscure. They reveal themselves more completely week by week. For sincere conviction that the truth of God is endangered by university education and the modern view of the Bible there can be only the most profound respect, even when such timidity is seen to be groundless. But for a commercialism devoid alike of conviction and character, making capital out of its power to mislead and alarm, there can be no feeling save deep disapproval and uncompromising protest.

But there remains that large and yet not indifferent company of Disciples who would like to know the truth of the things which have come to their ears. They have full right to know whether one to whom confidence has been given in such generous measure is worthy of its continuance. It is for this reason that I shall set forth, as clearly as I may, in succeeding numbers of the Christian Century, my convictions regarding some of the fundamental features of the Old Testament, the New Testament and the history and purposes of the Disciples of Christ. I wish my purpose to be clearly understood by all who read. That purpose is not to convince any man of the truth of my convictions. Men's minds are too variously organized to yield to one scheme of thought. There will be few who will share with me, at all points, the beliefs which I hold. Some will find them too radical; others too conservative. But I wish one question kept clearly in mind throughout the statements I shall make. That is this: Is one who holds these views of the Bible and of our history loyal to the Scriptures and to the fathers? Is he worthy of fellowship in the work and worship of the Disciples of Christ? Such an inquiry may have further reaches than we now see, as determining our present relation to the plea the fathers made.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The Evangelist's Point of View.

The evangelist, of all Christ's ministers, is compelled to exercise the finest discrimination between essentials and non-essentials. He abides with his hearers for but a short time. He comes to them with a very definite purpose in mind, the purpose of winning them from sin to Christ. The opportunity is grave, but it passes soon. Therefore he must not waste words. He must not speak irrelevancies. He must not awaken opposition by urging non-essentials. He must know but one gospel, and that a simple, vital one. Men must be led into the immediate presence of Christ. No speculations can be allowed to bar the way. Human creeds must be brushed aside. The time is short. The situation is pregnant with spiritual opportunity. It requires tact. Above all it requires that the evangelist shall know just what his gospel is, what it is not, what is essential to it and what is not essential to it.

Different From the Pastor.

With the pastor it is somewhat different. First of all, he has time. He lives year after year with his people. He discusses all sorts of questions with them. He is a reader of many books. He is continually refreshed with new and interesting ideas. The pastor's work is educative, the evangelist's is decisive. The pastor must be interesting, the evangelist constraining. The pastor has a subject when he preaches. The evangelist has an object. The pastor often preaches to "deliver himself," the evangelist preaches to deliver men from sin.

This contrast is by no means absolute, but one of degree and emphasis. There are many pastors who take the typical evangelist's method. There are likewise some evangelists whose work is didactic mainly. But roughly speaking, the two callings supplement each other on the lines we have just drawn. We are interested now in the matter because we wish to point out the responsibility resting upon the evangelist to plant the seed of the gospel in the hearts of men without dogmatizing on irrelevancies or secondary truths.

Evasion of the Irrelevant.

The evangelist, we repeat, must discriminate in the choice of his materials. He, of all men, must put first things first. Secondary or incompetent matters must not eclipse the primary consideration. Prejudices and doubts about certain creedal or even Biblical points he will tactfully evade and join the battle at the very citadel of the will. His ammunition he will not waste on some outpost of doubt set up on the frontier of the wide field of intellect, but flanking these by strategem, he will urge his question on the heart "What then will you do with Jesus, called Christ?"

We are moved to say these things by the suggestive story told by James Small on another page. Mr. Small is one of our most successful evangelists. Fifteen years ago it was the editor's pleasure to assist him in a meeting in Des Moines, Iowa. His Irish stories remain with us to this day. But his stories, we remember, were merely a part of his strategy. His message was deep, serious, "full of state and awe." The Christ of his sermons abides with us still, more vividly than do his stories.

Christ His Gospel

He preached a living Christ, a tender Christ, a human Christ. He did not argue about Christ, he did not defend Christ. He presented Christ. To him Christ was not a "dead fact stranded on the shores of the oblivious years," but a living, present reality.

It seems to us that there is much significance in the simple story Mr. Small tells concerning the conversion of a young men who did not believe in the Virgin birth of Jesus. What waste of words and opportunity to argue that question when the simple presentation of Christ himself could capture the young man's heart! The thing that best commends Christ to our hearts is not that he came into the world in a certain manner, but what he is in himself when he comes here. The character of Jesus is his best certificate of divinity. This character, this personality, is divine no matter how it came into existence—that is the testimony of every conscience that ever reckoned honestly with Christ.

A Practical Bearing.

This matter has both a practical and controversial bearing. It has a practical bearing on the problem of the preacher's essential function. The evangelist who learns to treat questions of origin—whether of Christ or the Bible or the church—as secondary and more or less academic questions, has put himself in a position where he can force the real issue in the conscience. The real issue is not, how came Christ to be? but, what do you think of such a man as he is, and do you not yearn to be like him? The real issue is not, how came the Bible to be? but what is it actually worth as a revealer of God and an inspirer of men's lives? The real issue is not, how came the church into existence, or when was it set up, or what was its form at the beginning? but, what is the church actually doing in saving men and communities from sin, and what is your plain duty toward an institution that is engaged in such a divine mission?

Positive Preaching.

A question as to origin is a matter of fact, a question as to value is a matter of duty. One is an intellectual question, the other is a moral question. One is academic the other is intensely practical.

Now the preacher must be positive—some stubbornly like to insist that he must be dogmatic. Very well. But let him be dogmatic about values, not about origins. Values are propagated by dogmatism. But origins call for inquiry, for tolerance of other views, for the open mind. The true evangelism, for which the church waits, will lose none of the vigor of the old evangelism. It will spend its vigor, however, in affirming and illuminating the transcendant worth of the indisputable facts of our holy religion.

A Doctrinal Bearing.

The little story of our evangelist has a bearing on the current doctrinal controversy. It helps us to define the "essentials" upon which we have the right to demand unity. We have never in our history dreamed of adopting a dual standard of fellowship—one for church membership and another for the ministry. We leave all such artificial distinctions to the creed-bound sects. Nevertheless a propaganda has been operating in our midst for several years to establish this dual standard. The demand has gone forth from a newspaper office that because a certain preacher is alleged to disbelieve in the virgin birth (although the charge is false and has been denied by him again and again) therefore he should not be allowed to appear on the programs of our conventions!

Fellowship in the Ministry.

What would Mr. Small's attitude be toward the young man of his story if the latter should develop into a minister of singular personal purity and piety and self-sacrifice and still maintain his inability to believe in the Virgin birth?

Would the great-hearted evangelist deny him a pulpit in one of our churches, or a chair in one of our colleges, or a place on our convention programs? We do not need to wait for his answer. We know that he would give his young convert the right hand of fellowship into the ministry and all its opportunities as cordially as he did welcome him into the fold of Christ. Moreover we think he would take especial pride in pointing to the young preacher as an illustration of the unity which it is the very mission of our brotherhood to consummate among all of Christ's scattered people.

State Missions.

It is the ideal of the Christian religion to evangelize the whole earth. No program of missionary operations is complete which does not include the preaching of the gospel to those near at hand as well as to those far away. There is a romance about saving black men in Africa that does not pertain to the telling of the gospel story to our colored washerwoman. We are apt to be woefully ignorant and indifferent about the task that lies near at hand.

But some one asks, is there anything remaining to do in the states where we are strong? Do Missouri, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Iowa furnish a field for missionary operation? Because in days gone by over-zealous individuals have thought it necessary to put an additional church in a town of two thousand with ten churches, the cause of state missions has sometimes suffered. We have fancied that the field in these states was already overchurched. This is far from the truth, however.

We may take the state of Illinois as an example of the fact that the gospel work still needs to be carried on in states where we are numerous. In the city of Chicago we have every sort of missionary problem. No great Protestant denomination works in the Ghetto with its thousands of Jews. There are the Chinese with only one mission in Chicago and that in a third story room. There are the numerous Japanese with no Protestant missionary. There are the Bohemians and Poles with scarcely any gospel influence and a definite infidel catechism being taught their children. Illinois is not evangelized until Chicago has the gospel in her needy sections as well as in the fashionable suburbs. In the state of Illinois are many rural communities with no Sunday-school in ten miles and no regular ministry of the gospel. There are mining sections where important villages and towns have no gospel influence. There are the inland cities of Illinois where more churches are needed to fully carry on the preaching of the gospel. There are of course many towns and villages where churches have been foolishly multiplied beyond the needs of the community.

Illinois is not saved until Chicago is saved. Ohio is not saved until Cincinnati is saved. Missouri is not saved until St. Louis is saved. The world is not saved until these centers of wealth and culture are taken for Christ. The first of November an appeal should sound forth from every pulpit. It should not have the less urgency because it is in behalf of the sinner that is near at hand. The size of the offering should not be less an object of pride because it will be spent where we may advise intelligently in the administration of the funds. The first of November should be a day when our preachers shall have vision and when our people shall feel deeply the obligations of human brotherhood.

Mr. Moninger's Conception of the Church.

Last week we contrasted the strangely archaic positions of Mr. Moninger with the modern conceptions which had been gained in Yale. In the discussion of Mr. Moninger's conception of the church we find the same mixture of points of view, the same hopelessly antagonistic statements. In his discussion of the church, however, he deals with a subject on which Disciples have traditions and the statements are in the majority of cases on the conservative side.

"The New Testament Church" states that the etymology of the word "ecclesia" is "called out" and it adds the naive suggestion that this means that Christians are called out of the world. This is what the logicians call the fallacy of etymology. The word "ecclesia" had a perfectly definite meaning in Jesus' day. It meant a public assembly. The Christian "ecclesia" at first meant nothing more than a public meeting. Later, offices developed and work was undertaken. In the beginning, the modern institutional meaning was entirely absent.

The book undertakes to date the organization of the church with perfect definiteness. Curiously enough it quotes the very passage which disproves the outgrown idea that Pentacost was a day for the formal organization of anything. "They then that received his word were baptized and there were added unto them three thousand souls." To whom were the three thousand added? (Acts 2:41, 42.) It is true that in Matthew, the sixteenth chapter, there seems to be a reference to the church in the future but on the other hand there is a reference in the eighteenth chapter of Matthew to the church in the present. The fallacy to all efforts to date the organization of the church is that many have regarded the church and its form of organization as for all time fixed. Quite the contrary was true. In Jerusalem they had deacons and for a long time no elders. In the churches founded by Paul, there were in many cases elders with no mention of deacons. In other churches there were other functionaries. The anxiety displayed among a few in our ranks over the names of these officers finds no echo in the New Testament. The church of the New Testament times was a flexible organization. Had it not been so, it could never have been transplanted from country to country. It developed such officers and functions as were adapted to the people of the local community. Even the efforts of a later Catholicism were not able to reduce the organization of the church to a dead level of uniformity. It was contrary to the laws of life. A social organization must conform to the needs of the people or die. It has ever been so with the church and nowhere more clearly than in New Testament times.

Mr. Moninger makes a curious error with regard to the apostles of the church. He quotes the passage concerning Jesus' appointment of twelve apostles and later proceeds to say that the apostles had no successors. The apostles chose Matthias to fill Judas' place. Did this not indicate that they considered the office one to be perpetuated? Paul claimed to be an apostle. Now would Mr. Moninger dispute his claim as did the Judaizers of the early church? In Acts 14:14, we find Barnabas called an apostle. Is he now to be thrown out of office? In Galatians 1:19, James, the brother of the Lord, is called an apostle. Must he now be degraded to the ranks because of the new light that has arisen on the nature of the office? Besides these there are other claimants to the honors of the apostleship, among whom may be Andronicus and Junia (Rom. 16:7). It is a fact of history that the office of apostle did disappear in the early church eventually, but neither Mr. Moninger nor any other person can tell when.

The same errors that characterize the statements of the book with regard to the organization of the church are to be found in the chapter on the Holy Spirit. The book follows a certain line that was the polemic of our pioneers against emotional revivalism. This polemic was effective in its time but neither party to the ancient strife held the historic position with regard to the work of the Holy Spirit in the New Testament church. The book states that the baptism with the Holy Spirit occurred only twice. There are other cases in which the same thing happended as on Pentecost and in the household of Cornelius. As examples of these are the statements in Acts 19:6 and Acts 4:31. It is foreign to the facts to think that experiences can be classified like carrots and apples. The experience of the Holy Spirit in the life of the early church was as varied as human experience always is. At first the most valued evidence of the Spirit's presence was the miraculous. Later Paul insisted that speaking with tongues was not as valuable as prophesying, though he spoke with tongues more than they all. There is no evidence to show that the religious experiences of the apostles differed in kind from those of other Christians of the same period.

Again, the book erects a rule of faith and practice. It is the scripture referred to in 2 Tim. 3:16, 17. Surely Mr. Moninger knows that when this was written there was only one body of scripture and that was the Old Testament. Only parts of the New Testament had then been written and these had not yet been erected into a sacred canon. Is the rule of faith and practice in the early church the Old Testament? Paul tells Timothy that the Old Testament has value but he does not say what Mr. Moninger wishes to place upon the foundation of this text, that it is the rule of faith and practice.

More interesting even than these misstatements, are the omissions from the picture of the church drawn in the book. The book is on the New Testament Church. It furnishes introduction to the gospels and to the book of Acts. It is expressly stated that this is to enable the inquirer to learn the mode of entrance into the church. But there is no introduction to the epistles which tell how to live in the church. The only use made of the epistles in the book is to show who the officers of the early church were. This expresses a heresy now too common among us that it is more important to get into the church than to co-operate with the work of the church after getting in. The epistles tell of men excommunicated for evil lives but of this there is nothing in our manual. The epistles tell of much noble philanthropic work in the early church. Of this nothing from Mr. Moninger. It has seemed more important to establish that "disciples" was written with a small "d," though the Greek language was at this time all in capitals. The church dealt with the relations of Christians to government, with social problems of great urgency, with a broad program to usher in a good day of universal brotherhood. Concerning all this splendid program, Mr. Moninger has no mention for it is important to settle whether the modern pastor is an elder or a deacon.

To show the hopelessly mixed character of the book, we have a book on the New Testament church which fails to draw the line of distinction between the New Testament conception of the coming Kingdom and the present church. The chapter in Mr. Moninger's book on Judgment is dragged in by the ears. It dwells solitary and alone in company with incongruous ideas. The kingdom of God is a very different conception from that of the church. The church is a temporary organization designed for a special task. The kingdom is a larger idea which with its roots in the past grows to its glorious maturity in the distant future. The church is a visible social organization. The kingdom is an invisible social ideal. In with this archaic view of the kingdom of God, Mr. Moninger with his usual naive inconsistency puts a perfectly modern idea that the judgment day is now in progress. This is of course a scriptural idea but one that has had small favor with those holding to a mechanically worked out program for the activity of God.

Next week, we shall make a study of Mr. Moninger's conception of our plea. In that study we shall endeavor to make clear that Mr. Moninger repudiates the point of view of Thomas and Alexander Campbell and of Isaac Errett and adopts rather that of Benjamin Franklin who spent a great part of his life hunting the heresies of Isaac Errett and assailing the brethren who used organs and co-operated with missionary societies.

In the American Magazine, Dr. Woods Hutchinson, writing on "The Curiosities of Sleep," says: "It might be incidentally mentioned, for the relief of anxious souls, that the risk of any individual passing into a trance and remaining in it long enough to be buried alive is exceedingly slight. There is no authentic instance of this having ever occurred. It took occasion to investigate this question some years ago and communicated with a number of leading undertakers, and they all unanimously denounced it as one of the myths of the nineteenth century. One of them, at the time president of the National Funeral Directors' Association, informed me that he had carefully investigated every instance of 'burial alive' reported in the newspapers for fifteen years past and found every one of them to be, in his own language, 'a pure fake.'"

The Ministry of Life.

BY REV. PARKER STOCKDALE.

[This address was prepared for the Christian Endeavor session of the New Orleans Convention. On account of sickness, Mr. Stockdale was unable to be present. He read it to the Chicago ministers' meeting Monday morning, October 26, to their great delight. Mr. Stockdale is pastor of the Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago.—Editors.]

Two incidents gave Jesus the opportunity to utter the central truth of his gospel—the wish of the Greeks to see him, and the dispute among the disciples about greatness in the Kingdom of Heaven.

The Greeks manifested their characteristic attitude of mind—they were untiring seekers after truth. The fame of this teacher whose golden words stirred men to the deeps of life had aroused in them the desire to see a new philosopher. They came to see Jesus—the matchless man, the eloquent teacher, the intellectual force whose sun was then rising to the meridian. The magnetism of an original personality attracted them—they expected to see a great man and to experience the pleasure of a conversation with him. It would be to them only an incident—to Jesus it gave an opportunity to disclose the real nature of his life and work. Jesus responds to their curiosity in a vivid and wonderful way, and at no time in all his career does the light of his genius shine with more radiance. Had he been an ordinary man, he would have done the commonplace thing. He would have received the Greeks, and they, seeing him at that time, would have met a Jewish carpenter turned teacher for the people—a teacher whose face was fairer—a teacher whose words were wisdom. But Jesus wanted them. and he wants us to see him and know him as the Christ of God and the suffering servant of man. He is to be known not in the transient aspects of his life, but in the innermost meaning and richness of his nature, in the permanent and transcendent glory of his message and mission. So he proclaims the fundamental law of spiritual and eternal life in these words: "The hour has come that the Son of Man should be glorified. Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal. If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be; if any man serve me, him will my Father honor."

On another day the men who were to participate in the beginnings of the Kingdom of Heaven—before they understood the Christ-mind—before they discovered the secret of the Christian life—before they were transfigured by the vision of eternal love in the face of God's Son—before they were illuminated by the Holy Spirit—one day these men selfish in their traditional ambitions, narrow in their mistaken conception of the Christ and his Kingdom—one day these untutored, intense and earnest men quarreled among themselves about the honors and positions in the new movement to which they had given their outward and superficial support. And there was strife among them, which of them would be accounted the greatest. And He said unto them: "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But it shall not be so among you: whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister: and whosoever of you will be the chiefest shall be the servant of all. For even the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many."

Here then in these two incidents—in these paradoxes full of the truth always upon his lips and always exemplified in his life—Jesus gives us the essential values of the Christian life. The spiritual is superior to the material, and in the ministry of a life surrendered to the will of Christ we rise to the realm of true and lasting greatness. Beloved, this is the law we must obey—this is the standard of life-values we must maintain, if we are to realize in our character and experience the purposes of Christ Jesus concerning us, if we are to fill up the measure of our ministry to men and to participate in the sufferings and glory of Him who died that we might live.

Strange paradoxes these! Hard for minds clouded by sin to understand! Impossible for hearts filled with selfishness to appreciate! We must die to live. We must lose to gain. We get rich by giving and the more we give the wealthier we become. Not by what we get out of life but by what we put into it do we grow great. We know that it is more blessed to give than to receive. We find joy through sorrow and the crown is beyond the cross. Hands pierced by nails are alone worthy to be spread in benediction above the broken-hearted. Only lives baptized in the agony of Gethsemane and the shame of Calvary can reign with the risen Lord in joy and glory. We must surrender to conquer and we must be cast down that we may be lifted up. We must be ignorant if we would become wise. Would we exercise dominion, we must bring ourselves into subjection. Would we revel in the gladness of success, we must know the anguish of failure. Yea, beloved, we must be planted in the likeness of his death if we would be raised up in the power of his resurrection. This is the grace of our Lord Jesus that he was rich but for our sakes he became poor that we through his poverty might be made rich. I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live: yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

The New Testament is full of this great throbbing thought, indeed, this truth created the New Testament and an invincible and imperishable Christianity. All apostles and epistles, all ceremonies and churches, all sermons and institutions must exist and find their meaning and power in this ministry of the Christ life and spirit. Christianity is inward experience expressed in outward ministry. The life is more than meat and the body more than raiment. Out of the heart are the issues of life and it is to be the creative and dynamic center of a passionate love expressed in sacrifice and service.

Having considered the cardinal principle beneath all Christian living, and Christian thinking, let us notice the call of Christ to a life of service. It is a call to comfort in the hour of sorrow, but even then we serve in rolling away the stone. It is a call to peace and rest but even then we are told to yoke ourselves with him in burden bearing. It is a call to the richness and ripeness of vineyards and harvest fields, but even then we are commanded to work and wait. Brethren, the call of Christ to a ministry of life has come to us, we cannot escape his philosophy and law of the Christian life. With imperative authority and sweet persuasiveness, he would show us the way of a useful and happy life. His call is clear and luminous. His method is primary and vital. His reward is real and eternal. He says: I have chosen you, and appointed you that ye should go forth and bring forth fruit, and that your fruits should abide. He has called us to a fruitful and fragrant life. As he glorified the father in the ministry of his suffering and death, so we are to glorify Christ in bearing much fruit by our death to selfishness and through the new life springing up a hundred fold in his service. Jesus says: I am among you as one who serves. Learn of me and follow me. Ought not Christ to have suffered to enter into his glory.

Again, this service is personal. Personality is the large word in Christianity and it is the supreme force in the world. It is the source of all vision and emotion. It is the citadel of the will and determines all activities which involve responsibility in an ethical world. It is the permanent reality in a world of transient phenomena.

A person is after all the most vital, substantial and permanent fact and force in all the world—a soul is real and immortal.

Now Jesus stands in history and in humanity a personal fact and force. He is the soul of the Christian life—the incarnation of truth and goodness. He has filled the world with the heroic measure of his manhood. He has dominated nineteen centuries and still his voice speaks with absolute authority. His love has made fragrant and gracious the most powerful civilization of all history. He remains a permanent and increasing force in the world. Literary criticism cannot dissolve him into either a Greek myth or a Semite fable. "The waves of a tossing and restless sea of unbelief break at his feet, and he stands still the supreme model, the inspiration of great souls, the rest of the weary, the fragrance of all Christendom, the one defined flower in the garden of God." "The earth is not deep enough for his tomb; the clouds are not wide enough for winding sheet. The love of Christ is like the blue sky, into which you may clearly see, but the real vastness of which you cannot measure—it is like the sea into whose bosom you can look a little way, but its depths are unfathomable."

Jesus is the pre-eminent, the transcendent personality. God hath highly exalted him and given him a name above every name. Even Renan pays him this tribute: the highest consciousness of God which has existed in the bosom of humanity was that of Jesus. In him was condensed all that was good and elevated in our natures. He is without an equal; his glory remains entire, and will never be renewed. He has made his race take the greatest step toward the Ministers and Men.

BY ARTHUR HOLMES.

No radical improvement in the method of religious work has been made since Jesus sent six couples of personally inspired disciples to personally inspire others. In the ordinary church the pastor is the largest factor in its success; and the largest factor is his personality—that vague something, made up of manners, manner, looks and quality of mind.

An important element in personality is physical appearance. Based upon appearance two types of clergymen—caught more from the pages of comic papers than from a study of live specimens in their native habitat—live in the imaginations of laymen.

One type is represented by the attentuated, anaemic, useless-handed, loose-jointed, long-faced ecclesiastic, dressed in clinging black, topped with a thin covering of light-colored hair, flanked with drooping mutton-chops and resonant with a hark-from-the-tomb-a-doleful voice. His general air is other-worldly and he exudes piousness as a jug sweats water on a hot day.

The other representative is the rotund, smugly righteous man, dressed in sleek black clothes swelling with pudgy, worldly success. He wears a big watch chain (gold cross prominently displayed) and is terminated at one end with shiny shoes and at the other with a shiny beaver. He stands for the politico-clerical who has tasted of this world and knows that it is good. All clergymen have some characteristics of these two. The ideal stands between them.

The man's minister must first of all be a man. He has muscles and a strong clean jaw. His hands are not fat and look as if they could do things.

He looks men squarely in the eye, calmly, steadily, sincerely, good-naturedly. When he talks to men he is neither frightened nor aggressive. He is himself—plain, honest and simple. He neither advertises nor disguises his profession by his manner or dress. He might be taken for a physician or an intelligent business-man.

His first item of mental equipment is his knowledge of men. He knows them because he loves them. He has studied them from their view-point, not his own. He is interested in their business; plays their games for the love of the game and beats or is beaten like a man.

His next item of knowledge is of what is going on in the world. He knows politics. He is acquainted with present-day reforms. He avoids emphasizing the "dangers" of either, knowing that dangers in his mind, are apt to be defined according to the narrow interests of his parish or congregation. A corrective of this weakness is the deep study of history and the acquisition of the historical method of thinking, for many blatant and so-called world-embracing reforms simmer down to mere bubbles in the light of this study.

The practical attitude of the ideal minister has two important marks. He looks upon his church as a power-house from which force goes out. Instead of trying to draw men into his congregation, he lies awake nights discovering avenues of service through which to send them out. He knows the fallacy of institutional features like carroms, home-made checkers, second-hand gramophones playing hymns, a case of Sunday-school books and a tableful of last year's magazines. He knows that imitative and counterfeit societies or secret organizations, or competitive campaigns out of which the pith has been taken, may cause a temporary amusement and an apologetic the-wife-wanted-me-to-come interest but are of no avail against the masculine eall of the world.

Instead of these he makes his church a manufacturer of real men. He inspires them with heroic ideals of service and points out to them definitely the places where they may count most for helping onward the world. He sends them out in the spirit of the overcoming Christ to grapple with the back-breaking problems of their world, and, in these battles, he holds them to account, fearlessly and in the name of God, to the highest ideals set for holy warriors. As a result, men find that his church is a real contributor to their manhood and they seek its altars as the hart pants for the water-brooks.

The minister's second attitude is receptive. He listens. He knows that "if you give a woman enough note-paper and a man a good listener both will tell all they know." He listens, therefore, six days in the week and what he hears he preaches on the seventh. Therefore, he preaches what men need.

When one of his workers in some secular organization brings a freak to the pastor's study, the latter stays at home from the Ladies' Aid meeting and listens, listens sympathetieally, knowing that before him is a man dynamic with good or evil for soeicty, latent with untold possibilities, touched with the divine fire of some single idea, walking in a narrow beam of light with darkness all around him and needing more than anything else in the world, a brother-man who will take his hand to explore the darkness with him.

"The Story of Mr. ——'s Conversion."

BY EVANGELIST JAMES SMALL.

Evangelists have all types of human nature to deal with and all kinds of objections to meet. They of all men should be wise in dealing with doubt and with the unsaved.

They of all men should know the essentials and non-essentials in conversion and reach, if possible, as many people for Christ as they can. My story is the story of a young man in Mayfield, Ky. The young man in the gospel was typical in many respects of the subject of this story.

He had youth and wealth and ambition and reverence on his side; but I found him an unbeliever in the virgin birth. Here was his stumbling block. The story, he said, was not an impossible story but an improbable one. So improbable that he could not believe it and could not sincerely publicly confess that he believed it.

Here now was room for argument and here too was room for taet and wisdom. I prayed for the latter.

The question was shall we pursuade the young man to go forward without this faith or shall we seek to lead him to Christ in some other way? Was there not a way by which the young fellow could be reached without beginning with the story of the Virgin birth? It seemed to me there was; and I immediately set to work to show him that there was.

I knew that the story of the Virgin birth is given in Matthew and Luke. I know that Matthew emphasizes Joseph's testimony, Luke Mary's testimony.

Mark does not tell the story but begins his Gospel with the words: "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God," and had Mark been asked what he meant by the phrase "Son of God" he would probably have included as proof the Virgin birth story. So of John. He says: "The word was made flesh." He meant what Matthew and Luke had given at greater length. I knew too that Paul coined a new word in Phil. 2 to tell his readers how Jesus came into the world. I knew all this and much more and yet, somehow, I did not feel inclined to say a word about it.

My whole desire was to reach the young man for Christ and secure the conquest of his mind and heart for Him.

So I began with the Savior's manhood and appealed to him on that ground. I took him to his power then, and now, and appealed to him on that ground. I took him to his purity and loving deeds and made an appeal on that ground. Last of all, I led him to the Cross and the resurrection and showed that the Cross was the highest proof of God's love, and his resurrection the highest proof of his Lordship, and with a few moments exhortation asked him if he was not willing to confess Jesus to be the Son of God by these proofs, and to his joy and mine he said he was.

On this admission I sought out that same day, two brothers who were not identified with the church, telling them of their brother's decision, and that evening the three young men were on the front seat.

I know not yet whether that young man believes in the Virgin birth or not as I do, but I am convinced that if any one will write Sherman B. Moore the minister he will tell you that he is a worker in the church and wielding a splendid influence in the office where he works and in the town of Mayfield where he lives. This is the story that one of the editors of the Century heard me tell on the train and asked me to write for his paper which I have briefly and eheerfully done.

divine. He pronounced for the first time the sentence upon which will repose the edifice of eternal religion. He founded the pure worship of all ages, of all lands, that which all elevated souls will practice unto the end of time. THE CHASM.

The Correspondent: "There is a great chasm or division yawning between the extremes of the Disciples. It seems too wide to bridge. The two can scarcely see each other so wide is this chasm. I think the division is permanent."

A theological chasm is not unchanging like the banks of a canal, therefore, the division is neither permanent nor serious. Both are fighting for the same cause. There will be misunderstandings, sorrowful eruptions and newspaper clashings; but these are a necessary factor in all progress. The smoke will be thick but little blood will flow. A good book for us all to read just now is that one entitled, "The Man who was called Thursday." There is not a woman in the book, just as there is not a woman in our present strife. I think it would be a good thing to turn all our papers over to the women to edit. They are so sweet and sensible and strong. "Thursday" was a Scotland Yard detective. By a trick he got on the Grand Council of the Anarchists. There were six others on the Council. "Sunday" was president, "Monday" secretary. In their meetings they planned to throw bombs and destroy the governmental heads of Europe. After the meetings, "Thursday" got busy in his police detective work. He found he was shadowed by "Wednesday." For hours he tried to escape him; but at a restaurant "Wednesday" reveals himself to "Thursday" as a policeman. Then "Thursday" declares himself. Both are surprised. They then plan to trap another of the supreme council. But to their surprise they learn he also is a defender of the law. Then they start out to intercept the throwing of a bomb in Paris by one of the Council. There is great fighting in France between the police and the supposed anarchists; but when they come to close quarters all turn out to be representatives of the law. They were fighting each other under a dreadful delusion. He who runs may make the application.

I maintain that between the extremes of the Disciples there is a positive synthesis. Let me give two illustrations.

J. B. Briney and E. S. Ames.

I wonder if anyone else has noticed how much these two Disciples are alike. Not only have they many personal correspondences; they have some striking religious similarities. It was a joy to me to make this discovery. Like most people, I usually take the popular judgment as true; and accordingly I have thought of J. B. Briney and E. S. Ames as being poles apart. They think of themselves as such. But men rarely know themselves, especially religious philosophers. It was their humor that first struck me as of a common sort. From their laughter I have traced agreements up to their theologies and find they even have a common root.

The discovery to me was like the discovery of a new land to an explorer. I pass it on for the joy and good of others.

As I have suggested, both are chock-full of fun. A good story is heartily relished by both. Ames as a story-teller is superior in a small group; Briney in an assembly. The latter's wide experience as a debater has made him exceptionally rich on the platform. But Ames' soul is no less full of the mirth of life. Both enjoy their own stories. In this they show their good taste, because they are usually good ones. Laughter is sanity, especially in religious souls. He has little faith in the universe who cannot laugh. Laughter and pathos are twin sisters; so in both we find the deeper and more tender sentiments well developed. The tear is in both their hearts and often in Mr. Briney's eye.

Both believe that they have a message for the world and are burning to give it utterance. They cannot contain. They are not egotists but prophets. This characteristic is illustrated by their frequent publications. "Briney's Monthly" was the product of the true Pauline spirit to spread the gospel. Ames' sermons were born in a like passion. Would that we had more men anxious to publish. Both these publications have ceased, I believe. But their pens are not dry; because their brains have not ceased to throb.

These men are one in their fighting spirit. They believe there is something to fight. That, today, is a great faith. They are not content to sit comfortable with their slippers on. The Devil is abroad and they are after him. The curse today is not the activity of heresy but the heresy of inactivity. Both fight in the open. They are not sly or stealthy. They have big nails in their boots. They stride noisily to battle.

Again, the life of both of these is bound up with the cause of the Disciples. They are unsectarianly clannish. The conventions of the Disciples would seem lonely without the genially forceful personality of J. B. Briney. Sad it is to think that the gatherings of the hosts must soon march without this captain of Christian war leading. E. S. Ames' heart, like that of Bruce, has been flung on the battle ground.

The University of Chicago is a tremendously big school. Its professors are important personages in the educational world. Ames is a professor in that big school. But to him the Hyde Park Church of the Disciples is much bigger. The cause of the Disciples is what he thinks about when he is alone. It snuggles in his innermost heart. Why should not our writers be concerned with the hearts of men as well as their brains?

The Disciples will put their arms around them both. Surely they will.

I now wish to point out further agreements between these men; but agreements in which I differ from both.

Both (here I hesitate) are aristocrats. No; democrats, but not thorough democrats. Ames is not as friendly as a good democrat ought to be with the fathers of the past; and Briney is aristocratic towards many of the fathers of today. Ames is scarcely on speaking terms with Calvin; and Briney disdains Sabatier. Both like a limited circle of theological friends. It would be better if they were true democrats. Our brotherhood is not exclusive.

It may be unkind, unkind to both, perhaps, but I will suggest that both are literalists. Mr. Briney gathers together the texts of the Bible and therefrom forms his doctrines. Mr. Ames gathers together the facts of evolution and psychology and therefrom forms his conclusions. Of course, Mr. Briney would not shut out science and of course Mr. Ames would not shut out the texts. They differ in emphasis. But both are mathematicians in religion. Both belong to the school of critics. Both by overworking their theories have cramped their splendid souls.

From my point of view neither have given themselves air enough. God is freer and more spontaneous than their views would permit him to be. The imagination has been sacrificed to the logical process. Wonder and awe have not had large enough place. Both have the souls of poets but they themselves are afraid of poetry. The value of mysticism in religion has been underestimated. Both being logicions have pushed out and on to understand the unknowable. So neither has been content to rest without a system; but systems will not satisfy. They do not explain. If Mr. Briney and Mr. Ames would join hands to gather all the facts of science and the texts, we would still cry for the Living God who cannot be confined.

And then—shall I whisper it? Mr. Briney might make some mistakes in his interpretations and Mr. Ames might make like mistakes in his conclusions. No! I shall not whisper it. Of course they do. They, manly men as they are, would be the first to suggest this possibility, although they are both dogmatic in their teaching. Strong men usually are.

And they are both, I repeat, liberalists, rationalists, too. By rationalists, I mean where reason is coldly to the front. With them the wind does not blow where it listeth. It blows only through hard law—determinism, perhaps. I do not know that I have proved my case; but I am assured that there can be found a surprising synthesis in the extremes of the Disciples. Men are frequently apparently far apart when they are in the roots of their philosophy together.

D. R. Dungan and P. J. Rice.

I did not know, of course, either D. R. Dungan or J. B. Briney in their young manhood. But I doubt not I would have liked them right heartily. I am at a disadvantage in comparing them with much younger men.

I will never forget the day when I first saw D. R. Dungan. He was the first man I met in the United States. I had read his "On the Rock" and "Chang Foo," so I had a high regard for him. I had never met an author before. To me he was the most wonderful personage in the world. My eyes never feasted so as in these moments of my first meeting with him. I could to this day minutely describe his dress, smile, whiskers and all. I can almost repeat verbatim our conversation. I was in a strange land, knew no one, home-sick—and there was the author of "On the Rock" being kind to me. That kindness was not lost. It has been more than remembered all these years. For long I sat in the class-room under

THE KING'S GRIEF.*

In the last study the rebellion of Absalom against his father David was the theme. The young man had prepared during four years for the event which he finally brought to pass at the sacred city of Hebron in the south of Judah; and from there he marched with his friends northward to Jerusalem, gaining adherents at every step. The king was taken totally by surprise. He had no intimation that defection had broken out in his kingdom. To be sure, during his long reign, there had been several attempts at rebellion, chiefly from partisans of the house of Saul, but nothing so serious as this had ever confronted him.

The King's Retreat.

A hasty council of David's friends was called and as the prince approached the city with his host it was deemed best that David and the court should retire eastward in the direction of the Jordan, leaving the capital to the rebels. This was probably both wise and merciful. It enabled David to prolong the hour of crisis and to prepare himself for the contest that was inevitable. At the same time it did not jeopardize the lives of the people of Jerusalem who were innocent spectators of the change. No doubt a valiant defense could have been made, but it would have been costly in property and life, and David chose the simpler way.

The Ark Sent Back.

The procession that wended its way out of Jerusalem across the Kedron and up the slopes of Olivet must have been a sad one. The king had never met such humiliation before; least of all had he expected it at the hands of one of his own family. His friends crowded around him with comfort, and his old warriors of the Six Hundred were ready for any hazard that might keep the king in power. But he resolutely set his face toward the Wildernes and bore patiently the tauntings of those partisans of the family of Saul who now had the audacity to mock him on his lonely retreat. When the priests brought out the ark of God to bear with him to his place of refuge, David nobly refused to take it from the sanctuary. There are no nobler words in the Old Testament than those in which he declined whatever advantage its possession might bring him, saying, "If the Lord be pleased with me, he will restore me to his tabernacle; but, if not, let him do as seemeth good unto him."

The Two Counselors.

Of the two counselors of David who held the most honor, Ahithophel of Giloh had deserted to Absalom, but Hushai remained faithful. By the advice of David he presented himself before Absalom as one who sought his favor by deserting the king. Absalom was thus induced to submit his plan of action to both men, Ahithophel counselling him to pursue after David immediately upon his seizure of the city. The king would then have no chance to defend himself and his overthrow would be easy. Absalom was impressed with this advice and if he had taken it, he would no doubt have been successful in his attempt. But he was anxious to get Hushai's view as well, and that shrewd friend of David advised him to remain in Jerusalem, which he had now occupied, and summon a large army by whose help the forces of David could be more effectually overcome. To this counsel Absalom gave his assent and thereby ruined his cause. Ahithophel in rage and jealousy retired to his home and put an end to his life; and Hushai sent word to David, by trusted messengers, that for the present at least he was safe.

Joab's Policy.

The king crossed the Jordan on that sad night and retired to the town of Mahanaim where he was met by loyal friends who provided for the needs of himself and his little army. Within a short time, as soon as recruits could be gathered from the region about, the king prepared to meet the advancing Absalom. David would have gone forth to battle in person but his officers restrained him, saying that his life was worth more than those of thousands of his people. When he sent forth his army under Joab and his brothers, he cautioned them strictly against any harm to Absalom. But the wily Joab knew better than the king that Absalom would be only a firebrand as long as he lived. He had himself done all that a loyal friend could do for the ambitious prince. It was now his turn to become the king's true friend and the chastiser of the prince.

Death of Absalom.

The issue of the battle was for a long time undetermined, but at last the trained troops of David prevailed over the less seasoned forces of Absalom and the battle became a route. The prince himself fled away on his beast and was caught by the head in the thick overhanging branches of a tree in the forest. There Joab found him soon after and taking no chances of further trouble he thrust him through with darts and had his body buried near by.

The Messengers.

Such is the preparation for this brief scene in the city gate where David waited for the runner to bring him word regarding the issue of the battle. Joab had hesitated to allow Ahimaaz, the son of the priest, to bear the tidings, for it was customary in that age to give the message to a man whose character was in some sense the interpretation of the message he bore. He knew that if David saw Ahimaaz coming with tidings, he would believe that the outcome had been good. Such indeed was Joab's thought as to the results, but he knew that the king would lose the sense of triumph in his grief for his son. Therefore he sent another messenger, a Cushite slave, who followed swiftly after the son of the priest. The latter could give the king no definite message concerning Absalom, probably because he did not wish to look upon David's grief. But the Cushite was less reserved and his words told David all the dreaded truth. Absalom was dead and, forgetful of his crown and his loyal servants who had hazarded their lives unto death for his sake, David went up to the little room over the gate-way of Mahanaim and poured out his grief in the touching words which have become the symbol of paternal affection and agony through all the years. One reads them with a sense of the overwhelming sorrow which had fallen upon David's heart, a sorrow perhaps the keener because he recognized his own sin as in a measure responsible for the tragedy.

The Chamber over the Gate.

Longfellow's poem, "The Chamber over the Gate," makes vivid the scene of the king's grief. It is the lesson of a youth's wild will, uncurbed and unrestrained, which bears fruit in his own ruin and his father's bitter grief. Yet the father never forgets that he would himself give joyfully his life for the boy he has lost.

"And forever the cry will be, would God I had died for thee. Oh, Absalom, my son!"

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. MacLachlan

Lesson I. Religious Education.

I. DEFINITION. Religious education is that department or aspect of general education that has to do with the culture of the spiritual life according to the ideals of the Christian religion. It is the human or pedagogical side of the work of the Holy Spirit in the sanctification of the individual. More simply still it may be defined as training for well-rounded discipleship.

II. ITS IMPORTANCE. If general education is the "making of a man," religious education may be called "the making of a Christ-man." St. Paul says that it was for the manifestation of this very thing that the whole creation groaned and travailed in pain from the beginning. (Romans 8:19-22). To educate souls into Christlikeness, therefore, is the noblest work in which man can engage.

III. RECIPROCAL RELATION OF EDUCATION AND RELIGION. Religion and education are inseparable ideals.

(1). EDUCATION IMPLIES RELIGION. The religious instinct is as natural to man as any other of his endowments. He is born and dies with it. Hence no true education can be merely secular. It must take account of our religious as well as our moral and social aptitudes.

(2). RELIGION IMPLIES EDUCATION. Religion is sometimes spoken of as a gift, conferred supernaturally. But that is only half the truth. It is a gift conferred through a PROCESS, and that process is the same by which we learn any other lesson or acquire any other dexterity. Religion is nothing apart from CHARACTER, and character is an educational product. Even CONVERSION presupposes instruction, and SANCTIFICATION is just another name for education in the Christian graces.

IV. SPHERES OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION. Religion has to do with the whole man. It is his entire life viewed in its relation to God. It covers, therefore, the three broad fields of his spiritual nature, intellect, feeling and will.

(1). THE INTELLECT. Some people speak disparagingly of an "intellectual religion." But the thinking and knowing powers belong to Christ just as much as the emotions and the will. KNOWLEDGE is one of the fruits of the Spirit. (1 Cor. 12:8; 2 Pet. 1:5). The Christian ideal is zeal according to knowledge. (Rom. 10:2). The Christian religion is largely the religion of a BOOK, and this book has to be mastered by the intellect before its truths can reach the heart. The Christian life is founded on a DOCTRINE, which it is the part of the intellect to apprehend. The habits of MISSIONARY GIVING and SOCIAL SERVICE depend largely on knowledge of the pertinent facts.

(2). FEELING. The religious emotions need discipline. They should be aroused where dormant and curbed where too exuberant. A large number of the religious fads of our day arise from an emotionalism that has lost touch with truth. THE AESTHETIC SENSE (musical, artistic, etc.) is closely related to the religious, and requires wise guidance, especially in youth. God is not honored by bad music and slipshod irreverent prayers. Children should be taught right standards of worship. CONSCIENCE consists largely of right feeling and is educable. A large part of CHRISTIAN ETHICS has to do with the control of selfish and cultivation of unselfish emotions. People need to be trained in the fundamental religious feelings of AWE, REVERENCE and HUMILITY.

(3). WILL. The will must be educated to respond to the higher emotional promptings; otherwise there is developed that SPURIOUS PIETY that revels in emotion for its own sake. (Mt. 7:21). CHURCH ATTENDANCE and other moral and religious duties are matters of habit. But habit depends on practice, and practice is the education of the will.

V. RELIGIOUS EDUCATION A SCIENCE. Within the last few years religious education has passed from the hap-hazard into the scientific stage, and has taken its rightful place as a department of general pedagogy. Its laws are being discovered and brought to the knowledge of religious workers everywhere. It has its university chairs, its literature, its statistics, etc. The time is happily past when mere devoutness of life was thought to be the sole qualification of a religious teacher of the young. The churches everywhere are demanding trained teachers for their Sunday-schools, and the latest pedagogical methods are being brought into the service of the religious life. The time has come when a Sunday-school of the old type is a crime against the child and the church.

LITERATURE.—Coe, "The Spiritual Life" and "The Religion of a Mature Mind"; Starbuck, "The Psychology of Religion"; Mead, "Modern Methods in Sunday-school Work"; Haslett, "Pedagogical Bible School"; Trumbull, "Yale Lectures on the Sunday-school"; Proceedings of the Religious Education Association.

QUESTIONS.—1. Define religious education. 2. What is the ground of its importance? 3. What is the reciprocal relation of religion and education? 4. What are the spheres of religious education? 5. What part does the education of the intellect play in the Christian life? 6. Specify some ways in which the religious feelings need guidance and discipline. 7. What part does the education of the will play in the Christian life? 8. What change for the better has come to religious education of recent years? 9. What is meant by calling it a science? 10. What other qualification besides piety is necessary for the modern Sunday-school teacher?

THE PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

The Ideal Statesman. Topic, November 4. Exod. 18:21.

Shall we mix religion and politics? No, if our intention is to advance ourselves in the church by means of methods known only to unscrupulous politicians. Yes, if we mean that the principles of the Bible are applicable to the whole of human conduct. There is no more pernicious error than that of thinking that a man can be a Christian in spots. He is either a Christian in all his relations with his fellow men or he is not a Christian at all. It is right therefore to talk about the state and its needs in the prayer meeting.

"Able Men."

Moses was instructed to provide out of all the people able men to be rulers. We have no right to put a man into office because he is needy or has a record of good service in the army or is popular among all classes. The first consideration is, Has he ability sufficient for the place he seeks? Much as we pity the poor man or honor the old soldier, we are not measuring up to the standard of good citizenship when we put either into an office for which he is unfit. It is reported of Washington that he said to a friend who asked for an office: "As your friend I should like to help you, but as President of the United States I cannot appoint you to this office, for you are not qualified for it." The voter ought to be just as conscientious in this matter as the President.

"Such as Fear God."

To refuse support to a man because he does not belong to the church with which the voter is affiliated is an exhibition of sectarianism that excites the wrath of every true American. But the religious man may be pardoned if he prefers to honor men who have some hold upon eternal realities. If every question that arises in politics is one of expediency patriotic feeling will not run very deep. When Lincoln gave expression to his faith in the judgments of the Lord, the people felt that they had additional reason for trusting their president. Cromwell, Gladstone, John Bright, Washington, and Garfield, were sustained by faith in God. We cannot believe that the great statesmen will ever be without faith.

"Men of Truth, Hating Unjust Gain."

The religious man is moral to the core of his being. The Old Testament fool who said there was no God was a man insensible to moral requirements. He did not deny that God existed; he denied that God had anything to do with conduct. He said, "Jehovah will not do good, neither will he do evil." Men who fear God hate injustice. It may be admitted that there are men in Christian churches who do injustice and yet imagine they fear God, but their God is a savage tyrant, not the God of everlasting justice and mercy. The ideal statesman is not thinking of party success, not of the applause of the multitudes, but of justice, of a "square deal." He hears the cry of the weakest. He resists the greed of the spoiler. With him justice is not merely what is conventional. Stealing under due form of law is not to be made respectable by having a mild name applied to it. He will not have much respect for vested rights that are vested wrongs. The ideal statesman knows what are the needs of the whole people. He appreciates their holiest ambitions and he aims to give free play to the best in every man. When he talks of money, banking, tariff, foreign policies, or any one of the many subjects that engage his thought he is interested in them and desires others to be interested in them for the sake of men and women and children. He will not deal with matters of no vital concern to the people.

THE DAWN AT SHANTY BAY

By Robert E. Knowles, Author "St. Cuthberts" and "The Undertone"

CHAPTER I.

Ronnie's Grievance.

Only those who understand the Scottish temperament would have known that there had been a struggle. For Ronald Robertson was wondrous tranquil as he stood aside to let Ephraim Raynor pass before him into the old-fashioned, low-roofed farmhouse that was Ronald's home. This outer tranquility was the evidence of inward storm—and portentous was the overplacid brow; for martial peace is Scottish born, and the Scot alone can be violently calm.

This ominous composure was relaxed a little as Ronald showed his companion to the little parlor, bowing him toward a large rocking-chair in the corner. The stern host seated himself squarely opposite, his eyes fixed upon the other's face, his lips moving irresolutely as if torn betwixt speech and silence. Finally he spoke:

"Ye ken, Ephraim, I'm no yin o' the kind as gangs mutterin' to himsel'. What I hae to say, I say it oot. I've often noticed, at the annual meetin' of the kirk, there's aye some as won't open their mouth at the meetin'—but they dare a fearsome yappin at the sheds when they're getting oot the sleighs, after it's a' over. I'm no that kind, Ephraim."

The visitor smiled as he looked at the intense face before him. He was about to speak when the door opened quickly to admit a woman's form, tall and slender, the face sweet and patient as it was delicate and fragile. With a hasty apology for the interruption, she was about to withdraw when her husband detained her.

"Isna that the truth, Mary?"

"What, Ronald? I don't know what you mean."

The large eyes turned tenderly upon her husband as she stood still at the threshold.

"What I've been tellin' Ephraim here," he rejoined, "that what I hae to say, I say it oot afore all the world. Isna that the truth?"

The woman's dark eyes beamed mischievously. "Oh, I don't know, Ronald—I'm not so sure that it is, after all. The most important thing you ever said to me, you shut the door, and looked out of the window, and under the sofa, and into the clothes-press, before you said it," her voice rippling into low laughter as she went on.

Mr. Raynor broke into open merriment, interrupted by Ronald's Doric:

"That's no fair—yon was a speecial occasion. Forbye, I tellt the same thing to yir faither the next day—an' what's mair, I said it again i' the kirk the next September, afore a' the world. Ah, wumman, I hae ye there."

But his wife did not tarry to prolong the argument, closing the door jauntily with a little curtsey, leaving the two men to the conversation she had interrupted. Ronald drew his chair a little nearer to his friend.

"Mind ye," he began, "it's no that I dinna love the Hoose o' God; ye ken fine there's nae man loves it mair. But I canna stand the likes o' yon that we had the last Sabbath I was there—why man, she fair duckit her heid like she was gangin' doon a cellar stair. An' they a' jined in at the Lord's Prayer like a lot o' bairns sayin' a piece—'twas clean ridickilous."

"What's that, Ronald?" the visitor interrupted. "Who—who bent her head? I didn't see no bowin' or scrapin'."

(Copyright, 1907, Fleming H. Revell Co.)

"Ye mind it fine—it was yon grand singer frae the city, wha sang the hymn—'Jerusalem the Golden,' I think they ca' it; an' when she cam till the line, 'Jesus in mercy bring us,' she bowed her heid when she spoke His name. An' that was in a Presbyterian kirk, mind ye—an', what's mair, it was in oor ain kirk; an' I says to mysel', 'Weel, if they're gaein' ower to Rome, I'll bide by mysel', an' I'll worship as my faithers worshiped; an' they can gang their ain gait.' Noo ye ken why I've quit St. Andrew's."

For nearly a minute Ephraim Raynor made no reply. Something of a quizzical look was on his face as he looked into Ronald's eye, his own filled, as indeed his whole life was filled, half with seriousness and half with humor. The face that he turned toward his friend was marked by strength, especially the strength of tenderness; and every feature conspired with every other to voice the originality and force that were conspicuous in his nature.

"I don't set up to be a terrible churchman," he began, "but you Scotch fellows can gag at more gnats and swallow more camels than any folks since Pilate. I'll bet the Pharisees had Scotch blood in them," he added, twinkling merrily toward Ronald as he spoke. "Old Jock Campbell's madder than a hatter because they let 'em set down for the long prayer. He don't reckon to quit the church—but he don't put a penny in the pan any more, just to show his colors. That's the way Jock airs his principles—you're a great bunch, Ronnie," and Ephraim made a feeble attempt to poke Ronald in the ribs as he concluded, space interfering somewhat with success.

"That's no to the pint, Ephraim," remonstrated Ronald; "I dinna object till them settin' doon for the lang prayer. I hae a reason—Kirsty Falconer tuk a faint yin Sabbath when the minister was at the sick and afflictit; he was ower lang wi' them. Kirsty was standin' alang o' me, an' she keeled ower on tap o' a braw new silk hat I paid a pretty pickle for only five year afore. It was clean spiled, so I sent it wi' the wumman's box o' claes till the Crowfoot Indians—some ungodly heathen'll be struttin' aboot wi't this meenit," and Ronald sighed as he thought of the departed.

"You're a terror for ancient history, Ronald," returned his friend. "But about this here singer woman—I was in the church that day, and I saw her bow her head like you say; but I kind o' thought it was beautiful an' fetchin'—anyhow, it's in the Bible, ain't it, about bowin' at—about bowin' then?"

Ronald looked in silence at the inquirer. "Ye wasna brocht up in Scotland, was ye, Ephraim?" he said solemnly at length.

"No," the other answered quickly. "You bet I wasn't—I was fetched up in Illinois—but what's that got to do with the Bible?

"It's got everythin' to dae wi' it," Ronald replied. "It has this to dae wi't, that yon bit o' the Scriptures is no to be ta'en leeterally—it's a figure o' speech, ye ken; when it says ye're to bow at that Name, it means ye're to bow in yir insides, like a Protestant, and no' to be duckin' yir head, like a poppy—that's the meanin' o't—ye're to bend the knee inside o' ye," and Ronald nodded triumphantly toward his friend.

"There isn't any knee inside of you," returned Ephraim doggedly.

Ronald looked at him pityingly. "There's a speeritual knee—that's the kind folks aye bend when they gie in. That's the kind Queen Mary bendit till John Knox—she didna wallup doon on the floor, nae doot, but she bendit the innard knee for a' that; an' she kent fine——"

"Oh, I'm gettin' on to you now," Ephraim interrupted eagerly; "that's the kind of a knee we made you British fellows bend at Yorktown—my father's grandfather heard it crack. I'd sooner duck my head," he concluded, a faint touch of derision in his tone.

Ronald was on his mettle in a moment. "Wha's at the ancient history noo? And what has Yorktown to dae wi' the solo i' the kirk? Forbye, we was ower busy wi' fetchin' the rest o' the world to bother lang wi' ye—what's that got to dae wi' yon singin'-buddy? Let's stick to the pint, Ephraim," cried Ronald.

"I'll tell you what it's got to do with it, Ronald Robertson—it's got something to do, just as sure as that smoke comes from that chimney yonder." Ronald smiled grimly. "I know a little about that woman," Ephraim went on, "and the poor critter has bent the knee often enough, I can tell you. She's sick. She blew in here from Rochester, and God only knows who she is—but she's sick—an' she's got the sweetest little girl in forty townships. And God help any poor Yankee that's sick among the Scotch—unless she knows the catechism and can eat oatmeal, it'll go hard with her. The poor critter tried to get some music pupils—that was why she sang that morning in the church—but she hasn't got no strength fit for any work like that."

"Ye dinna say the buddy's sick!" and there was a change now in Ronald's voice. "Whar does the buddy bide?"

"She's got that old shack at the village—that tin-covered little house where Sandy Cowan used to make the tombstones; a man wouldn't hardly put his mother-in-law in it."

Ronald looked across the fields toward the hamlet in the distance, its scanty outline plainly visible from the window beside him. "They're awfu' fools wi' money," he said in a low tone after a little pause. "Awfu' fools."

"Who's fools?" inquired Ephraim.

"Thae Presbyterian folk—twa o the elders was here to see me the ither day; they was wantin' money," and Ronald rose and moved to the mantel as he spoke, lifting a large china dog abstractedly and turning it round till its face was to the wall. "Aye, they was wantin' money," he repeated as he resumed his seat.

"What for?" his friend asked pointedly.

"Aye, that's the pint exactly," Ronald said with emphasis; "it was for a Christmas tree they're haverin' aboot; they're gaein' to get a big cedar to litter the Hoose o' God wi'. And they want siller to buy a bauble for ilka bairn i' the kirk—a fine way o' celebratin' oor Saviour's death, even if they did ken the day," Ronald concluded with fine scorn.

"I heard something about it. What did you tell them, Ronald?"

"I tellt them I was a Presbyterian," answered Ronald in a heightened voice. "I tellt them my faither was a Covenanter, an' he got till his rest wi'oot hardly hearin' tell o' Christmas, or ony o' thae new-fangled schemes for worshipin' Almichty God."

"What did they do?" asked Ephraim.

"They went awa," replied Ronald simply.

"They'll be back again," rejoined the other. "They're goin' to put a steeple on the church, an' I know they've got you slated for a couple o' hundred anyhow—it's a sad thing to be rich, Ronald."

"Steeple!" Ronald exclaimed contemptuously. "Steeple—it's mair o' their nonsense. They think mair o' the steeple nor they dae o' the people, I'm thinkin'. What way wud they want a steeple? There was nae steeple when the sermon on the mount was preachit. It's juist what I was gaein' to tell ye—they're clean daft aboot money, wantin' to litter up the Hoose o' God wi' trees and sic like; and wantin' a weathercock for the kirk—an' a' the time puir stranger buddies lyin' sick an' helpless amang us; an' the elders——"

But the Scotchman's speech was interrupted by a familiar call. "Ronald," a gentle voice was saying, "come here a minute when you're free. I need you just a minute." Ephraim declared he was just on the point of departure anyway, and Ronald bade him a warm farewell as he prepared to answer the ever-welcome summons.

CHAPTER II.

The Wound Beneath the Armor.

Very winsome was the face turned toward Ronald as he hurried in the direction of the voice that called him; but the eyes that looked so intently for his advent seemed unnaturally bright.

"What's the matter, Mary; are ye ailin'?" he cried as he bent low over her, one hand resting tenderly on the slightly disheveled hair. "Ye're no sick, are ye, Mary?" a wealth of anxiety in the pleading voice.

"You take my little ways too seriously, Ronald," and the sweet face that long ago had seemed to him the fairest type of Canadian beauty was lighted by a reassuring smile. "I was dreaming, dear: I was dreaming about—you know. It was a kind of a day-dream—but I had a kind of a wakening, too, and I felt a little faintness. I'm afraid it's what you would call 'the sair heart' father—just let me lie and rest a little."

Very gently Ronald bended over the earnest face, as his wife, reclining now, slipped her hand into her husband's.

"What did Ephraim have to say?" she asked after a little silence.

"Naethin' of ony importance—we was just haein' a crack."

"Did he say anything about Jessie?"

"Na, I dinna think he did—he was tellin' me aboot that wumman that skirled the solo i' the kirk." His wife smiled; she had heard often enough about the process thus described.

"Jessie's in New York," she said quietly after a moment's pause.

Ronald was silent, a frown of pain flitting across his face. He did not speak.

"Do you suppose she'll see him, Ronald?"

"See wha?" he answered abruptly, his voice still low.

"You know, Ronald, you know," the wife answered, a wave of sadness in her voice. There was a long silence. Then he saw the dark eyes filling up with tears; the gentle arms came slowly up, and drew his head down close beside her, her voice choking:

"Oh, Ronald, I dreamed our boy was home last night—and I held him tight—so tight; like this, Ronald—and I thought I had never seen him so strong and manly. And you were there, and we were all so happy, like—like we used to be."

The strong man, struggling mightily, restrained himself as he felt close to him the heaving bosom; the melting memory of a baby form that had once rested there, swept before him. A later vision too—of a flush-faced lad and his last embrace in his mother's arms before the tide of anger bore him forth—swam before the eyes he was striving to keep dry. He could only hold her close, while conflicting emotions stormed his breast. He spoke at last, and his question was commonplace enough, after the manner of his kind.

"What's Ephraim's girl daein' i' New York?"

"She's visiting the Smallwoods—they were here last summer."

Another long pause. Ronald was again the first to speak.

"How d'ye come to ken that—to ken that he's there?"

The mother waited a moment or two before she answered.

"Because—because he sent me a little—a little card; it was a Christmas card," she said, her voice faltering a little.

Ronald's heart was swept away, though he did not know it. "What was the address?" he asked quickly, even hoarsely, lifting himself up as he spoke. "He'll be wantin' me to write till him—but I'll no write—what was the address he gi'ed ye?"

Mary Robertson started as she saw the hunger on his face, and hope, not unmixed with pity, was surging in her heart.

"He didn't give any address, father—only the letter had the New York postmark."

Ronald's face paled. "It doesna matter," he cried as if he meant it. "It doesna matter—he ca'd me a liar to my face, an' naebody wants to ken where he's bidin'. Where's the letter, Mary? Ye didna lose it, did ye?" The differing tones contrasted strangely. "Where's the Christmas caird ye spoke aboot? Strange daein's for a Christian country; where's the caird, mither? Ye didna lose it, did ye, Mary?"

His wife pointed to a little table that stood against the wall. "You'll find it in the Book," she said. "Did I ever lose anything of Hugh's?"

Ronald's face changed, paled slightly, as he heard the now unfamiliar name; and rising quickly, he turned toward the table. "There's sic a thing as justice," he murmured, "as well as pity. God Himsel' is juist afore He's mercifu'. And the yin ye've juist mentioned never told me yet he's sorry—but surely he wudna send a letter wi'oot gi'ein' the address. Where's my glasses—why, I hae them on!"

Adjusting them carefully, he opened the Bible and took the enclosure out, holding it up before him. His hand shook as he scanned the card, and a sigh escaped him as he laid it down; taking the envelope, he examined it carefully. "What makes these specs sae dirty?" he said, half audibly, taking them off and wiping them vigorously with his red pocket-handkerchief. "It's a queer like thing there's nae address," he murmured, looking first on one side and then on the other, reluctant to quench the trembling hope.

Stern and severe the Scottish nature may have been that gleamed from his deep-set eyes; dark and stormy may have been the memory of the hour that had witnessed the wrathful parting of his only son; resolute may have been the inner purpose to vindicate what Ronald Robertson called the right; but eager, and wistful, and even tender, were the eyes that searched the simple missive for the tidings it did not bear.

Silently he stored the card and envelope to their resting place, then turned slowly back and resumed his seat beside his wife.

"I'm sorry you're disappointed," she began gently, "but I knew it wasn't there."

"I'm no' disappinted," he broke in. "I only wantit to see. Hae ye no' heard me say he's naethin' to me ony mair? It wasna what he did, mind ye—I didna mind a' it cost me—but it was what he said."

"Oh, Ronald, don't," pleaded his wife. "He was so young—and he didn't realize what it meant. And he's all we have," she added chokingly. "I wrote to him," she said after a moment. "I thought perhaps——"

"What address did ye send it to? Did ye get it some ither way?" he pressed, interrupting, rising to his feet as he spoke.

"No, dear," and the woman's voice had a pitiful note of hopefulness in it. "I didn't know—but I just addressed it to New York; I'm hoping perhaps he'll call at the post-office and get it there. Perhaps Jessie'll see him—do you think Jessie might see him, father?"

Ronald was still. "I dinna ken," he answered presently. "New York's an awfu' place for throng; ye say Ephraim's Jessie's visitin' doon there—what's atween him and her?"

Mary Robertson's face looked decidedly young as she smiled into her husband's eyes. "The same thing as used to be between you and me, Ronald, the same old thing," stroking the locks through which the gray was showing.

"It's atween us yet, lass," said the man. "They're no gaein' to be married, are they?"

"No, of course not—how could they? I don't know that he has ever spoken love to her at all; but he loves her, I know that. Oh, Ronald," and sudden passion filled the pleading voice, "won't you try to find him and bring him back to us again? I've been thinking—I've been thinking, dear, how lovely it would be now—now at this Christmas time, if we could undo all the past. It's the time—the time, it seems to me, when it ought to be easiest to forgive. Surely that's the chief message of our Savior's birth, peace and good will!"

She stopped, her eyes carrying on the entreaty of her voice. But disappointment filled them as they rested on her husband's face, unrelenting as it was.

"Dinna ask me mair," he answered, grim firmness in his voice. "Ye ken it canna be—sin maun hae its juist reward, as the Scriptures teach. An', forbye, none o' thae Christmas haverins for me—it's no' i' the Bible, an' I dinna gang wi' thae popish ways. An', what's mair, we dinna ken where he bides," he concluded, the tone more tender.

The wife and mother sighed heavily at the words. "No, Ronald, we don't—I would to God we did. But if we can't find our own poor boy, let us try to help somebody else—there are so many who need it so. It seems to me it's an awful thing to have lots of money—and no children to help with it. And God has blessed you so, Ronald, and has given you so much; and at this Christmas season we could cheer so many whose hearts are heavy, if we only tried. Perhaps somebody else where our Hugh——"

But Ronald interrupted. "I'm no' dootin' the truth o' what ye say. There's mony a guid turn we could dae wi' what the Almichty's gi'en us. But no' at Christmas time mair nor ony ither time—yon's a man-made season a'thegither—it's no' i' the Bible, and I'm a Presbyterian frae Kilmarnock."

Wherewith Mary Robertson was fain to be content, the secret between her heart and the Lord of the Christmastide being so sweet and clear.

The leaflets, bulletins and circulars published by the Forward Movement for Missionary education and Stewardship are most suggestive. It would be well for Bible and mission classes and the various organizations of the church to supply themselves with an adequate amount of this literature from headquarters, Ford Building, Boston, if they desire a new era of interest and efficient service.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates.

BAPTISTS IN MINNESOTA.

P. J. Rice.

The Baptists have just held a very interesting state convention in Minneapolis. The sessions were largely attended and enthusiastic. The representatives of their national missionary societies were given conspicious places on the program. Several things impressed the writer. One of the prominent notes of the convention had reference to the unification of their missionary budget. Instead of each society apportioning the churches for its particular work, all of the societies have presented their claims and thus have formed a missionary budget to be apportioned among the churches. It is expected that in many churches the total amount asked for will be nearly double what the churches have heretofore given. Many of the pastors expressed themselves as feeling that, coming to their churches with a single and specific amount to be raised, they will find a ready response and the larger sum will be more easily secured than according to the former method of meeting several different apportionments.

Great emphasis is being laid upon the value of the duplex envelope system for raising church funds. The secretary of the forward movement, Dr. J. M. Moore, said some very pungent things regarding the annual offering plan of raising missionary funds. He asked the pastors if they would be willing to depend upon an annual collection for their salaries. He said, "The plan not only fails to get the money; it is unscriptural." The duplex envelope system into which one puts each week his or her offering for church expenses and his offering for world-wide missions provides a steady stream of money flowing into the missionary treasury the year round. They are urging that Sunday-schools also adopt the duplex envelope system, and whenever possible that a single treasury be provided for both church and Sunday-school, thus linking the two and making it possible for everybody to help in all the departments of church work.

Baptists and Free Baptists.

Two sessions of this busy convention were given up almost wholly to the consideration of various phases of the problem of union. The plan proposed for the union of the Baptists and Free Baptists was presented and unanimously adopted, as it has been in nearly all the states. The basis of this union, now practically certain of being carried into execution, is as significant as the fact itself. It is not in any sense an attempt to settle old doctrinal differences. The statement is, "we will leave these questions of doctrine where the New Testament leaves them." It is a union of the missionary organizations of the two bodies, a union, in other words, in service, a union for the conquest of the world in the name of Jesus Christ.

Baptists and Disciples.

The question of the relation of the Baptists and the Disciples of Christ was also considered. Some months ago a tentative program for the closer co-operation of these two bodies was submitted to a conference of representatives of each informally called together. Later this program was acted upon favorably by the state boards of both the Baptists and the Disciples and still later it was adopted by the Disciples in their annual convention in June last. The same program was presented to the Baptist State Convention last week, and unanimously adopted. It is as follows:

"Recognizing the growing sense of unity quite generally manifest between Baptists and Disciples of Christ, and believing that this sentiment, so in harmony with the spirit and purpose of our Lord, and so essential to the complete evangelism of the world, should be fostered and encouraged in every possible way, therefore, we, representatives of the two bodies named, in the state of Minnesota, do hereby propose the following resolutions, as indicating a program of possible co-operation and affiliation:

"1: That in the future we avoid the duplication of churches in towns and villages where there is not a manifest need for two churches, and that in locating churches in the larger cities we each have regard for the territory previously occupied by the other body.

"2: That in places where both sides are now represented by organized churches and where it is evident that one could do the work better than two, we encourage their union upon some basis to be mutually agreed upon by the local congregations, in conference with chosen representatives of each state body, and that we pledge our hearty support to all such undertakings.

"3: That in places where one body has a church and the other has none, each encourage unaffiliated members to unite with the local church with the full understanding that they have the right to hold individual judgments regarding matters of opinion and practice where in the two bodies may seem to differ.

"4: That we encourage also every movement looking toward the closer mutual acquaintance of the two bodies by holding union services wherever and whenever expedient, by frequent changes of pulpits, by fraternal greetings extended through chosen representatives of each body in the general state gatherings of the other body, by open and platform discussion of the questions involved in the union of the two, and by all other means calculated to promote the cause for which our Lord so earnestly prayed."

It remains to be seen how this program will work out in the several places in the state where there seems to be an opportunity to try various phases of it. It is of course only advisory and in the last analysis depends almost entirely upon local parties. But it at least provides a public pronouncement regarding the desirability of co-operation, and the lines along which it may be readily secured. This ought to make it easier to effect affiliation in local communities when the opportunity is at all apparent. This "Minnesota Plan," though very simple and very tentative, may be worthy of consideration in other places and so it is given out.

The writer was also impressed with the plans for a Denominational Brotherhood which have been evolved. It is anticipated that a much greater activity on the part of the men may be secured by this means, but the reports which come from the various brotherhoods represented only partially justified the anticipation. It seems a difficult thing to put yokes on men and make them wear them. But there is a great work to be done by the men of all our churches and doubtless sooner or later some one will hit upon a plan of organization that will prove both practical and efficient.

The Baptists are a great people with a great vision and a gre t message. Their denominational pride is about equal to the pride of the Disciples of Christ in "Our Plea." They are making mighty strides in every field and are alert to the opportunities that are everywhere manifest for the advancement of the kingdom of God. Disciples may with propriety seek their fellowship and may confidently anticipate union with them in the not distant future, upon a basis of co-operation in service if not in doctrinal formulas.

OUR TRAINING COURSE

We begin this week a series of chapters on teachers training by H. D. C. MacLachlan of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va. These chapters are supplemental to those recently prepared by Professor Willett and printed serially in the Christian Century. Dr. Willett treated of the Biblical literature. Mr. MacLachlan will treat of the pedagogy of the Sunday school. No man is better fitted for this delicate task than he. Trained in the University of Glasgow and Kentucky University he keeps himself in touch with the literature of his field even though involved in the busy details of one of our most important pastorates. Mr. MacLachlan not only knows the field of psychology and pedagogy but is a writer of rare charm.

It is the purpose of the New Christian Century Co., to issue in book form the work of Willett and MacLachlan on Teacher Training. The book will be an authority in its field. There is a real need for it and a conscious need, too. Much shoddy Teacher Training literature is being put on the market mainly for commercial purposes. It is wholly inadequate for this holiest work of the church.

Our readers will be profited by a careful reading of Mr. MacLachlan's chapters as they appear each week in our pages. We are sure that the author will welcome suggestions or criticisms from any one before the chapters are bound into a volume.

A MATTER OF BUSINESS

We are not going to talk business on this page this week. We shall sit down together, not in an office, but at our fireside and talk a bit about ourselves and our family affairs. Some messages have come to us in recent mails that have done us so much good we want to share them with our readers.

But first, we want to express our regret that in launching a new paper (for while we wear an old name we do not want it to be forgotten that we are a new paper) we are compelled to adopt a seeming attitude of protest. Protests are all right, but it is unfortunate that we have to start off with one. We would much prefer to fill our columns with devotional and instructional writing than with protests. Our disposition is peaceable. We recoil from strife and the confusion of many tongues and the temper of controversy. We feel that Christ's way is a way of peace. And that is the path we have chosen for ourselves. Hence it grieves us to appear belligerent to brethren who have not read after us sufficiently to know what our normal temper is.

Our Plea Imperilled.

But we justify our indignation. Our thoughts have been waiting at the gate of our heart too long, hoping that those who are propagating havoc in the affairs of our sacred brotherhood would see their error and repent. The evils of journalistic domination in our temple have become noisome as the trafficking in the sacred fane at Jerusalem. The time has come for patience to burn with indignation. Our brotherhood is long suffering and burly and good-natured. But the heart of us cannot be indifferent a propaganda to subvert our plea and cast our ship on the rocks of sectarianism.

And so we cannot help speaking. We wonder how others who have the ear of the brotherhood can keep from speaking. They know what we know and know it better. How then can they keep silence? How can a religious newspaper, for example, satisfy itself with dreaming pious reminiscences when the ship is being scuttled or the crew stimulated into mutiny? Our reference last week to a newspaper's attempt to make capital in a subterranean way out of another newspaper's unjust attack upon a brother has brought us already a chorus of approving voices.

The New "Protest."

Moreover this chorus is being heard in other newspaper offices besides our own. The Christian Standard published a few notes of it last week in a spirit of bravado. But the brethren know that the letter by S. S. Jones of Danville, Illinois, and Peter Ainslee of Baltimore expressing the brotherhood's disgust are only samples of a bulky correspondence of like nature that office is receiving. In his report of the New Orleans convention the editor says timidly—more to his employer than to the readers of the paper—that "the brethren from rank and file, as well as from pulpit, are asking that henceforth we strive, as best we mortals may, to preserve the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace." Therefrom we catch a ray of hope. We could have wished to see the editor's employer with him at the New Orleans convention. The voice of the brethren might have made an impression on him too as it did on his editor.

Higher Criticism Applied.

Clearly it does not take much of a higher critic to make out the composite authorship of the editorial page of the Christian Standard last week. Mr. Lappin's editorial pleading for peace is followed by a bumptious article contending that there can be no peace now. The brethren of Illinois who know Mr. Lappin and love him are watching him with hearty interest. They wonder whether he or his employer will dictate the policy and spirit of that paper henceforth. No one who knows Mr. Lappin doubts what his preferences are. But will his preferences prevail?

To the Letters.

But tut! tut! We started out to talk about ourselves and to read some letters and here we are talking about the neighbors! Let us to the letters. We have not asked permission to print the names of the senders so we will read the contents simply, and take it as true that every letter is from a man whose name is known throughout our brotherhood. We cannot take space enough for all of them so we will just give some good samples.

OHIO.

"We received yesterday, "The Christian Century", dated October 24th. We want to join our voice in congratulations over "The New Christian Century." We like it, and think you are striking out on the lines that will make your paper in demand among the people of the Christian church.

The writer personally believes that it will be in accordance with justice for you to write up freely your criticism of the Christian Standard and the Standard Publishing Co. I think it is perfectly legitimate and within the bounds of Christian duty to expose pharisaism and intolerance."

"This week's Christian Century is fine, as was last week's. If you keep up at this rate, you are sure to have a great paper. Chicago is the best place in our brotherhood for a paper. Keep it vigorous. Make it constructive. Lead the church in better methods; inspire the preachers and church officers to dare and do for Christ and His cause; keep it cheerful and hopeful. Do not allow it to get too serious.

See that you have a vigorous business management. I wish you every possible degree of success.

Enclosed please find my check for two years' subscription."

"Dear Mr. Willett:

The rumor has reached my ear that you are about to withdraw from the Centennial Program. Now if there is any truth in this rumor I most sincerely protest against it. As I see this controversy our very liberties are involved in it. This is not a question of either an endorsement or rejection of your views, but of the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free."

"Your latest sounds good to me. Our greatest need is a paper that has the spirit, courage and brains of Christianity.

I will hustle some for it as I have opportunity. I inclose a bit of news."

ILLINOIS.

"I want to send you a line of hearty congratulation on this week's Century. Your convention write-up was the best by far that our press has given us this year. I note also very many improvements that cannot but make for a larger circulation and a stronger constituency.

Brother Oesehger's articles are especially helpful and certainly timely. With every good wish, I am, most fraternally yours."

"Congratulations on the New Century. I wish it every good thing. Oeschger's articles are particularly helpful and certainly timely. I am sorely disappointed in Brother Lappin. I can scarcely believe my own eyes when I read his nowadays writings. I have about come to the conclusion, after more than two year's vexation and annoyance that I can get along better without the Cincinnati organ than with it. This present persecution is positively the limit. Your Christian spirit and largeness of mind never meant more to the many who believe in you than just now.

With every good wish and renewed tokens of esteem, I am, yours most fraternally."

MISSOURI.

"I am enclosing herewith one dollar ($1.00) in payment of one year's subscription for myself to The Christian Century. If the last five numbers are any index of what is to follow, we are sure to have a great paper in the Century. I heartily congratulate you on the new policy of the paper. Speak out, in plain English, the very best you know, and you will find a hearty response from many of us who are heartily sick of a type of so called religious journalism that has been in vogue among us. May the Lord bless and guide you. Fraternally yours."

"A good hand shake over the last number of the Century. It has appeared like a corpse for quite a while. I am glad to see you take off your gloves and handle the Standard as it deserves. You must make the world see that you are in it and a live factor. Grapple in a masterly way with the issues of the day and of the Disciples, come back with strong blows at the Standard and at McGarvey and Co. Even your enemies will have more respect for you. Find the joints in their armour and send in a lance, I have confidence that you and those associated with you have the ability to make the Century go. Don't say things so gracefully and elegantly that your strength will be sacrificed to beauty—put points as well as feathers on your arrows. Gather the best news from the field and give it out in good form every week. The Lord bless you."

"Dear Brother Willett: This is just a few lines to cheer you on while under fire. You will stand firm, I feel sure, because you are in the right

I wish I had a million dollars to back the Century. Yours sincerely."

MINNESOTA.

Dear Bro. Morrison:

"I feel that I should like to say directly to you that nothing in the recent happenings of the Disciples has brought such a sense of hopefulness and victory to me as the note you have struck. You have in your very first issue so changed the situation as to place the Standard on the defensive and this in itself is a good victory. I have never been so confident of the ultimate triumph of the basic principles of our movement as I am now.

"Keep your eye steadily fixed on the old watchword 'In faith, unity,' etc., and you will not only make yourself immortal but will contribute mightily to the progress of our great cause. In your first utterances you have gained a tremendous advanage, and for this reason the battle you will have to wage will be shorter and more easily won, but I have no doubt but the battle will be on right royally, and you will need both wisdom and grace. I believe you possess both and I am therefore confident."

KANSAS.

"I have read with an unusual relish the two last issues of the Christian Century. I say this not to align myself with a particular school, but to rejoice in a free press and an unfettered pen. Let all people speak and let them speak in the open, for truth cannot perish. Fill the hopper full and grind away. I am thankful that I can believe in men who may differ from me. I pray for the inflowing spirit of sympathy and tolerance in which alone our problems are to be solved. I am glad that every advance in the fight of faith is an approach toward reality and that the stalwart sons of science and the dauntless soldiers of faith are coming to see that their battle is one, and that in a day not far off that powerful trinity, science, philosophy and religion will march under one banner, the banner of the cross. When that day comes the miracle problem will be solved.

"When practice catches up with theory, when creed and deed are united, we shall wonder why we did not learn sooner that the only defense of truth and the only possible use of truth is in life, its faith, fear, struggle and victory. Not consistency, not correctness, nor yet orthodoxy, but sincerity is the word to command our respect to the end of the race."

INDIANA.

"Please accept my warmest congratulations to you and to your associates in the New Christian Century Co. I have derived more real satisfaction from my reading of the last two numbers of the Christian Century than I have for many months. There is an urgent need for a strong, high standard religious newspaper among the Disciples of Christ—one that will appeal to our larger selves. I believe the Christian Century is blazing the way. If I can be of any service to you at any time, do not hesitate to command me. May God bless you and yours as well as the work you are doing in His name.

"Fraternally yours."

NEW YORK.

"I have read the last two numbers of the Christian Century with deep satisfaction—a satisfaction that had to voice itself in thanksgiving and praise. You are bound to succeed for you have become the voice of a host among us that must increase just as surely as truth must increase. The voice of the Century is that of an Emancipation Proclamation and I know that every one of us who stand for progress will walk straighter and take new courage for it. I believe that this new stand has come in the fullness of the time.

"I am frank to say that the Century in the past hasn't quite satisfied the mass of the people in our church here and new subscriptions may be a little difficult to secure at first. But I am with you and will do all I can. The reaping time is not far away."

"I truly appreciate the Christian Century. Have tried to get people to take it every year. It is a good paper. I have taken it since 1895, and will do all I can to get subscribers for it. I am trying to get people interested in the Disciple church. That would help the paper. I am not young at 77 to get clubs for a paper, but will make an effort."

PENNSYLVANIA.

"We notice that we are in arrears from July 1908. We enclose herewith our dollar and compliment you on your improvement. Keep it up and success to you, you are clean and instructive. Why don't you have Bro. Willett put out a teachers training class book? It would be a peer."

"I understand that the Christian Century has come out squarely as a representative of the present day thought in our brotherhood. Believing that this furnishes a very good opportunity for all of us who believe these things in our hearts to express ourselves in sympathy with them, I enclose a check for $1.00 for a year's subscription. With best wishes for your success, I am,

"Yours cordially."

COVENANT.

Memorial Church of Christ, Baptist and Disciple, Oakwood Boulevard, near Cottage Grove Avenue.

As we trust we have been brought by divine grace to receive the Lord Jesus Christ, and to give up ourselves to Him, so we do now, relying upon His gracious aid, solemnly covenant with each other and promise:

That we will walk together in brotherly love as becomes members of a Christian church; that we will exercise an affectionate care and watchfulness over each other, and faithfully admonish and entreat one another as occasion may require.

That we will not forsake the assembling of ourselves together, nor neglect to pray for ourselves and others.

That we will endeavor to bring up such as may at any time be under our care, in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and by a pure and holy example, to win our kindred and acquaintances to the Savior, to holiness, and to eternal life.

That we will rejoice in each other's happiness, and endeavor with tenderness and sympathy to bear each other's burdens and sorrows.

That we will not bring forward to the church a complaint against any member for any personal trespass against us, until we have taken the first and second steps pointed out by Christ in the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, and that all private offences which can be privately settled, we will never make public.

That we will live circumspectly in the world, denying "ungodliness and worldly lusts," setting a worthy example, and remembering that as we have been voluntarily buried by baptism, and have been raised up from the emblematic grave, so there is on us a special obligation henceforth to lead a new and holy life.

That we will strive together for the support of a faithful evangelical ministry among us; that according to our abilities and opportunities we will, as faithful servants of the Lord, do good to all men, especially in helping to extend the gospel in its purity and power to the whole human family, and that we will regularly support the work of the church by systematic contributions of money.

And that through life, amidst evil report and good report, we will humbly and earnestly seek to live to the glory of Him who hath called us out of darkness into His marvelous light.

Correspondence on the Religious Life.

D. R. Dungan. He is a teacher of ability. I think I know him and love him. But I also know P. J. Rice. We have worked and laughed together, played and prayed with one another. We have exchanged meetings. I know him at his daily tasks and by the fireside of his home. Now I might point out many resemblances between these two men; but I must content myself with one great essential likeness. They came to their religious positions in a similar way; and for the identical purpose. The purpose of both souls is to show forth the truth of Christianity. Both are defenders of the faith. Both wish to establish the hearts of men in Christian truth. In this their aim and efforts are identical. One has given long years to the support of Christianity; the other is spending the strong years of his middle manhood for the same.

There is difference in the accentuation of the parts of truth; but this is because the method of approval was the same. D. R. Dungan was a valiant debater in his early days. He formed his intellectual views under the assault of the enemy. His arguments were shaped to meet the attack. He was not opposing straw men, but actual present men. His defense was built for the guns of the disbelievers of those early days in Nebraska and Iowa. All honor to him. Let our pioneers have no doubts as to whether the younger men show them due respect. Our respect is that of deep emotion and high appreciation. But P. J. Rice is doing just what D. R. Dungan did. He is trying to defend Christianity against the attacks of the men of his time, and to establish the truthfulness of Christianity in the hearts of men. The attack is not quite the same today as it was fifty or twenty-five years ago; so Mr. Rice is not meeting it just as D. R. Dungan did. Neither is he dealing with straw men. He retreats at times where Mr. Dungan moved forward. But this is not because he has surrendered to the enemy; but simply that he may get an advantage over him. In the most active days of D. R. Dungan oral debates were common—but in the days of P. J. Rice there are no verbal debates. The fight has shifted to the printed page. There has been a corresponding change in the outposts to be defended. Rice is simply trying to defend the Christianity of his time and place as Mr. Dungan did so well in his.

As a mutual friend I write this in the hope that it may have at least a slight influence to create a little better understanding.

So to the Correspondents I answer: Analyze the chasm.

I commend "The Man who was called 'Thursday.'"

Let our sentence be that of Paul: "The greatest of these is love."

CHICAGO

The First Baptist Church was the first church in the city of Chicago to erect a place of worship. The newness of Chicago is vividly brought to our attention by the announcement that this church is this week celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of its life. The present church building is located at the corner of Thirty-first street and South Park avenue. The pastor is Austen K. de Blois. Graham Taylor, Prof. C. R. Henderson and Jenkin Lloyd Jones are among the speakers at the celebration. It is significant that all of these gentlemen are specialists in the field of sociology.

Founder's day was celebrated this week at the "Moody" church on Chicago avenue where Rev. A. C. Dixon is pastor. This church maintains itself in a field where most of the denominations have been driven out. The church is institutional and maintains a training school for training religious workers. It is to be regretted that while Mr. Moody became more liberal at the close of his life, this great church conducted in his name should have become the center of a millenarian propaganda and other outgrown religious ideas. In spite, however, of the doctrinal holdings of the organization, it is doing a great work for its community.

The campaign for the election of Mr. Street, the Prohibition nominee for state's attorney in Cook county, proceeds with a vigor that is amazing all. Meetings are being held every day at the noon hour in the Y. M. C. A. this week and the men from the stores and offices gather together to report progress. Meetings are being held in churches and halls all over the county and many conservative politicians are freely predicting the election of Mr. Street. In case he is not elected, at least a sufficient vote of "protest" will be rolled up to show that the saloon is not the only force in the practical politics of Chicago that is worth reckoning with. Both Mr. Wayman and Mr. Kern are endorsed by the United Societies representing the liquor interests. Mr. Kern has a bad record from a previous term of office and Mr. Wayman was nominated by methods that should be opposed by every friend of good government.

The Laymen's Evangelistic Movement of Chicago is planning another great effort next spring. This time J. Wilbur Chapman will lead the forces. He will doubtless command a more general support than Mr. Torrey was able to do last spring as his type of evangelism is more generally acceptable among the churches.

Only two Disciple churches in Chicago are now without pastors. the church at Irving Park and the mission on Armitage and Humboldt. It is hoped that these will soon be supplied. The ministry of our churches is largely recruited from men that have pursued post graduate work in the great universities and who have succeeded elsewhere in pastorates. There was never a time in the life of Chicago when we had a more capable or a more harmonious ministry. The petty questions that seem such mountains to some outside pale into insignificance in the presence of the terribly urgent social problems that the Chicago ministers face.

The South Chicago church received two new members by letter last Sunday. All departments of the church are in a flourishing condition.

The Sheffield avenue church, of which Will F. Shaw is pastor, received two additions by letter last Sunday.

DO YOU LIVE IN CHICAGO?

The response to our call for two thousand subscribers in Chicago sent out last week is most encouraging. We have received assurances from ministers and leading laymen of many churches that it is their purpose to introduce the Christian Century into every home in their churches. Already the machinery has been started going and the subscriptions are coming in.

No larger opportunity has ever been presented to Chicago than the Christian Century now offers.

The wide circulation of this paper will bind our entire Chicago membership closely together and render cooperation among us more easy.

Besides, the firm establishment of the Century will make it possible to reach the whole brotherhood with the matchless opportunity Chicago now offers for mission work on a gigantic scale. Chicago should belong to Christ and the Disciples of Christ.

Our city has been basely misrepresented to the brotherhood. The ideals and spirit and teaching of our ministers and churches have been reported to the brotherhood in such fashion as to amount to perversion of the facts.

Too long has our sacred work here waited for a defense.

When some timid reader tells us to keep silent or to "be gentle and not speak too plainly," our heart feels that the very cobble stones of the streets of our city will cry out if we do not.

We are saying to the brethren who would dissuade us from speaking the plain truth that we cannot help speaking it. Our heart has ached with the unuttered words too long.

No city in our land has a more consecrated ministry than Chicago. No city has a more self-sacrificing body of Disciples of Christ.

No city exhibits more harmony in plans and ideals for Christian work than ours. Our ministerial fellowship is the holiest and most inspiring relationship we know.

George H. Combs says that Kansas City with her big churches and her wealth does not show a popular interest in their city mission work as hearty as Chicago shows.

We want to make the Christian Century a means of increasing and intensifying the worths of our Chicago work. More than that, we wish to make it the reflector to the brotherhood of the problems and activities of the Disciples in our city.

Every Disciple will wish to aid in this. The best way to aid is to become a reader of the Century yourself and get others to take the paper.

W. D. Endres at Harvey had the experience of taking the confession of faith of a Roman Catholic who is accepting the evangelical ideals of Christianity. All departments of the work are being organized for an aggressive campaign this year.

A meeting in the interest of the candidacy of Mr. Street for state's attorney was held in the Irving Park church on Monday night and attended by members of all the different denominations in the suburb.

E. J. Arnot of the University of Chicago preached at Batavia, Illinois, last Sunday. Mr. Arnot is pursuing studies in the University.

Luke Stewart, also of the University of Chicago, preached at the mission formed by the union of Logan Square and Humboldt Park last Sunday.

C. G. Kindred of Englewood is now in a hospital in Englewood. He has been ill for some time, but insisted on attending the meetings of the church. He is now effectually isolated from the world by strict physician's orders and it is hoped that rest and proper treatment will enable him to escape the necessity of a serious surgical operation. He is greatly missed at the ministers' meetings and that there is a big vacancy left during his absence at the Englewood church goes without saying. The best wishes of all his brethren go out for his recovery.

The ministers' meeting last Monday was an unusually helpful one. Parker Stockdale read his paper that had been prepared for the national convention at New Orleans, and much time was given for discussion. Seldom is a paper ever read before the Chicago ministers that elicits such general approval as did this paper. It sounded orthodox both to the orthodox, and to the others if there are such in Chicago. The title of the paper was "The Ministry of Life." We are happy to reproduce it in our columns this week.

The only "destructive" criticism that is hurting Chicago churches is that criticism which has prevented good people on the outside from helping at the biggest task that was ever assigned to man. While certain journals haggle over criticism and evolution, anarchists are being educated here to throw bombs at officials, prostitutes are ruining our homes, criminals are rendering property holding precarious, and grafting politicians are spending the money that should go into the public schools. Men with higher criticism and men without it are leading Chicago citizens into godly lives. Any "destructive" criticism that raises a false issue in the face of these pressing social problems is an enemy of progress and is near to being the Anti-Christ.

The next meeting of the Ministers' Association will be held in the Grand Pacific Hotel. A change of the hour of the meeting will be experimented with. The meeting will be held at two o'clock in the afternoon. It is believed that this will enable a larger number to be present. It has been suggested, also, that preachers get into a more orthodox disposition by the afternoon of "blue" Monday.

The meetings of the Ministers' Association have been better attended than usual this year. The past two weeks, seventeen Chicago pastors have been at each meeting. There are always visiting ministers and sometimes visiting laymen present.

WITH THE WORKERS

The church at Homer ,Ill., will continue J. Scott Hyde as pastor another year. This is his first year in the ministry and the church has doubled in membership and in every department. It has now one hundred active members.

Mr. Hyde has also just reorganized the church at Fithian, with thirty members, and will preach for them Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Mr. Hyde will Living Link this church with $200 on its expenses the coming year.

At Weston, Mo., under the enterprising leadership of J E. Wolfe, a Home Department of fifty has been worked up during early autumn. This has resulted from a visit made by J. H. Bryan to that school during the summer. All of the members of the Weston church save 46 are now in the Bible school, and these will have to come in or else hide out for the winter. The enrollment now exceeds 200.

E. E. Cooperthwaite closes his work in Wilkes Barre, Pa., November 1st, as missionary pastor under the auspices of the A. C. M. S. For five years he has worked in this most difficult field, preaching in a public building down town. He leaves a flock of loyal saints who will, with the incoming minister, take up the work of building a church.

Mrs. M. W. Mason, a lady evangelist from Australia, has held a meeting in a town where we had no church, Waynoka, Oklahoma. A church has been organized with 33 members, 16 of these coming by primary obedience.

Pastor G. S. West of Newberry, Pennsylvania, has visited a town called Orvis in that state and organized a new church. There are 40 charter members in the organization. There has been a Sunday-school there for a couple of years.

The church at Dallas, Texas, reports a meeting held with home forces which resulted in 22 additions to the church.

The Tennessee state convention will be held in the Walnut street church at Chattanooga October 26-29.

Milligan college has an enrollment of 120 this year. A new dormitory has been completed for the young ladies and it is said to be one of the best in use among our colleges.

Hiram college has an enrollment of 274 this fall. This splendid old college with its fine traditions continues a force among us. It has the open door to all truth and turns out men that are not afraid of the hardships of a foreign field, nor are they defieient for the places of trust at home.

The church at Denton, Texas, has had 34 additions since last report. W. F. Reynolds has received an indefinite call from the church.

J. H. McCartney has closed his work at Grand Junction, Colorado. T. M. Meyers of Kansas has been invited to spend a month with the church with a view of becoming its minister.

The church at Salida, Colorado, will begin a meeting with Homer T. Wilson of Texas to do the preaching, some time in November. W. B. Crewsdon is the pastor.

Evangelists Snively and Altheide will hold a meeting in the church at Warrensburg, Missouri, where Geo. B. Stewart is pastor. They will go from Carbondale, Illinois, to this field. The church at Warrensburg is very busy getting ready for the enterprise.

The church at Fitzgerald, Georgia, received two ladies by letter on October 18. The pastor, E. Everett Hollingworth, is preaching a series of Sunday night sermons on great questions from the Bible, as follows: October 4, "The Fugitive," "Where Art Thou?" October 11, "The Man Who was Rich and Didn't Know It," "What is that in Thy Hand?" October 18, "The Traveler," "Whither Goest Thou?" October 25, "The Problem of To-day," "What is a Man Profited if He Gain the Whole World and Lose His Life?" November 1, "The Seeker," "Whom Seekest Thou?" November 8, "The Inquisitive Man," "What is that to Thee?" November 15, "The Startled Multitude," "What Shall We Do?" November 22, "The Universal Question," "If a Man Die, Shall He Live Again?" November 29, "The Freedmen," "Who Are They, and Whence Came They?"

The church at Fremont, Nebraska, is now in a meeting. There have been eight accessions up to the time of the last report. Rev. Fulton, the minister, expects to raise enough money during the meeting to clear the church of debt. Charles E. McVay, the singer, has two choruses. The children's chorus has 60 voices. The meeting will close October 29 with a song recital by Evangelist McVay. He will assist N. M. Ragland of the First church of Springfield, Missouri, beginning November 1st.

B. F. Hill of Oklahoma had three additions the first Sunday after his return from the national convention. There have been twelve additions since his last report. He is to begin a meeting at Mounds, Oklahoma, the first of November. The enrollment of his Sunday School has doubled in the last six months.

A new church building has been dedicated in Columbus, Ohio, for the congregation known as the New South church. Three thousand dollars was provided on dedication day, which is more than enough to provide for the indebtedness.

The church at Goldfield, Iowa, has improved its house of worship, spending $1,600 on the work. The entire amount has been provided. C. L. Organ is now in a meeting with that church.

W. H. Salyer has held a meeting at McCabe, a mining camp in Arizona, which has resulted in the organization of a church with 35 charter members. People of different denominations have joined in the movement to give the place a church.

E. M. Norton of Fithian has just closed a most successful meeting at Westville, Illinois, with 35 added to the church. This congregation is only a year and a half old, being organized by Mr. Norton.

C. O. McFarland has just closed a successful meeting at Alvin, Illinois, which added forty people to the membership of the church. These additions were adults, and people of influence in the community.

Evangelist J. A. Brown has just completed a short meeting at St. Joe, Indiana. Through this effort 27 were added to the church.

The church a Garwin, Iowa, has held a meeting this fall under the leadership of C. L. McKim, which resulted in 23 accessions to the church.

Evangelist Charles W. Barnes has held a meting at the church in Lewiston, Kentucky, which resulted in 37 additions to the church. Arrangements have been made to employ a minister for half of his time, and the church is now hunting the man, hoping to induce some neighboring church to coöperate in his support.

The church at Arapahoe, Nebraska, reports that they will dedicate their beautiful new house of worship on November 22. L. L. Carpenter has been engaged as master of ceremonies. There have been three additions to the church recently.

PRODUCE GAS.

Hence Certain Foods Not Nourishing.

No matter how agreeable an article of food may be, if it causes bloating and gas in the stomach, it is not likely to be nourishing.

The gas thus formed is liable to cause actual, immediate harm by pressing against the heart.

An Oregon girl suffered in this way until she found the right kind of food. She writes:

Two years ago I had given up all hope of having health and strength. After eating I had severe pain around the heart, and a choking sensation.

"During these spells I had to sit perfectly still, the slightest movement causing increased pain. Even breathing caused such sharp pain my heart seemed to turn over, making me take short quick breaths.

"Night after night without sleep, I would sit up and wait until morning when the pains gradually lessened. I began to fear serious heart trouble.

"One day I was so miserable the doctor was called. After a careful examination he said it was gas from fermented food, pressing against my heart, that caused the trouble—otherwise my heart was all right.

"His medicine gave only temporary relief. I tried going without food, hoping I could find something which would agree with me. After I became quite weak, an aunt suggested Grape-Nuts.

"The first meal of this food caused no unpleasant effects but made me feel stronger. At every meal I ate Grape-Nuts and grew better daily. I now have no trouble when I avoid pasty, starchy foods and stick to Grape-Nuts."

"There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKERS

R. H. Newton, formerly pastor at Normal, Ill., has been spending a year on the plains of eastern Colorado and has found great benefit to his health in this vacation. He has been preaching on Sundays at Ordway, where the congregation is just completing a chapel in the hope of permanently establishing the cause in that place.

P. C. Macfarlane, of Alameda, Calif., was the president of the North Carolina Missionary Convention and has been elected president of the State Board for the ensuing year.

The Egypt and Palestine Travel Study Class that leaves next February is now being organized by its director, Prof. Ira M. Price, of the University of Chicago. The tour will be a bonafide three months of study of history, people and places and is an exceptionally fine opportunity for any one who desires to visit those Bible lands under the best conditions.

The church at Moweaqua, Illinois, was assisted in an evangelistic effort this summer by C. R. L. Vawter. Fifty people responded to the gospel invitation. The pastor of the church is D. G. Dungan, a son of Dr. Dungan, and the evangelist generously ascribes the gospel harvest to the work of the pastor. Mr. Vawter has had 70 additions in Assumption this summer.

The church at Toledo, Ohio, has a mission Sunday School. Besides this it is interested in many a good work such as conducting services at the county jail, and at the infirmary. Grant M. Spear is the pastor.

The church at Watsonville, California, where D. F. Stafford ministers, has just cleared a debt of ten thousand dollars off of a property which cost forty thousand dollars four years ago. They are now in a meeting under the leadership of Charles A. Young.

R. H. Crossfield closed a thirteen years' ministry at Owensboro, Kentucky, recently. There were audiences taxing the capacity of the church on the last Sunday and six additions. Dr. Crossfield goes to the presidency of Kentucky University, or Transylvania, as it is henceforth to be called.

The church at Sandersville, Georgia, recently dedicated a twenty thousand dollar property with the assistance of Geo. L. Snively. The church needed to raise $6,500 but this amount was greatly exceeded. Mr. Snively will continue with the church for a short meeting.

The church at Delphi, Indiana, has dedicated a new church building with the assistance of L. L. Carpenter. Five thousand dollars was raised on the day the building was dedicated.

They are preparing for a great revival which will be conducted by Allen Wilson, to commence in Nov. as early as possible. The work there is in excellent condition and ready to line up for the revival. J. F. Findley is the pastor.

FROM THE HUB OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

The season of renewed activity is upon us and glowing reports of a promising winter's work come to this center of the Empire State from surrounding towns and cities.

Rochester will give a good account of her two live congregations this year. At the First Church everything is expectancy over the probable outcome of Miss Lemert's campaign for a larger Bible-school. She begins there about the middle of the month and will find that under Brother Robert Stewart's ministry the church has grown in every way. Columbus Ave., the thriving second church, too, has grown much during the past year, and its Bible-school has pushed the First Church hard for supremacy. The minister, J. Frank Green, has entered without reserve into every department of the work.

Auburn, under the wise leadership of Arthur Broden, may well claim the honor of being the most evangelistic church. Besides passing the 400 mark in membership. it has recently established a good mission in another portion of the city.

Wellsville is now without a pastor, L. C. McPherson having answered the call from Keuka College for field service. His term of service with the work there resulted in strengthening it in many ways.

Before entering upon his college duties, Brother McPherson held a meeting in his brother's, Perry McPherson's, church at Dunkirk, which resulted in seventeen being added to the membership there. This is the living-link of the Richmond Ave., Buffalo, in home missions, and it is doing a good work.

It is rumored that L. C. Cost leaves East Aurora to engage in business in Buffalo. This will mean that some good man is needed at once to keep Elbert Hubbard and his Roycrofters in line.

The work in and around Buffalo continues to manifest the strong and aggressive spirit which has characterized it for some time. Brothers Miller, Ferrall and Hayden in the City, and Brothers Bower, Hull, Randall and Prewitt in the Tonawandas and at Niagara, are leading churches of which any state ought to be proud. Enrolled in them are to be found true and loyal disciples in hearty sympathy with every forward movement of the brotherhood.

Buffalo has for some time been the seat of the State Board of the New York Christian Missionary Society. Here resides Dr. Eli H. Long, the efficient and untiring president, A. B. Kellogg, the "watch-dog" of the treasury, through whose foresight and prudence a permanent fund of more than $5,000 has been gathered together, D. Krebief of Williamsville, treasurer of the state society, and D. C. Tremaine, state secretary.

The year book of the New York Christian Endeavor Society has just been issued, and as usual is a very complete report of the work done during the last fiscal year. Appended is a complete statistical report of the churches, showing number, size, offering, etc., There are forty-eight churches within the state with a total membership of 9,105. There were 892 additions, 574 of which were by baptism, during the year. These churches raised for all purposes last year, local support, repairs, missions, etc., $99,046.18.

This state offers unexcelled opportunities for missionary work. Great cities are growing so rapidly that the churches cannot keep pace with the opportunities. Aside from the down town New England churches, every city church in the state is in excellent condition and doing a fine work. There are thirty-seven cities of over 10,000 inhabitants in this state in which we have no congregations. In many of these are excellent opportunities for the cause we love, if only the means were provided.

The new college project grows more favorable each day. The institute and college both opened under favorable circumstances and prospects for a good year are bright. Brother Lowell C. McPherson will move his family to Keuka Park about the middle of the month, entering at once upon full service for the institution. President Z. A. Space has been confined to his room for several weeks with an acute attack of rheumatism. He was taken down in the midst of a canvas for students, and for a few days worried considerably over the enforced rest at such an inopportune time. A little Scotch lassie, however, taught him the lesson of patience, and last week from his room at Clifton Springs Sanitarium he wrote these lines. How needful that we all heed them.

Patience.

"Bide a wee and dinna worry,"
Life is too much of a hurry,
No use sighing
No use crying
Said a little peasant maiden
To a friend whose life was laden;
With accumulated cares
She had gathered unawares.

Rest awhile beside this fountain,
Drink the nectar from the mountain,
No use whining
No use pining
Said this little goddess kindly,
Far too many think so blindly;
Hence imaginative fears
Caused a flood of bitter tears.

Stop and rest for just a moment,
Chaffing is a poor exponent,
No more using
Nor abusing
Said our little earnest preacher
Patience is a blessed teacher;
It can satisfy the soul
And our anxious fears control.

Christian Century:

Having read with care the article on "Trial Unions," in the issue of October 1, by Errett Gates, I am glad to say I think its suggestions are timely and worthy of candid consideration.

Undue haste in forming union of bodies of people is certain to retard the cause of Christian union. A general acquaintance of the individual members of the uniting bodies is the primary condition of any permanent union of congregations.

This can only be secured by personal touch in worshiping and working together with a oneness of spirit and purpose. Hence "trial unions," or "federation," is an important step toward the final solution of the union problem. So it has seemed to me for o score of years. W. L. Hayden.

Indianapolis, Ind.,

CHICAGO (Continued.)

There were three confessions again last Sunday at Jackson boulevard church. The church has been receiving substantial gains in membership recently.

The Memorial church took an offering for city missions recently which resulted in a hundred and sixty dollars for this fund. According to the agreement this money will be divided between the boards of the Baptists and Disciples in accordance with their previous records on missionary lines.

G. A. Campbell is to spend a week in Danville with the church of which Andrew Scott is pastor. He will preach to build up the spiritual life of the members and to lead men and women into the initial experiences of the Christian religion.

R. W. Gentry preached at Englewood last Sunday. His period of service with the Memorial church is closed, as according to agreement that church has secured a Baptist minister to be the assistant of Dr. Willett.

The Evanston church is again canvassing the proposition of planting themselves on their recently acquired lot at the corner of Greenleaf street and Maple avenue. The plan is to move the present building to the back end of the new lot. After the congregation outgrew it, the building would be used for certain institutional features in which there is interest. The official board is proceeding to get estimates on the job and to attempt to find a buyer for the old lot.

We feel it to be a merited testimony of the ability of our G. A. Campbell that he has been placed in charge of the non-partisan campaign in Austin to elect Mr. Street for state's attorney. The campaign has been organized all over the city and in every locality, our men have a creditable part in the undertaking.

Charles E. Varney of Paw Paw, Michigan, preached at Irving Park last Sunday. No one has been secured yet to succeed Mr. Rothenberger in this field.

The church at Douglas Park where Harry F. Burns ministers took the offering for city missions recently. This offering amounted to thirty dollars.

Charles Reign Scoville met the members of the Metropolitan church on Monday night. Such conferences have been very infrequent in the history of the church owing to the busy life Mr. Scoville leads. The whole future program of the church was under discussion.

THE BAPTIST DISCIPLE CONGRESS.

Rev. A. W. Taylor.

The coming of Christian Union will be less a matter of any formal program than of a spirit. We shall unite when we desire to do so strongly enough. We shall desire to so do when we learn to trust one another's motives and to love the common work of the Kingdom of Heaven more than we do our party shibboleths. We are not willing to unite because we cling to traditional differences and lack that mutual understanding that comes with close acquaintance. We are in a state of armed neutrality. We desire the peace of unity and the greatest spirits desire the further advantages of actual organic union but we must first get the spirit of the thing into the rank and file. This we shall do by inspiring the captains of the host. This the Baptist-Disciple congress will do. Mutual acquaintance will destroy suspicion and allay fears of denominational loss; it will enlarge the common views of the mutual interests of both communions; it will inspire the greater love for the greater task of redeeming a whole world from all its error. It will teach us that we have many more things in common than we have of difference and that after all our differences are matters of opinion and expediency while our common faith and our common task is vital and eternal.

Eureka, Ill.

ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS EACH FROM ONE THOUSAND PERSONS FOR THE CENTENNIAL.

On the train home from New Orleans, Charles Reign Scoville proposed to be one of a thousand persons to give a thousand dollars each to Missions, Benevolence, and Education in the Centennial year upon which we have entered. The pledge is not conditional. The great evangelist simply steps out as a volunteer and calls for 999 more to do likewise!

Among our people are several whose normal gifts from year to year run from ten to fifty thousand dollars each. One has devoted a hundred thousand to education in one donation. Even if they should not be moved to celebrate the Centennial with double, quadruple, or tenfold offerings, each of these can enroll many names from his friends in the Centennial Book of Gold beside his own.

Of course all of us understand that such publicity as is necessary to carry through this undertaking is not for vain glory or the praise of men, but to provoke one another unto love and good works and to witness tangibly and practically to our King's glory. So R. A. Long in real modesty gave that which will be counted the first thousand of this Centennial offering to Ministerial Relief in New Orleans last Sunday. Every one distributes his thousand as he chooses, giving through his local church, if he will, but allowing the aggregate amount to be reported to Pittsburg.

This will bring in a million dollars this year. It will inspire the tens and hundreds of thousands to multiply their sacrificial offerings. It will move ministers, missionaries, nurses, and teachers to perform prodigies of service. It will reinforce the preaching of every evangelist. Thousands will be won to Christ by this demonstration of Christian love. Every department of Christian service will be stimulated to an intensity that will guarantee the reaching of its Centennial Aim!

From this wide acquaintance with the brotherhood, Brother Scoville believes the thousand volunteers will be found. Let every editor, every secretary, every college president, every minister, every disciple become an active agent to secure the names as speedily as possible. The quicker they are reported the greater will be the help to not only the causes immediately concerned but to every interest of the King. Help the State Offering by seeking the thousands!

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

COLORADO CONVENTION.

The program of the Colorado Christian Missionary Society came too late for publication last week. It is now too late as an announcement, but may serve as news of what has taken place. The convention was announced for October 27-30 with the Central Church of Denver (W. B. Craig, pastor). Following is the program:

Tuesday, Oct. 27.

Afternoon and evening will be occupied by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Reports of state officers, and address of the President, Mrs. L. S. Brown. In the evening the annual address will be delivered by Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, national president.

Wednesday, Oct. 28.

Friday, Oct. 30.

Morning: Devotions, James Mailley, Colorado Springs; Business reports of committees. Address, James H.Mohorter, Gen, Sec. National Benevolent Association. Final adjournment.

Gospel Shot.—Tracts that bring results. Samples, 10 cents. C. F. Ladd, Rock Falls, Illinois.

Joseph Serena and C. R. Stauffer of Syracuse are assisting DeWitt H. Bradbury at Pompey, New York, in a series of special meetings.

R. H. Ingram reports that the church at Perry, Iowa, has had three additions recently. They have raised a two thousand dollar debt on the building, and plan to begin the new year with no indebtedness of any kind.

Elmore Sinclair of St. Thomas, Canada, located at Watseka, Illinois, three months ago. Since that time 25 have been added to the membership of the church. The Sunday-school has the best attendance in its history, and everything gives promise of a most successful year's work.

E. A. Newby has just finished a meeting at Sharon, Kansas, which brought 45 new members into the church. His next evangelistic effort will be with the mission of the Central church at Wichita, Kansas.

The church at Lawrenceburg, Kentucky, is in a meeting with Walter C. Gibbs as evangelist. There have been 54 additions up to the time of the last report. The singing led by L. W. Ogle has been a great assistance in the work.

L. W. Nutter of the Parkland church, Louisville, Kentucky, has been holding several meetings recently with splendid results. At Colemanville he had 22 additions. At Bethany there were 25 additions. His church has extended him a unanimous call for a fifth year.

Evangelist T. J. Head has held a meeting at Mountainville, Missouri, which resulted in 33 added to the church there. He has a number of engagements ahead for the winter for work in his chosen field.

Evangelist Joel Brown conducted evangelistic services at Mystic, Misouri, recently and had 72 additions to this little church. This will increase their working force to a point where they may be of great influence in the community.

Evangelists Shelburne and Knight have begun a meeting with the church at Newton Falls, Ohio, where J. C. Archer ministers. At the last report 30 had been added to the church.

The church at Lebanon, Kansas, has secured pledges for $4,000 for a new church building. Levi W. Scott is the pastor of the church.

The First church of Pomona, California has raised $1,707.78 for missions the past year.

William Thompson has opened a series of revival services at Effingham, Illinois. He reports that the opera house was filled on a recent Sunday.

Charles Reign Scoville has opened a meeting at Hannibal, Missouri, where Levi P. Marshall preaches. Twenty-five responded to the first invitation.

The church at Chester, Nebraska, has dedicated a new church building with the assistance of F. M. Rains. The building cost $17,000 and all the debt has been provided for. The church begins a meeting immediately with Evangelists Small and St. John to assist.

The church at Pasadena, California, where F. M. Dowling ministers, has dedicated a new $85,000 building with the assistance of Charles Reign Scoville. Mr. Scoville remained with the church for a series of revival services. This effort resulted in 351 accepting the gospel invitation. Our church in Pasadena is now strong in its membership and has one of the finest appointed buildings in the west.

Texas Christian University has a larger attendance this year than last. Some changes are occurring on the faculty as some of the teachers are planning studies in the universities, Harvard and Chicago. The board of trustees of the institution have voted to bear part of the expense of the university preacher as he gives his entire time to the institution.

The church at Columbus, Indiana, where W. H. Book ministers, will have two Living Links with the foreign society the coming year and will contribute $750 through the home board to work in Oklahoma. Their representative in that state will be S. R. Hawkins.

J. A. Lord of the Christian Standard will assist in a series of special services at the church in Columbus, Indiana, in January.

W. E. Spicer, our minister at Bisbee, Arizona, reports a cradle roll of 245 in his Bible school. That gives great promise for the future.

F. W. Emerson of Freeport, Illinois, has resigned to go to Redlands, California. In the year he spent at Freeport, he had a great place in the civic affairs of the community and though he was the pastor of a mission church meeting in a hall, often preached to the largest Sunday evening audience in the city. He will be missed, not only in the church where he ministered, but also in the work of the National Christian Hospital and Sanitarium Association under whose auspices he issued a little health journal called the Hal-Hom.

William J. Lockhart held a meeting at Missouri Valley, Iowa, recently. The meeting resulted in 53 additions, most of them being the heads of families. The work of the evangelist is strongly commended by the people of the Missouri Valley church.

A gasoline launch has been prepared to scatter the gospel message in the islands of the South Seas. The boat is called the Hiram Bingham. Missionaries will travel from island to island in the work of carrying the gospel to parts where it has hitherto been unknown.

The church in Gainesville, Texas, has installed a new pipe organ. G. L. Bush is the pastor of this enterprising church.

The congregation at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, is doing things these days under the leadership of the pastor, G. R. VanArsdale. To church hopes this year to complete a named loan fund with the church extension for $5,000. A canvass is being made of the members of the church to secure subscriptions for a new building.

The church at Lawrenceville, Illinois, is showing great activity recently. It is a Living Link with the foreign society. It has just completed a $4,500 parsonage and has expended $2,500 on improvements in the church building. A pipe organ has been added as well as five more separate class rooms for use in the Sunday School. H. C. Holmes is the minister.

The church at Enid, Oklahoma, the location of the college in Oklahoma, is being blessed with frequent additions to the membership. Eight were received the first Sunday of the month, one on the second Sunday, and three on the third Sunday.

J. L. Brandt is now in the midst of a promising meeting in Guthrie, Oklahoma.

The church at El Reno, Oklahoma, sent its minister to the national convention at New Orleans. No church does this without getting value received in the increased efficiency of the minister and in the new touch with the whole movement.

F. L. VanVoorhis has finished a meeting at Edmond, Oklahoma, which resulted in forty-seven additions to the church.

Oklahoma Christian University has 217 students this fall. This is one of the youngest educational enterprises in our church but is being marvelously prospered. Prof. Sears has one of the largest Hebrew classes in the country.

The state convention of Oklahoma was held at Enid, Oklahoma, last week. We shall hope to print an account of it later.

DIDN'T KNOW

That Coffee Contained a Drug.

There are still some well-informed persons who do not know that coffee contains a drug —caffeine.

This drug is what causes the coffee habit and the many ailments that frequently develop from its habitual use.

"I was drinking coffee twice a day but did not know it was hurting me," writes a Neb. lady. "I don't think I had ever heard or read that coffee was harmful.

"Sometimes I couldn't lie down, had to sleep in a sitting posture as the heart action was so slow. The doctor did not ask me if I drank coffee and the medicine I took did not seem to help me.

"Finally I got so bad I could not drink half a cup, as the dull heavy pain around my heart would be worse. I stopped it for a while and felt some better, but was soon drinking it again, and felt the same distress as before.

"Then I decided coffee caused my trouble, also my husband's, for he complained of severe heartburn every morning after breakfast.

"My daughter had used Postum on a visit and asked why we did not try it. We did, following directions about making it, and for four years we have used it and prefer it to coffee.

"My old trouble has entirely left me and my husband has no more heartburn. I can say from experience now that Postum is the most wholesome of drinks, any one can drink it three times a day without harm, but with decided benefit."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

At the Eureka college banquet during the convention at New Orleans it was decided to hold a great Eureka college and Illinois rally next year in connection with our centennial convention at Pittsburgh. It is believed that this will be better than an expensive banquet and more in keeping with the purpose of this great gathering. A good program will be prepared in advance and the rally will be made one of the important side features of the convention. All of our college interests ought to be well represented in Pittsburg.

The state of New York is one of the great mission fields of America. It has eight and one half million of people and we have less than eleven thousand members there. In the larger cities are the problems that have grown up by rapid immigration. In all parts of the states there are great open doors of opportunity.

Z. T. Sweeney will dedicate the church at East Orange, New Jersey, on November 29. This is an event with the Disciples in the East.

Geo. W. Brown is home from the foreign field, having been stationed at Jubbulpore, India. He is now pursuing post-graduate work in John Hopkins University at Baltimore, Maryland.

In a short meeting with home forces of the Quindaro Boulevard Mission, Kansas City, Kansas, there were three conversions, one from the M. E.'s sixteen by letter and reinstatement. A church was organized about October 4, with something like fifty members. The outlook for this new work is very promising. William M. Mayfield is the pastor.

John R. Golden and Charles E. McVay just closed a successful revival at Flanagan, Ill. Bro. McVay is now singing in his third meeting with I. H. Fuller, at Fremont, Nebraska.

The East Side Christian Church, Denver, Colorado, is in the process of a building enterprise to cost about $25,000. The new house will be located in a section previously without a church. Rev. Jesse B. Haston is the pastor.

THINGS BOOMING AT MITCHELL PARK.

C. A. Lowe, pastor of Mitchell Park, St. Joseph, Mo., sends in a list of members of an Adult Bible Class, just organized in that school, of even sixty. His class will receive the the diploma. This school received a taste of International Certificate right away. They have also organized a class of about sixty in Training for Service, and a large number of these will go through the course and receive Training for Service last year, graduating a splendid class in the early spring, and "having tasted of the good word of God," they are pushing on to larger things. It is needless to say that Mitchell Park church is growing in all its departments and promising to be very soon, one of the strongest churches in the state. It was planted as a mission only a few years ago. C. A. Lowe is a real leader, and the Lord is rewarding his efforts.

IMPORTANT TEACHER-TRAINING CONFERENCE IN KANSAS CITY.

At the First Christian Church Sunday afternoon, October 25th, was held a very enthusiastic and valuable meeting of the officers and teachers of the training classes of greater Kansas City, under the direction of the Kansas City Union, D. P. Gribben, president; Miss Abby Downing, secretary. Nearly all of the training classes in Kansas City were represented, either by delegates or reports. We have now an enrollment of between eleven and twelve hundred.

The writer had the privilege of opening the meeting with a short address on "What Further We Ought to do in the Training for Service in Kansas City, and Why." He took the ground that we ought to reach not less than 2,000 enrolled, because, in the first place, it is easier to do a big thing than a little one; in the second place, we have the people, not less than 6,000 enrolled in our Bible Schools and 10,000 church members in this city. In the third place, we now have enthusiasm aroused and while we are on the wave we ought to be borne along to the desired port. In the fourth place, we need the culture. Many of the people in our churches are still lamentably uninformed about the Bible and the obligations of Christian service. While this is the case, the duty is plain for us to enlist them in this great training movement.

J. T. Ferguson, pastor of the Ivanhoe church, and teacher of the Training class at that place, spoke on "How to Arouse and Maintain Enthusiasm in the Work." He also conducted a most edifying conference.

D. Y. Donaldson, pastor of the South Prospect church, and teacher of a large training class at that place, spoke and conducted a conference on the subject of "Ways of Teaching." Both of these exercises were very snappy, interesting and helpful.

President Gribben announced the preparation for a great union meeting of all the classes of the two cities during the winter, to be addressed by J. M. Kersey, of Parsons, Kansas, teacher of one of the largest classes in the world.

The writer announced preparations for a great Adult Bible Class rally to be conducted by the International Superintendent, W. C. Pearce, and General Secretary, Marion Lawrence, for the two Kansas Cities in February, 1909.

13,000,000 Dyspeptics

Live In the United States and Canada Suffering Terribly Every Meal.

A rough estimate gives the enormous total above as the number of people who suffer in America from Dyspepsia. Add to this those who suffer occasional stomach trouble and you have the field which lies open for Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

These wonderful little digesters are the most popular dyspepsia remedy sold in Canada and America.

Why? There must be merit to them or they would not or could not be distancing all competitors.

Ask any druggist to tell you of their popularity.

They will assist nature in digesting a meal no matter what the condition of the stomach. They are prepared scientifically and are made powerful so that nature restores the lost ingredients with which she manufactures her digestive fluids.

They soothe the tired and irritated nerves of the stomach. They prevent and relieve constipation and bowel trouble.

If you want to eat a dangerous meal at late hours take a tablet with you and fear no evil consequences or make up your mind that Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will reduce the ill effects of over eating.

They are made up from fruit and vegetable essences and their tablet form of preparation preserves these qualities longer than fluid or powder modes of administering the same essences.

They have been tried for years and found to be not wanting. You don't buy a new thing in Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, you purchase a remedy for stomach trouble that has a record for cures by the thousand. Ask the druggist, then give him 50c for a package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

According to figures compiled in the general land office at Washington, receipts on account of the sales of public lands during the last fiscal year amounted to $11,492,453. There were 201,953 entries, covering 18,938,836 acres.

CHICAGO CONGRESS ENTERTAINMENT.

The Christian Churches on the South Side of Chicago, in the vicinity of the Memorial Church, where the joint Congress of Baptists, Disciples and Free Baptists will be held, Nov. 10-12, have joined together to provide entertainment (lodging and breakfast) for all Disciples who attend the Congress. If you wish entertainment send your name at once to Errett Gates, 5464 Jefferson Ave., Chicago, Ill.

WHY GO TO THE CONGRESS AT CHICAGO?

The writer of this article is looking forward with much pleasure and great expectancy to the Congress that is to be held in Chicago on Nov. 10, 11 and 12. In this Congress, Baptists, Free Baptists, and Disciples, will meet on an equal footing to discuss the great questions in which we are all vitally interested. It is destined to become an epoch-making gathering.

The writer has made all arrangements to be present at this great gathering of church people. But, we may ask the question, why should Disciples of Christ go to this Congress? For the purpose of answering just such a question, this article is written. In the first place we should go because the Baptists, who have been the leading spirits in this Congress, have given us, the Disciples of Christ, such a gracious and pressing invitation to be present. In short, we are wanted. In the second place we are needed. The great aim and purpose of the Congress can only be realized, if we are present. For us to remain away would to a large extent defeat the very purpose for which the Congress is held. We should conscientiously see to it that through no fault of ours the Congress should fail in its splendid purposes. In the third place we need the Congress. We need the valuable lessons that we will be able to learn from its deliberations. We will learn much by rubbing up against other men. Contact with the many splendid men that we will meet in this Congress will broaden our horizon and deepen our sympathies. We will be larger men as a result of such contact. It will be a great training for us in leadership. The enrichment in mental vision and brotherly love resulting from the personal touch with those who are not of our own immediate communion will make us better Christians and more efficient preachers. For this reason alone no preacher among us can afford not to attend this Congress. In the fifth place we should go because this Congress will mark an epoch in the history of Christian unity efforts. It is destined to bring about a greater measure of unity between those who ought to be organically one. In short, it will make for Christian Union, the very purpose for which we believe we came into existence. The Congress will afford one of those high moments of opportunity for helping to bring about that oneness for which Christ prayed, and which has been proclaimed by us from the house tops for a century.

To all my fellow ministers in the Churches of Christ, I say, go to the Congress. The time and money spent will prove to be a profitable investment, both for yourself and the cause of Christianity in general. Unity and brotherhood will experience a mighty forward impulse in this Congress.

William Oeschger.

THE COMING CONGRESS.

Rev. F. L. Moffett.

In 1809, Thomas Campbell made an appeal to the Christian World through "The Declaration and Address" for Christian Union. Next year we meet at Pittsburg to review the past one hundred years. We will also take an introspective view and inquire concerning the prospect. We have ever kept before us the real purpose of our existence, there may have been times when some would have purposely or ignorantly turned us from our course. There may be those even now who would misinterpret our program and make prominent things which we have always considered secondary. Nevertheless we will continue to be true ourselves as a people. The prayer of Jesus has not been answered. "That they all may be one is our mission as a people. We should contemplate with delight, anything which will contribute to the realization of the divine purpose.

It is certainly a pleasure for us to know that other great religious bodies are by their words and conduct giving expression to the spirit which called us as a people into existence, surely we have came to the kingdom for such a time as this. The congress which is soon to meet in Chicago is not only one of the signs of the times, but is full of great possibilities. It will mark more than one mile in religious progress. Every minister among the Disciples who can possibly attend this congress should be there. This is not for the sake of numbers, but the importance of the occasion demands it. It is not expected that the union problem will be finally settled at this gathering, but it will help these three bodies to get each other's view point. It will doubtless show us that our differences are in the main unimportant, and above all it will cultivate that spirit of love and fellowship which is the first absolutely essential thing in realizing the fulfillment of our Master's prayer with these three groups.

I am quite sure we will not permit any religious body to excel us in zeal for union. There is no problem which is more important than that one. No people have thought upon it quite so much as we have. No people have prayed for it more than we. No people will contribute more than we at the present time. No people should be better represented than we at the congress in Chicago from Nov. 10-12.

THE MARVELOUS OPENING ON THE CONGO.

In sending this remarkable letter Dr. Dye writes: "Letters just from the Congo give us much encouragement. The work for which Northern and Southern California's money is to be used is opening up now even before we have entered. There 700 men and women have given up the old life and are begging for instruction, before we have even established a station. Have we exaggerated the opportunity? Is it going to orpduce encouraging enough results? I beg of you to push this Centennial work of the Pacific Coast states."

THE COMING CONGRESS.

By Carlos C. Rowlison.

There are many reasons why our ministers and others should attend the forthcoming joint Congress in Chicago. Of course we ought to go because the Disciples have been special pleaders for Christian Union, and we desire to be consistent. But we ought also to go to gain the reaction which will be produced by such a contact as this occasion affords. We must no longer simply theorize about union—we must accomplish it; and this Congress ought to make much clearer to ourselves the practical way of realizing our plea.

It is no less important that we attend this Congress for the value of the program itself. It promises to be a genuine contribution to a very important new church activity—an activity of loving ministration to sufferers, a kind of activity that Jesus pointed to as a proof of his messiahship. Evidently the church must intelligently contribute her share to the relief of nervous sufferers. The danger is that the church will undertake this work blindly, if not indeed superstitiously, and with commercial intent, and the discussion at the Congress ought to do much to lead us into the use of sane and effective methods. All students of recent psychology are looking with profound interest and expectation to the results of this new church activity, provided well established scientific knowledge is applied to the process. Let us go to the Congress and be instructed.

Nothing approaching this work has ever been attempted before. In a series of splendid pictures the great and impressive scenes in the Bible story are depicted, true in color, costume, landscape, and all details to the life, the country and the time. ¶ To make the men and women of the Bible actual, living characters to their pupils is one of the first duties of the Sunday-School teachers, and no better help can they find for this than in the Tissot pictures. ¶ The whole world acknowledges that J. James Tissot was the greatest artist that ever lived, so far as Biblical subjects are concerned.

Only the unparalled success in the higher-priced editions makes possible this phenomenally low offer now. ¶ These pictures have received the unqualified endorsement of the leading clergymen and Sunday-School teachers throughout the United States. ¶ Nothing could be more helpful, and interesting, and delightful, when one is reading the Bible, than such a graphic interpretation of sacred stories. ¶ In no other way can the Bible stories be made so real and actual to children. Should be in every home.

My Confession of Faith in the Old Testament

It was in 1886, I believe, that George Thomas Dowling, a brilliant and successful Baptist minister in Cleveland, addressed a communication to the leading Baptist journals inquiring if there was room in the denomination for a man who was no longer able to defend the practice of Close Communion. The replies were singularly unanimous in the negative, and Dr. Dowling resigned his pastorate and identified himself with another religious body. Today there is not a Baptist church in this city that would contend for Close Communion. Throughout the North the situation is the same. It is apparent that some miles have been covered in the progress of the church since that day.

Similar has been the advance in the field of biblical study. The determination to test the traditions of the Jewish schools regarding the Old Testament, and the frequently crude fancies of the church fathers concerning the Bible as a whole, has led to surprising and gratifying results. In every case it is the Bible itself which has supplied the criteria for the tests. The appeal of the newer scholarship is from the traditions to the Scriptures themselves—not to chance or surface utterances alone, but to their entire structure, message and purpose. The result has been to place in the hands of the Bible student of the present day a volume which is self-attesting, self-explanatory, convincing and inspiring. The older arguments of scepticism which were fatal against a Bible which the orthodoxy of the day insisted was verbally inspired, inerrant in matters of historical and scientific character, and equally authoritative at all points, are pointless and futile now. Mr. Ingersoll's shafts of wit, which seemed unanswerable to audiences trained to believe in the doctrine of a "level Bible," all portions of which were of precisely the same value for belief and conduct, would appear witless and absurd today to students of the historical method. It is the frank recognition of the actual nature of the Bible, not as a book mechanically inspired and therefore technically perfect, but as the record of the religious experience of a unique and elect people, and therefore marked by the limitations of the human lives which wrought it, which is saving the faith of thousands of the present generation to whom the older views are meaningless.

Speaking particularly of the Old Testament, I share the views of that company of biblical scholars which is usually known as the moderate or constructive school, accepting the results of the historical and critical method in so far as careful and long continued investigation has verified them. These results are no longer in question among well-informed students of the Old Testament. They are the basis of practically all the work now being done by the workers whose names are of significance in the biblical field. They are the commonplaces of the history, textual research, biblical theology and dogmatics of every institution of note in Europe and America. The non-critical views have been defended by a noble body of men, of whom Professor William Henry Green of Princeton was the last notable example. That they have been displaced by more satisfactory conclusions is the inevitable result of facing the facts which the Bible presents in such convincing way. Even Dr. Orr, whose "Problem of the Old Testament" was hailed as a defense of the traditional view, accepts practically every principle of the critical school, and contents himself with the task of pointing out with admirable cogency the vagaries into which unlicensed and fantastic types of criticism may be betrayed. In this he has rendered excellent service to the cause of sound biblical study.

In company, then, with that group of biblical students who accept the legitimacy of the historical method as applied to the Old Testament, I believe that this collection of books is inspired, as the product of the spirit of God working in the lives of prophets, priests and sages during the period of Hebrew and early Jewish history. But the inspiration consists not in magical qualities discoverable in the books, but in the characters of the men themselves. Their lives lie behind their messages, and in most cases their messages preceded the records which the Bible furnishes. In these volumes, then, we have the report of their dealings with God, and their efforts to realize his plans for the times in which they lived.

The purpose of the Old Testament writers was not to write history but to interpret such historical facts as seemed to them to have special religious significance. Their records of the past, therefore, are very fragmentary and unsatisfactory to the mere historian. They leave out much that he wishes to know, and they often seem indifferent as to whether one or another of variant narratives which they record may be the correct one. But in every case their purpose is plain. They wish by every account recorded, whether of attested fact, of ancestral tradition, or of prehistoric legend, to illustrate the divine purpose. In the books, such as Judges, Samuel and Kings, which deal largely with past events in the life of the nation, we have the use of history as a method employed by prophets in teaching religion to their contemporaries. In the later chapters of Genesis we have the employment, by the same men, of traditions, evidently sufficiently authentic, but even more fragmentary, regarding the patriarchal heroes, the founders of the nation. The purpose is the same, the emphasis being placed upon the character of God and the qualities he desires in his children. In the earliest chapters of Genesis we have the use of Semitic world-stories of creation and primitive times as vehicles of religious instruction, not for their own sakes, but because their popular character made them useful for instruction. In the Chronicles and Ezra and Nehemiah, the priestly writers portrayed the experiences of the past with their emphasis upon the value of ritual as an aid in religion.

I believe that Moses was the leader of Israel from Egyptian bondage, the maker of the nation in the sense that he gave it its first consciousness of unity and purpose, and its earliest law giver, in whose name all subsequent legislation was enacted. That he was the author of the three codes of law, which every scholar recognizes in the Hexateuch, cannot be maintained in face of the materials which those successive codes reveal. That the primitive institutes given by Moses were gradually enlarged in the experience of the nation, the "Book of the Covenant" emerging in code form in the early royal period, the Deuteronomic law in the reformation of Josiah, and the Priest Code in the days preceding Ezra is the accepted view among Bible scholars merely because it best accords both with the contents of the codes themselves, and with the history in which they appeared. Moses was thus not merely the transmitter of this law to ancient Israel, as the Jews insisted, but its real law-giver, in the sense that he so shaped its ideals that all later enactments bore the stamp of his personality and were published in his name.

I believe that David was the "Sweet Singer of Israel," who as the composer of certain hymns or psalms set the type of sacred music in the nation, and ultimately left his name to that collection of prayers and praises gathered at first perhaps for the second temple, and ultimately elaborated into the five books of psalms in our present book of that name. That he was the composer of many of these hymns it is impossible to affirm. The titles are late and untrustworthy. But that he had some genuine part in establishing the ritual of religion seems clear.

The Wisdom books, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, are by unknown authors. The tradition of Solomon's connection with them probably approaches nearest to reality in the case of Proverbs, and shades off into the fantastic beliefs of late centuries which credited him with the authorship of the Greek works, the "Wisdom of Solomon," and the "Psalms of Solomon."

I believe the book of Daniel to be an apocalyptic work of the Maccabean period, attributed to an ancient prophet in order to give the greater force and value. This view is now so generally accepted, even by such conservatives as Sayce and Zahn, as to make a bare reference sufficient.

I believe that the prophets, among all the teachers of Israel, constitute the great central guiding and uplifting force of the Old Testament. At first, as in the days of Samuel, they were rough and illiterate men. In such times as those even of Elijah and Elisha they still resorted to strange methods of incitement such as minstrelsy. They wrought cures and performed other wonders, as means of attracting attention and attesting their authority. But as time went on they rose to higher levels. With Amos and Hosea, Isaiah and Micah, Jeremiah and the prophets of the Exile, they reached their highest power. They preached and wrote, they rebuked and pleaded. They taught the great truths of the unity, personality and holiness of God. They lifted Israel from ignorance to knowledge, from savagery to humanity, from absorbed self-interest to some conception of the purpose of God. Sometimes they were well-known public leaders, as was the case with Amos and Isaiah. Sometimes they were unknown workers, who only left their written word for others to read, as with the Evangelical Prophets of the last part of Isaiah, or the unknown voices of the second and third parts of Zechariah. Sometimes they used the facts of past, present, or future to enforce their message, as Hosea and Zephaniah, and sometimes they constructed parables to illustrate their meaning, as with Ezekiel and the author of Jonah. But in all this work they were bound together in a singular unity of purpose. They kept in their hearts the glow of the Messianic hope. Their Golden Age was yet ahead. One greater than the greatest was still to come. And thus the Old Testament, with its many varieties of utterance, and its many differing values as an interpreter of the Divine Life, has the unique function of recording the life and thought, the prayers and hopes of a people through whom a yet grander disclosure of God's life was to be made. The work of the Christ was forecast there, not so much in type and symbol as in the great forward reaching hopes of Israel's highest and best. So that when Jesus came he stood beside the canvas of Old Testament history and prophecy and said to the Jews, "You search the Scriptures, for in them you think you have eternal life. They are they which testify of me." Then he added, sadly, "But you will not come to me that you may have life."

In the foregoing statement I have summarized the most important points in my view of the Old Testament. These views I have held and taught, in the class-room, upon the lecture platform, and in the press. To those who have known me in any of these capacities the matters I have set down are commonplaces. I have never had one set of opinions for the class-room and another for the lecture-hall. Wherever, even in preaching, I have had an occasion to deal with these matters a plain statement of my understanding of the Scriptures has never been withheld.

I am only concerned, in closing, to point out the purpose I have in seeking so personal a statement. It is not to argue the views set down. It is not to attempt to vindicate them, and show why others seem to me less convincing. It is merely to register them, and then to ask the question, Is one who holds these views disloyal to the Bible and out of harmony with the spirit which moved the fathers of this reformation? In other words, do the men who hold the more conservative opinion, as well as those who occupy more radical ground, regard each others' opinions, and such as I have here registered, as consistent with a saving faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; and in the Bible as the word of God? I do not believe that any theme of greater moment confronts the Disciples as they approach the Centennial of the Declaration and Address.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

Education and NationalCharacter.

It is remarkable to how considerable an extent the literature of religious education has taken form within the past five years. It will be remembered that it is just about that length of time since the Religious Education Association was organized in this city with a great convention of which the leading spirit was the late President William R. Harper. That was a very notable gathering, consisting of university and college presidents, pastors, Sunday-school workers, missionaries, and others engaged in religious activities, as well as those technically concerned with secular education. From that time on the work of the Religious Education Association has grown steadily, each year marked by a convention whose theme was related to the dominant purposes of the organization. Such topics as "The Aims of Religious Education," "The Materials of Religious Education," and "The Bible in Practical Life," have been handled in series of masterly addresses and are now accessible in the various annual volumes of the Association.

The last convention, held at Washington, dealt with the theme, "Education and National Character," and its chief utterances have just appeared in the annual volume under that title.* This volume is an admirable companion to those already published. It was especially appropriate that the convention, dealing with the relation of education to national character, should be held in the capitol of the nation, and one of its important features was the public reception at the White House addressed by President Roosevelt. Among the themes considered are "Enlarged Ideals in Morals and Religion," by President King; "The Universities and the Social Conscience," by Professor Peabody; "The Significance of the Present Moral Awakening in the Nation," by Dr. Abbott; "The Place of the Religious Education Association, the Life of the Nation," by Professor Coe; "Religion in Public School Education," by Professor Votaw; "The Pastor as a Teacher," by Rev Floyd W. Tomkins; "Why College Men Do Not Go into the Ministry," by Professor Mathews; "The Annual Survey of Progress in Moral and Religious Education," by President Hodges, and others, to the number of some thirty. These addresses make the volume a veritable trasurer-house of valuable information and inspiration for the work of religious instruction and especially upon the general theme of national character. This volume, like those who have preceded it, ought to be in every public library, as well as on the shelves of ministers and teachers.

Preparations are now far under way for the sixth annual convention of the Religious Education Association which will be held in this city February 9-11, 1909. Professor Peabody of Harvard is the president, and has already outlined a most attractive program on the general theme of "Religious Education and Social Service." He was present in this city at a gathering of one hundred prominent business and professional men last week, and gave an address upon the general features of the Association and especially upon the work of the coming convention which was felt by those who heard it to be a rare and uplifting utterance. The personnel of the coming convention will be of a very high order. The speakers include some ciation may be secured from its headquarters in this city, and every active Christian worker in the field of education will wish to know what its departments of activity are and how it may assist him in the work he has to do.

Mr. Moninger's Conception of Our Plea.

Last week we considered Mr. Moninger's conception of the church. We might have said that he did not describe the church but rather the Disciples of Christ who are but a part of the church historically considered. Mr. Moninger's book introduces many ideas that are the peculiar property of our own movement. This is well, though it is always well to distinguish between John's word and that of Alexander Campbell, or Paul's word and that of Ben Franklin. As so many references in the book are peculiar to our movement and are dragged into the book on the New Testament church by the ears to satisfy a demand that exists in some quarters, it were well to examine the conception of our plea which Mr. Moninger proposes to teach to our future teachers.

Recently on a railway train enroute to the National Convention, we engaged an evangelist in conversation. He had a great human heart when he was not theologically minded; but once with the sword of his theology in his hand he hewed about him so recklessly as to kill both Amalekites and Israelites. We asked him when the church began. He replied promptly, "On the day of Pentecost." "Where do we find the church today?" we queried. "Why, we are it," was the confident reply. "Is the Methodist church a church of Christ," I asked. "Certainly not," was the response. Questions followed in which he made plain that no church was a church of Christ unless it baptized by immersion and wore the name Christian on the door-plate. We then asked, "Where was the church between 300 A. D. and 1800 A. D.?" He hesitated and said he guessed there had not been any church in that period. We urged, however, that Jesus had promised that the gates of Hades should not prevail against the church. "Where was the church?" we insisted. After he thought much on this he replied, "The church must have been in its wilderness wanderings." This desperate sally provoked ungodly mirth on our part and the discussion ended.

It will be news to many of our people in the better churches, especially in those numerous churches where the Christian Standard makes no appearance, that we have people who would deny that the Methodists were Christians. It is true, however much we may be ashamed of it, and we occasionally find a preacher who in an excess of zeal doubts the salvation of his good old Methodist mother. When theology so triumphs over the heart, it is so much the worse for theology. Should such a point of view become current instead of being the mere freak interpretation of eccentrics, our movement would be doomed to become as narrow as the Adventists. Its growth would cease and we would be as a convention speaker said, "A body of scholastics holding memorial services."

We scan Mr. Moninger's book anxiously to see whether it presents such a point of view as is above indicated. It would be fatal to our movement to have our future teachers instructed in such a point of view. It is incredible that Mr. Moninger himself should hold such a position. It would never stand the test of his educational experience. But, strangely enough, he lets no word escape him which would be inconsistent with such a point of view, the reference books he quotes are those that lean most to this side and some of his statements are far from the position of the progressive element of the brotherhood.

In the bibliography given at the end of the different chapters, we note there is scarcely a book that is not published by the Standard Publishing Company. This may account for the absence of certain great names in the bibliography. Mr. Moninger's employer would naturally blue pencil any suggestion that would sell books for the house at St. Louis, or the house at Chicago. Time after time the name of Ben Franklin appears. Ben Franklin probably disrupted more churches than any man who ever preached in our movement with his continual propaganda against organs and missionary societies. He was the life-long antagonist of Isaac Errett of sainted memory. Yet his works with their crass legalism are quoted at the end of a great many chapters. The only works of Isaac Errett that are quoted are his tracts, "Our Position" and "A True Basis of Christian Union." The books of Isaac Errett are unfortunately printed in St. Louis, which renders them impossible for the purpose. Among the books more modern is one by Ashley Johnson, "The Great Controversy" (most suggestive title), and "From Darkness to Light," a book containing the stories of men who left other religious bodies for various reasons and came into our own. Just how such a literature can be a propos to a discussion of the New Testament church is beyond us. Even in discussing Christian union, Mr. Moninger for some hidden reason fails to quote from the Declaration and Address or even mention it. That document is so liberal as to be heterodox! He quotes nothing from Alexander Campbell. He, too, was a dangerous liberal who was much too generous in his attitude to Christians of the various denominations. In the subject of Christian Union, the best book written in recent years is by Amos R. Wells, a Congregationalist, and is called "That They May All Be One." This book is not mentioned in the bibliography, however.

We have noted that Mr. Moninger shows a point of view in raising such inconsequential questions as the matter of the small "d" which he asserts should be used in writing "Disciples of Christ." In discussing the "divine" creed, Mr. Moninger says, no man rises higher than his creed. Fortunately that is not true. Had not men's hearts always been better than their heads, this old world would have been in a much sorrier plight. Throughout the book, we have Franklinisms too numerous to be mentioned in particular.

Mr. Moninger is so anxious to make his case at times that he will stretch a point in church history. He says the change of the form of baptism was made in the Roman Catholic church. As a matter of fact, pouring was allowed in exceptional cases soon after the life time of the apostles as is shown by the reference in "Teaching of the Apostles."

The Triangular Congress in Chicago this week is such an occasion as Disciples might long have prayed for. It will be an epoch-making event. We have heard of a number of men who are coming from great distances. Those who cannot attend will, we are assured, follow the progress of the sessions with prayer to God for his guidance in our effort to answer our Lord's great prayer.

Dr. Garrison's Disavowal.

Dr. Garrison, as we believed he would, disavows any part in or approval of the advertising circular of the Christian Evangelist which we criticised recently. We are gratified for the frank statement to this effect in last week's issue of his paper. The more important point of our criticism, however, seems not to have been made clear. We think it is important that it be made clear. The report has gone to the world that Professor Willett does not believe in the miraculous. One of our church newspapers is carrying on a persistent propaganda of this untruth making it the basis of a ruthless persecution of Dr. Willett and an occasion for embarrassing our missionary societies. This newspaper perversely refuses to listen to any statement of the facts but continues to accept headlines of the secular press as higher authority than Professor Willett's own statements. Now the point of our criticism of Dr. Garrison's editorial is that he has fallen unwittingly into the same class as the Christian Standard. We do not think he would give his approval to an advertising scheme to capitalize the popular misinformation and prejudice concerning Professor Willett into an asset for his publishing business and in our criticism we frankly stated so. But, relieving him personally of this charge, it remains true that his editorial referred to, yokes him with Russell Errett in the furtherance of an untruth that is working injury to a brother and jeopardizing the sacred interests of our brotherhood.

This untruth is that Professor Willett does not believe in the miraculous element of the gospel. Dr. Garrison says the Professor is out of harmony with "the great leaders of evangelical thought" in that "they believe in the miraculous element in the Bible including the Virgin birth of Christ, his unique Sonship, his sacrificial death and his resurrection from the dead." The bald point of our criticism was simply that this is not so. Professor Willett is in harmony with these "leaders" in his belief with them in these facts of the gospel. We heard him preach three weeks in an evangelistic meeting last spring in which forty people united with the church, mostly by confession. The constant theme of all his preaching was just this set of facts, "the unique sonship of Jesus, his sacrificial death, and his resurrection from the dead." Within a month in the Christian Century he has answered a direct question concerning his beliefs in the Virgin birth with the categorical reply, "Yes."

Professor Willett's theory of miracles may not agree with Dr. Garrison's or Dr. Moore's or Alexander Campbell's, or "the great leaders of evangelical thought" or even with his editorial colleague in the Christian Century, but what of that? Are we Disciples going to begin, at the end of our first century to make a certain philosophy of miracles a test of fellowship? If so, then let Dr. Garrison and Dr. Moore get together first of all!

We are good natured about all this, but we are intensely in earnest in our effort to quash the propaganda of detraction and disaffection which has too long been suffered by our goodnatured brotherhood. We may have to use blunt language to make ourselves clear but we are in a hurry to get the work done. We are restive under the necessity of engaging in such a discussion at the opening of the Centennial year. We want to give ourselves to weightier issues. We wish the Christian Century to become a factor in working out our glorious centennial aims. But we believe our brotherhood is more interested in justice than in the centennial, in truth than a triumph. in the unity of faith than a uniformity of creed.

The Christian Evangelist has, with a few exceptions only, a history of kindliness and justice. We are jealous for its reputation for fairness. We do not bring any accusation against its editor's intention. But we do say that unintentionally his article was misleading and unjust and we are confident that in the light of our statement of the facts he will do what lies in his power to make these facts known.

The Strength and Weakness of Christian Science

In the religious world, a phenomenon now attracting much attention is the growth of the movement called Christian Science. It seems difficult to get accurate statistics but it is clear that the movement now has thousands of adherents and in the leading cities there are magnificent edifices erected as monuments of the faith of this people. The clientele of the movement is gathered from the better grades of society, many intelligent professional people being included in its ranks.

What are the elements of power which have promoted the growth of Christian Science? It is useless to quote Barnum's suggestion. Christian Scientists may be humbugged in some regards but no movement can make such growth without elements of real power. It will be well if the older religious bodies will recognize this and learn the lesson that lies on the face of the Christian Science movement.

First of all, Christian Science arose as an answer to a great need in our city life. Christian Science is essentially a city movement. It is rarely found in any strength in rural districts. That is not simply due to the conservatism of the agricultural class but to the fact that they do not need Christian Science. Americans live faster than any other nation in the cities. We have become a nation of nerves. Our men are often irascible in their offices and our women hysterical in their homes. Chronic ailments are found on every hand. Worry and hustle have broken up the nervous equilibrium of the city population. These people can get no help from doctors for medicine will not take the place of a healthy mental regime. When people with nerves have suffered with their chronic complaints beyond endurance, when they have, like the woman in Jesus' day, suffered many things from many physicians and grown not better but rather worse, they try quack medicines, spiritualism or anything else that promises them relief. The first great element of strength of the Christian Science is the need that exists for just such a thing.

In the second place, Christian Science has grown because it has in many cases brought results. It is only blind prejudice to deny these results. It is true of course that the same results have for many centuries been achieved at Catholic shrines by faith in the bones of a saint. They have been achieved by a Dowie and by many an unworthy impostor who has still been able to instill in the one healed the essential mental attitude. Not only has Christian Science achieved many wonderful cures, especially in the field of nervous complaints, but it has also helped many a person to bear the burdens of life patiently. Some poor woman with a drunken husband endures his periodical disturbance of the domestic peace rather than violate the cult and either grow angry or come to hate. Triumphantly she keeps her mind from worry and her heart from resentment and hopes to triumph by sheer goodness. Christian Science is strong because it cures disease and helps people to bear the ills of life.

Again, Christian Science is strong because it has some modern theological ideas. Its repudiation of the devil as a co-partner of God in the ruling of this universe is quite in line with modern ideas. Its vague and impersonal picture of the deity quite comports with the point of view of a modern scientist, provided he believes in God. A most interesting line of parallels between Christian Science and the "new theology" could be established, though as we shall see, there are differences even more fundamental than the agreements.

Christian Science is strong because it has a compact and effective organization. Even the pope of Rome allows his priests to preach. He takes the risk of doctrinal divergence within certain limits. But in Christian Science there are no sermons. Only the writings of the founder are permitted. The lecturer is the the only free lance and even he must be an individual that has been brought up at the feet of the high priestess. The organization has many an interesting device to secure central and autocratic government which certainly makes for effectiveness in any group that will voluntarily surrender their liberties as Christian Scientists have done. This is why one man in a given city takes up his pen in defence of the movement and why the movement goes foward with such splendid esprit de corps.

Let us not think, however, that Christian Science is destined to become the national faith in America. First of all it will not because it is not missionary. It has developed a proselyting genius among people already Christian that is the marvel of the religious world, but it seldom wins people to itself that have not already received teaching and membership in orthodox churches. It has no missions among the heathen and no settlements in the slums. It can grow only as the vine wraps itself around the oak. When it undertakes the task of meeting infidelity, it is ineffective and useless.

It will never become the national religion because it lacks the essentially social point of view which the orthodox churches have all received in some measure. It does not feed the hungry save perhaps in its own membership. It has built no hospitals or other philanthropic institutions. The poor must needs pay a high price for a copyright book which contains the key to the scriptures. The total unconcern of the movement for the point of view of the sociologist will work its undoing in the end.

In this connection we must note the mercenary quality of Christian Science. A people who deny the material are very unwilling to accept mental checks. These must be written on paper and signed by responsible parties. The healers charge large sums for their labors. Mrs. Eddy has become through her religious cult one of the richest women in America living in a mansion with all the luxurious appointments of the best in the land. The business policy of the movement has cost it many friends.

It will never be the universal medical practice for it neglects some important facts of experience. Men have experienced healing through the practice of Christian Science. But they have also experienced healing through quinine, or through an amputation. The physician of the past has been unscientific when he repudiated the experience of healing that the Christian Scientist had. The doctor, however, still cures a larger percentage of cases than the healer. To deny the healing power of the physician is to repudiate a human experience covering centuries and reaching into all civilized countries. The true eclectic will use both mental and physical science to meet his need. Both Christian Science and the prejudiced physician are unscientific and both alike will fail to provide a program of health broad enough for the needs of the race.

Christian Science has many weaknesses on the religious side. Its view of the Bible is the allegorical view held by Swedenborg in modern times and by the more numerous allegorical interpreters in more ancient times. It naturally dreads the processes of historical criticism more than the orthodox churches do. When it comes to be seen that the Bible is not a divine puzzle book thrown down out of heaven to be interpreted in these latter days by Mrs. Eddy, but rather a literature of a people historically conditioned, Christian Science will end. The religious creed denies the human life of Jesus, it denies the fact of sin, regarding sin as a delusion the same as disease and it has many other impossible religious ideas. This crude religious program received by intelligent people is a rebuke to the orthodox. If our Sunday-schools had been more efficient as teaching agencies, these people who were trained in them would not hold such crude religious views.

Christian Science, however, is more a philosophy than a religion. Its denial of material reality is held by many adherents of oriental religions. It is an outgrown notion that once circulated in Europe a few hundred years ago. Such a philosophy is suicidal. To deny material reality is to impeach the testimony given by the senses. To do this is to make uncertain the very stuff which is the raw material of our thinking. If our experiences are unreal, our thinking is uncertain or false and even our faith in Christian Science becomes uncertain with all the rest.

What shall we do with Christian Science? Certainly not call it names. Our first task is to appreciate it. Then we must appropriate the true for all truth is ours. The Emanuel movement in Boston and the work of Bishop Fallows in Chicago are interesting experiments in this line. When we earn to do for our members all that Christian Science can do and in addition allow them the service of their family physician, we shall no longer lose valuable people who shall no longer perform social service. Instead of oriental imaginings they shall have the human and sympathetic point of view of Jesus who instead of denying sin and disease, fought and overcame it.

Growing Old Gracefully.

In every country it is the custom for young men to respect age and experience. Among the ancient Hebrews, a man was not to take part in any discussion until fitted by the experiences of a long life. It was a daring suggestion of Joel that the young men should see visions while the old men were dreaming dreams. In modern life we esteem every man for his service. If old men are valuable for sounsel, yet are young men fitted for war.

In our church are many old men who are fathers to the young preachers. The figure of Father Moore will be missed when the sad day comes when he is no longer seen in our convention lobbies. With fine tolerance he excuses the departures from tradition in young men. With fatherly feeling he gathers them around him for counsel. If his words do not always meet the approval of the young men, his good heart never fails to command friends. There are other great and good men who have walked with the fathers. They remain to this today to link up this present with its burning problems to the long ago. Most of them have grown old gracefully. As fruit mellows with the decline of the summer, as old wine is better and old violins sweeter, so these old men have grown in the Christian graces and leave a sweet perfume in the spiritual atmosphere wherever they go.

This being so we are rudely shocked when one of our old and revered leaders fails in his love for the younger man and displays the partisanship of a college freshman at a football game. Such a shock is that which comes in the demand of Professor Radford in the Christian Standard that some men shall be barred from the Centennial program because of alleged heresy. The Professor has taught young men these many years. He ought to know that this method would never stamp out heresy in a college, much less in a great church. Or does the Professor forget that dramatic day in his own youth when he first advocated evolution at a college commencement and the president must needs answer him, though he had to throw away a well-prepared speech on another subject to do so? Or does the Professor forget that his heresy was such a menace at one time that a conservative colleague was given him to save the faith in old Eureka? Will the Professor try to recall whether threats of excommunication ever daunted him in those heroic days of heresy?

Professor Radford has never attended a great university. The problems of our young men cannot be clarly known to him. A host of former students will believe that he has spoken with no clear vision of the issues. But they would rather he would not speak. They will not believe until the last extremity that old age has soured instead of sweetened their former teacher; but a few more bitter demands like this one and they must yield reluctantly.

It is a blessed art to grow old sweetly. Most of us will have to grow old sometime. May we all preserve a clear memory of the heresies and mistakes of youth that another generation be not unjustly judged.

The Elections.

The election of Mr. Taft to the Presidency brings to that office one of the best prepared men who ever entered it. For years Mr. Taft's experiences have been in the line of development for this high responsibility. His legal, judicial, diplomatic and secretarial positions have acquainted him with the many sides of public life and he enters the presidency as if to the manor born. His campaign was active but not spectacular or sensational. His utterances on the stump were singularly well balanced for the heat and strenuousness of the canvass. No doubt he will surround himself with wise and able counsellors. The temper and policy of the Roosevelt administration will be continued as well as it can be continued with Roosevelt left out. The business interests of the country will know what to count on and we may look for an immediate revival of business and probably, as is nearly always the case, an inflation of it. It is gratifying to know that the campaign has been carried on in a wholesome temper and that neither of the leading candidates has been besmirched with mud. The disclosures of Mr. Hearst and the participation of President Roosevelt afforded about the only excitement in the campaign. Nevertheless Mr. Bryan met with vast crowds wherever he spoke. Evidently the people respect him as an orator if they will not vote for him as president.

In Illinois the contest for the governorship was waged with more heat than that for the presidency. Mr. Stevenson's candidacy gathered to its support the large element of disaffected republicans. Ex-Governor Richard Yates in his campaign for the republican nomination had stirred up bad blood against Governor Deneen and the present governor's campaign was not able to effect a reconciliation. As a result Deneen ran far behind Taft and it looked for awhile as if he would be defeated. The down state vote, however, came to rescue him from the Chicago slump. This was a singular reversal of his first candidacy when he outran even Mr. Roosevelt in Illinois.

The election of John E. W. Wayman to the States' Attorneyship of Cook County came as a surprise to most people. At last reports his plurality is placed at 40,000 over Kern the Democratic candidate. The reform leaders of Chicago had taken a strong stand against Mr. Wayman on account of two facts, first, that his nomination was involved in fraud at the primaries and second that his campaign against Healy for the nomination was made on the Sunday closing issue with Wayman backed by the United Societies. Both Mr. Kern and Mr. Wayman were recommended by the United Societies for election. Many good men felt that the backing of a candidate by the liquor interests was a sufficient argument against good men's supporting him. Evidently not so many felt this way about it as was imagined. We still hope much from Mr. Wayman. He is a member of the Christian Church, though not in Chicago. He graduated from Bethany college. A brother, J. C. Wayman, is a member of the Memorial Church of Christ in Chicago. A man of such antecedents and connections can hardly put himself beyond the reach of influences for civic righteousness, no matter what his connection with the United Societies may happen to be.

A Big Event in India.

By George W. Brown.

Recently a step has been taken in mission work in India which friends of missions believe will be most far reaching in its effects, and may prove to be the most important move made in missions for many years. It is the reorganizing of historic Serampore College.

This institution was founded by that great pioneer of modern missions, William Carey, along with his associates, Marshman and Ward. Years before they had been compelled to leave Calcutta, but found an asylum in the nearby settlement of Serampore, at that time under the government of Denmark. A few years before his death Serampore College had been organized and its fundamental statutes drawn up, unless a charter granted by the king of Denmark. By the terms of this charter the institution was empowered to give such instruction as is usually given in colleges and universities in other parts of the world and to grant such degrees as are usually granted in Europe and America. A handsome building was erected, and work begun many years before Carey's death, but he never saw his plans fully realized. In fact, they never have been fully realized.

According to the charter, the control of the institution must rest in the hands of the Baptists. But the English Baptists are a broadminded folk, and want to share the benefits of their charter with all Christian India. They desire to have an institution to which every mission and denomination in India may send students who may prepare themselves for leadership. So last March a conference was held, partly in Calcutta and partly in Serampore, to discuss plans for the utilization of the college and its charter. In this conference all the Baptist bodies at work in India were represented, and so were the Disciples of Christ. In all nearly four days were consumed, and a plan was formed to make the school one fitted to meet the ends mentioned above.

It is hoped to equip the college with a suitable faculty and with ample apparatus and library, to put up a number of new buildings, and to form a large endowment. Should these plans be successful, there is no doubt but that independent Christianity in India will receive a great boom, and that the day will approach much more rapidly when the Indian church will be able to stand alone and to make progress from its own strength. A committee to raise the endowment has been appointed and is no doubt now at work in England, and will likely visit America as well.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett.

Dear Dr. Willett: Your querist, P. C. S., whose query you answer in a recent number of the Christian Century, would probably find what he requires in Kautzsch's new translation of the Old Testament. A translation of Kautzsch's Table appeared in the Biblical World some time during the summer of 1895, and was reprinted in the Expository Times for August, 1895. It is adequate and authoritative—or as nearly so as the scholarship of the day can make it.

E. M. T.

Professor Carl Clemen of the University of Bonn delivered an interesting lecture on "The Apocalypse" before the Outlook Club in this city last week. He pointed out the close relationship between the Book of Revelation and the other apocalyptic writings of Jewish and Jewish-Christian nature during the first pre-Christian and the first Christian centuries. He finds that John made use of earlier material which probably lay richly to hand in the profuse Jewish literature of this nature. He gave a careful analysis of the various symbols of the book and their close relation to the political events of the time. Most of these incidents to which reference is made are fairly well known to us. Those which are more obscure do not materially affect the interpretation of the book. Professor Clemen places the date of the apocalypse in the reign of Domitian, during the last decade of the first century.

Dear Brother Willett: In the Christian Century of October 10, page 10, in answer to R. M. H., do you mean to say that there is no convincing evidence of the virgin birth of Jesus? Then what becomes of the evidence as given in Luke 1:26-38? Is it reliable evidence or not? Because little is said of the virgin birth of Jesus and much concerning his resurrection, does this argue that one scripture may be accepted and the other rejected? I fear that your reply to the querist will encourage him to reject the story of the virgin birth of Jesus. Very sincerely,

Bonham, Texas. J. H. Rosecrans.

The fact of the virgin birth is not in dispute, either by R. M. H. or myself. The question is rather regarding its importance as an article of Christian faith. The following facts are evident: (1) The narratives of the birth of Jesus do not belong to the common body of gospel material, but are additions to it. Neither Mark nor John contain any record of the event. This does not prove that the records which supply it are unauthentic, but it does prove that a record of the life of Christ like Mark or John was deemed complete without it. (2) No other part of the New Testament mentions it. It was not a theme of apostolic preaching, so far as we know. It cannot therefore be ranked with the essential elements of the Christian faith. No man in the first generation of believers was asked to give expression to his faith in this fact. (3) In the nature of the case the theme did not lend itself to public testimony. So strange a statement would not only fail of credit with the outer world, but would by its very publicity give occasion to unbelieving and slanderous tongues to speak evil of the Savior and his followers. It was distinctly a truth for the inner circle, the family group of the faithful. As such it still has a value, rather than as an article of faith or a test of orthodoxy or as a theme for public debate.

At this moment there comes to my desk a letter from a consecrated Christian woman, widely known among the Disciples. She writes for personal council on this very point of the Virgin Birth. I venture to quote a part of her letter. She writes:

"I have so many women friends who come or write to me when they are halting in their ways. There are two or three now whom I know have passed through a strong prejudice against Christianity, into admiration for the life of Christ. But their stumbling-block is the birth. Do you think it would be doing harm if I dared suggest to these young friends of mine, who are students in the real sense, that they eliminate from their present study the divine birth, and study the Christ himself? Can I suggest to them that to find the Christ may be easily possible even though they fail to hold the belief in the miracle of the birth? After all it is the life of Christ we need. If I tell them that this other faith (in the miracle) will come later, I put emphasis on what is troubling them and there is danger that they may miss the greater blessing of faith in Christ. May I ask your help?"

This Christian woman has touched the crux of the whole question. Not all truths of the Bible are aids to faith. John distinctly declared that there were many other things not written in his book. Among them was the story of the Virgin Birth. But the things he had set down were intended as aids to faith in Christ. To some minds the Virgin Birth would have such value, to others, quite the contrary. We cannot doubt that this wise and sensitive teacher of youth has chosen the very best course. Teach the essentials of the life, character, message and program of Jesus. In due time all other valuable things will join themselves to this nucleus of faith. If the Virgin Birth finds a place among these added truths, well. If not, it may well wait, in such minds, the fuller vindication of the future.

SOME RECENT BOOKS

Today in Palestine, by H. W. Dunning, Ph. D.; New York, James Pott and Co., 1907, pp. 278, $2.00.

Dr. Dunning is the author of "Today on the Nile," which has come to be recognized as one of the best guide books to travel in Egypt. He is well equipped to tell the story of Egypt and Palestine in the most useful way for the benefit of those who are journeying through these lands. Dr. Dunning was formerly instructor in the Semitic languages in Yale University, but has, for a number of years, devoted himself to the work of conducting parties of travelers through the Orient. He is well informed upon all the details of history and of the life of the people in these regions. He speaks Arabic with sufficient ease to be independent of that type of information which comes from local sources and is deemed sufficient by many travelers through the East. The present volume is handsomely illustrated with a large number of photographic scenes from different sections of the Holy Land. It suggests the best method of seeing Palestine, beginning with Jerusalem, going southward to Hebron and then to Jericho and the Dead Sea, and afterwards northward by camp through interesting sections of Syria. The final chapter gives a resume of Palestinian history and furnishes some admirable suggestions to the traveler who is contemplating a trip to Palestine.

The Pilgrims, by Frederick A. Noble, Boston, the Pilgrim Press, 1907, pp. 465, $2.50 net.

Dr. Noble was for many years the pastor of Union Park Congregational Church in this city and still holds an emeritus relation with that church. He is the author of several books, but this is the most ambitious and satisfactory work he has written. In it he traces the story of the Pilgrims both on English and American soil and considers those elements which the Pilgrims added to the American character. When one takes an inventory of the factors which have made up the national life, he recognizes that perhaps the most controlling and formative of all of them has been that which issued from the Pilgrim Colony of New England. These men, who crossed the Atlantic in the Mayflower, were of the finest type of English yeomanry. They were young men, many of them graduates of Oxford and Cambridge, and all of them devoted to the ideals of protestantism for which they had already suffered in their home land. The story, in its general outlines, is very familiar, but its more detailed recital forms one of the most interesting chapters in the history of American religious life. Dr. Noble, both in training and temper, is admirably fitted to tell this story, and he has devoted a number of the leisure years of his residence in the East to the accomplishment of this task.

Turkey and the Turks, by W. S. Monroe, L. C. Page and Co. Boston, 1907, pp. 324, $2.00.

No government is attracting more attention just now than the tottering empire of Turkey, with its many but decreasing provinces, its miscellaneous population, its curious customs, and its one aggressive feature of Mohammedanism. Mr. Monroe has told the story of this curious people in a most readable and informing volume, which not only describes the land of the Ottoman Empire but gives some history of the rise of this remarkably complex government, of the manners and customs of the different groups of people who make up its races, of the court intrigues and embroglios which have made exciting the recent history of the land, and something of the prospects for the future, considering the rapid invasion of the empire by European ideas. The book is embellished with a large number of photographs of persons and places of interest.

Sunday-school Lesson.

Herbert L. Willett.

THE SHEPHERD.*

As we noticed in connection with the lesson for October 25, which was itself a psalm, these poems are found in that collection of the prayers and praises of Israel which goes by the title of the Book of Psalms. In some connections it is called the Psalms of David, and David's connection with many of the poems that make up the book is recognized in their titles. The psalms were not composed by any one person, although nearly one-half of those which have survived to us in that book are entitled Psalms of David in their superscriptions. This points clearly to the fact that David was believed to have been the composer of a number of these poems, and thus stood as the representative of this sort of composition, just as Moses' name is connected with the law, Solomon's with the writings of wisdom, and Isaiah's with prophecy.

The Book of Psalms.

The Book of Psalms is divided, in the revised version as in the original, into five books, perhaps under the influence of the "five books" of the law. Each of these books closes with a doxology which is not a part of the psalm, but is a separate statement giving the proper sentiments at the end of each of the collections. Many of the psalms have superscriptions, some of which tell the supposed author, some the circumstances under which the psalm was believed to have been composed, and others still the tune to which it was sung or the instruments upon which the accompaniment was played. These superscriptions are not a part of the original psalm but were added by Jewish editors at the time the book was compiled or later. In its present form it is probable that the psalms were gathered through many generations from all parts of the nation and all types of religious life, precisely as hymns are now composed by Christians of various points of view and circumstances. The reason why any particular psalm found its way into the collection was probably because it had become dear to the hearts of the people in their worship, precisely as hymns are chosen from earlier collections today.

The Great Hymn Book.

It is probable that the earliest formal collection of Psalms was made for use in the Second Temple, and, as David was known to have been a singer and minstrel and there were already extant many psalms and hymns which were attributed to him, the collection which grew from generation to generation, as new sections were added to it, gradually took his name and is known, both in the New Testament and by us, as the "Psalms of David." The Book of Psalms was used not only by the later generations of Old Testament worshipers in the public service, but also by the Jews of our Lord's day and by the early Christian church. It is perhaps the most conspicuous collection of hymns in the world. Many of its poems have been taken over almost without change into hymn books of the Christian Church, and even tunes have become familiar through their use with a certain Psalm, as the tune "Old Hundredth," which was composed for the 100th Psalm.

David and the Psalms.

The relation of David to the psalter is a question of considerable difficulty to the Bible student. Opinions differ all the way from the acceptance of the entire seventy-two psalms which bear his name, to a practical rejection of all connection between David and any of the psalms which we now possess. Yet it is not denied by any competent Bible scholars that David himself was a composer of songs of this character, the only question being whether those that we now have are any of them actually his work. A moderate and satisfactory view is that some of these psalms in our present collection are undoubtedly the work of this psalmist king, and one always likes to believe that among these Davidic hymns, the Twenty-third Psalm finds its place.

A Psalm of Experience.

At first thought, such compositions as the "Shepherd Psalm" would seem appropriate to those early days of David when he was a shepherd on the plains of Bethlehem, keeping the flock of his father, Jesse, on those very up-lands, where, in later years the shepherds watching their flocks by night heard the song of "Peace on Earth, Good Will to Men." But it is quite clear that the author of this psalm was one who had gone through long experiences and had undergone many sorrows. No light-hearted youth like the David of Bethlehem days could have composed these words. It is more likely, if it be a psalm of David's, that it belongs to the period of his enforced exile from Jerusalem at the time of Absalom's rebellion, and recalls something of the sadness of his heart, not unmixed with deep gratitude, that in all his troubles God had been his shepherd, leading him through devious ways, but still guiding him in love and sympathy. The table spread in the presence of his enemies may perhaps refer to the timely assistance brought him during his sore distress in the wilderness after his flight from Jerusalem. But it is more likely that the psalm is a record of the psalmist's trust in God in all the perilous and trying times of a long and eventful life.

Shepherd and Sheep.

It is not strangt that a psalm like this should have found its place in the heart of the universal church. It is not only true to the daily experience of shepherd and sheep in the East where the most intimate sympathy exists between the two, but also it admirably describes the union of heart between God and his children. In such a relationship there can be no permanent want. The pastures are abundant and fresh. The waters are not turbulent and terrifying but quiet and clear. Weariness is forgotten in the restoring and encouraging presence of the shepherd. The best paths are chosen, straight paths, as far as the rough country will permit, because the shepherd's name and honor are pledged to the most careful attention to his flocks.

The Shadowed Path.

Even when the path lies through deep valleys of gloom and terror where wild beasts may lurk on either side, there is no fear since the sheep trust their shepherd; and for the child of God there can be no danger even in death, for the Father is there guiding and protecting. In times of distress and opposition, sudden and unexpected relief is discovered and hunger is appeased by plentiful supplies in the very presence of foes. The festal oil is not forgotten and the cup of blessings is more than full. Who would not rejoice in such comforts as these? Who should not find satisfaction in the guidance and comforting presence of such a Shepherd-Father? In the fold of the shepherd the sheep may hope to dwell for many days. In the sanctuary of God the worshiper finds his true home and nope; and in the presenee of God in the Upper Fold, there are joys and compensations which await him forever.

Jesus the Good Shepherd.

The Twenty-third Psalm is beautifully appropriate to the life of the Orient. There, shepherd and sheep know each other with an intimacy which is impossible in the West. Jesus used this beautiful figure in describing his own relationship to the sheep, (John: 10), and of him, as of the Heavenly Father, the words of this psalm are appropriate. He is the Shepherd and Bishop of Souls.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan.

LESSON 2. HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

I. DIVISIONS. In the Jewish-Christian line of descent education and religion have always been closely associated. The history of this connection is long and interesting and helps to a better understanding of its modern developments. For the sake of clearness we may divide it into four periods:

I. PRE-CHRISTIAN (Hebrew).

II. EARLY CHRISTIAN. (a) Apostolic; (b) Post-Apostolic.

III. MEDIAEVAL (Catholic).

IV. PROTESTANT (a) Before Sunday-school organization; (b) After Sunday-school organization.

II. RELIGIOUS EDUCATION AMONG THE HEBREWS. This extends from the beginnings of Hebrew history down to the present time. We are concerned with it, however, only up to the establishment of the first Christian churches. It has two divisions:

(1). BEFORE THE EXILE. From the beginning there was no distinction between religious and secular education. The lesson material was the law, written or unwritten, and the history of God's gracious dealings with His people. (Deut. 31:9-13; 4:9; Ex. 12:26, 27.) Parental instruction was the rule (Deut 4:9; 11:19, 20; 32:46), but private teachers seem to have been sometimes employed (2 Ki. 10:5.) Even "the little ones" were taught the law (Deut. 31: 9-13; Josh. 8:30-35.) The priests were occasionally engaged in teaching (Mi. 2:11). Under Jehosaphat and Josiah public instructors drawn from the priestly caste were sent on a tour of instruction through the country (2 Chron. 17:7-9; 2 Ki. 22 and 23 chaps.).

(2). AFTER THE EXILE. During the years of exile the Jews learned the value of education as a religious and national asset and acquired a greatly increased reverence for their sacred books, especially "the law." Soon after the return Ezra held a great educational convention in Jerusalem at which "the book of the law" was publicly read and translated from the original classical Hebrew into the Aramaic vernacular (Ez. 8:1-8). Thence sprang a new educational era among the Jews. The class of "scribes," or men learned in the law, arose and became a great power. The synagogue or meeting house was instituted in which regular instruction was given in the Hebrew language and in the law. Later under the influence of the Alexandrine schools provision was made for the instruction of the young. Latterly every synagogue had its attached school. A graded system was in use. Girls received private instruction. In the time of Christ there were four classes of schools: elementary, synagogue, the higher schools (as those of Hillel and Shamai) and the famous Sanedrin. (Lightfoot). Small parchment rolls were used by the children as text-books. The method was by question and answer.

III. EARLY CHRISTIAN. (1). APOSTOLIC. The first Christian churches following the example of the synagogue were teaching institutions. Jesus' last commission to his apostles was to teach (Matt. 28:30). The teaching function was accorded a high place in the church (1 Cor. 14:9; 1 Tim. 4:11; Heb. 5:12; Col. 1:28). The earliest preaching was chiefly teaching (Acts 5:42; Col 1:28; the sermons in the Acts). A special set of officers were called teachers (Rom. 12:7; Eph. 4:11; 1 Cor. 12:28). One of the qualifications of bishops or overseers was their "aptness to teach" (1 Tim. 3:2). False teaching was one of the grave dangers of the infant church (2 Pet. 2:1; Tit. 1:11). The instruction consisted of (a), oral instruction in the gospel facts and (b) the reading and Christian interpretation of the Old Testament (1 Cor. 11:23-25; 15:1-8; Acts 8:30-35; the epistles generally.)

(2). POST-APOSTOLIC. In this period appear the earliest religious schools as distinct from the regular church-meetings. They arose from the necessity of providing suitable religious instruction for those who wished to become members of the church. These persons were known as catechumens and the schools as catechetical schools. The course covered two or three years and was the regular preparation for adult baptism. Both adults and children were included, the former being the heathen converts who had no previous Christian training, the latter being the children of Christian parents baptized in infancy. One of the most famous of these schools was that of Alexandria, which for long exercised a powerful influence in the church. Another was at Antioch. These two schools in addition to the catechetical work, gave advanced instruction in the Christian religion. It was not uncommon also for strong churches to have attached schools, in which general religious instruction was given to the young. At least two councils of the church made the establishment of such schools compulsory on pastors and bishops.

QUESTIONS: Into what periods may we divide the history of religious education? What are the two divisions of Hebrew education that concern us? What was the lesson material of the Jews? What educational movement took place under Jehosaphat and Josiah? What were the "schools of the prophets"? What part did Ezra play in the educational revival after the exile? What were synagogue schools? What were the four classes of schools in the time of Christ? What is the next period and how is it divided? How was the teaching function regarded in the Apostolic church? What was the nature of the earliest preaching? What important class of officers were recognized? What were the catechetical schools and how did they arise? Name two of these schools that were especially famous. What other religious schools also existed in this period?

THE PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

Right Use of the Lord's Day. Topic, November 11. Rev. 1:10; Matt. 12:1-13.

The rest day has been the subject of legislation from a very early date. Many peoples have had laws respecting it. Rest was enjoined upon the Israelites on the seventh day for social, humane and religious reasons. The slave and the beast of burden shared in the benefits of the Sabbath. The Israelite was admonished to observe the Sabbath as a memorial of his days of servitude in Egypt and thus retain a vivid consciousness of racial solidarity and religious ideals. The sacred day was a reminder to the people that they had covenanted to serve a holy God.

"Mercy, Not Sacrifice."

The formalists of the New Testament times had forgotten the spirit of the Sabbath law. They thought of the statute first and of men afterwards. Jesus reversed this order. Laws and institutions are made for man, and when they are used to deprive man of his rights, it is time to ask whether there is not something wrong with the law or with the manner of its enforcement. Jesus quotes Hosea against his opponents. The prophet had to deal with men corrupt in life and unjust in their treatment of the poor, who nevertheless thought they could appease the wrath of God by presenting beasts at the altar. He denounced them as enemies of true religion and ridiculed their heathenish worship. The example of the prophet and the authority of Jesus warrant us in believing that unrighteous men who profess great reverence for the Lord's day are proper objects of ridicule. We are untrue to our Lord if we allow the sacred day to be abused by such men. They bring into disrepute the efforts of good men to secure for the day the recognition that it should have in a Christian nation. We are bound by every tie that unites us to our Lord to let the world see the difference between a formal and a genuine Christianity.

Men and Sheep.

"A nation that neglects the Sabbath soon sinks into barbarism or ruin. Civilized man cannot bear the pressure of seven days' work and worry in a week." Thus wrote Edmund Burke. And Dr. Chalmers said: "I never knew the man who worked seven days in the week without becoming soon a wreck in health or in fortune, or in both." From the Encyclopedia of Social Reform: "As a matter of fact, leaving out England and America, where there has been less need of legislation on the subject because of the prevalence of Sunday rest, the main efforts for legislation forbidding or limiting Sunday labor have come from working men themselves, through their trade-unions and the Socialist and Labor parties. In most countries they have done far more for it than the church. On the continent the prevalence of Sunday labor has been a subject of general and bitter protest. Even in the United States of late years Sunday labor has in many ways much increased." The facts mentioned in this quotation suggest one use of the Lord's day. We can create sentiment in favor of legislation for the protection of those who will be driven to work seven days in the week if the state does not come to their aid. There is work that must be done on Sunday. But we have a right to ask whether it is men or sheep in the minds of those who demand seven days of labor every week from their employees. The deed of mercy must be allowed; we must fight the demand of greed.

A School Day.

We as citizens legislate for the protection of the weak in their right to a day of rest. As Christians we use the day for placing before the men the claims of Jesus Christ. A Sunday of idleness may be worse than a Sunday of toil. Accidents on Monday tell the story of Sunday carousals. Men are not free until they have the truth in their hearts. The large proportion of nominal disciples in the churches emphasizes the need of instruction for church members. Worship will be full of superstition if the worshippers are not taught the character of the God whom they seek to honor. The home and the Sunday-school have given to them in the Lord's day an opportunity for impressing upon the children the truth as it is in Christ. To avail themselves of this opportunity neither institution is required to repress the joyous feelings of child life. If the child is loved as Jesus loves him, what he learns about Jesus will add to his joy.

The Ministry of Life

By Rev. Parker Stockdale

(Concluded from last week.)

It hurt our feelings to cut Mr. Stockdale's address in two. Only the necessities of our space justified us. The address was prepared to be spoken and we would advise our readers to go back to last week's issue and "get a good start" rather than to attempt to "hitch on" when the speech is moving at such speed.—EDITORS.

Next: Jesus is the creative person. Christianity blossomed out of his heart, and all happy life has come from the grave of our risen Lord. The New Testament with its heroic personalities, its divine ideas and ideals, its power and regenerating influences, grew out of the mind and heart of Christ—the new humanity began in him. Christianity has its organizations but these are imperfect—Christianity has its person and he is dynamic and creative. There is a doctrine of the Christ and the Christ declared a doctrine, but after all the every-day Christian life grows out of a personal fellowship with the Son of God.

> But warm, sweet, tender even yet.
> A present help is He
> And faith has yet its Olivet
> And love its Galilee.

Jesus made everything center in himself. This was the original and distinctive significance of his ministry. With unprecedented audacity, masterful self-confidence, and supreme personal authority he announced himself to be the way, the truth and the life. With serene and quiet power he asked men to follow him, to love him, to suffer for him, to live and die for him. He gave not a philosophy of life, not a system of thought, not a set of rules for action, but without hesitation he offered himself as the sum and substance of all truth and goodness. He said: I if I be lifted up will draw all men unto myself. No man can come unto the Father but by me. It is eternal life to know God and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent. Whosoever believeth on me hath eternal life. I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth on me shall never die. What a stupendous and unparalleled emphasis upon the personal element and claim.

Brethren, this personal note must be sounded again, for it is the key-note to which is set all the song of Christian joy and service. We must get back across the creeds and ecclesiasticisms of humanity and history—back to the presence of the Great Person. Then we shall see how the Christ living in us creates the Christian life and this life finds its ultimate and essential expression in service—a ministry of life where one gives not simply his money, his influence, his time, but himself in the complete consecration of all his personal powers.

Again: Our ministry in life to be Christian must be a social service. After coming to see the real doctrine of greatness through service, after discovering that the higher and larger life comes through the loss of the selfish and lower one, and coming to understand that this service and sacrifice must be personal and spontaneous, it is now necessary to see that the world must have a vital realization of this service in all the relations of life. Our ministry is not of the cathedral and monastery. It is true that often we must go to the mountain tops of transfiguration for vision and interpretation, but these altitude experiences must come to worthful work in the shadowed valleys where live the sick and sinful. Our service is in field and factory, marketplace and fireside. We are ceasing to make the traditional and superficial distinctions between the sacred and secular. All days are holy days, if we do some useful work. All places are holy places if men, women and little children receive there the benediction which comes through the living ministry of a loving Christian. The old sacerdotalisms, cold, hard, exclusive and aristocratic, formulating the false dualisms of holy church and sinful world, living Christ and written creed, reverent worship and slavish work, a visionary Christianity and a solid science, are passing with the growing vision of a practical every-day Christianity in all the walks and ways of men. The world is Christ's workshop, the commonest work is Christ's service, and science is one of the highways leading towards God's love and truth.

Jesus dignified all useful labor at the carpenter's bench. He glorified our common duties and taught us that the true ministry of life is doing gladly the work next at hand and heart.

> Joy is a duty—so with golden lore,
> The Hebrew rabbis taught in days of yore.
> And happy human hearts heard in their speech,
> Almost the highest wisdom man can reach.
>
> But one bright peak still rises far above,
> And there the Master stands whose name is Love;
> Saying to those whom heavy tasks employ,
> Life is divine when duty is a joy.

Jesus left the temple for the street. He went among the sad and poor, not as priest, not as friend. His only dignity was that born of a serene goodness, his only authority that created by the truth within his heart, and his boundless influence was produced alone by the ministry he wrought among all—the high, the low, the rich and the poor.

The tragedy of the modern church is its failure to minister to the everyday needs of the community in which it is located. Alas for the Christian community which has no ministry in a community which is not Christian. Today we hear much about the problems of our country, especially of the cities. The saloon, the slum, the ignorant emigrant, the labor troubles, the selfishness of the rich and the impotence of the uncultivated poor, challenge the redemptive forces of Christianity and demand the most heroic and gracious ministry since Jesus lived and loved.

> In the beauty of the lilies
> Christ was born across the sea,
> With a glory in his bosom
> That transfigures you and me.
> As he died to make men holy,
> Let us die to make men free.

E. L. Powell says that if today we go into actual life among busy and earnest people two things will be evident: "The demand on the part of the men of the marketplace is for a Christianity that is simple, direct, straightforward, positive and aggressive. Men do not care for the facts with which theology has to do. They do not care for the method of the manufacture of violins, they do care for the music. They do not care for technicalities; they do care for realities. I believe that, if the pulpits of today will bring to men the simple, unadorned Christianity of Christ, the men will hear it. They do not wish to be troubled and confused and vexed by metaphysical subtleties and vain speculations in connection with which there is neither information nor enrichment. Another thing will be discovered. The temper of masculine humanity in the marketplace is demanding that the gospel shall make demands on them that shall be worth while. I believe that one reason why men stay away from the churches today is because the pulpit is bringing a soft and effeminate message to them rather than the virile, heroic message of the gospel. We invite them to a drawing room when they are waiting to hear the sound of a trumpet summoning them to the battlefield. We play for their amusement upon the flute when they are listening for the bugle. It has always been true in the history of the world that men will answer to the heroic. Jesus made that appeal. He did not say unto men, "Come and be entertained, come and let me play for you and sing for you, come and be charmed by the beautiful things I may say unto you." What was his message? If any man come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me. A gas-lighted and flower-scented Christianity does not meet the requirements of masculine humanity, and the pulpit might as well understand now, if it desires to reach men, that it must once again lift up the cross and say unto men, "Here is your opportunity for heroic endeavor and self-sacrificing service in the interest of humanity."

Brethren, we must get the vision of Jesus. Our lives must minister to all. We must get away from all that represents a selfish, ecclesiastical aristocracy into the summer atmosphere of a warm-hearted brotherhood where grow and ripen all the harvest fruits of love.

> The parish priest of austerity
> Climbed up into a high church steeple
> To be nearer to God, so that he might hand
> His word down to the people.
> And in sermon script he daily wrote
> What he thought was sent from heaven,
> And dropped it down on the people's heads
> Two times one day in seven.
>
> In his age, God said, Come down and die,
> And he cried out from the steeple:
> "Where art thou Lord?" And the Lord replied:
> "Down here among my people."

Beloved, if we are to minister unto Christ we must forever visit the sick, go unto him who is in prison, feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty and clothe the naked.

Tonight my message is especially directed to the young Christians of our churches. We call them members of the Christian Endeavor Society. Someone has said that human progress is neither rapid nor regular, potent nor permanent for good, when it does not in some way educate and elevate the youth of the race. The Christian Endeavor movement has educated multitudes of young Christians in the message and mission of Christianity. It has given them the true meaning of life, and taught them how to use it. Through its influence they have become disciples of Christ and servants of man. It has put to work in our churches and communities a thousand forces hitherto undeveloped and undirected in the lives of the young. It has kindled a thousand fires of enthusiasm and inspired many to live for Christ and humanity. It has been a mighty force for the promotion of Christian union. Is its work done? Has it fulfilled its mission? I answer that it has only commenced its working career if it holds within its deepest life the truths proclaimed here tonight. It must not crystalize into a serene self-satisfaction over past achievements. It must not cultivate a spirit of isolation from the church. It must forever remember that it is a movement within the church and for the development of all the powers in the service of Christ. While it must never cease to do the distinctive work which in the past has given to it influence and authority, the time has come as never before when Christian Endeavor must mean Christian service.

During recent times among the Disciples of Christ there has been witnessed an unprecedented enthusiasm in the teaching of God's word. We glory in this and rejoice in the multitude of trained teachers throughout our brotherhood. But I predict a pathetic reaction if we do not now take up the cry for training in the doing of God's work. Our truth must be transmuted into service and our churches must become centers of giving love. Our Christian Endeavor Societies must be trained in all the meanings of the Christian ministry.

The history of the world proves the validity of this law of service. And the history of the race is after all the biography of great souls, and the biography of great souls is the story of those immortals who invested their gifts for the good and growth of all. The fearless men who sailed uncharted seas, the intrepid men who turned virgin soil to sun and rain, the strong men who died for right on a thousand fields of glory, the statesmen who placed right above might and law above greed, the inventors who discovered and commanded the forces of the world, the philosophers who taught the love of truth, the poets who sang gladness into human hearts, the martyrs who in all times and climes toiled, suffered and endured—these are the great men who need no Hall of Fame to perpetuate their memories—they must live not alone in books and bronze and marble, for they live in the world they made better in the hearts they made holier. Leonidas protecting the western world with epic heroism, Socrates teaching a gracious morality in an age of superstition, Moses leading a people to freedom, Pericles consecrating a city to beauty and culture, Paul propounding at the cost of his life a doctrine high as heaven and pure as the dawn, Columbus giving in poverty the untold treasures of a continent, Dante becoming a voice for ten dark and silent centuries, Luther thundering protest against a worldly church, Edison wooing with wizard wisdom the secrets of the electric witch, O'Connell and Henry pleading with superhuman eloquence for the rights of man, the kingly Washington and the immaculate Maid of Orleans holding aloft unstained banners, Raphael glorifying humanity in the apotheosis of motherhood, Lincoln loving a nation into imperishable grandeur, Carey taking the gospel across the seas—these great souls, along with all the unnamed and unnumbered servants of God and man, unknown and unsung, teach us that we enter into greatness and glory when like Jesus the Christ of God and the Servant of all we go forth into the world not to be ministered unto but to minister and to give our life.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates.

TWO PRINCIPLES OF UNITY.

One of the simplest methods for securing unity in the church has been the method of exclusion. This principle is abundantly illustrated in the history of the church. The church learned it from the example of the Roman Emperors, who were passionately devoted to the unity and peace of the empire. When the Emperor Decius found that a great many of his subjects were not burning incense before the statues of the Emperor, according to the requirments of the Roman state religion, he issued a decree commanding all the people of the Empire to worship the Emperor on pain of death. There were many of his subjects called Christians who refused to obey, and were put to death. In this way he secured unity of faith and practice among his people.

When the Christians came to power in the Roman Empire it was their turn to enforce unity of faith and practice after the same process—the method of exclusion. It became the favorite method of the Roman Catholic Church. Excommunication from the fellowship and sacraments of the church was one of the mildest expressions of this principle; but when this did not secure unity, the dissenter or heretic was burned at the stake, or hung on the gallows. It was to secure unity and peace that Pope Innocent III undertook the crusade against the Albigenses in 1209, in which thousands of men, women and children were put to death, in the name of "the faith once for all delivered" to the popes. It was to secure faith and practice that Jerome of Prague, John Huss and Savanarola were put to death.

The plan was simple enough. These men were teaching things that were contrary to the doctrines taught by the church, and they were making converts among the people. It seemed to do no good to tell the people that the doctrines were new, were not held by the fathers, and were dangerous to the faith and practice of the church and the souls of men. The people still went to hear them preach. When the preachers were put in prison and forbidden to preach, they wrote books and the people read them. When their books were commanded to be burned the people hid them away and read them in secret. Heresy continued to spread in spite of all these measures. There was one thing else that could be done—these preachers could be put to death and forever stop their speaking and writing. That was the simplest and easiest method—a little severe, but justifiable, because it delivered the people from the soul-destroying heresies of the preachers. Then it was good for the preachers, for just before they were tied to the stake the priest absolved them from all sin, even the sin of their heresy, and secured them entrance into the heavenly world; whereas, if they had continued to live they might have fallen into other sins and died without the absolution of the church. The end was made to justify the means. So salutary an end as the good of the soul and the purification of the church, justified even the shedding of blood.

Peace and Unity by Exclusion.

This same principle of securing unity still survives in the church. The isolation of the poisonous teaching, the exclusion of the dangerous teacher from contact with the people, the transfer of his membership from "our brotherhood" to some other denomination to which he really belongs," will solve the problem of peace and unity—so Lexington and Cincinnati think. If Prof. Willett will just get out of the brotherhood, and with him every one who believes as he does, that will leave in the brotherhood only those who believe as we do, and then we will have unity and peace—so says Lexington and Cincinnati. Just see how fine it will be for Willett, for he will have with him only those who think as he does. Then they will have peace. But suppose someone in the brotherhood controlled by Lexington and Cincinnati should happen to teach something contrary to Creed of Lexington—what would you do? We would just put him out and all who believed with him, so they could form a new denomination and have peace; then we would have peace and unity again in the ranks controlled by Cincinnati and Lexington. But suppose still another teacher should rise up teaching new ideas, what would you do? We would do the same thing as in former cases.

That would mean a new denomination every time there was difference of opinion according to the Lexington and Cincinnati plan. This plan, then, of keeping on the watch for heresy, and raising an alarm every time a man departs from "the faith once for all delivered" to Lexington, means division and new denominations. For what is the point gained in smelling out and chasing down heretics at so great a cost of time and labor and good feeling, if after the heretic has been caught and branded, he is let go again among the churches. No, that will not do. This heresy-hunting business calls for action on the part of the elders of churches, missionary secretaries and program committees. It is their business to keep track of the heretic pilloried by Lexington and Cincinnati and "let them alone" in the making of convention programs. If they forget it is not difficult to remind them; but if they still do not heed on second or third warning, the machinery of shut-out and boycott will be brought into play. What is the use of exposing a heretic, if the brotherhood forgets about it. The brotherhood must be inflamed to take sides for or against the heretic. That means discord and division; but it is justifiable because it brings unity of opinion to that part of the brotherhood controlled by Lexington and Cincinnati; and satisfaction to the leaders of the heresy-hunting expedition. The heretic hunter cannot be cheated of his prey—that would disappoint him and bring his business into disrepute.

The Irony of It.

What an irony it is that the Disciples should have given birth to a guild of heresy hunters who are able to thrive in their business and menace the peace of the brotherhood. Such a business belongs to the denominations that have a creed to defend, and ecclesiastical machinery to protect. But not to the Disciples—that people of freedom, with a simple confession of faith in Jesus as their creed, where widest difference of opinion is made consistent with loyalty to Jesus for the sake of an all-inclusive union of his followers. Strange indeed that a movement to bring to trial the belief of a man concerning the historicity of Old Testament events could take root among a people whose only test of fellowship is faith in Jesus as Lord and Redeemer. Some one must have misread the spirit and purpose of this movement to be able to raise the question of a man's loyalty to Jesus on the strength of his attitude toward an Old Testament event. That is mixing up essentials and non-essentials, faith and opinion, with a vengeance.

The Principle of Comprehension.

The business of the Disciples is the inclusion within one fellowship of all who belong to Christ. This is their peculiar and matchless contribution to the unity of Christendom, that all who are in fellowship with Christ, are entitled to fellowship with all Christ's people. This operated at once as a principle of inclusion and addition.

When the Disciples dared an answer to the question, "who are disciples of Christ," in terms of New Testament discipleship, they made an epoch in Christian history. Some one has said concerning the Disciples that their distinguishing contribution to the world is, "the simplicity of Christian discipleship." It was something new and startling when they first declared before the world that they proposed to make first century terms of Christian fellowship nineteenth century terms of fellowship. A new census of Christendom had to be taken and the number of the elect was instantly increased when the Campbells declared that those were disciples of Christ who professed "their faith in him and obedience to him in all things, according to his word."

By reducing the terms of discipleship they increased the number of disciples. Many who had been read out of Christian fellowship by the un-Christian tests of fellowship written into the creeds, were surprised to find that they were still disciples of Christ. They believed in Jesus, but they did not believe in predestination, election and the damnation of infants. They believed in the life of love and human service, but they did not believe in total depravity and human inability. They passed all the tests of discipleship applied in the New Testament, but they did not pass the tests applied in the creeds. They were once more included among those who were called Christians.

The sublime mission of the Disciples is one of inclusion and comprehension, not of exclusion. It is contrary to the very genius of their movement to study points of disagreement, to emphasize differences among brethren, and to trump up causes and occasions for reading men out of Christian fellowship. They sought a basis of union as broad as God's eternal purpose of redemption, which should give standing room within the church for every soul "called according to the purpose of his will." And that will is no narrow, exacting, theological hair-splitting will, which suspends a decree of exclusion from his fellowship at the end of a closely woven argument in support of his power to make the sun stand still, or to make an axe float on the water. His will is not that his children should believe in the marvelous tales of a book to please him, but that they should love one another. The denial of love in one's treatment of his brethren is a greater heresy in God's sight than the denial of any or of all miracles in both Old and New Testaments.

THE TRIANGULAR CONGRESS

November 10, 11 and 12

The following is the program of the twenty-sixth annual session of the Baptist Congress (Baptists, Disciples and Free Baptists) to be held in the Memorial Church, Chicago, Ill., November 10, 11 and 12, 1908. The sessions begin at 2:30 p. m., Tuesday. Rev. Dr. J. L. Jackson of Chicago is the president. President Harry Pratt Judson of the University of Chicago and Bishop Samuel Fallows will deliver addresses of welcome.

1. "Does the N. T. Contemplate the Church as an Institution?" Writers (Baptist), Prof. J. H. Logan, D. D., Hamilton, N. Y.; (Disciple), Rev. A. W. Fortune, Cincinnati, Ohio. Speakers (Baptist) Rev. W. B. Wallace, Cleveland, Ohio; (Free Baptist), Prof. Shirley J. Case, Ph. D., Chicago.

THE DAWN AT SHANTY BAY

By Robert E. Knowles, Author "St. Cuthberts" and "The Undertow"

CHAPTER III.

"'Twixt the Gloamin' an' the Mirk."

Surely there is never twilight in all the year like the twilight of Christmas Eve. How ominously it creeps upon the world, portent of the approaching dawn, herald of the throbbing day that is waiting at the door. But in what different fashions is it greeted by those to whom it brings its differing message! Childhood, rapture-bound, hails it as the hem of the garment in which the Mystic Messenger of the night, treasure-laden, shall creep to childhood's crib; wiser with the years, youth loves it still for the sweet delusion, exposed and thrilless now, that once interwove its spell with the very texture of the dusk; older still, the brooding parent heart greets it for enchanted childhood's sake, or checks the choking sob that rises with the memory of once eager hearts now forever still, the vision of once radiant faces now wrapped in the long slumber that no Christmas bells can rouse. And old age, the tumult nearly past, will hail the Christmas twilight with reverent peace, well pleased that the gloaming hastens to make straight the path for the Eternal Day whose sun shall no more go down.

The darkness was falling fast as Ronald Robertson made his way toward the country village that adjoined his farm, its scattered lights coming to the rescue one by one, twinkling bravely as they joined their forces against the encircling gloom. One solitary bell alone did the hamlet boast, ringing out lustily from the steeple of St. Paul's Episcopal, telling as best it could, single handed though it was, the golden tidings of the approaching morn.

But for half a lifetime Ronald had trained himself to hold this bell at bay, scorning its heterodox observance of times and seasons that Scripture did not teach; especially had he resented its pealing effort to hallow the twenty-fifth of December, which, as Ronald was swift to affirm, had no higher ordination than a mere man-made almanac could impart.

Nevertheless, the flavor of Christmas was about him, even though he knew it not. Unconsciously stirred, the spirit of reminiscence was upon him as he trudged through the listening snow. Of many things was he thinking; of his early life, when poverty, as well as principle, made Christmas a forbidden day; of Heaven's gracious gift when one of the sweetest of Canadian girls had become his wife; of succeeding years, each one adding to his treasure, till ample fortune had come his own; of Hugh, his only son, and all the Christmas pleasures that his mother, more indulgent, had supplied him; of later years, bringing with them Hugh's deviation from the path, and of all the blinding storm that had broken from that sullen cloud; of the loneliness that now reigned at home, his wife's yearning grief, his own stolid sorrow. He could not but think, too, of his Scotch forbears and the hitherto unstained name they bore; of their love for the ancient Church of Scotland and its severe and simple service; upon the changing times he reflected, and the flippant mummeries that the day age dignified by the name of Progress. His mind reverted to the talk he had had with Ephraim, and, in consequence, to the innovations that had grieved his Presbyterian spirit and driven him from the kirk his mother died in blessing. Thus mentally absorbed, Ronald did not notice the approach of a familiar figure till he was almost under the tower of St. Paul's. A cheery voice arrested him.

"Isn't that elegant, Ronald?"

"What's that?" cried Ronald, his face brightening as he saw the other's through the dusk. "What's that ye're sayin', Ephraim?"

"Isn't that slick?" Ephraim repeated, varying the adjective alone. "Isn't that elegant for Christmas music?" pointing upward to the church steeple as he spoke; "it makes a fellow think of the angelic choir," he concluded fervidly.

"I canna hear what ye're sayin'—yon ungodly bell's makin' sic a clatter; what's it bellerin' aboot? It's no' the Sabbath Day."

"The Episcopals are havin' church," roared Ephraim. "Mebbe they don't have it till the mornin'—this is a kind of a preliminary canter."

"Service for a Christmas mornin'!" said Ronald pityingly, his voice exalted high; "they'll be haein' the Pope to preach till them, nae doot—an' mebbe he'll hae a wee bit stockin' hangin' roon' his neck, an' a swamp-cedar ower his arm." This last was delivered with as much scorn as was consistent with the effort of shouting into Ephraim's ear.

"Come on a bit ahead; this would deefen a man," said his auditor, moving onward as he spoke. Ronald followed, and soon the two men were beyond the sound-belt.

"Where you bound for?" Ephraim asked.

"I'm gaein' to the doctor's; I want to hae a crack wi' him aboot the wife."

"How is she?" asked the other.

"Oh, she's no' sae bad—she's fine, but she has thae bits o' tired turns. I'm feart she's frettin' a deal.'

"What's she frettin' about, if it's a fair question?"

"Oh, I guess ye ken; there's but yin thing her and me has to fash oorsels aboot—I'm thinkin' ye ken what it is."

"The boy?" Ephraim ventured after a pause.

"Aye, it's the boy—the laddie, his mither ca's him."

"That's like a mother—a Scotch mother," remarked Ephraim. "And what do you call him yourself?"

Ronald waited a minute. "I ca' him—the yin that's awa," he said presently.

A considerable silence followed. Ephraim broke it abruptly.

"You're wrong, Ronnie," he began solemnly.

"Wrang," exclaimed the other. "What way am I wrang?"

"About Hugh. The lad made a mistake, I know—but you set up to be a Christian; an' you ought to forgive him and bring him back. It's breakin' his mother's heart; an' what's the use o' talkin' about God forgivin' folks, if you don't try your hand at the business yourself?"

"Aye, that's a' verra weel," interrupted Ronald. "But ye ken there's sic a thing as justice—th' Almichty Himsel' doesna forgive wi'oot certain conditions."

"Sure," replied the other. "I can't help admirin' the folks you class yourself with—but the Almighty always loves, I reckon. And if you loved Hugh, you'd forgive him too."

"What's that ye're sayin', Ephraim?" Ronald cried, sharpness in his tone. "Div ye mean I dinna love the—the—yin that's awa frae us? I doot ye've gone ower far wi' yir remarks," and Ephraim could not but notice the pain in his companion's voice. Drawing closer, he slipped his arm, not without an awkward kind of tenderness, over Ronald's shoulder.

"I know, Ronald—I know," he said. "Of course you love your son. An' I'm a peach, to be talkin' religion to anyone! But I know you love him—and why don't you bring him back?"

He felt the strong frame quiver as he waited for an answer. When it came, the words were quivering too.

"Aye, I love him—he's his mother's laddie, onyway; but there's sic a thing as justice—an' forbye," his eyes glowing through the dusk with a strong and wistful light, "forbye, we dinna ken where he bides. Here we are—this is the doctor's hoose," an he turned in quickly at the half-open gate.

But his errand was fruitless; the doctor was absent on a prolonged visit to the country.

"The lassie says he'll no' be back till late—I'll gang hame again," said Ronald, preparing to retrace his steps.

"Wait a minute," interjected Ephraim. "I've got a little business on hand myself; you just come along with me—mebbe I'll need you."

"Where micht ye be gaein'?"

"Well, I'll tell you," replied Ephraim. "I'm goin' to that singin'-woman, as you call her—to Mrs. Marlatt's, over there at that little house I told you about. I've got a little scheme on there—and I might want your help."

"The singin'-buddy!" cried Ronald in dismay. "I'll no gang there wi' ye—they tell me she's a Yankee, onyway."

"Well, suppose she is; they're mostly harmless. Anyhow, you've got to go," Ephraim retorted.

"I'll no gang—what has the likes o' me to dae wi' solo-singers?" Ronald responded.

"But I tell you you will—she's sick."

"She's what?"

"She's sick—I don't think she's long for here. An' her little girl's the sweetest thing in town; I told you that once afore," said Ephraim, steadily moving in the direction of the little house, Ronald following, protesting as he went.

"What kind o' a scheme, as ye ca' it, hae ye got on hand?"

"Oh, just a little celebration—innocent as milk," Ephraim exclaimed.

"Some o' thae Christmas flummeries?" inquired Ronald, suspiciously.

"Wait an' see for yourself—here's the house now," and Ephraim turned toward the door, his arm by this time interlocked with his friend's.

He knocked gently, and in a moment the door was opened by a child of somewhere about eight years of age. Beautiful to look upon she certainly was. The childish face, bright with the light of intelligence, was full of simple earnestness; large glowing eyes, eloquent of trustfulness and of hope as yet unbruised, bespoke the wistful longing of an eager soul that had still gazed with wondering sadness at life's encircling mystery. The white forehead stood out, broad and radiant, from the ringlet wealth of sunny hair; the cheeks, too white and pale, were yet redeemed to beauty by the bright glow, too bright by far, that burned amid the pallor; the gently curving lips, exquisitely formed, seemed to share the quest of the tender eyes, responsive to every inward emotion, the outer playground for the inner life of thought and impulse. The whole countenance, indeed, testified to the fact that her childhood-life had been touched with care, heavier far than is, happily enough, the familiar experience of such early years.

The child's eyes glistened as they fell on Ephraim Raynor. "Oh, come in," she said eagerly. "Come away in. Mother'll be so glad to see you—she isn't any better."

Ephraim presented his friend, whom the little girl greeted cordially, welcome for the other's sake. As they entered the humble house, Ronald looked warily about, his misgivings with regard to Yankees in general and church soloists in particular showing on his face. A solitary lamp cast its rather feeble light over what seemed the only apartment in the house while a bulky coal stove, generously ladened, dispensed its grateful cheer; at one corner of the room, a large calico curtain had been hung, the view behind completely hidden.

Then Ronald's eye fell upon an old-fashioned bed, evidently provided for an emergency, which had its place at the corner opposite. One had only to glance at the unhappy occupant of the homely couch, to discern the source of the child's rare spiritual beauty; for her features were fashioned in minute and faithful likeness to the wasted face upon the pillow.

CHAPTER IV.

The Pious Perjury.

Startled by what he saw, Ronald stopped, glancing backward toward the door that had just closed behind him. But his guide and counsellor and friend, remarking the hesitation, cut off all possible retreat.

"Mrs. Marlatt," he said, withdrawing his hand from the pallid palm upon the counterpane, "I've brought a friend to see you. This is Mr. Robertson, Ronald Robertson—you've heard me speak of him. Come on, Ronald."

Ronald, robed in confusion, bowed reverently from where he stood. With the mystic faculty that marks the noblest of his race, he could detect, even from afar, the muffled footfall of the King of Terrors. But the white hand was outstretched; and his step was almost noiseless as he moved forward to the bed, taking the proffered hand into his own; fevered hot it was, but something of delicate refinement and subtle winsomeness stole forth from it, thrilling the rough and furrowed palm that held it in a clasp more tender than it knew.

"I'm glad you've brought your friend," the woman said, glancing at Ephraim, and the voice was husky that spoke the words. "I saw him in the Presbyterian chapel," she added, smiling playfully toward her new acquaintance. Ronald recognized the reference in a moment, and the robe of his confusion clung tighter than before.

"I'm sorry ye're sae sick," he began hesitatingly. "An' I ken fine what ye're meanin' aboot the kirk—ye're referrin' till the way I walkit oot the door when ye sang yon hymn."

He paused, embarrassed. But the woman's smile was sweeter than before, and Ronald found himself wondering why he had been so hasty.

"I didn't blame you," she said very sweetly. "I knew what it was—it was when I bowed at the name of Jesus; you remember."

"Aye—aye, that was juist it," Ronald began, falteringly. "Aye, that was juist aboot it, madam. But I didna blame ye," he hastened on, repeating her own words; "I laid it till the minister an' the elders. They was brocht up better, ye ken," he concluded confidentially, dimly fearful that he was floundering sadly.

Strange are the features of merriment when upon the human face they mingle with the signature of death. But nothing less than merriment it was that broke from eye and lip as Ronald's auditor gazed into the strong set face of her visitor, and marked the stern intensity of his voice. Unfamiliar with his kind, the type was new and highly interesting.

"I sang it the way I used to in the church at home," she said at length. "It's a church hymn, I think."

"What church?" Ronald asked abruptly.

"Oh—the Church, I said; the Church of England, of course."

"Oh, aye," Ronald responded significantly. "I thocht mebbe ye was meanin' the Kirk o' Scotland—it's kind o' perplexin', ye ken," smiling amiably into the interested face before him. "What way micht ye come to ca' it the English kirk? Ephraim tells me ye're a Yankee—an' they maistly ca's it th' Episcopal," he ventured with an inquiring glance.

A note of subdued laughter came from the woman's lips. "I'm no Yankee; Mr. Raynor must be mistaken. I came here from the States, of course. But I'm an English woman—Mildred was born in Exeter," glancing as she spoke toward her child, now enthroned on Ephraim's knee, thrilling to some tale of wonder.

"Oh, aye—I ken," Ronald answered, considerable curiosity in his voice. "That'll be where ye was married, tae, will it no'?"

"Yes, I was married there," she said, her tone hushed and sad.

"That'll be where the little yin's faither died?" Ronald ventured, as considerately as he might.

It must be said, to justify what followed, that the light which flickered from the solitary lamp was subdued and dim—and the introduction of soul to soul is but seldom effected in the garish day. All of friendship's commerce is, after all, a kind of courtship, nobler by virtue of its freedom from all grosser tinge of passion. And all truest friendship ripens amid the twilight; it may have its beginning beneath the glowing sun of prosperity and happiness, but it is only the tender dark that can bring it to its sweet maturity. It is alone the sacred light which darkness, or semi-darkness, casts, that reveals to each other kindred hearts, closer drawn together in loyalty and love to await the dawn that never yet was born but from the womb of night.

Such tender shadows took this new-formed friendship of Ronald and this outgoing woman into their fruitful keeping. The dim flickering of the lamp was there, and there, too, were the invisible shadows of a deeper darkness, creeping ever closer, herding these two hearts together, nearer to the Central Light.

Besides, Mildred and Ephraim were far enough away, the fascination of the unreal upon them both, as the ingenious story-teller wove the wondrous web. Moreover, and to be remembered most of all in cases such as this, the confidence that flows from one soul to another is not a matter of time at all. Days and years it holds in worthy scorn; who has not known the luxury of finding a friend in an hour, unquestioning its heaven-source, as thirsty travelers question not the new-found spring, unmade of human hands, that leaps in crystal fullness at their feet?

Thus did it come about, amid the flickering shadows, that Mrs. Marlatt told to the silent listener beside her bed so much of the story of her life. Short and simple, and sad withal, were the annals of her past. Her girlhood life in England, her early marriage, the birth of her only child; the growing alienation of her husband, his lapse from sobriety and faithfulness, his final disappearance shortly after their arrival in America—these last were implied rather than expressly stated, the faltering voice telling sadly that his whereabouts were now unknown, the last vague tidings indicating that he had shipped as a common seaman on a vessel bound for Brazil.

"I wonder why I should have told you all this," she said, as she lay back half-exhausted on her pillow. "I have told it to few—almost to none; Mildred has no suspicion of it," she added in a lower tone; "she almost never asks about him—of course, she doesn't remember him except from hearing me speak about him."

"I thank ye for yir confidence," Ronald said simply. "Ye can trust me," and as the woman's eye looked through the semi-gloom into the strong set face above her, she knew what he said was true.

"I know I can," she said quickly. "Do you know, I always wanted to meet you since that day when you walked out of the church. When I learned what your reason was, I—I really respected you. I knew it was a principle with you—and yet I felt that you, as well as I, bowed to the Saviour's name."

Ronald's theological vigilance was wide awake again. "Aye, ma'am," he began, doubtful as to how he would conclude, "aye, ma'am, that's true, nae doot, in a certain sense—I bend the innard knee, ye ken."

But at this juncture, the mild debate was throttled in its birth by the advent of Ephraim's enraptured listener; she had slipped down from his arm, and now stood all aglow beside her mother's bed.

"Oh, mother," she began breathlessly, "Mr. Raynor heard the bells—he heard them twice," she exclaimed rapturously.

"What, darling?" the fond voice answered. "What bells did he hear?"

"Why, Santa Claus's bells, of course; the bells on his reindeers—he heard them twice. He's here—and Mr. Raynor's going out to tell him about me—you see I wasn't here last Christmas, and he's going to send him in. You are, aren't you, Mr. Raynor?" she urged, her curls gleaming in the feeble light as she turned her twinkling face up to Ephraim's.

"Yes, child," said Ephraim. "I sure heard the bells—an' I'm just going out now to send Santa Claus in. He's a jolly old fellow; so don't be afraid, honey—you must talk to him if you want to, and ask him anything you like. He loves little girls, you know."

Chill horror took possession of Ronald's soul, and his startled conscience loomed, as if enthroned, amid the storm upon his brow. He was thinking of Ephraim's soul; the outlook was dark, so far as he could see, and there swam before him a lurid picture of that lake of fire in which all liars have their well-earned part.

Ephraim saw his friend's disquietude; as he reached the door, he turned and cried, "Come on, Ronnie, come on with me."

The rigid Ronald started slowly after him; the child's voice broke in:

"Bring him back when you come, Mr. Raynor—I want him to see Santa Claus too."

"I'm afeard," began Ephraim, "I'm afeard he can't come back, honey; you see, he's got to—to—hold the reindeers while Santa Claus comes in."

"Oh, yes—oh, won't that be lovely? Here give them this," she cried gleefully, leaping to a little cupboard and springing back to Ronald in an instant, placing in his outraged hands as many lumps of sugar as her own could bear. "I'm sure reindeers just love sugar," she assured him.

Ronald walked toward the door like one in a dream, his hands outstretched despairingly with their perjured load. Ephraim's radiant face looked as if he had suddenly grown ten years younger; but Ronald groaned aloud, sore misgivings now arising in his heart lest the lake of fire might not be for Ephraim alone.

The two men turned the corner of the house before a word was spoken. Then Ronald turned savagely upon his friend.

"What's like the maitter wi' ye?" he demanded, still holding the glistening lumps in front of him. "What like daein's is this for twa Christian men—wi' yir sleigh-bells, an' yir Sandy Claws, an' yir buck-deer foolishness? Man, what the—the creation," he amended, "div ye mean?"

Ephraim listened undisturbed. "Don't get hot under the collar, Ronald," he said quietly. "An' don't keep pokin' that sugar at me like that—I don't want it; throw it away—there ain't no reindeers."

"Div ye think," Ronald fairly sputtered, "div ye think I didna ken yon aboot the reindeers was a lie? Ye needna be enlightenin' me. But I'm no gaein' to waste the sweeties, wi' hunnerds o' puir folk needin' bread," he avowed providently. "Yon was an awesome lie, aboot me standin' ootside, hangin' ontil yir reindeers by their bridles; I wouldna dae it—they'd paw a man's insides oot o' him in nae time. Forbye, there isn't yin to hang ontil—it was a fearsome lie. Man, Ephraim, div ye ever think o' yir latter end?"

By this time Ronald had extracted his red pocket-handkerchief, carefully wrapping within it the treasure that must not be wasted.

"There's a Christmas tree in there," Ephraim announced calmly, after the storm was somewhat spent. He pointed toward the little house.

"A what?" exclaimed Ronald. "In where?"

"In the house—behind that curtain you saw. There's a Christmas tree in there; I fixed it last night and put a lot of pretty things on it. An' the little one doesn't know—she promised her mother this morning not to look."

"It's sair foolishness for the heid o' a family to be mixin' wi'," commented Ronald sadly. "Ye'd be better readin' yir Bible, Ephraim, I'm thinkin'."

"It's too dark," Ephraim replied laconically. "Besides, I've got to get busy. Ronald, do you know what you've got to do?"

"Me!" said Ronald, "I'm no gaein' to dae onything—I'm gaein' hame."

"No, you're not, not by a long chalk—you've got to be the Santa Claus, Ronnie." And Ephraim's voice was low and sweet.

"Heigh!" Ronald almost shouted, doubtful of his own hearing, "what's that ye're sayin'? I've got to be what?"

"Santa Claus," returned Ephraim quietly. "That's what you've got to be, Ronald. I'd like to be it myself—but there's more or less talkin' that's got to be done, and the youngster knows my voice. I might disguise it a little—but this is far better; she hardly heard you speak."

"But ye dinna mean to say," Ronald interrupted, "as ye're tryin' to get an auld man like me to mak a fool o' himself like that?"

"You've got to do it, Ronnie. There's no one else, an' we can't disappoint the little one; what would the good Lord think of two grown-up men like us, breakin' faith with one poor little girl like that?"

"But div ye no ken it's actin' a part, Ephraim—man, ye're tryin' to get me to lend mysel' till a lie," remonstrated Ronald, struggling to lift the debate on to higher ground. "Ye canna understaun the way I feel aboot it; yin o' my grandfaithers—I had only twa—yin was a minister, an' the ither was an elder."

"Well, suppose they were; they'll never know—neither of them's around. Come on, let's try an' give the kid one happy night—she'll be wondering what's gone wrong;" and by dint of coaxing, pleading, cajoling, he at last bore Ronald on with him to the door of an adjoining shed. "Come on in here," he said.

"What for?" Ronald inquired cautiously.

"I hid a few duds here—you'll have to put them on."

"Duds!" cried Ronald in dismay. "Pit them on! Is it claes ye mean?"

"Ay, it's claes," retorted Ephraim, imitating the Doric. "It's claes! You'd make a nice Santa Claus without any fixtures, wouldn't you? Here, put this on first."

Ronald glowered about, submitting the darkened shed to a general scrutiny; then he focused his gaze upon the article Ephraim was proffering. His jaw fell in amazement.

"Pit it on! Pit the likes o' that on me!" perplexity and pathos mingling in his voice. "Wud ye listen till the fule?—man, div ye ken what ye're reachin' at me? It's a pillow—div ye hear me? I tell ye, it's a pillow, a sleepin' pillow for a bed!" he elaborated, the definition reeking with contempt.

"That's what it is," Ephraim acknowledged. "I got the loan of it from the tavern—put it on," he concluded quietly.

"Where'll I pit it on?" Ronald fairly roared, thinking thus to settle the matter. "On my little finger?" he inquired with withering scorn.

"No, on your stomach," Ephraim informed him soberly; "inside your vest—Santa Claus has a paunch on him like a rain barrel; he lives high, you see—fattens up in the winter."

Ronald gasped; but already the eager Ephraim was busy applying the pillow.

"My wes'-coat'll no button," Ronald murmured in a low, dramatic tone, as though the disappointment of his life had come.

"Don't matter," assured Ephraim. "I've got something that will—keep your hand on that;" and Ronald was left alone a minute, solemnly pressing the sudden enlargement to the neighborhood of his bosom, while Ephraim extracted an ample garment from a barrel in the corner. It was much the worse for wear.

"Here, this'll meet," he exclaimed cheerily as he wrapped a huge coonskin coat about the composite frame. Through the encircling collar he could see the look of gray despair on Ronald's face, and it pleased him well. Quickly he added an ancient cap, a pair of gauntlets and a flaming muffler that encircled the imperial waist, binding the frontal endowment to its place. The final touch came with the adjustment of a mask, rosy-cheeked and ample-bearded, from which Ronald's eyes looked out in helpless pleading.

"Tak it off," he groaned beseechingly, "it's an ungodly business ye're forcin' on me. If I was to get my call, I'd be a fine figure in Heeven, luikin' through this pasteboard thing, wi' its sheep's wool for the hair on a buddie's heid. Forbye, I'm smotherin'—what div ye want me to dae?" he inquired plaintively, already being gently led toward the door. The child's eager face could be seen at the window.

"Do!" answered Ephraim, "you don't have to do nuthin' only act Santa Claus. Take the little trinkets off the tree an' give them to the youngster—an ' make nice little speeches"—(Ronald moaned audibly)—"an' tell her anything she asks. You'll get your reward in Heaven," he concluded, struggling vainly to control his features as Ronald walked solemnly on, both hands tenderly holding the abdominal addition to its place.

Brevities and Oddities.

Medical Student: "What did you operate on that man for?" Eminent Surgeon: "Two hundred dollars." Medical Student: "I mean, what did he have?" Eminent Surgeon: "Two hundred dollars."

A passenger on a Missouri River steamer, the other day, speaking of the muddy appearance of the stream, said: "But this water makes the best drinking water in the world after it is once fertilized." (He meant filtered.)

Arthur: "They say, dear, that people who live together get to look alike." Kate: "Then you must consider my refusal as final."

WITH THE WORKERS

The state Christian Endeavor convention in Oklahoma is to be held at Enid this week.

A. B. McCormick has held a two weeks' meeting in his own church at Lexington, O. There were forty-two added to the church.

The Central Christian Church of Uniontown, Pa., where J. Walter Carpenter ministers is having additions almost every Sunday, six coming on a recent Sunday.

The little church of nine members, organized at McBain, Michigan last summer by R. Bruce Brown, is now in a meeting. Five have been added by primary obedience.

A. R. Adams who is leaving Milestone, Sask is locating at Fremont, Michigan. T. W. Bellingham who has been ministering at Fremont goes to Benton Harbor.

The church at Benton Harbor, Michigan has improved its building at an expenditure of $400.

J. T. Alsup is closing his work at New Hampton, Mo., and is returning to Illinois. At the close of his pastorate the church is in a meeting with S. R. Reynolds and at last report over thirty had been added.

The church at Beaver Falls has dedicated a house costing $35,000. Geo. L. Snively assisted in the dedication. $6,300 was raised on dedication day. Much of the credit of the new building is due to the earnest efforts of the pastor, John Darby.

J. T. Adams has closed his meeting at Gutner, Neb., owing to the continued storms. Fifteen were added to the church and eleven hundred dollars raised to remodel the building.

A new church building have been dedicated at Swayzee, Indiana amid great rejoicing. L. L. Carpenter assisted in the dedication.

A. R. Adams has closed his work at Milestone, Sask. There were three confessions at the farewell service. His successor, Mr. Westiway, will be on the field very soon.

The church at Fort Collins, Colorado is preparing for a great meeting in November under the leadership of Allen Wilson. The ministry of the pastor, J. F. Findley, is being blessed, twenty-two having been added to the church in two Sundays recently.

C. L. Harbord has recently held a meeting at Williamstown, Mo., which resulted in eighteen additions to the church.

The church at Princeton, Illinois has had ten additions in two Sundays recently. Hopes of future success run high here.

R. H. Fife and son held a four weeks' meeting in Arcola, Illinois, which resulted in 106 being added to the church. It is said that exactly half of the number are men and boys. This feature is most encouraging.

W. M. Hoolett has held a meeting in his own church in Mount Auburn, Iowa, which resulted in thirteen additions in thirteen days.

The church at Duffield, Mo., has been having a harvest time recently. In a meeting with Mr. Kimball, twenty-one were added to the church. The ministry of the pastor, B. Matchett, had brought in seven additions just before the meeting began.

The official board of the church at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to which G. B. Van Arsdall ministers, recently voted unanimously and heartily to make the contribution of that church toward founding the Wharton Memorial Home for the children of Missionaries, in three annual offerings. This church is alive to every good work.

J. H. Jones held a twelve days' meeting with the Antioch Church in Cedar county, Missouri, with nine additions. He is now in a meeting at Half Way, Polk county, Missouri, with good prospects of success.

C. O. McFarland and wife, evangelists, have closed a nineteen days' meeting at Alvin, Illinois, with forty additions. Most of these were adults. They are now in a meeting at Bellflower, Missouri, where they have had to go into a hall for room.

The church at Salina, Kansas, is to have a great tabernacle meeting with Wilhite and Gates leading the forces. The Christian Century will be distributed to help in the good work. We are promised reports from time to time as the meeting progresses.

Miss Zonetta Vance spoke at the El Paso, Texas church one Sunday following the national convention at New Orleans.

Walla Walla, Wash., began a meeting the first Sunday of November, with J. L. Brandt and Byron L. Burdett.

Melvin Menges will labor in Matanzas, Cuba, instead of Havana as heretofore. There has been one confession at each of the last three services. It is reported that the work in Havana will not be continued.

The church at Santa Barbara, California, surprised the pastor, Sumner T. Martin, with some substantial gifts recently. Several additions by letter have occurred recently. The church begins revival services November eighth. Prof. Stout will lead the music.

Geo. L. Brandt spent the last week of October at Drake University, where he delivered six lectures and preached two sermons to large and appreciative congregations.

The church at Diagonal, Iowa, dedicated a new church last Sunday. They were assisted by L. L. Carpenter.

The church at Maysville, Kentucky, has secured the services of Roger L. Clerk, of Savannah, Georgia, who will begin his service with them January first.

The church at Harrison, Ohio, has extended a unanimous call to M. G. Long to remain as their pastor a third year.

R. B. Doan, of Clinton, Iowa, has been called to the work at Streator, Illinois. He expects to begin the new task about the first of December.

The church at Hereford, Texas, has begun a new building to cost $18,000. They are working under the leadership of S. T. Shore.

The enrollment at Christian University, Missouri, is reported to be seventy-five per cent more than last year. The number of ministerial students is double that of last year. President Johann is naturally very much pleased over these achievements as are we all. These young men are needed even before they begin their training.

The church at Ann Arbor, Michigan, has secured O. E. Tomes, of the Englewood church, Indianapolis, as their pastor. There were seventy-five additions during his two years in Indianapolis.

Allen T. Shaw held a meeting in Armongton, Illinois recently which resulted in thirteen additions, twelve by primary obedience. The church has been greatly strengthened by its recent experience. John C. Lappin is the pastor.

N. M. Ragland and Charles E. McVay, singer, are in a meeting at Springfield, Missouri. Mr. McVay has some open dates after December first.

Granville Snell of Mound City, Mo., writes: "The pastor and church at Mound City, Missouri, will begin special services Sunday, November eighth. This is a good church. Amen to your editorial on 'Peace—But How.' I shall do what I can for the circulation of the Century. It has a message which the church needs. You have a right to your notions. You are my brethren as are all that love the Lord Jesus."

There were six additions at the Northside Christian Church in Kansas City, Missouri last Sunday.

The revival services conducted by the minister, I. H. Fuller and Charles E. McVay, singer, closed with eight accessions. The church was greatly strengthened spiritually by Brother Fuller's sermons. Fremont is a city of 12,000 and is an important field. Mr. McVay leaves here for Springfield, Mo.

November twenty-nine, will be a high day with the church at East Orange, N. J. Z. T. Sweeney will dedicate their new church on that date. It is a handsome building, seating 1,200 people. Miner Lee Bates will also be present on dedication day. A good reed organ has recently been donated to the equipment of the church.

H. O. Breeden and Mr. Saxton have just closed a most successful series of evangelistic services at Columbia, Missouri. The meetings lasted nineteen days and resulted in 120 additions to the church, fifty by confession of faith. The pastor of the church is Madison Ashby Hart. He writes a most appreciative word concerning the work of the evangelists. He believes the results of the meeting are permanent and that they will minister much in developing the future of the church.

The church at Liberty, Missouri will begin a meeting with home forces on Sunday, November 8. The pastor is R. G. Frank. The church is rallying to the support of its minister in this good enterprise.

The Duluth, Minn. Church has been without a pastor for the last three months but has been fortunate in securing B. V. Black of Mankato. The church is extending the new workers a warm welcome to their community and is planning more aggressive service in behalf of its religious program.

The Portland Avenue Church, in Minneapolis is in a most vigorous condition at the present time. Miss Patterson and Mr. Pauly have been engaged to sing during the year, being paid by the Round Table. Attendance in Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor is much increased. P. J. Rice is the pastor.

M. C. Hughes of Bicknell, Indiana, has been called to the pastorate of the First Christian Church of Jeffersonville, Indiana. Brother Hughes has been with the Bicknell Church for two years and a half. He has done a great work at Bicknell. He leaves the church in the most prosperous condition that it has ever been in, in its history. The Bicknell Church gives him up with great reluctance. Brother Hughes has been a good worker in the twelfth district work. He is the president of this district at the present time.

A. D. Harmon of the First Christian Church, St. Paul, Minn., recently entered upon his twelfth year as pastor of that church. During this time the church has steadily grown and at present occupies a commanding place among the Protestant churches of that thriving city. In recognition of his worth the church recently raised the pastor's salary from $1,800 to $2,400.

WITH THE WORKERS

The Lawranceville Church, at Lawranceville, Illinois, celebrated its Diamond Jubilee on October 24 and 25. The pastor, Harry C. Holmes and the Official Board of the church, had made great preparations for the occasion. Among those from a distance that made addresses were F. W. Burnham of Springfield, J. W. Kilborn of Mt. Carmel, and William Oeschger of Vincennes, Ind., and H. L. Stine of Tipton, Ind. The whole affair proved to be a most delightful affair, as well as a great uplift to the church. Brother Holmes is doing a great work with this church.

The secretary of the forthcoming joint congress of Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples sends us this final word in regard to the sessions of the congress. The first session will be held Tuesday, 2:30 P. M., Nov. 10, in the Memorial Church of Christ, Oakwood Boulevard and Cottage Grove Avenue. Take the Cottage Grove Avenue car to Oakwood Boulevard and walk one block west to the church. There will be afternoon and evening sessions Tuesday and Wednesday and a morning and afternoon session Thursday with probably a social function Thursday evening. The secretary has received numerous letters regarding the congress and all are commendatory of the plans for the meeting and all express the conviction that such fraternal discussion of our common problems can not but produce closer relations of the three bodies.

The tabernacle meeting at Guthrie Oklahoma conducted by Jno. L. Brandt and Byron L. Burdett closed with 121 additions. It was unfortunate the meeting had to close in three weeks as the interest was then at the very highest and the attendance very large.

P. J. Rice, of Minneapolis, Minn., has been elected vice-president of the Federation Council of the city, which is the official totle of the city ministers union, having over one hundred members.

Rev. A. D. Harmon, of St. Paul, recently read a very thoughtful paper before the Ministers' Union of Minneapolis on the subject: "The Trend of Modern Religious Thought." It provoked a lively discussion but on the whole was cordially received, even its critics recognizing its strength. In it, the writer shows himself to be a thoroughly modern man, thoughtful, sane and balanced in his judgements.

F. W. Norton has been in Illinois for several weeks in the interest of the Wharton Memorial Home. He reports a fine missionary interest in that state and a generous response to his appeal. Read his statement in another column concerning this new work. Some one ought to put five or ten thousand dollars into this work. Many should send small gifts.

J. Fred Jones, the popular state secretary of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, was in Eureka two days last week and delivered two addresses. Wednesday evening he presented the cause of Illinois Missions in the Christian to a large audience. Thursday afternoon he met the students of Eureka College and many friends in the college chapel and told the story of his recent trip to New Orleans. Brother Jones understands human nature pretty thoroughly and his character sketches were of a very high order. He is very popular with the students of the college, who enjoy his wit and believe thoroughly in his wisdom. Jones has been secretary in Illinois thirteen years and is at his best. The work is in fine shape.

The church at Lima, Kansas, has closed a series of evangelistic meetings which resulted favorably. There were forty-one additions and other blessings from the special services.

In our report of the Convention in New Orelans, we stated that the constitution adopted by the general board was passed to become effective one year hence.. This was a mistake. This action which was a continuation of the midnight session at the Athenaeum was reconsidered at the adjourned session of the Board on Monday morning at which time the constitution was passed to become effective immediately. The minutes of the secretary dated Monday, Oct. 19th, read as follows: "Motion prevailed to reconsider adoption of revised constitution. Motion to adopt constitution as revised for one year and that a Committee on Constitution prevailed."

The new building at East Orange, New Jersey, was ready for occupancy the last of October. The Sunday School there has made a steady gain the past six weeks that is phenomenal. The school has advanced from an attendance of 173 to an attendance of 257. This has been without any special effort. The pastor is L. N. D. Wells, who is doing some post graduate work in Columbia University.

Th church at Guthrie, Oklahoma, has had a most prosperous year. One hundred and five were added in the Brandt meeting recently, and a total of 160 have been added thus far during 1908. Dr. F. L. Boblitt is the successful pastor of this church. Oklahoma is new and has furnished the Disciples an admirable opportunity to do a constructive task at establishing the church in a new community.

The First Christian Church of Ft. Collins, Colo., has had twenty-one additions the last two Sundays, of this number, sixteen were by Confession.

ANNUAL REPORT AT TAYLORVILLE, ILLINOIS.

My first year with the church at Taylorville, Ill., closed Sept. 1st, 1908. The following is a report of work done:

Sermons delivered, 81; Additions to membership, by baptism, 27, by letter and statement, 34, total 61; loss by letter, 11; by death, 5; total loss, 16; net gain, 45; special addresses delivered, 18; funerals, 13; weddings, 20.

We have a membership of 450; an efficient official board; a splendid Sunday-school led by Prof. H. L. Fowkes; a vigorous C. W. B. M., with Mrs. C. N. Meridith, president; a good Junior, Intermediate and Senior C. E. Harmony prevails in all departments of the church and the future is bright with promise. We have just placed a handsome pipe organ which with repairs cost us $2,600. This organ was built by the Hinners Organ Co. of Pekin, Illinois. We unhesitatingly recommend this company to any church. They are men of honor and integrity, competent and fair. We are perfectly satisfied with the organ. W. H. Book of Columbus, Indiana, will lead us in an evangelistic campaign beginning Nov. 9th. We expect a great meeting and are making extensive preparations. This is a great church which has not fully recognized its ability and influence. Taylorville has a population of 7,000 souls and we have in our church some of the best people of the city. There are about 5,000 people here who are not affiliated with any church. We have selected as our motto during the Book Campaign, "FIVE HUNDRED FOR CHRIST."

M. L. Pontius, Minister.

"Dolan," said Mr. Rafferty, as he looked up at the city postoffice, "what does them letters 'MDCCCXCVII' mean?" "They mean eighteen hundred and ninety-seven." "Dolan," came the query, after a thoughtful pause, "don't yez think they're overdoing this spellin' reform a bit?"

Cardinal Wiseman was of rotund proportions; and he used to relate with great gusto that, when he was staying at Lord Clifford's house, one of the maid-servants, who had been told that his proper title was "Your Eminence," used to say, as she dropped her reverential courtesy, "Yes, your Immense!"

NICK-NAMED.

But Doesn't Object In the Least.

A young lady from Troy was nick-named "Grape-Nuts" but she has been so greatly benefited by this world-famed food that she did not object to the sobriquet given her by friends. She writes:—

"From over-work my health failed me last summer and I feared for the future. Nearly everyone I knew had something to recommend, and I tried them all without benefit.

"A cousin, however, was persistent in recommending Grape-Nuts, because of the really wonderful good the food had been to her. Finally she sent me a package and to please her I commenced to eat it.

"Almost from the very start my strength began to improve, and soon I began to gain in weight. After about five months cating Grape-Nuts for breakfast and supper daily, I became well again.

"My appearance improved so much my friends wondered and asked the reason. I told them it was Grape-Nuts and nothing else. I have talked so much about the benefits to be derived from this food that they have nick-named me "Grape-Nuts," but I don't object in the least. This food has certainly proved a great blessing to me." "There's a Reason."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

CHICAGO

The church at Douglas Park where Harry F. Burns ministers, observed Rally day last Sunday. There were 120 in Sunday-school in the morning, which quite taxed the capacity of the little building. In the evening the church joined a union meeting in one of the churches to work for the election of Mr. Street as state's attorney. There were two accessions to the church by letter in the morning. The church is considering the advisability of entering into a building enterprise. The outlook is most auspicious.

The mission at Garfield Boulevard is taking on new life since the advent of Clarence Rainwater. The Ladies' Aid Society has been revived. There is now an enrollment of 66 in the Sunday-school which it is hoped will be much increased by a contest which is now on in the school.

There were five additions at the Hyde Park Church a week ago Sunday. The church has had its annual election which brings several new men on the board. These new men have some new ideas which will prove of value in the work.

Dr. Ames will produce an edition of the Messenger next month that will be new. The Messenger is a church paper with local editions for each church that circulates among our churches in Chicago. Dr. Ames proposes to print in the common pages of the next issue a complete directory of our members in Chicago. This will furnish the names and street address of every Disciple in Chicago. This enterprise is a most commendable one and will help us in many ways.

The Sunday-school at Evanston averaged 168 in attendance for October. There was an attendance of 163 last Sunday. This is a most marked gain. New chairs have been bought for a primary department that has from fifty to sixty every Sunday. The house was full at the evening service. The greatest harmony and enthusiasm prevails at this time in the work.

The Metropolitan Church had a conference with Charles Reign Scoville on Monday night of last week, the first since he ceased to be active pastor. A. T. Campbell is the associate pastor. A tidy sum of $3,500 was reported as an addition to the building fund. Mr. Scoville expressed his willingness to have the original plan of the church proceed. The church hopes to formulate a definite program at an early date.

Luke Stewart preached at Logan Square again last Sunday. He has been delegated by the board to investigate the social conditions of the neighborhood in order that the board may have definite data on which to formulate a program for the mission in the future.

The church at Oak Park reports one addition for last Sunday. The Sunday-school now has an orchestra to assist in the music. Victor F. Johnson has been in quarantine for two Sundays which has interfered with his service to some extent. His child has had the disease but is now better. The Maywood church is in a healthy, normal condition.

The church at Sheffield avenue delights to take missionary offerings. They had two last Sunday, one for state missions and the other for Ministerial Relief. There was one addition by letter.

Dr. Gates preached at Morocco, Indiana, again last Sunday. He is a kind of bishop to the weak churches around Chicago, going where churches are neglected and discouraged. His advice has put churches going again and located pastors.

The Chicago Christian Missionary Society has just finished the first year of the new scheme of organization. They have dispensed with the city evangelist and the oversight of the churches has been given to committees. The north group of churches and missions has been supervised by O. F. Jordan and Mr. Moore. The west group of churches has been supervised by Parker Stockdale and A. L. Roach. The south group of churches has been supervised by Dr. E. S. Ames and Mr. Bowman. These men have kept in the closest touch with the missions. Pastors have been located promptly. In some cases the whole board has visited a mission. This supervising service has all been donated. Last year the board paid two thousand dollars for this service. This year the money has all been put into the salaries of the pastors. The incidental expenses have been the same as last year, amounting to less than two hundred dollars, with the exception of the rally expense which is taken care of partly by the collections.

The neglected part of Chicago so far as the Disciples are concerned is the north side. We have ten churches on the south side, eight on the west side and four on the north side. There is no church between the Sheffield avenue church and Evanston, a stretch of eight or ten miles of solid residence territory. It is well known that taken as a whole the north side is the most desirable residence section of the city. It has the least percentage of foreign element. The new transportation lines have produced a great wave of building enterprise on this side. We need at least two churches between Sheffield avenue and Evanston. There is a line of little villages all the way to Waukegan as thick as beads on a string. In none of these do we have a church, though in every one of these suburbs we have people. These higher grade folk with their education and wealth should be the salt of society. Where the church does not influence them properly they become a very contagion of evil. This side of Chicago's missionary problem must be considered.

Guy Hoover reports a twenty-five dollar offering for city missions at West Pullman. The work there proceeds with its usual conservative and steady progress..

It is reported that C. G. Kindred is some better. He is at Union Hospital in Englewood where he is isolated from the world to get rest and be under the observation of the physicians who are in doubt whether to operate. Mr. Gentry preached at Englewood again last Sunday. The deepest concern is manifested everywhere about Mr. Kindred and everywhere in Chicago the warmest wishes for his early recovery are expressed. He is important not only to our own people but his co-operation in the common enterprises is constantly sought.

E. J. Arnot of the University of Chicago has been engaged to preach regularly at Batavia.

The Ministers' Association listened to the reading of a press report last Monday announcing that Mrs. Rothenberger of Cleveland had fallen from a bridge eighty feet below and was dead. Mrs. Rothenberger has been in very ill health for the past year. This seemed to furnish the only explanation. A resolution of sympathy was sent to Mr. Rothenberger. Mrs. Rothenberger leaves a bady a year old. She was the only daughter of Mr. Teachout, who is prominent in Cleveland.

Mr. Sarvis preached at Chicago Heights last Sunday. No regular source of supply has yet been arranged for this point, it is said.

W. S. Lockhart has resigned at Chicago Heights and is already out of the city. He goes to Fayetteville, Arkansas, where Mr. Ragland ministered so many years. Fayetteville is the location of the State University of Arkansas. Mr. Lockhart took a B. D. degree in the University of Chicago while here, and has made a fine record at Chicago Heights. Mrs. Lockhart also studied in the divinity school of the university and can put some preachers to rout in a theological bout. They will be much missed in the common life around Chicago. Our best wishes go with them.

The Ministers' Association of Chicago now meets in the English Room at the Grand Pacific hotel. This room is isolated from the noise of the street and furnishes ideal quarters. The meeting was held last Monday at two o'clock in the afternoon and this is to be the regular thing henceforth. Twenty preachers and one visitor were present this week. Guy Hoover read a most interesting and helpful paper on "Paul's Conception of Immortality." The paper was generously discussed from the usual points of view.

There will be a meeting of the general board of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, in the pastor's study of the First M. E. Church, the corner of Washington and Clark streets on next Monday night. Each church not receiving support is entitled to three delegates, one of them being the pastor. Each mission church is entitled to two delegates, one the pastor. This general board meeting will elect the officers and board members for the coming year. Every church should have full representation.

The event of the coming week will be the Congress of Baptists and Disciples. Every Disciple in Chicago should be interested and we should furnish our full quota in the audiences. The program has been published elsewhere.

The Jackson Boulevard Church had a mass meeting in the interest of the candidacy of Mr. Street last week. The neighborhood churches were invited in. This enterprising church had a special wire in the church on Tuesday night to receive election reports and the ladies served supper in the church. The Sunday-school had an attendance on Sunday of 375 and in the evening of last Sunday the auditorium was filled.

G. A. Campbell will give a book review to the ministers next week, on Chesterton's "Orthodoxy." He was to have given it this week but was called out of town on business.

The Sunday-school at Harvey had an attendance of 125 last Sunday. W. D. Endres is getting organization into all departments of the work and the outlook is most favorable.

The Sabbath Association of Illinois will meet next Monday at the First M. E. Church. There will be sessions at 10:30 A. M., 2:00 P. M., and 8:00 P. M. Many of the Ministers Association of Chicago have given up their meetings to attend. One of our university trained preachers raised a question of the orthodoxy of the name of the association. He was surprised at the response to his facetious sally on the part of the watch-dog of our orthodoxy in Chicago, A. J. White. The association will doubtless create a healthy sentiment on the subject, though Disciples have contended from Alexander Campbell's day that the observance of the Lord's day will have to rest on other than a legalistic basis. It is significant that the labor unions are doing more to secure the observance of the Lord's day than are the churches.

The Chicago Ministers will always be glad to have visiting ministers attend their meetings which are held every Monday. What is needed for Chicago is a larger understanding of our problems. We have been exploited as monsters of treason, when the truth is that if God's martyrs are to be found in our movement, they have labored on the Chicago field. No man has ever stayed here a long term of years and gone away in good health. The terrible physical strain is too great. No man in our ministry has probably ever left Chicago as well off financially as he came. In trials and persecutions, in danger of the enemies without and subjected to the treachery of false brethren within, who would use our alleged faults to build up a newspaper circulation, we have done our work. God will be our Judge. But meanwhile we want the brethren to know us and when they come to Chicago they will be given every opportunity to find us out.

Rev. H. G. Connelly, who took his B. D. from Yale last spring, stopped over the night of the 28th of October with the Messrs. Arnots as he was on his way to Ardmore, Oklahoma, where he will work this coming year. Mr. Connelly is one of our promising young ministers. He reports that twenty-two disciples are studying at Yale this year.

CHURCH EXTENSION NOTES.

Statement of Receipts for October, 1908, Compared with October, 1907.

Churches.

For last year	$3,992.24
For this year	4,750.61
Gain	$ 758.37

Individuals.

For last year	$1,126.04
For this year	3,278.10
Gain	$2,152.06

Total gain.....$2,910.43.

Our comparative statement shows that we have made a gain of $758.37 from the churches and $2,152.06 from individuals during October as compared with the same time last year. The board is glad to record this gain, and it is grateful to the churches and individuals who have helped to make it. We have also gained 66 in the number of contributing churches. There are many churches that have not yet sent in their offerings, and it is hoped that they will be sent in during November. Remit to G. W. Muckley, corresponding secretary, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

During the month of October the Church Extension Board received three annuity gifts. One to the amount of $500 from a brother in Michigan; one of $250 from a friend in Missouri, and another of $2,000 from a brother in Illinois. This last gift makes $4,000 that this brother has given to Church Extension, and his gift constitutes the 237th gift to Church Extension on the Annuity Plan. Concerning the Annuity Plan write G. W. Muckley, corresponding secretary, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

It is very gratifying to the Church Extension Board that its receipts for October show a gain of $2,910.43, and that we have gained 66 contributing churches. Remember that this is the beginning of the Centennial Year, and we should be constantly receiving large Church Extension gifts. Remit to G. W. Muckley, corresponding secretary, 500 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Canton, O., November 1, 1908.—Meeting is seven days old, sixty-seven added today, 125 to date. Benjamin L. Smith of Cleveland preached to over five hundred in an overflow meeting in basement. Auditorium tonight. Church proper packed and hundreds turned away.—Welshimer & Kendall.

FOREIGN MISSIONARY NOTES.

Hancock County, Indiana, has decided to become a Living-link in the Foreign Society. Greenfield is the county seat. B. F. Dailey and V. W. Blair of that city have helped to bring about this decision.

A good brother in Iowa has promised $1,000 towards the proposed Bible College at Vigan, Philippine Islands. This school for the training of native evangelists is to cost $25,000. It will be an industrial school and self-sustaining after erection.

E. R. Moon and wife of Oregon will soon sail for Bolengi, Africa. Mr. Moon is supported by the church at Covina, Calif., and Mrs. Moon by Brother Watters, of Pomona, Calif. These two strong young people volunteered during Dr. and Mrs. Dye's campaign on the Pacific Coast.

J. C. Archer and wife of Newton Falls, O., and Harry C. Archer of Hiram, will sail for India from New York on Nov. 21st. They go to Jubbulpore.

W. B. Alexander and wife of Toledo, O., sailed for India on Oct. 28th from New York.

The Foreign Society has sent out the largest number of new missionaries this year of any year in its history. The number is twenty-four.

Pres. A. McLean and Sec. Stephen J. Corey will begin a long campaign of Centennial Missionary Rallies on Nov. 14th. With the exception of the holidays they will be on the field in separate campaigns until March 6th. M. D. Adams, of India, Dr. Jas. Butchart, of China, Herman P. Williams and W. H. Hanna, of the Philippines and H. P. Shaw of China will assist them. They are to hold a night mass meeting in each place, showing moving pictures and stereopticon views from the mission fields of the world.

THE BIBLE STUDY (BLAKESLEE) LESSONS—NEW OFFICERS AND EDITORS.

The Bible Study Publishing Company of Boston have elected Mr. Franklin P. Shumway, President, filling the vacancy caused by the death of Rev. E. Blakeslee last July, and re-elected Mr. Robert E. Blakeslee, Treasurer and Managing Editor.

They have also secured Frank E. Sanders, D. D., formerly Secretary of the Congregational Sunday-school and Publishing Society, as Consulting Editor, and elected Philip A. Nordell, D. D., Office Editor. These gentlemen, in co-operation with several trained editorial assistants, will write and edit the Bible Study Union Lessons, prepared for the past seventeen years under the direction of Mr. Blakeslee.

The Company is also perfecting other plans for both the preparation and publication of these Lessons, which will ensure a continuance of the progressive policy that has distinguished them in the past, and they believe make them still more useful to schools who appreciate the many advantages of connected and graded Bible study.

Just For Fun.

The children were to have a fancy dress party. Little Annette was advised to appear as one of the seasons. She chose nutmeg.

He—"Won't you miss me when I'm far away?"

She—"No, I'll always think of you as very close."—Cornell Widow.

Summer Politics.—The Man (new arrival at summer hotel)—"I suppose there's no prohibition of kissing at this resort?"

Maid (demurely)—"No; merely local option."—Puck.

After reading Darwin's "Origin of Species" Prof. Henry Smith of Oxford, was moved to write this little prayer:

"O glorious Stream of Tendency!
We raise our souls to thee,
Who out of primal jelly-fish
Hast made such folk as we."

Embarrassing.—A colored woman of Alexandria, Va., was on trial before a magistrate of that town charged with inhuman treatment of her offspring. Evidence was clear that the woman had severely beaten the youngster, aged some nine years, who was in court to exhibit his battered condition. Before imposing sentence, his honor asked the woman whether she had anything to say. "Kin I ask yo' honah a question?" inquired the prisoner. The judge nodded affirmatively.

"Well, then, yo' honah, I'd like to ask yo' whether yo' was ever the parient of a puffectly wuthless cullud chile."—Lippincott's.

"What is the use of the vermiform appendix?" asked the teacher of the class in physiology. "The veriform appendix," promptly answered Tommy Tucker, "is useful to keep things out of and to get rid of."—Exchange.

The Washington Star repeats a story of old Hiram Doolittle. Hiram made his wife keep a cash account. Every week he would go over it, growling and grumbling like this: "Look here, Hannah, mustard plasters, fifty cents; three teeth extracted, two dollars! There's two dollars and a half in one week spent for your own private pleasure. Do you think I'm made of money?"

The suffix ous meaning full of was being discussed in the spelling class. Mountainous, full of mountains; dangerous, full of danger; porous, full of pores; courageous, full of courage; and joyous, full of joy, had been glibly recited. "Who is ready to give us another example?" asked the teacher in a confident tone. A sedate-looking boy on a back seat promptly responded, "Pious."—The Circle.

PUZZLE SOLVED.
Coffee at Bottom of Trouble.

It takes some people a long time to find out that coffee is hurting them.

But when once the fact is clear, most people try to keep away from the thing which is followed by ever increasing detriment to the heart, stomach and nerves.

"Until two years ago I was a heavy coffee drinker," writes an Ill. stockman, "and had been all my life. I am now 56 years old.

"About three years ago I began to have nervous spells and could not sleep nights, was bothered by indigestion, bloating, and gas on stomach affected my heart.

"I spent lots of money doctoring—one doctor told me I had chronic catarrh of the stomach; another that I had heart disease and was liable to die at any time. They all dieted me until I was nearly starved but I seemed to get worse instead of better.

"Having heard of the good Postum had done for nervous people, I discarded coffee altogether and began to use Postum regularly. I soon got better and now, after nearly two years, I can truthfully say I am sound and well.

"I sleep well at night, do not have the nervous spells and am not bothered with indigestion or palpitation. I weigh 32 pounds more than when I began Postum, and am better every way than I ever was while drinking coffee. I can't say too much in praise of Postum, as I am sure it saved my life." "There's a Reason."

TENNESSEE STATE CONVENTION.

The State Convention of Tennessee was held in Chattanooga Oct. 26-29. In this same city the first convention was held nineteen years ago. There are reported 53,800 Disciples in the state but only about 10,000 can be said to be in sympathy with organized mission work. The report of the Corresponding Secretary, A. I. Myhr, gives the following: 17 workers have been in the field or assisted as ministers of churches, doing 149 months work last year; 48 meetings were held; 1462 additions to the churches; six new churches and seven Sunday-schools were organized.

The receipts for general fund will be about $7,500 and in addition $4,025 was secured for the permanent fund, which now amounts to about $32,000.

A promising feature of the work is the enlistment of business men, one session of the convention being given to their conference. It was presided over by J. O. Cheek of Nashville and addresses were made by B. J. Farrar, C. C. Taylor, Geo. W. Hardin, Dr. L. M. Scott, G. W. Mershon, Prof. J. E. Crouch, Dr. E. H. Jones, Dr. P. Y. Pendleton, E. S. Smith, R. E. Moss, Dr. Hugh McLellan, Richmond Key and A. I. Myhr.

Sermons were preached by J. J. Castlebury, R. Lin Cave and R. E. Moss.

W. H. Sheffer is president of the next convention.

The last afternoon and evening were devoted to the work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Reports showed enlargement in all features. Addresses were made by Mrs. M. E. Harlan of Indianapolis and H. J. Derthick of Hazel Green, Ky.

THE NEW HOME FOR THE CHILDREN OF OUR MISSIONARIES.

It has always been the case that children of American parentage could not remain long in the heathen lands where missionaries labor. Climate, heathen conditions and lack of opportunity for education make it necessary to bring the children of missionaries back to America. A home must be provided for their care. Our religious neighbors have long since established such homes. We have reached that stage in missionary growth where the same provision must be made. Action taken at the national convention at San Francisco authorized the Foreign Society to establish such a home. Hiram, O., was selected as the location and it was made a memorial to the lamented G. L. Wharton, our first missionary to heathen lands.

This Home asks you to help it but once and that to build it and provide a small endowment. The missionaries will pay for the board and clothing of their children. Your contribution will go to a permanent work to do good through all the years to come. These are children of heroic parents who have sacrificed enough. We can and must relieve their heartache and anxiety for their children. Wm. Remfrey Hunt took his little girl to England and put her in an English home because our home was not ready when he and Mrs. Hunt returned to China. This ought not to be.

The Home can not be established without funds. Part of the $25,000.00 needed has been provided. The local committee having the work in charge must have the money or the assurance that it will be forthcoming within a year. The committee consists of well-known brethren, some of whom are among the largest donors to this work. They are Pres. Miner Lee Bates, Hiram, A. R. Teachout, Treasurer, O. C. M. S., Cleveland, S. H. Bartlett, former Secretary O. C. M. S., Painesville, John E. Pounds, Hiram and W. H. Cowdery, Cleveland. The Home will be owned and controlled by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

Will you not help this work? Send a contribution or the promise of one at once so that the committee may know what to count on. The contributions have ranged from $1,000.00 down to small sums. Every contribution helps. Send or promise what you can. Remember we ask aid but once from you. Send your offering or pledge to the Wharton Memorial Home, Hiram, O., or write to me if you wish to make inquiry.

F. W. Norton, General Representative,
Hiram, O.

ARE YOU IN ARREARS?

We need the money. We really must have all our subscription accounts cleared up immediately. While the old Christian Century was dying the accounts were not pushed with vigor. The new Christian Century will push its business vigorously. We have to do it. Uncle Sam insists that delinquent accounts be paid or we must stop your paper. We do not want to stop your paper. Nor do you want it stopped. It is just beginning to be interesting now. This Centennial year the Christian Century will be packed full of the best things. The past few weeks we have given only a taste of the good things yet to come. You cannot afford to owe us. We cannot afford to let you. Look at the label on your paper and figure how much you owe and send a remittance. Do it now.

HOUSEHOLD LUBRICANT

There's something or other, every day, in every home, that needs a drop of oil. It may be the sewing machine or just a door hinge, but whatever it is, there's nothing takes the squeak and the hard work out of it like Household Lubricant—

The Oil that makes things hum

Household Lubricant is a fine-bodied oil, very carefully compounded and put up in a tasty little oiler that fits a lady's hand perfectly.

It won't gum; it won't corrode; it won't get rancid. Costs only a trifle to begin with and wears a long time wherever you put it.

Charcoal Removes Stomach Poisons.

Pure Charcoal Will Absorb One Hundred Times Its Volume in Poisonous Gases.

Charcoal was made famous by the old monks of Spain, who cured all manner of stomach, liver, blood and bowel troubles by this simple remedy.

One little nervous Frenchman held forth its virtues before a famous convention of European physicians and surgeons. Secheyron was his name. He was odd, quaint and very determined. His brothers in medicine laughed at his claims. Thereupon he swallowed two grains of strychnine, enough to kill three men, and ate some charcoal. The doctors thought him mad, but he did not even have to go to bed. The charcoal killed the effects of the strychnine and Secheyron was famous. Ever since that day physicians have used it. Run impure water through charcoal and you have a pure, delicious drink.

Bad breath, gastritis, bowel gases, torpid liver, impure blood, etc., give way before the action of charcoal.

It is really a wonderful adjunct to nature and it is a most inexhaustible storehouse of health to the man or woman who suffers from gases or impurities of any kind.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made of pure willow charcoal, sweetened to a palatable state with honey.

Two or three of them cure an ordinary case of bad breath. They should be used after every meal, especially if one's breath is prone to be impure.

These little lozenges have nothing to do with medicine. They are just sweet, fresh willow, burned to a nicety for charcoal making and fragrant honey, the product of the bee. Thus every ingredient comes to man from the lap of nature.

The only secret lies in the Stuart process of compressing these simple substances into a hard tablet or lozenge, so that age, evaporation or decay may not assail their curative qualities.

You may take as many of them as you wish and the more you take the quicker will you remove the effects of bad breath and impurities arising from a decayed or decaying meal. They assist digestion, purify the blood and help the intestines and bowels throw off all waste matter.

Go to your druggist at once and buy a package of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges, price 25 cents. You will soon be told by your friends that your breath is not so bad as it was. Send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

SACRED MUSIC IN OUR SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

The question of sacred music is one which shows no common ground, one in which there is no general agreement as to what it is and what it should be. Particularly does this apply to the music of the Sunday-school. We print below some extracts from a discussion of the subject by Miss Jeannette Robinson Murphy, printed in The Examiner of San Francisco. Condemning many of the tunes used in the Sunday-school services, she says:

"They are ragtime, pure and simple, often copied from dance music.

"We should not be surprised that so many American children have lost their love for the Church of God, when they have no part in its services. They are not taught to memorize the grand old church hymns which have comforted the saints for ages.

"'They are told in many churches that they must not dance; yet with few exceptions every tune they sing in their Sunday-school is a mighty good 'two-step' or 'waltz.'

"Ask any child you know if it knows all the words of 'No, not one,' 'Nothing but the blood of Jesus,' 'Stepping in the light,' 'Sunshine in my soul today,' and it will answer proudly, 'Yes'; but ask it if it can say by heart any of the stanzas of 'Nearer, my God, to thee,' 'Rock of ages,' 'Lead, kindly light,' 'Jesus, lover of my soul,'—in fact any reverent, noble hymn, new or old, and it will probably answer, 'No, they are too old-fashioned.'

"It is noticeable, in contrast with the vapid songs above referred to, that the grand old hymns prefer to speak of God as the Father and as Jehovah, setting forth the majesty and fear of God. And when they do mention his earthly name, oh! how tenderly and sacredly the name of Jesus is handled! 'Jesus, lover of my soul,' 'The soul that on Jesus has leaned for repose,' 'My faith looks up to thee, thou Lamb of Calvary,'—all so different from ditties which seem to be ground out by wholesale, with the aid of a rhyming dictionary and set to jigs, with gay choruses which are apt to make the most straight-laced long to dance.

"There is a distinct difference between religious and secular music. The contrary is claimed by some people, but this will not be admitted by the great leaders like Horatio Parker, or Edward Stubbs, or any of the leading hymn and tune writers of England today.

"For those who honestly think that good music and good hymns are really dry, and not adapted to arouse the enthusiasm of our children, let me say that all children love Cobb's beautiful setting to 'Round the Lord in glory seated,' Jeffrey's tune to 'Ancient of days,' Smart's lovely music to 'The day is gently sinking to a close,' Horatio Parker's to 'In loud exalted strain,' Dykes's to 'Lead, kindly light,' Sullivan's and Haydn's music to 'Onward, Christian soldiers'; and so I could go on with the list of bright tunes which delight children.

"There are a few, and only a few, of the Gospel songs which are sweet and helpful, but even in the season of revival they should be selected very carefully. It is not being 'born again' to be swept away by the power, often purely hypnotic, of a dashing song like 'The crowning day is coming,' which everybody is singing at fever heat. Catchy music with accompanying undignified ditties never brought any soul lastingly to its God.

"No child brought up on these trashy things can have the same high regard for religion which characterized our ancestors. The Cavaliers and the Puritans were taught truly religious hymns, and these men and women stood for noble, high principles, stern sense of duty and honor, and surely the hymns they sang had much to do with molding their characters. Today our children are not learning much, either religiously or esthetically, from the hymns they sing."

ANNUAL REPORT FROM EL PASO, TEX.

The summary of the year's work just closed at El Paso, Texas, is as follows: 65 additions at regular services, seven by baptism, 20 by statement and 38 by letter; 19 letters granted and two deaths; 35 per cent. increase in the amount of missionary offerings. There were by the minister, H. B. Robison, 83 sermons, six addresses, 44 talks, 27 class lessons, 162 other meetings, 2,440 calls, 743 callers, 24 weddings, 15 funeral services and 30,400 words written for the local press.

Mrs. Robison has among other activities organized a young married people's class and led them in the study of the origin, contents and purpose of the books of the New Testament.

The decrease of work in a number of industries in the city has made this a hard year financially for many members of the church.

The New Mexico territorial convention will be entertained by this church next year.

A NEW TRUMPET CALL FOR THE CONGO STEAMER.*

A. F. Hensey, Bolenge, Africa.

Mrs. Hensey and myself have just returned from a ten days' excursion up the Bosira River. Through the kindness of the Commissaire of this District, we went on the S. S. "Maringa," and returned on one of the steamers of the Trading Society known as the S. A. B., the Director very kindly allowing us the use of his own cabin. Much might be written of what we saw in all this journey, but I shall try to tell you only of the new work which we have opened up in the neighborhood of Bussira, the headquarters of the S. A. B. Dr. Widdowson and I made the first visit to this district in January, and in the towns of Besongo and Bonyeka we now have seven evangelists and 700 enrolled inquirers. Of these latter fully 100 seem intensely earnest.

The work at Bonyeka is beyond description. Our entrance was a triumphal march, and we were soon surrounded by hundreds of welcoming natives, the greater part of whom had never before seen a white woman. Some who came after we had gone into the house set apart for our use, fought for a peep into the doors and windows, and it seemed for a time that they would break down the flimsy walls.

Then they sounded the great wooden drum, and the people assembled to hear God's message. Picture if you will a great spreading-branched palaver tree, and you can see the auditorium Nature had provided for us. Within the ample shade of this African temple sat the chiefs and old men, each in his own chair of state, with a curious broad-bladed knife in his right hand; to their left sat the young warriors, uneasy with the spirit of those who are more used to the battle ground than the temple, and beyond them the boys, as fidgety as the boys of any land. To the right the women and girls were huddled in a shapeless mass, as full of giggles and gossip as—might be expected. The other side of the circle was made up of those who are more earnestly seeking for the Light. These sang with much zest if little tune. "There's not a friend like the lowly Jesus," and then came the Message.

In this concourse sat more than 800 people; it was the moment of a lifetime, and so knew our Bolenge boys. I wish that some who doubt the wisdom of missions could have seen one of these Iyokansombo, as I first saw him—the longest, lankest and awkwardest boy who ever struck a mission station—and then could have seen him as he stood at that supreme moment. As if conscious of the hour and the dignity of the Message, he seemed to stand a little straighter and taller, and as he "reasoned of righteousness, and self-control, and the judgment to come," and pressed home the claims of Jesus Christ as the Savior and King of men, the whispering and the fidgeting died away, and in tense eagerness they leaned forward to catch every word.

The service over, the elders remained. Then arose Lonjataka, the hereditary chief, who in his own town is as autocratic as the Czar, ponderous in the dignity befitting a man who has 210 wives, and 40 houses in which they live. Thus said he, "White man, the words of God which you have spoken to us feel very good in our stomachs. If our young people agree to them, it will be good for Bonyeka. At Bolenge there are other missionaries. Why don't you and Mamma stay here with us? We will build you a house, and you shall teach us of your new "Witch-Doctor," whom you call Jesus, and perhaps even we old men will agree to Him." We explained to them the present impossibility of a mission station there but they agreed to build at once a large house in which to worship God.

I do not think that I have ever stood in the presence of a great opportunity, so tinged with sadness. Here is this great population—twenty times as large as that of Bolenge; their hearts are open; neither the vices of civilization nor a sleeping-sickness have reached that far. If we could but strike while the iron is hot! But to secure a mission site there means a wait of probably two years, and Bonyeka is 250 miles from Bolenge, making frequent itineration impossible. Oh for a steamer, be it ever so small! You would not believe me if I should tell you the number of people that could be reached with the Gospel by means of a suitable steamer.

We are so few that the vastness of our field casts always a shadow over us—the darkness which comes over the heart as we see all these people without the changing power of the One who is the fairest among ten thousand. As you pray, will you remember to pray "for us also, that God may open unto us a door for the Word," that these two millions of people may be saved both for the life that now is, and for the life yet to be.

"So you wish to leave to get married, Mary? I hope you have given the matter serious consideration?" "Oh, I have, sir," was the earnest reply. "I've been to two fortune-tellers, and a clairvoyant, and looked in a sign-book, and dreamed on a lock of his hair, and been to one of them asterrologers, and to a meejum, and they all tell me to go ahead, sir. "Let me see, I've almost forgotten," the new western sojourner at Saymouth began reflectively, "what is the capital of New Hampshire." "Summer boarders," replied a knowing native.—Youth's Companion.

The Gargoil often makes its perch
On a cathedral or a church,
Where, 'mid ecclesiastic style,
He smiles an early-Gothic smile.
And while the parson, dignified,
Spouts at his weary flock inside,
The Gargoil, from his lofty seat,
Spouts at the people in the street,
And, like the parson, seems to say
To those beneath him, "Let us spray."
I like the Gargoil best; he plays
So cheerfully on rainy days,
While parsons (no one can deny)
Are awful dampers—when they're dry.

Vol. XXV. CHICAGO, ILL., NOVEMBER 14, 1908 No. 46

My Confession of Faith in the New Testament

It was one of the misfortunes of Christendom that the reformation controversies did much to develop and harden into fixed character two dogmas both of which are obnoxious to the spirit of the Bible and the church. The one is the Roman assumption of an infallible church, the other the post-reformation doctrine of an inerrant and verbally inspired Bible. Neither of these dogmas was held by the fathers of the church. The first was framed to give validity to the papal claims of authority, the second was constructed as a means of refuting these claims. The Catholic had made for himself a standard of appeal which he proclaimed as changeless and final—the Church. The Protestant looked about for some corresponding authority, fixed and absolute, to meet the pretense of Rome and decided that he could find it in the Bible. Both alike forsook the true fountain of life which is Christ alone, and hewed for themselves cisterns which would not hold water. In this respect the post-reformation divines were untrue to their great leaders, Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli, Erasmus and Calvin, who as little held the narrow view of the Bible as they admitted the claims of Rome. It was against this irreverent handling of the Word of God, this attempt to make it assume an infallibility which it nowhere claims, that Chillingworth wrote in "The Religion of Protestants," "Take away this presumptuous imposing of the senses of men on the word of God; of the special senses of men on the general words of God, and laying them on men's conscience together under the equal penalty of death and damnation. This deifying our own interpretations and tyrannous enforcing them upon others; this restraining of the word of God from that latitude and generality, and the understanding of men from that liberty wherein Christ and the apostles left them, is and hath been the fountain of all the schisms in the church and that which makes them immortal; the common incendiary of Christendom which tears in pieces not the coat, but the members of Christ. Take away this persecuting of men for not subscribing to the words of men as the words of God. Require of Christians only to believe in Christ and to call no man master but him only." In this sentiment he agrees with the great body of enlightened thought in the universal church from his day to our own, and his opinion finds echo in the words of the later Archbishop of Canterbury, who, in explaining and defending the modern view of the Old Testament says, "What can be a grosser superstition than the cry of literal inspiration? But because that has a regular footing it is to be treated as a good man's mistake, while the courage to speak the truth about the first chapter of Genesis is a wanton piece of wickedness" (Life of Archb-Tait. 1:292.)

The New Testament grew into its present form as a collection of writings from the hands of the apostles and their associates, and as thus possessed of a unique value as a source of knowledge regarding Jesus and the beginnings of Christianity. It is the product of the Spirit of God working freely in the first Christian community not to produce a literature, but to accomplish by all possible means, such as preaching, teaching, Christian living, the writing of letters, the writing and distribution of the gospel facts and appeals, and the wider ministries of evangelism, the spread of the program of Jesus in the world. There was no literary impulse in the earliest Christian group—Jesus had written nothing. He was a teacher, not a writer. He had not even commissioned the disciples to write. He apparently gave no directions as to the means by which a record of his sayings was to be preserved. He concerned himself with the greater task of getting himself understood by the men he chose to be his first interpreters to the world.

It was not until years after the close of his ministry that these men began to write as one of the methods of propagating the gospel message. The first writings were not even memoirs of Jesus, but rather letters, like those of Paul to the Thessalonians written to explain more fully certain of the apostle's teachings when he was with them, and to strengthen them in a time of persecution. Other epistles followed, till a considerable number, probably much in excess of our surviving collection, had become the prized possession of the churches. Meantime the story of Jesus' life, which was the main material of apostolic preaching, was constantly repeated, both in public preaching and in private instruction. It tended more or less to become a fixed oral narrative among a people with the dominant trait of verbal memory which has always characterized the oriental mind. But there were also fragments of written gospel, the transcript of personal remembrance or of the oral narrative. Such floating bits of biography or of "sayings of Jesus" must have been very common as time went on. Not all of such material has found incorporation in the New Testament, as recent discoveries have proved.

From these two sources, the oral narrative and the written documents, the writers of the gospels drew their data, with the addition of such personal elements as they chose to incorporate. By general acceptance, the gospel of Mark is believed to be the transcript of of the teachings of Peter concerning Jesus, made by John Mark of the Jerusalem Church. This is the testimony of Papias, and there is no sufficient reason to question it. The gospel of Matthew, which follows closely the plan and narrative of Mark, with frequent verbal likenesses which prove a close literary relationship, adds a large body of "teachings of Jesus," which is believed to be the special contribution of Matthew to this gospel, and to account for the name. It is Matthew's gospel then, not in the sense that in its present form he is its author, but that its distinctive feature the "words of Jesus" are believed to be from his hand. The gospel of Luke, the work of the only Gentile writer of the entire group, adds to the common material which it shares with Mark and Matthew, the unique section from Chapter 11 to chapter 18, usually called the "Perean Section," which contains some of the richest portions of the gospel record. The gospel of John, much later in its date, is of wholly different structure and spirit. Its general relation to the Apostle John is clear. It is still the task of criticism however to determine how far the work may be called the first-hand utterance of the Apostle of Love, and how far other hands, whose marks are so evident upon its pages, may have had to do with its shaping.

It is easy for one to whom the old dogma of verbal dictation has been an inheritance to ask, "could not the Holy Spirit inspire four different men to write independent records of the life of Christ, without any supposition of literary relationship one to another?" There can be no argument over such a question, any more than over the inquiry as to whether God could have made a flat world instead of a sphere, or a rainbow in which there should be eight colors instead of seven. The task of the biblical student is not to speculate regarding the kind of a Bible we ought to have had, but to attempt to discover the sort of book we actually possess. And as to its literary origin and history the New Testament leaves us in little doubt. Its human elements, which are very apparent, are the best proof of the Divine Spirit that breathes through it, the result of no mechanical inspiration of documents but of the presence of the Holy Spirit in the lives of the men whose words and deeds are here recorded, and most of all, the divine character of our Lord, of whose life and words we have here a trust-worthy account.

In company with the great body of Bible students of our day, who have applied the historical and critical method to the literature of the New Testament, I believe that the Gospels, though anonymous in their form, came to us from the men whose names they bear, and that though they lay no claim to precision of statement in details and in a few instances present perplexing variations one from another, yet they are witnesses to the life of Jesus whose testimony is competent and convincing. I accept their statements regarding the birth, youth, ministry, miracles, teachings, character and purpose of Jesus. I believe the Book of Acts to be a reliable record of the origins of the Christian society, and especially as illuminated by the epistles of Paul, an authentic narrative of that apostle's ministry. I believe that the letters of the Apostle Paul such as those to Thessalonica, Galatia, Corinth, Rome, Philippi and Philemon are entirely authentic. Those to the Ephesians and Colossians I hold to be Pauline with the possibility of later work upon them. In the pastoral epistles there is evident a distinctly later point of view, but genuine Pauline writings are the basis. The epistle to the Hebrews I believe to be the work of a Jewish Christian but not of Paul. I should not attempt to identify the writer either with Apollos as did Luther, or with Barnabas as did Turtullian. The general epistles I have recently discussed separately in these columns in the Teacher Training course, and shall not take space to repeat what I have there said, further than to say that they are amply worthy of a place in the New Testament in spite of the opinions of certain church fathers in the early centuries which excluded one or more of them from the various "canons" that were then forming.

The Revelation is an apocalypse, closely related to the Jewish and Christian Apocalyptic literature of the period. Its author is a certain John, well-known to the Christians to whom he wrote. If the earlier, or Neronian date of the book be accepted, there is no sufficient reason why John the Apostle should not be regarded as the author. If the later or Domitian date be held, the difficulty of admitting the production of the Gospel and the wholly different apocalypse as from the same hand in the same period, is obvious. New Testament scholarship inclines to the second view. But the purpose of Revelation is quite clear. It was an urgent appeal to the church to maintain its faith and courage in a time of bitter persecution and testing in the first century. That it accomplished this end there is no doubt.

In setting down these beliefs of mine regarding the New Testament, I am no more than registering the common opinion among Bible students in this generation. Variations will be found at different points. By some my position would be held as too radical, by more as too conservative, but by most as moderate and constructive. The literature of the subject will abundantly verify this statement. But what I wish to affirm with emphasis is my belief that the New Testament, whatever its origin and literary history, is a collection of documents with a single message—Jesus is the Son of God, the word made flesh, the revelation of the Father's life, and thus our only sufficient interpreter of the nature and purpose of God. Jesus has made to the world a disclosure of the true life of a child of God and by his sacrificial life and death has shown how men may live in relations of sonship and happiness with God. The Gospel is the "good news" of this way of restoring men to filial estate, and the message of Christ, wherever proclaimed and tried has proved its divine nature and power. The New Testament did not create the church, but it is its most precious possession as the record of its beginnings and of the teachings of the Master which are the norm of Christian life.

The question with which I close is the one to which I have insisted that attention should be given throughout. It is not, do you agree with me in my views of New Testament books? Your opinion or mine may be wrong. But what I wish to have answered is this question, is one who holds the beliefs which I have registered here loyal to the Scriptures as they interpret themselves, and to the Christ of whom they speak? More than this, does he stand upon the platform which the fathers of this reformation declared to be sufficient for the union of the people of God?

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

Self-Sacrifice and Self-Appreciation

Maeterlinck has preserved to us the legend of the keeper of the light-house who gave to the poor in the cabins about him the oil of the mighty lanterns that served to illumine the sea. "In the soul that is noble," he says, "altruism must, without doubt, be always the center of gravity; but the weak soul is apt to lose itself in others whereas it is in others that the strong soul discovers itself. The immaterial force that shines in our heart must shine, first of all, for itself; for in this condition alone shall it shine for others as well. But see that you give not away the oil of your lamp, though your lamp be never so small; let your gift be the flame, its crown."

This problem of striking a balance between self-culture and self-sacrifice is, likely, the most essential problem of our moral lives. Sheer selfishness, we know, shrivels the soul and the soul's world. But there is also a kind of self-giving which exhausts the soul and wastes its powers. Often self-sacrifice is hardly more than the helpless raising of the withered arm of resignation. The effectiveness of self-giving depends on there being a self worth giving. Our spiritual teachers exhort us to give, to do, to spend, to deny ourselves, and fail to make it clear to us that we must acquire a being, that we must possess and keep an individuality whose value we can ourselves appreciate ere it can have value to others no matter how freely given. To overlook the development of this self, to fail to organize the means for its constant renewal, is as stupid as for the general to plan his campaign with the battle only in mind, forgetting that his soldiers are to be fed and the ordnance maintained.

In Jesus we have the supreme illustration of self-sacrifice. But in him also we have the supreme illustration of self-appreciation. That is an extraordinary insight that made St. John connect the Master's act of washing the disciples' feet with his consciousness of divine dignity. How he knew what Jesus was thinking about just at that moment we know not. But he begins the story of the feet-washing by laying bare the mind of the Master. "Jesus, knowing that the Father had put all things into his hand, that he was come from God, and went to God, riseth from supper . . . . and began to wash his disciples' feet."

The inspired artist draws two pictures for us to look upon at once: one of the upper room and the act of self-humiliation, the other of the soul of Jesus and his self-appreciation. In the act of serving his friends the Master was most conscious of himself. He knew himself to be no slave but the ruler of all. Though doing a slave's work he was no whit less a king. St. John clearly sees that for a slave to wash a guest's feet has no significance; but for a king—that is divine! It was the kingship of Jesus that gave importance to his act. A soul so rich, so calmly self-conscious, so careful ever to preserve its isolation despite its thousand distracting intimacies—when such a soul stoops in service it communicates blessings vast and priceless.

Christ's self-giving saves the world not because it is just "giving" but because it was "his self" that was given. If we study his portrait afresh we will discover that his self-reserve was quite as essential in his personality as his self-giving. He bound his disciples to him by what he did not tell them quite as much as by what he told them. They were his friends, to be sure. But they worshipped him. Not one of them felt that he had plumbed the Master's soul.

It will be well for us if in following Christ we learn from him to be as well as to do. The secret of all effective service is not just what is done but who does it. The being reflects itself in the doing. It is of first importance, therefore, for the soul, as for the financier, to guard its capital. The personality must be kept intact. That is what carries the business on. Self-investment is profitless unless the self have intrinsic value. The oil must be made to keep the lamp going—not distributed, through however amiable motives, to the poor. The best service we can render the weak is to be ourselves strong. The sick need our health and cheer more than medicine. The world is not so much in need of sympathy as of inspiration, the unconscious inspiration that our being noble and strong exercises upon others. There is danger of our very sympathy making distress and illness a sort of luxury. But our strength, our character, our standing erect and meeting our own problems with courage, rebukes every whining soul.

The pastor's best gift to his people is himself. Many pastors are like Martha, busy with too many things. They call and coax and plead and argue and sympathize. Their days are spent in small and cheap activities. They rob the mighty lantern of its flame by doling out the oil to the needy. But the needy need something other than these cheap doles. They need to see a man! They need to find in him a soul with depth enough to create in them a sense of mystery. "In the every day walk of life," says Ruskin, "the solitary thing we can ever distribute among those who walk by our side, be they joyful of sad, is the confidence, strength, the freedom and peace, of our soul."

Here, too, is the mother's constant temptation—to serve her children in lesser deeds that rob her being of its most important property, to forget herself and waste her soul in the routine demands of her children. Let a mother know that the best way to serve her children is to keep alive in her breast the importance of her own personality. Let her know that the time will come when these little ones will need more than the services of her hands, more than the sacrifices of the nursery. Some day they will need her companionship. They will need her intelligence. They will need her to be large-minded, up-to-date, so that they may share their men's and women's problems with her. Happy is that mother who grows with her children! Happy she who keeps to herself in their childhood sacred hours for her own self-culture, renewing ever the oil in her lamp that to them her supreme gift may be a constant and increasing light!

It involves no stretch of our principle to give it application in the church as well as in the individual life. Our modern Christianity is emphasizing the active, pragmatic and institutional side of the Christian life. We stand in need today of such an emphasis as will enrich and ennoble the intrinsic character of the church. It is a serious question whether the church is adequately equipped to do the work our leaders exhort us to do. We are asked to do many things. Our churches are the scenes of much confusion. The bee-hive ideal possesses us. Our ministers have given up trying to teach us anything and have taken to exhorting us. Evangelism waxes more and more hypnotic and mechanical. A passion for numbers makes a real spiritual goal and a pedagogical method for the Sunday-school seem pale. Church work is largely cooking and serving and begging. Our congregational meetings are measured by the number who "take part" not by the thoughtfulness and helpfulness of their expressions.

Here is a question the modern church must face: are we backing our doing with our being? All this activity of self-sacrifice, is it matched by an adequate self-appreciation. Are our Christian men and women as strong, as well seasoned, as deep, as full of faith and reverence as our fathers and mothers. The ineffectiveness of much of our church life is common knowledge in the world about us. Yet we were never so busy. Certainly there was never more bustle and motion and organization than today. Never has there been such a passion for social service. The church is washing more feet than ever in history. Its back is bent for service. Why, then, are its services so often spurned? We yearn to bring people to Christ and literally beg for converts and recruits, yes, for mere auditors.

And we are treated as beggars!

Are we cheapening the church? Is our evangelism degrading the character of the church? Are our cheap music and our tinsel attractions and our hortatory preaching lowering the dignity of the church which Christ bought with his blood? Are our small services robbing the oil that keeps burning the mighty light that shines for all the world? Is the church conscious of its kingship when it takes the world's feet to wash them?

Perhaps the answer to our problem is to be found in the direction not of more "service" but of more quiet reverence and self-appreciation. Perhaps to self-denial we should add self-affirmation. The frenzied church needs the calmness of her Lord. Then her beggary will be changed to royalty and her apology to command.

Shall Professor Willett Resign?

So far as we have seen, the Christian Century is the only newspaper that has published the communication of W. R. Warren, of the Centennial Committee, reporting the defeat of a resolution demanding the resignation of Professor Willett from the Pittsburg program. The resolution was defeated by a vote of eight to three. The statement explains that the committee did not "consider itself an ecclesiastical court to pass upon Professor Willett's theological views."

The Christian Standard of Oct. 24, professes intense interest in getting a statement from the Centennial Committee on the Willett matter. "When their statement is ready we will get it in the Standard if we must stop the press and destroy the plates to do so." Since the statement has been issued and published in the Christian Century two issues of the Standard have been printed and no mention made of the action of the committee. Nor has it appeared in the columns of the Christian Evangelist, whose editor, the chairman of the Centennial Committee, certainly is informed of his committee's action.

We believe the brethren should know what has been done. Moreover we believe they should know what is now being attempted.

The contention has been shifted from the newspapers to private correspondence. The Standard is evidently tired of its fight. Its editor and his employer attempted by threatening the missionary societies to force the will of the brotherhood. In this they have manifestly failed. The protest of the brotherhood and the influential portion of the Standard's own constituency has been too emphatic and voluminous to be ignored. Consequently for two weeks their editorial pages have looked sickly and pale. An editorial on the "Annihilation of the Wicked" is about the livest article in these issues. It was probably chosen as the best substitute available for the series of lurid attacks on Willett and Rice and other brethren whom they wish to annihilate before the Centennial convention.

But the brethren should not infer that the end of the controversy has been reached. Influences are at work now to persuade Professor Willett to resign from the program. Representatives of the missionary societies are urging in a personal way what they rightly declined to demand in their official capacity as members of the Centennial Committee. The chairman of the Centennial Committee has joined with them in their appeal to Dr. Willett to shield the societies from the danger of an attack by the Standard for at least this year. The editor of the Standard, J. A. Lord, has signed an agreement to drop the fight on the missionary societies and the program, provided Willett resigns from the program. Dr. Willett in his desire for peace in the brotherhood has yielded so far to the persuasions of the missionary leaders as to accept the proposal of the Standard, asking only that the agreement be signed by the real dictator of the Standard's policies—the man who employs the editor.

The matter had gone thus far when it came to the Christian Century's ears. We are embarrassed and grieved. Embarrassed, because with Professor Willett's relation to this paper it is a delicate matter for us to make public a divergent judgment from his. Grieved, first, that Professor Willett's sensitiveness to his personal situation seems to have eclipsed for him the larger interests of our plea that are at stake in the battle raging around his head; and, secondly, that our missionary leaders would be willing to act as middlemen in bringing about so insincere and odious a bargain as the one proposed.

Have the Disciples of Christ come to this in their ninety-ninth year? Have we whose plea is liberty and union, whose history is one long, open discussion, whose passion is to know the truth and whose boast is the absence of any technical and artificial device of council or creed or bishop for fixing truth for us—have we come to a time when, for the sake of missionary collections, an odious contract to be "good," made and signed by a newspaper proprietor, can purchase the silence of our prophets?

God save us from this disgrace!

It were better far to have a creed than such a contract. Why should the brotherhood sell itself to Russell Errett for such a price? Who is he that he should be so feared? Discredited and routed by A. McLean, he was "good" until Herbert Moninger re-entrenched him behind the splendid breastworks of the Teacher Training idea. Thus fortified and re-enforced, he opened fire again, making a great noise with his "protest," until mutiny broke out in his own ranks. His attack on his brethren was met by his own readers and repulsed. Now he comes asking for a truce—until the convention is over, and what are the terms of the truce?

Unconditional surrender of the liberty of a representative committee to make a convention program without consulting the owner of the Christian Standard! "Let the man I object to get off the program and I will be 'good' at least for one year,"—this is the proposal.

Is it possible that our trusted missionary leaders wish an arrangement like this? Is it possible that Professor Willett has so far wearied of the attack made upon him that our sacred liberties are eclipsed by his own personal feelings? Is it possible that fifty thousand of us can go to Pittsburg gagged by the threats of a newspaper owner and shout for liberty in Christ? Is it possible that we can look the world in the face as we plead with the divided sects of Christendom to come into unity on the platform we have found?

These are grave and vital questions for us these days. It is, we frankly admit, a most delicate position in which Professor Willett is placed. To remain on the program lays him liable to the imputation of personal self-seeking at the expense of the brotherhood's peace. Yet no one who knows him could think for an instant that he would covet a place on the Centennial program for his personal honor. But whether he wills it or not the attack upon him has made his personality the center around which a battle rages—a battle not about him personally, but about the great, radical, basic principle of our plea, namely, that our unity, fellowship and coöperation are based not on agreement in any human speculation whatsoever but on simple faith in Jesus, the Son of God, the Lord and Master of our lives.

Shall Professor Willett resign and in resigning yield the battle to those who would fasten upon us a worse tyranny than that with which our fathers broke?

Israel's Doctrine of Immortality.

Londoners had the rare opportunity not long ago, says an English exchange, of hearing Dr. George Adam Smith at the Memorial Hall, where he delivered the Drew lecture on Immorality. He chose as his subject "Israel's Doctrine of the Individual and Immortality."

Dr. Smith spoke of the indifference of Old Testament writers to the future life of the individual, and proceeded to ask how we are to explain this attitude. Other branches of the great Semitic race, he said, share the same views. Arabia was the nursery, if not the cradle, of the Semites, and we have to consider the changeless nature of the Arabian nomad. He remembers his dead. He keeps a "year's mind" for his fathers and brethren. He visits their graves and calls them by name. He pours a little water on the sandy mound, and once a year he sacrifices sheep for the sake of the dead. Yet the Arabs never seem to have had any dogma of immortality. Wellhausen tells us that the few sparks of hope of immortality which we find in Arabian literature before Mahomet show traces of Jewish belief. After twelve centuries of Mahomet's teaching, the Arabs preserve a curious indifference on this subject. The dead have no permanent visible habitation. No doubt they are often present to the fearful imagination of the nomad. He thinks of them as a querulous, hungry troop. Dr. Smith told how his own Arab guide, when asked to get water at the close of the day, had raised an objection in the following words: "It is not the things I see that I am afraid of, but the things I won't see. They may hustle me into the water as I bend to draw!" The nomad's ghosts are a hungry, hustling crowd, who may hustle a lonely man into his grave.

The lecturer considers that the desert life endured for centuries had indisposed the nomads to believe in personal immortality. He further reminded us that the gods of these races were all tribal or national. It was this tribal existence which the Deity was in honor obliged to maintain. The leaves and branches might perish, if only the stock remained. Israel has no gospel for the future of the individual. The prophet does not bring even to Hezekiah the promise of anything except a respite from the doom which threatened him. The Psalmist says, "O spare me that I may recover brightness before I go hence and be no more." To the prophets there was no moral process, no chance to do God's will beyond the grave, no opportunity even for the best in that realm into which death was shepherding all the sons of men.

A most striking passage in the address was that in which Dr. Smith defined the attitude of Israel's prophets towards necromancy. They disapproved entirely of seeking for signs and tokens from the dead. A purer national religion, they believed, would set itself to the rigorous abolition of all these things. The prophets saw that pre-occupation with occult matters tended to take the mind away from the legitimate objects of belief. Dr. Smith added that the pursuit of such tokens is as vain today as ever it was. The so-called responses of the spirits are astonishingly meager, and are concerned with trifles, while the effects of such methods of inquiry on the intellectual and moral nature, even of the most intelligent inquirers, have been not a little harmful.

Dr. Forsyth presided at the meeting, and with him on the platform were Principal Garvie, Dr. Vaughan Pryce and Professor Bennett. Dr. Forsyth paid a tribute to the late Mr. Drew, who has passed away since Sir Oliver Lodge spoke last year in the same building.

The Fraternal Congress

The religious congress now in session in Chicago is proving to be a richly significant gathering. We had supposed the Congress involved a three cornered responsibility. Since attending its sessions we have discovered that it is the regular session of the Baptist Congress and that Disciples and Free Baptists are the guests of the Baptists. As guests, however, they are given every privilege of the floor and an equal place on the program with their hosts.

In this discovery we find added cause for gratification. The Congress is a symptom of the large heartedness of the Baptist brotherhood and a sign too of their earnest desire to effect as great a degree of union as is possible. President Harry Pratt Judson of the University of Chicago in presenting his address of welcome told the story of a woman bidding at an auction on a certain article. In a far section of the crowd some man was bidding for the same article. After they had run the price up from fifty cents to five dollars the woman stopped bidding and the auctioneer announced the article sold to Mr. Jonathan Jones. "Jonathan Jones," gasped the woman, "why he's my husband!"

The time has come, said Dr. Judson, for us Baptists and Disciples to cease bidding against each other and work in harmony. The address of Bishop Fallows of the Reformed Episcopal Church was equally felicitious and urgent. As we go to press we are able to report a fine attendance of Disciples in the congress. The paper by Rev. A. W. Fortune and the address by Dr. W. B. Craig have been heartily received. We will be happy to print our readers a report next week.

Ten builders rear an arch, each in turn lifting it higher; but it is the tenth man, who drops in the keystone, who hears the huzzas.

The Federation of Churches.

The great convention that was held three years ago in New York City, under the auspices of the Federation of churches in America, will be easily recalled. That Federation has not been idle in the meantime, but its work has been going steadily forward both in the East and West. The results of its efforts in New York City alone would make such a movement more than worth while.

In accordance with the plans of that Convention, to which additions have been made since that time in the progress of the work, each of the religious bodies represented there, or at least such of them as took approving action in reference to the Federation of Churches, has appointed certain delegates to meet in a Federal Council in Philadelphia December 2-8. Five hundred delegates are expected, representing thirty religious bodies and fifteen millions of church members. The day sessions are to be held in Witherspoon Hall and the evening sessions in the Academy of Music.

The following are the delegates representing the Disciples of Christ:

B. A. Abbott, Baltimore, Md.; Peter Ainslie, Baltimore, Md.; S. H. Bartlett, Painesville, O.; Pres. Miner Lee Bates, Hiram, O.; Levi G. Batman, Philadelphia, Pa.; Pres. H. M. Bell, DesMoines, Ia.; A. B. Chamberlain, Auburn, N. Y.; William Bayard Craig, Denver, Pres. T. E. Cramblet, Bethany W. Va.; J. H. Garrison, St. Louis, Mo.; J. H. Goldner, Cleveland, O.; Hon. W. H. Graham, Allegheny, Pa.; J. H. Hill, Cincinnati, O.; Walter S. Hoye, Beaver Creek, Md.; John T. T. Hundley, Norfolk, Pa.; Finis S. Idleman, Des Moines, Ia.; Prof. Chas. W. Kent, Charlottesville, Va.; J. P. Lichtenberger, New York, N. Y.; Geo. A. Miller, Washington, D. C.; Dr. E. E. Montgomery, Philadelphia, Pa.; W. T. Moore, Columbia, Mo.; Hon. Thos. W. Phillips, Newcastle, Pa.; A. B. Philputt, Indianapolis, Ind.; Frederick D. Power, Washington, D. C.; W. F. Richardson, Kansas City, Mo.; J. G. Slayter, Pittsburg, Pa.; C. J. Tannar, Detroit, Mich.; E. J. Teagarden, Danbury, Conn.; Prof. H. L. Willett, Chicago, Ill.; S. T. Willis, New York, N. Y.

Longing.

Of all the myriad moods of mind
That through the soul come thronging,
Which one was e'er so dear, so kind,
So beautiful as Longing?
The thing we long for, that we are
For one transcendent moment,
Before the present, poor and bare,
Can make its sneering comment.

Still, through our paltry stir and strife,
Glows down the wished ideal,
And longing moulds in clay what life
Carves in the marble real;
To let the new life in, we know,
Desire must ope the portal;
Perhaps the longing to be so
Helps make the soul immortal.

Longing is God's fresh heavenward will
With our poor earthward striving;
We quench it that we may be still
Content with merely living;
But, would we learn that heart's full scope
Which we are hourly wronging,
Our lives must climb from hope to hope
And realize our longing.

Ah! let us hope that to our praise
Good God not only reckons
The moments when we tread his ways,
But when the spirit beckons,—
That some slight good is also wrought
Beyond self-satisfaction,
When we are simply good in thought,
Howe'er we fail in action.

—James Russell Lowell.

They forgot their own God. Man's heart must be occupied with something. There is an old adage that says, "If the bushel is not filled with wheat, the devil will fill it with chaff." But there is not room in the heart for two thrones. If Satan is enthroned there is no room for Christ. It is a solemn thing to think that Christ does not remain as an uninvited guest. He must be invited. He will stand at the door knocking, but will not force an entrance. And so when men began to worship heathen gods, they naturally forgot God.—D. L. Moody.

"The Chariots of Israel"

2 Kings 2:12, 13, 14: "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof."

By Rev. Edgar De Witt Jones

A strange expression this! Is occurs twice in the Old Testament under peculiar circumstances. It first fell from Elisha's lips when Elijah was taken from him and carried up to heaven. Elisha had been serving Elijah for perhaps as many as eight years. The older man had been training the younger one for a prophetic career. Now the time had come for Elijah's departure. Both knew that hour was close at hand. Side by side they set out from Gilgal and went down to Jericho. I think it must have been a very solemn and yet a precious journey that, the last one they took together. I think Elisha must have felt a sense of utter weakness, just as all of us feel when some strong character is about to be taken from us. How often we have longed for the power to say to such, "you cannot leave us; you must not go!" But when God calls home a workman he alweys raises up some one to carry on the unfinished task. So Elijah and Elisha came to the Jordan and the grand old Tishbite wrapped his mantle into a long roll and smote the Jordan's waters and they were divided hither and thither, so that they two went over on dry land. And it came to pass when they were gone over that Elijah said unto Elisha, "Ask what I shall do for thee before I am taken from thee," and Elisha said, "I pray thee let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." And Elijah said, "Thou hast asked a hard thing, nevertheless if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee."

They then continued their walk and as they went they talked. Suddenly there appeared a chariot of fire and horses of fire, and it parted them asunder and Elijah was caught up by a whirlwind. And Elisha saw it and cried, "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof."

The second time this expression occurs in the Bible it fell from the lips of a king of Israel. After a long and conspicuous service Elisha was fallen sick of a fatal malady. Joash, king of Israel, heard of the prophet's sickness and went down to visit him. And when he saw Elisha was going to die the king wept over him and cried, "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof!"

To understand these expressions we must consider the lives of these two prophets. In temperament and method they were strikingly dissimilar. Undoubtedly, Elijah is the most dramatic character of the Old Testament, not excepting Moses. Without an account of his birth or his training suddenly he flames out on the inspired page. He comes from the cave and the wilderness and the mountain. A great rugged, brawny, hairy man. Over his broad shoulders, his long, uncut locks fell. Tall, gaunt and swift of foot, and clad in sheepskin garments, he was not a man of soft words. He was not a diplomat, nor a wily politician. He spoke in tones of thunder. He rebuked sin in high places. He laid the axe at the root of the tree. Were Elijah preaching today he would make sinners tremble as did Felix before Paul. Such was Elijah, "grand, gloomy and peculiar," rugged as the hills he loved! Abrupt as forked lightning, terrible as an army with banners.

Elisha was radically different. He is introduced to us some years before he becomes a leader in Israel. He was in training for his life work seven or eight years before Elijah's mantle fell on him. Elisha was gracious, gentle and a diplomat. He was a lover of companionship and was not averse to the busy, bustling life of the cities. He loved, too, the camp fires of the armies and the military counsels; the noise and clamor of battle was music to his ears. These two men supplemented each other. Each found in the other what he lacked in himself. Moreover, it was necessary that after a man of the Elijah type had blazed the path a man like Elisha should lead the people through it. If Elijah reminds us of John the Baptist, Elisha's spirit is suggestive of Him who would not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax.

It is needful that we have diversity of gifts and temperaments. In the stormy times of the early sixties, we had at the helm of state the patient, kindly Lincoln, tender and gentle as a woman, yet with a diplomacy consummate and masterly in every detail. But there was also the fiery, impulsive, irrepressive Stanton, the Secretary of War. He contributed a part also to the demands of that crucial period.

In the great Protestant Reformation lofty spirits of very different and varied temperaments made mighty contributions. How fortunate that Luther should have had his Melanchthon, and John Knox his George Wishart.

Elijah's ministry was of the destructive sort, Elisha's constructive. But they had many things in common. They were both obedient servants of God. Both of them used the expression, "The God of Israel before whom I stand." That is, as the slave stands, in the presence of his master waiting his bidding so they stood before God. Both of these men were courageous! Bold! Daring! No secret discipleship for them. They were out-and-out servants of God. At Mount Horeb, Elijah was discouraged until assured by Jehovah that there were others who had not bowed the knee to Baal and that there was still a work for him to do. Then the drooping spirit of the old prophet was revived mightily. With new duties confronting him, he was up and about them with his old time fire.

What would have become of Israel if it had not been for such men as Elijah and Elisha? See how fruitful their lives were! How they counted for righteousness! Elisha, as Elijah was taken away, thought of all this. The chariots of fire and the horsemen no doubt suggested to him the figure he used. He thought what a defense the man had been to Israel, what a Savior, what a preserver. Yes, Elijah was better and greater and more potent than a standing army. So Elisha cried out, "My father, my father, you are the chariots and horsemen of Israel!" And when Joash leaned over the bed of Elisha the same thought came to him. How much that man had done for Israel. So brave! So true! And he too cried, "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof."

Aye, a good man is a power, is a defense, is as a garrison to a people. I think it was such a man at his best that Shakespeare had in mind when he made Hamlet say, "What a piece of work is man. How noble in reason, how infinite in faculty, in form and moving how express and admirable, in action how like an angel, in appearance how like a god, the beauty of the world, the paragon of animals!"

The good men and women are the salt of the earth, the church and the state.

"What constitutes a state?
Not high raised battlements and labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate,
Nor cities proud with spires and turrets crowned,
Not bays and broad armed ports,
Where laughing at the storms proud navies ride;
Nor starred and spangled courts
Where low-browed baseness wafts perfumes to pride.
No! Men, high-minded men—
Men who their duties know
But know their rights—and Knowing dare maintain."

Do you wish to make your life a power for good? Then be good. Do you wish your church to be prosperous and far-reaching in its power? Then live Christlike lives. Make your influence felt for every good principle; make it count for things worth while, and your life will become wondrously blest and exceedingly fruitful.

Mark Twain was less truthful than funny when he said, "Be good and you will be lonesome."

Be good and you will be too busy to be lonesome and too happy to be neglected.

SOME RECENT BOOKS

Jesse ben David, a Shepherd of Bethlehem, James M. Ludlow; New York, Fleming H. Revell Company, 1907, pp. 132, $1.00.

Dr. Ludlow, the author of a number of interesting historical novels, including "The Captain of the Januisaries," "Deborah" etc., has presented here in story form the narrative of David, the shepherd boy and king. It is put into the setting of a Roman tale and embellished on the margins of the pages with drawings suitable to the theme. It is a very tasteful volume.

Stories of Jewish Home Life, by S. O. Rosenthal; Philadelphia, the Jewish Publication Society of America, 1907, pp. 381, $1.25.

Any one who knows what interesting material lies within the limits of the Ghetto may understand how stories, such as are here set forth to the number of some half dozen, may attain a lasting place in the minds of Jewish readers and have a value for those of other races as well. No people have preserved the religious atmosphere as have the people of Israel. These stories are named respectively: "Guttraud;" "Schlemihlehen;" "Rav's Mine;" "Jephtha's Daughter;" and "Raschelchen."

SOLOMON CROWNED.*

Solomon has the reputation, among the Jewish people, of being the greatest monarch in their history. This reputation probably rests upon a number of facts. He was the first to organize the resources of the nation in such a manner as to make his own position conspicuous and splendid. It might almost be said of him and Jerusalem as it was of Augustus and Rome—that he found the city built of brick and left it of marble. For though Solomon had not the resources which later fell to the hands of Herod the Great in beautifying his capitol, he was a lover of the outward show of things and made Jerusalem very wonderful to those who had known it in the simpler days of David. More than this, Solomon's wisdom, of which a subsequent lesson treats, was equally marvelous to the people of his age, both in his studies of nature and his practical knowledge of human motives. In short, he was such a figure as to inspire respect and awe, although not a man capable of winning the ardent love and passionate attachment which David inspired.

The Choice of a King.

It was natural that in a court like that of David, with several competing interests, there should be more than one aspirant to the kingship upon the approach of the king's death. Two of David's sons were already gone, Amnon murdered for his crime and Absalom slain in battle. Adonijah was probably the next in order of age and the natural claimant to the throne. But the process of choosing a king was not yet quite settled in Israel. Saul had understood that his son, Jonathan, would succeed him, and yet a man of a different family was placed upon the throne. There were few precedents to govern in the selection of a king. Was he to be secured by popular election, or by the right of the first-born son, or by the father's choice among his sons? Clearly David conceived that the last was at least a permissible method.

Adonijah's Plot.

Adonijah had taken pains to secure his own ascent to the throne by forestalling even the king's death with his own anointing. Securing the support of Joab, the master of the army, and of certain other followers, he withdrew from the city and at the sacred well below Jerusalem, proclaimed himself as king. The knowledge of these events quickly reached Nathan, the aged prophet, the counsellor of David and instructor of the young Solomon. He went to Bethsheba, the favorite wife of David and the mother of Solomon, and showed her how urgent was the necessity for instant action on her part. She lost no time in visiting David and sufficiently arousing him to a sense of the peril in which she and her son were placed by the action of Adonijah, contrary to the promise David had made her.

David's Commands.

It is at this moment that the lesson begins. David called the priest Zadok and the prophet Nathan and Benaiah, one of his trusted warriors, who later took the place Joab now filled. He ordered them to take Solomon, place him upon his own royal mule, the animal of state, and bring him down to the pool of Gihon, east of the city, where, at the flowing water, a sacred spot to all the people, they were to anoint him and proclaim him king with pealing of trumpets and acclamations.

Solomon Anointed.

These trusted servants of David did as they had been ordered, joyfully accepting the responsibility, for evidently Adonijah was not a favorite with them. They took the young prince and the body guard of Cretans and Philistines, or the "Cherathites and Pelathites," which are really the Hebrew forms of the same words, and went to the spot which David had indicated. Here they anointed Solomon with the holy oil out of the tabernacle where David had placed the ark. The sound of the shouting, the trumpets, and the popular acclaim both with voices and instruments of music, made a great commotion in the vicinity of Jerusalem. Adonijah and his friends further down the Kedron valley could not fail to hear the shouting. When they learned that it meant the anointing of Solomon at David's command, and that David's authority was still strong enough to carry to success such a plan, they hastened to undo as far as possible their rash act in attempting to thwart the will of the monarch.

Adonijah's Fear.

Adonijah sought sanctuary at the altar, grasping its corners and claiming its protection against the death he knew Solomon might decree against him. When the young king learned of the fact and of Adonijah's terror, he was not disposed to press his right to inflict punishment upon his less fortunate brother, but put him under pledge to keep the peace and work no conspiracy against himself. He was brought before Solomon and accepted his position of freedom with gratitude. We shall later see, however, that his restless and ambitious mind wrought at other projects which soon brought him to disaster.

The Second Psalm.

In this manner the will of David concerning Solomon was brought to successful execution. David's reign had resulted in a strong kingdom, amply respected by its neighbors, which was now bequeathed to the young and inexperienced monarch. It is not surprising that there should have been difficulty at the start of this new reign. Many dependent nations under the yoke of task—work and tribute, would naturally seek such a moment for release. If it may be supposed that the Second Psalm is the product of this period and perhaps of the mind of Nathan, we may find in it an admirable statement in reference to the attempts that were made by tributary powers to break away from the authority of the rightful king. They are the nations that rage and the people who imagine vain things. The king is undisturbed by their plans. God has set him upon the holy hill of Zion and promised him the nation for his inheritance. The prophet concludes the Psalm with words of admonition to these malcontents, and petitions them to submit to the authority of God's chosen king. Under such auspices and with such favorable omens Solomon began his reign.

The Prayer Meeting

Silas Jones.

Topic November 18: The Fatherhood of God in the Sermon on the Mount. Mt. 5:16, 45, 48; 6:1, 4, 6, 8, 9, 15, 18, 26, 32; 7:11, 21.

In the first recorded words of Jesus he speaks of God as Father. In teaching his disciples to pray, he bade them say, "Our Father." In Gethsemane, he prayed, "My Father, if this cup cannot pass away, except I drink it, thy will be done." On the cross he said, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." God was to him a loving Father to whom he came with perfect confidence at all times. Men meet the requirements of Jesus in proportion as they learn to live as the children of God.

The Glory of the Father.

The name of God is glorified on earth when his children walk in the light and do the deeds of the light. A great man like Paul is able to open the eyes of many to the mercy of God in their lives. The world is always in need of men of might to lead the hosts of the Lord. But a leader is of small account when he has no one to lead. I suspect that the great need is a multitude of plain people who can be depended upon to do their whole duty. The nobodies who think they have no responsibility are the destroyers of churches and the defamers of God.

The Father's Beneficence.

The sunlight is enjoyed by the evil and the good, and the rain is sent upon the just and the unjust. God takes thought for the birds of the heaven. It has taken men a long time to make a beginning in goodness that is based on the beneficence of God. They held for ages that the bad man should receive evil and not good, and they put in the class of bad men all who did not live according to their notions. The beasts of the field had no rights except such as man was pleased to grant them for his own advantage. Today we have a dim consciousness that a man in the penitentiary has some rights and that we ought to be kind to him for his own sake. By and by we shall know enough to take the man who has by crime forfeited his right to freedom and put him where he will become a better man. In the past penal institutions have been devices of Satan for confirming criminals in their sin.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

LESSON III. HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION (Continued).

PART II. SUNDAY-SCHOOL PEDAGOGY.

III. MEDIAEVAL (CATHOLIC). The whole period between the fifth century and the Protestant Reformation shows a marked decline in the educational life of the church. This was due in part to the rapid growth of Christianity among the heathen peoples of Europe but chiefly to the lust for temporal power among the higher ecclesiastics. So long as the machinery of the church could be held together and strengthened, they cared little how ignorant of religious truths the masses of the people might remain; and this point of view was helped by the sacramental conception of religion, which made the rite or ceremony as such efficacious apart from any intelligent coöperation in it by the worshipper. During all of these centuries the church leaders were more concerned with fighting and political intrigue than with intellectual pursuits. What little education existed was among the clergy. A relic of these days is our English word "clerk," which is a shortening of "cleric," or member of the clergy.

(1.) REVIVALS. Sporadic attempts were made to stem the tide of ignorance. In the ninth century the Emperor Charlemagne attempted to establish a system of instruction both secular and religious, but it seems to have been rendered largely inoperative by the ignorance of the clergy themselves. In a few cases catechisms were prepared for the religious instruction of the young. Several of the Church Councils (Lambeth, Bezier and Tortosa) took the matter in hand and ordered religious instruction to be given children, but with little success. Much more was accomplished by the revivals of religion under St. Francis and St. Dominic, whose "preaching friars" went about the country teaching the common people by the wayside and on the street the first principles of the faith. Afterwards these movements were corrupted by prosperity, but for long they were a great educational force.

(2.) SCHOOLS. General education was an ideal undreamed of. There were three classes of schools, the Cathedral, Conventual and Trivial, but, with the exception of the latter, these were patronized chiefly by the children of the upper classes. The universities were under the control of the church and the subjects taught were of a theological nature. It was in these institutions that the famous "scholastic philosophy," if not born, at least took root and flourished, and gave that intellectual cast to Christian faith from which it is only now recovering. Renaissance, or the Revival of Learning, as it is called, marks the decline of the mediaevalism and the birth of the modern spirit. Thenceforth the church was no longer to hold the key of knowledge, but educaton was to be secularized and thus made more truly religious. Sunday-schools were to become possible.

IV. PROTESTANT. Among the adherents of the various reform movements in the church before the Reformation proper some attempts were made in the direction of religious education for the young; but they were insignificant compared with the awakening of the Protestant churches to their duty in this regard which, with so much else that was great and good, sprang from the towering personality of Luther.

(1.) BEFORE SUNDAY-SCHOOL ORGANIZATION. This was the period when theological controversy raged fiercest and no concerted action was possible among the churches even in such a vital matter as the education of the young. Faith being conceived as an intellectual thing, each church thought it to be its duty to formulate its own doctrine (with special emphasis on the points where it differed from others) and to feed the minds of the young with these dry bones of theological controversy. Education in the modern sense was unknown.

(a) CATECHISMS. Instruction was catechetical not only in form, but in spirit. The first Protestant catechism was written by Luther about 1529. His example was soon imitated by others. Within the next thirty-five years four other standard catechisms were issued, representing different sections of the Protestant movement. The catechism of the English Church appeared in 1604. The famous "Shorter Catechism" which is still used by most of the English speaking Presbyterian bodies, appeared in 1664 and the "Longer" in the following year.

(b) COUNTER REFORMATION. The answer of the Catholic Church to the Protestant secession was the "Counter-Reformation," which was initiated in the famous Council of Trent. Provision was then made for the systematic religious instruction of the young, and the Catechism of the Council of Trent was issued in 1566. In this educational revival the Jesuit Order took a leading part, which they still maintain. By reaching out after the children they gave the Reformation its severest check, and it is the importance given to the instruction of the young that is one of the strongest points in Catholicism today. The church has never forgotten the words of St. Xavier, "Give me the children until they are seven years old, and any one may take them afterwards."

(c) HOME TRAINING. With all its weaknesses the education of these centuries had one strong point, namely, the emphasis laid on family worship and the home instruction of the young. To a large extent the home was the first and best, and in many cases the only, school of religion. The result was that while the children of Godless or careless parents were neglected, there were many others who received from at home a vital comprehension of religious truth that is not surpassed in any modern Sunday-school, and it is a thousand pities that this old fashioned home instruction is falling into disuse. The Sunday-school was never meant to relieve parents of a single responsibility for the religious nurture of their children.

LITERATURE. Same as in preceding lesson. The statements in these two lessons are largely borrowed, though not without verification, from Haslett's Pedagogical Bible School.

QUESTIONS. 1. Give in your own words an account of the general condition of religious education in Europe from the fifth to the fifteenth centuries. 2. Give at least two reasons for this. 3. Name some of the efforts that were made to counteract this. 4. What effect had the revivals of Sts. Francis and Dominic on the state of education ? 5. Tell what you know about the schools of those days. 6. Into what two periods may the Protestant development be divided? 7. What was the outstanding characteristics of religious education in the period before Sunday-school organization? 8. Name some of the famous catechisms. 9. What was the "Counter-Reformation" and what part did it play in the religious education of the young? 10. What was one strong point in the religious education of this period? 11. What danger exists today?

PRAYER MEETING (Concluded from page 8).

The Standard of Perfection.

In asking men to be perfect as God is perfect, Jesus paid humanity the highest compliment it ever received. He laid upon men no impossible tasks. They can do what he commanded. Ie is hardly necessary to say that the man who publshes abroad that he has reached the perfection which is the standard of conduct in the kingdom is either deceiving himself or trying to deceive others. All the men of this kind that I have ever encountered were sadly lacking in morals or deficient in mental vigor. Such men are unimportant. The disturbing fact is that we are so ready to substitute for the high standard fixed by our Lord a standard that is much easier to reach, and to comfort ourselves with the thought that we are doing fairly well. We cannot afford to lower the standard by which we judge conduct.

The Searcher of Hearts.

The hypocrite doing his righteousness before men, sounding a trumpet before him in the synagogue, praying in the corners of the streets, disfiguring his face to be seen of men to fast, ostentatiously doing mighty works in the name of the Lord, has all his pains for nothing. The Father of all mercies is not deceived. This is plain enough. But it is human to go right on and try to deceive God. When we stop to think of it, we know that the mumbling of prayers and a feigned friendliness are an insult to God and man, yet some of us think these shams are worth while. Perhaps successful deception of earthly fathers accounts for many attempts to deceive God. To many the word father carries with the implication of willingness to look with indulgence on the sins of children. Unfortunately there are fathers on earth who give their children a poor idea of fatherhood. God our Father searches out the sin of the heart. He is intolerant of every sort of wickedness. He loves his children too well to allow them to be at ease in sin. He will not give us quietness until we are at one with him in the love of truth and goodness.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett.

What are some of the books that deal helpfully with the subject of evolution as the method of explaining nature?

There are many books that deal suggestively and helpfully with the subject. Among such I would name: The Ascent Through Christ, E. Griffith-Jones (Gorham); Through Science to Faith, Smyth (Scribner); The Ascent of Man, Henry Drummond (Macmillan); The Theology of an Evolutionist, Lyman Abbott (Houghton). There are many others, but these would at least open the way to a competent understanding of the matter.

Dear Brother Willett:

1. Do you believe that mankind were physically generated from monkeys or other beasts inferior to mankind?

2. If you do, then which of the reported revelations from God to mankind contained in the book of Genesis do you regard as the first of such authentic revelations? For example: do you believe that God foretold Noah that the flood would come and that he told him to make the ark to save his family? Some revelation, definite and authentic, had to be the first from God to mankind, if he ascended from monkey parentage. Will you tell us which you think was the very first of those reported in the book of Genesis?

Roodhouse, Ill. L. W. Spayd.

Many of us had the misfortune to be taught in early life that the principle of evolution is a dangerous one, excluding God from his universe, and making creation a mere process of law and mechanics. Even in some of our colleges no competent light is thrown upon the question by instructors in biblical literature and Christian doctrine, though in the scientific departments of the same institutions the principle of evolution is generally accepted as the only competent and satisfactory explanation of things. For this very reason, the fact that the relations of nature and the Bible are not frankly faced in the class-rooms where preachers are trained for their work, not a few of them find themselves in perplexity over the whole question when they meet it in the literature and thinking of their active ministry. But if they study the matter with the aids which are so abundant in our day, they are likely to discover that there is no place where one can find satisfaction of mind on the question of God's relation to the universe outside of the principle of evolution. This is the simplest explanation of the facts as they are presented in overwhelming array not only in all the text books of science, but in those that deal with history, social growth, and political institutions. No man goes through any competent institution of education in these days who does not find out that evolution is the only explanation that is offered for the facts of life as they are observed on every hand, and he soon perceives that evolution is simply God's way of working. One need not insist that it is the only way in which he could work. With that question we have nothing to do. It is enough to perceive that it is manifestly the way in which he did work in the preparation of the world for man and of man for his destiny. The human body itself manifests its relationship to the other forms of life below it. The child in the embryo state passes through the very same processes of growth which characterize at least four of the orders of life below man in the physical scale. The development of human life began at the very point where, in the growth of the animal organism, self-consciousness and conscience appeared. These new gifts, like all the rest of the growth, were divine bestowments, not in spasms of creative energy but by the regular and constant impartation of the divine life. Evolution is often defined as the development of an organism in accordance with the working of fixed laws and by the power of resident forces. These resident forces are not always in the organism, as the atheistic type of evolution tried to insist, but in the environment as well, and the environment is all nature and God.

The revelation of God to man began at the very first moment when human life, thus growing, was able to understand something of the divine nature and purpose. A child's first perception of its parent's character is not through the words he speaks but through the sense of his love and care. God has never left himself without witness among any people, but in one history, that of the Hebrews, there was a sensitiveness to these facts and a desire to proclaim them which no other people have every possessed. Out of that sensitiveness and desire came the Old Testament. God revealed himself not so much in spoken words as in human life, and the record of that revelation is seen in such narratives as the prophets wrote, because they had first experienced God in their own lives and had proclaimed him in their spoken words.

The narratives of the early chapters of Genesis are a part of this literature. They are incidental to the messages of the prophets regarding their own times and God's will for those times, but they are valuable as showing what use could be made of early world beliefs in turning them to account as makers of character.

A few hours spent with the writings of Conn, De Vries and Alfred Russell Wallace, as well as the multitude of scholars who have written more particularly on the religious significance of evolution, would remove much of the prejudice felt by those who fear that evolution is an attempt to get rid of divine power in the order of the universe and would reveal the secret of that effectiveness which lies in the preaching of an informed and reverent student of God's works as well as his Word.

SOME RECENT BOOKS

Lessons of Prosperity, by Reverend W. L. Watkinson. (New York, Fleming H. Revell Co., Pp. 179, 75 cents.)

Dr. Watkinson is one of the well known English preachers. This is a small collection of addresses of which the first gives title to the book. The themes relate to personal conduct and are such as, "Keeping Up Appearances," "Playing with Fire," "Modest Goodness," "The Grammar of Ornament," etc.

The Nearer and Farther East, by Samuel M. Zwamer and Arthur Judson Brown. (New York, Macmillan Co., 1908, Pp. 312, 75 cents.)

This volume presents outline studies of Moslem lands and of Siam, Burmah, and Korea. Dr. Zwamer is probably the greatest living authority on the life and missionary conditions of Mohammedan countries. And Dr. Brown is equally an authority on the regions of farther Asia. The volume is divided into brief chapters which are followed with questions and references to additional helpful literature. It will be found an admirable text book for the study of missions, and it constitutes the eighth volume issued by the Central Committee on the union study of missions.

Jerusalem, by George Adam Smith. 2 vols. with maps and illustrations. (New York, A. C. Armstrong & Son, 1908. Pp. 456 and 579. $7.50 net.)

No one who has the slightest acquaintance with the geographical literature of Palestine will doubt that George Adam Smith is the greatest living authority upon that theme. His former work, "The Historical Geography of the Holy Land," in spite of the fact that it is a massive volume, is one of the most commonly used hand-books in Syria. It is a common remark that travelers through the Holy Land need a Bible, Bardekar and a copy of the "Historical Geography," and the first and third of these volumes will be read with increasing satisfaction the further one travels in that wonderful land. Few biblical students have brought to the exposition of holy Scripture a combination of such thorough intellectual training, such mental sympathy with the theme and such felicity of expression as Dr. Smith. There are whole chapters in the "Historical Geography" that read like romances. Who that has sat at the top of Mount Ebal and read his chapter on the view from that point, or has ridden slowly across the plain of Esdraelon with the volume open at the chapter which describes that wonderful expanse, without entering with the author fully into the mystery and glory of its scenes.

The new work is a companion to the "Historical Geography," Its field is, of course, much narrower, but its treatment is correspondingly more ample and the amount of material is one-half more than in the former work. The treatment is two-fold. The first volume is devoted to the topography, geology, water supply, natural and artificial resources, commerce, revenues, government, and population of Jerusalem. The second is taken up with the review of Jerusalem's history, beginning with the testimony of the Tel el Amarna tablets and passing in review each of the different periods to the times of the New Testament. Many of these chapters, especially those of the second volume, have appeared in the Expositor, but they are amplified and made more effective in their present setting.

Of these two volumes it may be said, as of the former work and indeed of all that Dr. Smith has written, that it combines true historical and scientific insight with a profound sympathy with the theme, and no man is a competent interpreter either of the Bible or those lands in which the Bible was produced who has not these two qualities. Not every one will be able to own this massive and monumental work, but there are few ministers or Sunday-school teachers who might not secure its purchase by the public library of their city. In that way its value would be appreciated by a much wider circle of readers than those able to own it at first hand. One who comes to know George Adam Smith through any of his writings is likely to wish to go farther afield with him in such biblical studies as those of Isaiah and the Minor Prophets, or in his admirable life of Henry Drummond. It is a matter of interest that during the present year Dr. Smith is publishing a series of articles on Moab in the Expositor Magazine.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

The Correspondent:—"Why should one persist in staying on the Centennial program when he knows there are a large number of brethren opposed to such a course? I should think any man who knows any considerable number are opposed to his views would gracefully decline and retire."

We have come to such a time as this for a purpose. The lesson we should learn is that of toleration. Unless we learn it, if the logic of the correspondent is to be followed, we may come up to Pittsburg to a great silent gathering. It would be unique in the religious conventions of Christendom. The presiding officers would sit silent on the platform, the singers would be mute and all the hosts sitting in the audience would remain modestly silent. No speaker could be found who would agree to speak because his views would not suit all. Perhaps it would be the greatest convention ever held. There would be no ranting, no seeking for cheap effect. Instead of the usual strain there would be repose and quiet. No one would pass harsh criticisms on good brethren. No speaker would have a chance to draw grewsome pictures of God's world of today. No man would make an impression. It would be God's opportunity. It would be a time for reflection.

God's Chance to Speak.

At first there would be marks of restlessness and nervousness, on account of the unusual character of the assembly, but the revival spirit of mighty numbers would soon possess the minds and hearts of this great silent gathering. What a time for repentence and consecration it would be. All would know we had reached a crisis in our brotherhood. Such a crisis as would not allow a single speaker to utter a word because on some minor matters he was not in accord with all. And so our centennial convention would be one of terrible silence. But as the blind become more sensitive in their senses other than sight, so our great silent gathering, not allowed vocal utterance, would turn to keener introspection. There would be great resolves as we sat ourselves down in the great auditorium of Pittsburg. Let us suppose it actual. We knew our silence was the price of intolerance. We remembered the fiery flames that claimed the life of Servetus and we were not forgetful of the terrible inquisition. We had brought ourselves into line not with apostolic succession, but with that of fanatical persecution. We had stopped the voice of every strong man and independent soul among us.

But there is one who is never silent—God. To our great convention as it waited in silence He spoke. This was his message. "Let every man be silent till he can speak in the Spirit of My Son, Christ, the Spirit of love."

The great concourse of people now felt as though they had waited a hundred years for this message, and a new Pensecostal spirit seemed to sweep into the hearts of the waiting multitude. They now breathed with one accord. They repented as one man, and thus was born a common joy and hope.

Our editors had not been heard, no statistics had been presented by our missionary secretaries, none of our evangelists had been permitted to exhort us. The orators remained in the audience humble and quiet. The voices heard every year in the conventions were now still.

But God had spoken and all was well. We, in our clashings, had about forgotten to have Him on our programs. We waited expectant for a further message. It came to the great silent gathering, in words which let us never forget. "He who is not against me is for me. Do not be unbrotherly as to error, but be brotherly in proclaiming the truth." The Spirit had done His work. The great Disciple brotherhood pleading for unity had been united. The tongues of all were loosed and every voice and heart sang as it had never been sung before:

"All hail the power of Jesus' name
Let Angels prostrate fall
Bring forth the royal diadem
And crown Him Lord of all."

We went to our homes and churches and tasks a tolerant and Christian people. We ceased not to be militant; but we ceased to be accusatory.

The reign of the newspaper had passed, the reign of God had begun.

Not Fanciful.

This is purely fanciful says some one. Not so. God is not fanciful. He is a real, present God. He was concerned with Pentecost and is not less concerned with Pittsburg.

His presence is with Medbury as it was with Matthew; with Phillips as it was with Philip; with McLean as with Mark; and with Mrs. Harlan and Mrs. Atwater as with Mary and Martha.

Nor is the thought of a silent convention fanciful if the logic of the correspondent be followed.

Some are opposed to Bro. Willett's remaining on the program. Suppose he would get off. Then no one could be on; for there is not a man among us who would please all. Mr. Willett has made great sacrifices for the brotherhood of his birth and choice. He persevered to educate himself so that he might serve it well. This is a sacrifice too rarely counted. He founded a school for the Disciples so that he might serve the ministry of the Disciples efficiently.

Through criticism and misrepresentation he has kept to his purpose, for he has a purpose. Somewhere in secret whence prayers arise and tears flow, he formed this purpose of giving his life to his brethren's need. To his trysting places with God he does not admit many of us, but we are not left in doubt as to the whiteness of the heat of those moments, perhaps years, of resolve. No cyclone of calumny has turned him from his course. He has gone almost silently on; but at times sorrowfully. The suggestion that he is covertly but persistently seeking to betray the brotherhood is, to use the expression Maurice once used in answer to a newspaper slander of his day "a momentous lie." To make the charge is to fail utterly to understand human nature. Is sacrifice a test of loyalty? Dr. Willett is loyal. He has refused more flattering offers to leave our brotherhood than any other man ever connected therewith. From the largest colleges and the largest churches have come these offers. He has succeeded in uniting the two largest churches ever brought into union by the efforts of one of our ministers. And no one has pointed out that any principle for which we have stood has been surrendered. So if he cannot stay on the program, who can?

Radford and Willett.

I do not know who is on the program. Perhaps B. J. Radford is. His labor of love in the decades past merit him a place of honor. But suppose (of course they would not) Dr. Willett and others should object to his representing us. If the correspondent were right he would have to be silent. If objections were filed to Dr. Radford being on the program I would write columns to defend his right and honor. I would point out his long years of splendid service at Eureka. I would tell of his successful pastorates at Des Moines and Denver. I would quote his poetry of helpfulness. I would turn the files of our papers and republish some of his suggestive writings. I would do more, I would reveal the hearts of a multitude in whom he has an honored place. I would scorn the objection that he does not always see eye to eye with me. We love and obey a common Christ. That is enough.

In similar way I would defend D. R. Dungan, J. B. Briney, J. H. Painter and all other good brethren.

But if there are to be none on the program whose point of view as to all religious questions is satisfactory to all we must come up to a great silent convention. We can afford it if we will listen to the Lord of hosts and the God of battles. We can be still if He speaks.

Let our sentence for this week be from Belloc, "Do not, I beseech you, be troubled about the increase of forces already in dissolution. You have mistaken the hour of the night; it is already morning."

The President-Elect on Missions

BY REV. A. W. FORTUNE.

The past few days have been full of interest for the people of Cincinnati. They have been busy celebrating the election of one of their townsmen to the governorship of the state, and another to the presidency of the nation. But during all this excitement there has been in session in the Trinity M. E. Church, the annual meeting of one of the great missionary bodies of the world—The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This society raised and expended last year about three quarters of a million dollars. This convention reached its culmination at 10 o'clock on Thursday, Nov. 5, when President-elect Wm. H. Taft delivered an address on foreign missions. It was my privilege to hear this address, and for the benefit of the readers of the Century, I want to pass on some of the good things he said. Everything helped to make this a great meeting. It was the second day after the election. The subject was foreign missions and the speaker was the man whom we had just selected to represent our country among the nations of the world.

President Taft said he was not able to speak of the work of the missionaries from a purely religious point of view, but he was able to speak of their work from the view-point of government and of the advancement of civilization. He said the spread of Christianity is absolutely necessary for the progress of the race. The Christian churches throughout the world are helping to establish those principles of government for which America stands. These principles of government seem to be inconsistent with every religion except Christianity. Mohammedanism and Buddhism naturally tend to despotism. But the responsibility of man to God, and of equality before God, which Christianity teaches, fits in with our form of government.

Mr. Taft said his experience in the Philippines made him vitally interested in the missionary work on those islands. He said the influence of the churches there means everything for the future of that people. Without the churches the government could scarcely get on. One of the indications of progress in the Philippines is the elevation of woman, and the estimation of woman is the standard of civilization.

Mr. Taft was very emphatic in his commendation of missionary work in China. He said the development of China is the greatest movement going on in the world today, and the outposts of civilization in China are the mission stations. The missionaries go further in China than anyone else, and they furnish an ideal civilization to those people among whom they go. He said there are many Americans in China who do not commend us, and ought not to any people. They are not there to help China but to work China for their own good. There are many merchants there, who are good men, but they are there to work trade in their own interest. The missionary represents a different ideal. He is there in the interest of the natives themselves. And it is this unselfish interest of the missionaries, said Mr. Taft, which gives American diplomats standing with the Chinese authorities. He said while he was in China, he attended the dedication of a Y. M. C. A. building, and representatives of all the Chinese officials of the place were present, and Chinese, who made no profession of Christianity, gave for the building because they recognized it as a good thing for their young men. He said the charge that the missionaries troubled the diplomats is untrue. And the Boxer uprising was not a revolt against the missionaries, but a revolt against foreign greed, and because the missionaries were closest at hand they received the first blow. He said the influence of mission work in China cannot be overstated. It effects all classes, even the leaders in education and statecraft. He said China is waking up, and it is important that she wake up under the best influences, hence the work of the missionaries in China is of supreme value at the present time.

Mr. Taft said we can not sit still here in this country and rid ourselves of our responsibility to other peoples. He said it is an argument of laziness, and of seeking to avoid responsibility, to say we have so much to do at home that we can not do anything abroad. He said he used to share this belief, but since he has traveled in the East and studied their problems, he has come to feel that the fact that we are a great, intelligent nation makes us debtors to these downtrodden peoples.

An address, like that made by our future president, means much for the cause of missions. In our discussion of missions, much stress has been placed upon the sentimental. We need the testimony of men who have studied the problem from the view point of world-civilization. This address will make friends for President Taft, but what is more important, it will make friends for the cause of foreign missions.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates.

CHRIST'S TESTS OF FELLOWSHIP.

Jesus laid down just a few decisive tests of fellowship. They were conditions of discipleship.

SELF DENIAL.

Jesus Said: "If an man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."

"If any man cometh unto me and hateth not his own father, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

"Whosoever doth not bear his own cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple."

HUMILITY.

Jesus said: ."Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven."

LOVE.

Jesus said:. "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one to another."

John said: "If a man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar."

Jesus said: "Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you; that ye may be sons of your Father who is in heaven."

SERVICE.

Jesus said: "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you he shall in nowise lose his reward."

Herein is my Father glorified that ye beach much fruit; and so shall ye be my disciples."

Jesus said: "I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep." He goeth before them, and the sheep follow him; for they know his voice."

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

"Then shall the king say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; for I was hungry, and ye gave me to eat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me to drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me." "In as much as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Self denial, numility, love, and service—these are the infallible marks of true discipleship to Jesus, and they are Jesus' own tests of fellowship with himself, and with the company of the disciples, and the ultimate conditions of salvation. There are no indications in the teaching of Jesus that he contemplated any other tests as terms of fellowship among his people. Likeness to Christ in the spirit and principle of his life is union with him; and union with him entitles a person to union with all who are in him. Here is the ultimate basis of a reunited church; whoever requires less, lowers Christian fellowship below the character of Jesus Christ, misleads the world and creates a church destined to division and to be a reproach to Christ; whoever requires more, declares likeness t o Christ an insufficient basis of reunion, dishonors Christ, and creates a church destined to perpetual disunion.

Self denial, humility, love and service—these are legal tender throughout Christendom, the universe over, and they are the native currency of the kingdom of heaven. "To such belong the kingdom of heaven." They are Jesus' answer to the question: "What must I do to be saved?" "Against such there is no law." In the last Great Day when the King shall sit upon the throne of his glory and all the nations are brought b efore him, for the final separation, the one question that will be asked, will be: Have you loved and served my brethren; Have you given the cup of cold water in the name of a disciple; Have you visited the fatherless and widows in their affliction and kept yourself unspotted from the world. For the one who has done these things heaven's fellowship was prepared from the foundation of the world. To such belongs the kingdom. By their fruits ye shall know them.

If these are the tests of fellowship in heaven, why are they not sufficient tests of fellowship on earth? This is what the Disciples of Christ have always been saying—Let us make conditions of salvation tests of fellowship. Alexander Campbell said in 1810: "Standards (creeds as tests of fellowship) have been lifted up which narrowed the gates of Zion, so that only a few of a certain height and breadth could have admission, there were none of them but would reject those whom God has not rejected, and deny admission to those whom God had admitted. All are defective. The apostle Paul, the angel Gabriel in human form, could not be admitted(to fellowship) on the principles of these standards."

"We have decided, therefore, to lift it (the New Testament) up as a standard for the church, to open the gates of admission into the church as wide as the gates of heaven." "That standard is the testimony of Jesus, which is the spirit of prophecy."

Self denial, humility, love and service—there is nothing here about belief in Old Testament miracles, or the verbal inspiration of the scriptures, or the Virgin Birth, or any other doctrine as tests of fellowship among the disciples. Christ asked no man to believe in a doctrine of Revelation, or of Inspiration, or of Atonement, or of Retribution, as a condition of entering on discipleship with him. Jesus supreme interest was not in doctrine and books, historic events and marvelous tales, but in men's lives: he came that they might have life, and have it abundantly. His supreme task was not to save the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, or the unity of the book of Isaiah, but to seek and to save the lost. Any cost was worth while if it was directed to the saving of lost men. Any one, even God, was justified in loving men. As Jesus' supreme interest was in men's lives, so he wants the supreme interest of his church to be in mens' lives. He made this human interest and service a test of loyalty to him.

THE TEST OF LOYALTY.

"If a man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." It is possible for a man to say: I believe in the verbal inspiration of the scriptures, in the miracles of the Old Testament, and in the Virgin Birth, and still be a heretic, and to make himself a heretic in his attitude toward those who do not hold those doctrines. Not he that believes much but he that loves much, is most loyal to Christ. It has been the favorite method of Lexington and Cincinnati to point to the number of doctrines they believe as evidence of their superior loyalty to Christ and the church. That is not Christ's test of loyalty. Lexington and Cincinnati would do far better to take Christ's standard and point to their love and service for humanity as tests of their orthodoxy.

"By their fruits ye shall know them." During the last ten or fifteen years, if there has been discord in the ranks of the Disciples, if there has been a "fight" or 'line up" at the conventions, if there has been suspicion and hatred among brethren, if the missionary societies have had their income and work imperiled, it has been due, in most instances, to the pretended zeal of Cincinnati and Lexington for orthodoxy. They have made the impression in some quarters, by reason of this, that they were "the true, the tried, and the faithful" among the Disciples, and the only ones who could be trusted with the interests of the Kingdom. They have not shrunk from producing division, to carry their zeal for orthodoxy to a successful issue. The ground on which they have justified their conduct has been their more loyal belief in certain doctrines, and in no instance, their more royal service for humanity.

"What doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God."

THE DAWN AT SHANTY BAY

By Robert E. Knowles, Author "St. Cuthberts" and "The Undertow"

CHAPTER V.

How Ronnie Took the Hurdle.

A moment later they were both blinking before the flickering lamp and beaming stove that illumined the little room. Mildred, seized of that ecstatic terror that only children and Christmas know, flew to her mother's bedside at the first opening of the door.

"Don't be afraid; it's Santa Claus," the mother's voice whispered to the child. This was confirmed by Ephraim's stouter tone.

"Come on, little one; come an' shake hands with Santa. He loves little children."

Gently he beguiled the child into obedience, his efforts seconded by the mother's pleading; till at last, slowly and with sweet girlish shyness, Mildred stole toward the bulky figure, extending one tiny palm, the other still outstretched toward the bed she had left behind. Ronald drew closer to her; and as the wondering face, aglow with almost reverent eagerness, was turned upward to his own, the strong man's heart seemed suddenly to slip its leash. For the eternal childlike was in her face, holding in its hand the universal key. Ronald thought of Hugh, and of Hugh's golden childhood days—even of his own he thought, free though his had been from such frivolties as these. He thought of another—of Hugh's baby sister—who had gone from him when little more than big enough to turn upward the sweet lips that could lisp her father's name; and his heart outmelted toward the child before him. In a moment the trembling palm was in his own, his gauntlet cast upon the floor; and all the folly of his masquerade, all the sinfulness of the deception, all the historic perjury of these yuletide festivities he had been taught to despise as popish and depraved—these vanished from his mind, displaced by the elemental love that springs in every true man's heart when confronted with the truth and purity of childhood's face, and by the deeper passion of the heart that has known a father's pity or experienced a father's loss.

"Stand ye behind the sheet," he whispered to Ephraim when opportunity presented. "When I gie this wee bit stick the magic wave—I'll shake it like, ye ken—ye maun pu' the sheet to the yin side."

Ephraim understood exultantly, and took his place in readiness.

"Watch me, lassie," cried Ronald to the child. "Dinna tak yir eyes aff Sandy—I'll mak yon curtain staun' aside;" and so saying, he waved majestically, the curtain yielding with one ripping breath that spoke the pangs of dissolution. Ephraim was enfolded, prostrate, emerging later quite unnoticed.

Highly delighted with the success of his poetic fancy, Ronald gave himself up to the glory of the hour. One by one he plucked the treasures from the tree, handing them to the transported child, gallantly bowing as low as his too highly developed bosom would permit.

"Here's a bonnie horse an' wagon," he said, now in mid-career; "I made them wi' my ain hands, lassie."

"Oh, how lovely!" gasped the child. "Thank you so much, Santa."

"An' here's the bonniest wee hood—wi' a tawsel to hang doon yir back!"

"Oh, isn't it sweet—thank you so much, Santa! And who made it?" cried the eight-year-old, her eyes aglow.

"My—my—my grandmither made it," Ronold responded defiantly. "She's gey clever wi' the needle."

(Copyright, 1907, by Fleming H. Revell Co.)

"Ask him where his grandmother lives," whispered Ephraim. Mildred promptly echoed the question.

"She lives i' Greenland," Ronald cried heroically. "It's awfu' cauld i' Greenland," he added, trying to mop under the edges of the pasteboard mask. "Open the window a wee bit," he appealed to Ephraim in a whisper. "I dasn't," his friend replied; "the minister might be passin'."

The merry work went on; and soon Mildred and her mystic benefactor were almost on terms of intimacy.

"Please tell me where you live," the child ventured during a pause in the high proceedings.

"Juist over at the ——" he began unguardedly. "Over at the North Pole," he amended, his voice rising in satisfaction at the revised geography.

"And what do you do all summer?" she went on. "I've often wondered what Santa does all summer."

Ronald was by this time far from the moorings of his youth. "I sleep a' the simmer," he replied with shameful promptness. "Mebbe I fix up a bonnie toy or twa—but naethin' to speak o'."

"And do you really go over all the world on Christmas eve?" the child pursued, charmed with so rare an opportunity for information.

"Ay, I gang everywhere—'m gaein' till Africy when I'm through wi' here," said Ronald calmly.

"But they'll be asleep," interposed his questioner, wide-awake she.

"Mebbe sae—ay, they'll be asleep. But I gang doon the chimney, ye ken; it's no hard when ye're used till it. I must be gaein' noo—my reindeers is waitin' at the door."

The girl flew to the window at the word, her hands to her eyes.

"They're not there, Santa," she cried in disappointment, "I can't see them."

"Oh, ay—ay," Ronald said in some embarrassment. "Oh, I forgot, lassie. I left them i' the taivern sheds." The child's glistening eyes seemed to fire his own as they flashed their flame into his face.

"Ask him to dance," Ephraim whispered. Mildred cheerfully transmitted the request. Whereat Ronald was not one whit dismayed.

"Ay, I'll dance for ye," he responded gleefully; "a' the Sandy Claws's can shake a toe—I'll gie ye the Highland Fling," which he promptly proceeded to perform, the ensuing perspiration finding its destiny in his flowing beard. But suddenly calamity befell him; Ephraim's pillowy affixture, sharing the agitation of the moment, slowly sank beneath it, finally drooping at Ronald's feet upon the floor. The performer came to a sudden standstill, gazing at it in silent horror. But his self-control was great, returning in an instant.

"Tak this pillow to my sleigh," he ordered Ephraim, handing it calmly to his friend, sadly conscious though he was of how sorely he had fallen off. "Ye ken, lassie, I hae to snatch a wee bit sleep the best I can when I'm gangin' frae yin continent till anither; an' I carry it in there to—to keep me warm." he concluded triumphantly, stroking the bereaved locality with one hand and wiping the moisture from behind his ears with the other.

Even Ephraim gasped at this. "I'm afeard we'll have to let him go," he said smilingly to Mildred; "he seems tired—and his reindeers'll be gettin' cold."

The child assented regretfully. The now diminished Santa Claus bowed toward the smiling mother on the bed; rather precipitately did he bow, forgetful for the moment how reduced he was in flesh.

"Good-night, Santa Claus—good-bye," and as Mildred spoke she cuddled up to him in a sort of rapturous affection, holding up her hands. Ronald lifted the child in his arms and held her close for a moment, his whole being strangely thrilled by the warm and magnetic touch. Then he thrust his hands within the folds of the coon-skin coat, rummaging in an upper pocket; moving toward the now dismantled tree, he pretended to pluck something from the topmost bough.

"Here's a wee bit paper screed frae Sandy," he said gallantly. "Mebbe ye'll find his address on it."

Mildred examined it a moment in the light of the glowing stove and then rushed toward the bed.

"Oh, mother, look—look, mother; it's twenty—it's twenty dollars," she cried incredulously. The wasted hand received it and the wan face turned toward the dispenser. But a draught of chilly air greeted her as she turned, the door closing rapidly behind two outgoing figures, and she could just hear Ronald's voice from without.

"Merry Christmas to ye a'! Merry Christmas, an' God bless ye!"

The two cronies walked on beneath the glowing stars. Ephraim was the first to speak. "There must a' been a curious joy about dyin' on the cross," he said suddenly.

"Joy!" echoed Ronald, "what dae ye mean?"

"Oh, nothin'," responded the other. "Only it's so much fun to give something—an' that other was the high water mark."

Ronald made no reply, his mind earnestly engaged with another matter. And as they stood a moment at the corner that marked the parting of their ways, he looked Ephraim full in the face, and his words were very solemn.

"Ephraim, div ye think the Lord'll hae mercy on my soul?"

Ephraim pondered. "I would if I was Him," he said slowly at length; "besides, I shouldn't wonder if it was Him put you up to it," he added hopefully. "Yes, I think He'll forgive you—in a general way."

"Ye mean that ye're no sure aboot that Greenland bit—an' aboot Africy?" Ronald conjectured eagerly, fearful himself that these exceptions were only just.

"Yes," Ephraim admitted slowly; "an' that was pretty handy about the sheds—the tavern sheds, you remember; yes," he continued thoughtfully, "them three bits was kind o'—they was uncommon original, Ronald," he hastened to conclude, well pleased with the charitable flavour of the adjective.

Ronald found his wife ready to retire as he entered. He had just completed an explanation of his absence, a very limited one, when she said:

"The minister was here tonight; and he wants you, even if you don't come to church, to be present at the communion next Sabbath. And I almost promised for you."

Ronald waited a minute before he spoke. "Na, na," he said finally, "I'll no gang till the Saicrament; I dinna believe in Saicraments at Christmas. An' I've been actin' scandalous, forbye. What's that ye're fixin', Mary?" he inquired abruptly, partly to change the subject, and partly because something on the bed attracted his attention.

The smile that stole over his wife's face was touched by tender sweetness. "I'll tell you, Ronnie," she began, her eyes suffused; "I was just making a new dress for wee Bessie's doll. If—if any thing should happen us, father—I want Hugh always to know he had a little sister; he was so small when she went away," and the mother picked up the fabric on which she had been working, laying it reverently aside.

Ronald's voice was a little husky. "Wha's stockin' is that—that yin hangin' on the bed?" he asked.

"Oh, I forgot," cried his wife as she hastily removed it; "you'll think me foolish,—but I was thinking—I was only thinking; and I hung it there, like—like when he was little."

But Ronald took the stocking from her hand. "It'll dae nae harm," he said gently; "we'll just let it bide—we'll let it bide till the mornin' comes," and his wife thought to herself that she had never seen his face so gentle nor heard his voice so tender. And she wondered, too, which morning Ronald meant—but she did not ask, except of God.

CHAPTER VI.

Ronnie's Contract.

Perhaps no one noticed it; but the incongruity was plain enough if one took the pains to look. For the walls of the bedroom were bedecked with many things which betrayed the boyish hands that alone could have hung them there. Colored plates there were, in high festival of pigment, and many a vivid picture wherewith the Boy's Own Paper had enriched its rejoicing patrons; the gory prowess of red Indians had an honored place, as had the daring of a few intrepid hunters, and the chivalry of soldiers clad in glorious vermillion. A pair of boxing gloves, fallen upon evil days of peace, lay ignobly on the mantel; a sword, choicest of boyish treasures, hung suspended from its hook. Two mammoth nests, vocal of silence now, clove to the topmost turrets of the old-fashioned bureau, string of divers-colored eggs, dear-won, beneath them—and buckled round the base of one slender pillar was a silver-mounted collar, the lone surviving relic of the lamented canine whose well-loved name it bore.

But all this was unnoticed now; for whose eyes will rest on other things when mortals watch for death? Wherefore, when Ronald Robertson had told his wife how quick the end was hastening, and had, further, expressed his purpose to bring Mrs. Marlatt to his own home, no thought of unseemliness made him hesitate over the choice of an apartment for the dying.

"I dinna like the spare room," he said; "it's lonely—we'll tak her to the yin above the parlor," and his wife was well content, for it had long been a sacred chamber to her lonely heart.

And now, the old clock in the hall just striking midnight, every eye seemed oblivious to all but the central figure that lay in Hugh's long empty bed, waiting for the opening of the gate up to which she had pressed her way through weariness and pain. It seemed a fitting season for the release of a weary spirit, for the weeks, flying fast had borne the sufferer from the snows of Christmas Eve to the balmy breath of spring, even now waiting at the door.

"She wants you—she's motionin' you to come." Ephraim's voice was an awesome whisper as he touched Ronald on the shoulder.

Ronald lifted his face from his hands, turned his strong earnest eyes a moment toward the bed, then rose and went slowly to the woman's side.

The child's face was close beside her mother's on the pillow, and, as Ronald stooped over her, she lifted her eyes piteously to his.

"Oh, Mr. Robertson, don't let my mother go away—she's going. I know she's going—and I don't know where; only I can't go, I can't go; and she's all I have," the golden curls flung in disheveled sorrow about her face as the almost motherless made her plaint.

"Don't, darling, don't," the dying lips answered faintly, "I'm going to the Saviour that I've told you about so much—and I'll be near you, darling, I'll be as near as ever I can—and you'll come too, and we'll never part again."

The child's lips quivered, then grew still, as her big eyes filled with wonder, almost with trust, her mind struggling with the wondrous tidings.

"But who'll bring me?" she cried bitterly in a moment; "I don't know the way," the blue eyes overflowing again.

"The Saviour'll bring you," her mother said, fastening her eyes upon her daughter's face.

"Will you tell Him to—will you tell Him how little I am, and I don't know the way, and He mustn't forget?" the girl pleaded eagerly, her lips close to the brooding face beside her.

Young though she was, she could read love's oath in her mother's eyes; and she was content. Very quietly she allowed herself to be drawn away; it was evident her mother wished a word with the man beside the bed.

Ronald bended low, and none but himself could hear what the woman said. But they could hardly fail to observe that, even while she spoke, her eyes, burning with love and glowing with compassion, were fixed upon her daughter's face. Then they heard Ronald say chokingly:

"Aye, ma'am, I'll tak her for my ain—I'll tak her as if th' Almichty Himsel' put her i' my hands. An' I'll no gie her up till I gie her up to God," he ended solemnly, unconsciously raising his right hand as he made the vow.

The mother's face shone with peace. She beckoned to Mildred, who came quickly to her side, and her mother, lifting the tiny palm in her own wasted hand, laid it in Ronald's tightening grasp, smiling in love and trust upon them both.

Ronald stooped down and took the little thing up into his arms, holding her tight against his breast, throbbing and heaving with its deep emotion. His wife, her eyes so misty that she could scarcely see, moved noiselessly across the room and put her arm about her husband's neck, her lips moving dumbly among the golden locks.

The woman slept, but only a few minutes had elapsed when she awoke. A moment or so she gazed, as if startled, about the room. Then she began:

"I'm going—and I go believing. I believe in you," her eyes fixed on Ronald, "and I believe in you because I believe in God," that great truth dimly filtering through her mind.

The association of words seemed to prompt what followed. "I believe in God," she began gropingly; in a moment her mind glided along the well-worn path, and she essayed again the Apostle's Creed, that mighty confession she had made her own long before she knew its wondrous import. "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord." As the holy title broke from the dying lips, she bowed her head upon the pillow; her eyes were closed, but there was at least one royal heart among the breathless worshippers that did homage to the royal heart outgoing—and Ronald bowed his head in reverence and love before the Blessed Name.

Soon she opened her eyes again, roving an instant among the three who kept the sacred vigil. Bu they settled themselves on Ronald, now standing at the foot of the bed, the child's tired head resting on his shoulder. He could see the filmy insignia of death already sealing the eyes that still poured out their message of love and confidence; and he smiled back his promise to keep the trust.

He felt that he should speak some word—he had never stood beside a deathbed with such a word unspoken. Hesitatingly he began:

"Yea, though I walk through death's dark vale
Yet will I fear none ill,—"

He recited to its close the great ritual wherewith the ministers of his Kirk were ever wont to uplift the parting soul. The dying eyes brightened at the noble words, probably never heard before; a moment later the vital spark was speeding.

Ronald stood at the foot of the bed, his tall form straightened now, his eyes aglow with faith, his whole demeanor that of a priest of God. Shading his eyes with his right hand a moment, he suddenly lifted it high, pointing upward as he cried aloud:

"Safe hame, my friend! Safe hame!" but the last words were choked in tears. Yet she heard them as she glided round the distant Cape of Death—and He heard who guides the unreturning feet.

Ronald gazed a moment upon the ancient mystery, the calm face already taking on the majesty of the Eternal Silence. Then he turned to look upon the motherless. What is childhood's swift escape from grief but rest in God? For Mildred was in the shadowland of sleep, her head pillowed on Ronald's shoulder, while her mother sped upon her new and radiant way; and who dare deny that the lesser journey of the child were as perilous as the other's, without the self-same Guide?

Ronald's lips touched the unconscious head. "She's sleepin'," he said, moving toward his wife.

"Which one do you mean, Ronald?" his wife whispered gently.

"I mean them baith," Ronald answered reverently; "only the nicht's no past for the bairn yet."

Then he carried her into the adjoining room and laid her on their own bed.

"Ye maun sleep wi' her the nicht, Mary," he said, his voice very low; "I canna dae what I promised, wi'oot yir help. We'll baith keep her till we gie her up to God. An' yir—yir arms hae been empty lang," with which he turned and went swiftly from the room.

His wife groped her way to a clothes-chest in the corner. It was dark—but in a moment she brought forth a tiny nightgown, anointed with the tears that fell hot and fast; then she sank beside the bed and renewed the age-old vows that are so precious to the mothers' God.

CHAPTER VII.

The Surgery of the Soul.

"Yes, Ronald, your crops never looked better, as you say; it seems hard lines for a man with your wealth to be so poor," and there was a curious light in Ephraim's gray eyes as he looked out on the fields of living green about his neighbor's home. For another season was already demanding its accustomed place.

"I dinna understand ye—ye dinna ken what ye're talkin' aboot. Div ye mean I'm no weel-to-dae?" returned Ronald, no little mortification in his voice. "I'm no a Rothschild—but I'm no a pauper, mind ye."

Ephraim's eyes rested thoughtfully on his friend. "You've got all kinds of money—all kinds of it, I know; but I wouldn't call you rich—I wouldn't even call you well-off. Not by no means! You see, Ronnie, it's like this—I don't call a feller rich that's got lots o' money. Lots of men of means is mighty mean men—you're not, Ronnie, not an inch of you," he hastened to explain; "but there's several kinds of riches—a man's rich if he's got a good upper story," tapping his brow in illustration; "an' he's richer if he's got good friends; an' he's richer still if he's got them round him as loves him—children mostly, I reckon. An' then, unless the preachers is all fools, he's richest of all if he's got—if he's got that, you know. I'm not quite a millionaire in that line myself," and Ephraim smiled at the open-mouthed listener as he concluded his estimate.

"Ye're a lad, Ephraim," was Ronald's not very enlightening response. "What class wud ye pit the likes o' me in?"

Ephraim grinned significantly. "You're powerful poor, Ronnie—you're mighty nigh a bankrupt. Was you at the Sacrament yesterday, Ronnie? I heard you was."

Ronald, wide-eyed, had to close his mouth before he could begin his answer.

"Aye," he replied, staring at his questioner. "I went wi' the wife—she was frettin'. What has the Saicrament to dae wi' riches?"

"Just this much. I never went to a Sacrament; but if I did, an' if I didn't get grace enough to forgive one poor lad that happened to make a break, and afterwards got mad and called me a liar, I'd think I was cheated out o' my boots. I'd feel like I was Rothschild—to take the man you mentioned—bein' turned into a pauper. I'm goin' to tell you something, Ronnie—d'ye want to heart it?"

"Aye, I dinna mind." Ronald was just a little pale; he looked as if he could have denied himself the information cheerfully enough.

"Well then, I will. D'ye know, sometimes I think I might go to the Sacrament, if I ever felt good enough—an' if you'd forgive Hugh. But it don't seem to be fixin' you up, goods. This goin' there an' gettin' forgiven yourself all the time, just as if God had nuthin' else to do, just as if that was His trade—an' then not tryin' even to be a 'prentice at the business yourself—it don't seem catchin' enough to suit me. The Almighty must get tired settin' the copy-book for you, Ronnie," and Ephraim looked the least bit like a prophet as his eyes searched the grave face before him.

Ronald's voice was shrill in its agitation. "But there's mair i' the Bible forbye forgiveness," he began vehemently; "was it no' th' Almichty wha made the great White Throne, an'——"

"Yes, but He didn't make it for you," Ephraim interrupted quietly. "Hello! here's the kid—we'll have to cut out theology, I reckon. What's that you've got, honey?"

White and fragile, and panting rather pitifully in her haste, Mildred walked straight to Ronald's chair.

"Oh, daddy!" Ronald glowed at the music of the new-learned word. "Oh daddy, look what I found—I got them in Nanna's drawer upstairs." This was her name for her foster-mother. "It bounces nearly to the ceiling," wherewith she flung the ball upon the floor, catching it as it descended; "and I wish you'd tie up the handle on this whip—it's ravelled; and just listen," putting the whistle to her lips and blowing till the room rang with the sound. "Whose are they, daddy? were they yours?"

Ronald's lips were firm; but his eyes turned traitors, dim and dewey as they were. He did not look at Ephraim.

"I'll fix the whup—gie't me."

"But whose are they, daddy?"

A pause intervened. "Thae was—thae was my son's," he said, almost unheard.

"Your son! What's his name?"

"His name was Hugh, lassie," Ronald said slowly.

"What's his name now?" the child asked instantly.

"It's—it's still Hugh. Thae toys was his."

"Whose are they now, daddy?"

"They're—they're his, lassie."

"Where is he, daddy?" the eager face upturned.

"He's—he's awa'."

"Was Nanna his mother?"

"Aye; aye, lassie."

"Then she's his mother yet?" the serious face aglow with interest.

Ronald's voice shook in spite of all his efforts. "Aye, Mildred, aye, she's his mither yet."

"Then why doesn't he come home?" she asked in a perplexed tone.

Ronald cast about sorely in his mind, gazing down the while upon the beautiful inquisitor, all unconscious as she was of the fresh-bleeding wound.

"Ye—ye wudna unnerstand," he evaded.

"Do you understand, daddy?"

"Aye," he answered sadly, "naebody unnerstands only me."

"Doesn't Nanna understand?"

Ronald hesitated. "I dinna think, sae."

"Doesn't God understand, daddy?"

Ronald gazed in startled silence; but Ephraim volunteered the answer for which the child was waiting.

"No, honey, He don't—there isn't nobody finds it as hard to understand as Him. Come on out into the yard," he suddenly digressed; "I want to see the bees," and, lifting the child to his shoulder, he strode out into the sunlight, Ronald musing still within the shadow.

The remainder of the afternoon Ronald spent among the glistening fields, whitening to the harvest; he had much to think upon. And his troubled mind was still thus employed as he sat amid the gloaming, when his wife slipped into the room and took her place beside him.

"Ronald," she began, "something very beautiful occurred to-night. "Oh! she's the sweetest child!" a wealth of devotion in the words. "Father," she went on, the tone touched with anxious care, "why don't you take Mildred to the specialist in the city? Don't you think she's growing weaker, father? She tires so easily—and she's coughing more. If I could only know it isn't serious! But I often think—what do you think, father?" she concluded eagerly.

Ronald's eyes were troubled. "I canna deny the lassie's no what she micht be. I dinna like thae red spots on the bonnie cheeks. But the simmer'll dae her guid, I'm hopin'," he added, summoning a cheerful note. "But what's this the wee girlie's been daein' the day?—ye said it was something beautifu'," he quoted, glad to abandon the darker topic.

His wife moved closer. "It was lovely, Ronald. I noticed how quiet and thoughtful she had been all evening; but tonight, when she said her little prayer to me, after she was all through, she turned her face up to mine: 'I want to pray about Hugh,' she said; 'I want God to bring him home to you and daddy. I'm sure He doesn't want Hugh to stay away any more—and I'm sure He doesn't like daddy to be so lonely.' And," the now broken voice went on, "she prayed the sweetest little prayer. Oh, father," taking his face in both her hands, the glistening eyes appealing to him through the dusk, "don't you mind how our Hugh used to kneel just like that?—you used to steal upstairs to watch him, father! It seems so long ago—and it was so sweet, father; take me, Ronald," and the quivering form stole into his arms.

Ronald fought his fight in silence. "Ye canna think I dinna mind," he said at length, huskily. "I mind ilka hair o' his heid. But there's mair, tae, as I canna forget till my deein' day. Ye dinna unnerstand the Scottish natur', Mary—we're taught, frae we was bairns, to gie up chick an' child afore we coontenance a sin; the prodigals maun aye repent an' turn," he concluded, the ancestral spirit of his race ringing in his voice.

His wife rested silent in his arms a minute. "Do you ever pray for him too, dear?" she asked in a gentle voice.

"Aye, lass; oh, aye, I pray he'll be forgiven o' his sin—isna that Mildred callin'? I'll gang till her mysel'," with which, clearing a very troublesome throat as he went, Ronald made a dignified escape. But his wife did not abate the siege; her lips still moved in pleading, but now their plaint was turned toward the all-pitying Heart.

The Afternoon Tea.

Betty McGee to an afternoon tea
Invited my dolly, my kitty, and me.
"An afternoon tea in the morning at nine,
And please to be prompt in the rain or the shine.
The tea will be cocoa, of course you must know,"
Said Betty to me; and I promised to go.

An afternoon tea is the stylishest thing!
I put on my prettiest necklace and ring,
And Mother's long skirt, with a bonnet of red,
And did up my hair on the top of my head.
I made Dolly sweet in a new kimona,
And dressed Kitty up in her very best bow.
Then I took Sister's card-case, with card for us three,
I know what to do at an afternoon tea.

But what do you think? When the morning had come,
And we asked if Miss Betty McGee was at home,
They giggled and said she "had gone out to play;
She must have forgotten that this was her day."
Forgotten her guests, though the clock pointed nine,
And we were all ready for rain or shine!
Forgotten the cocoa, forgotten it all,
While she was unstylishly playing at ball;
"Please tell her," said I, in my haughtiest way,
"It was very bad form!" Then we bade them good-day.
And that was the end of the afternoon tea
For poor little Dolly and Kitty and me.

Consul General Miller of Yokohama reports that forty-nine Japanese banks with a capital of $38,000,000 suspended last year.

WITH THE WORKERS

C. E. French has begun work in his new field at Tallula, Illinois.

F. M. Rains will dedicate a new church at Robinson, Illinois, November 29.

There were two additions at the Northside Christian church in Kansas City last Sunday.

J. W. Williams has resigned as pastor of the Christian church at Chambersburg, Illinois.

The church at Winimac, Indiana, loses its pastor, I. G. Shaw. He goes to Middlesborough, Kentucky.

The church at Jackson Center, Ohio, dedicated a new building Nov. 8. L. L. Carpenter the veteran dedicator assisted them.

Evangelist Allen T. Shaw of Pontiac held a meeting at Armington where John C. Lappin ministers, which brought thirteen into the church.

The church at Lomax, Illinois, is doing the commendable service of educating a young man for the ministry. He is now in Eureka college.

Edward Chitter is now holding a meeting at Chency, Kansas. At the end of the first six days, 31 were added. Mr. Chitter is open for dates after January 1.

Thomas H. Papplewell, of Arkansas City, Kansas, reports a day of unusual blessing in their work recently. There were fourteen additions to the church in one Sunday.

The church at Fairbury, Illinois, has made a satisfactory growth the past year. Thirty have been added to the membership of the church, twenty by confession of faith. Ellis Gish is the pastor.

S. M. Perkins, the pastor of the Davenport, Iowa church began a meeting in his church on Nov. 8. He will use the stereopticon and some other modern devices in emphasizing Christian truth.

The church worshipping at Rowland street, Syracuse, New York, began a meeting Nov. 8 with home forces. C. R. Stauffer is the pastor. The church contemplates erecting a new building on Geddes street.

The church at San Jose, California, is in the process of erecting a new church building which they hope to have completed at the end of the year. The cost will be about $35,000. M. W. Harkins is the minister.

On Nov. 8 the corner stone of the colored Christian church building in Kansas city was laid. This is the largest colored congregation in our brotherhood. The building will be the finest one erected for the use of the colored people. Dr. Combs and Dr. Jenkins spoke at the corner stone exercises.

T. Alfred Fleming pastor of the Miles Avenue Christian church of Cleveland, Ohio, has been secured to assist in a meeting at Colfax, Illinois. The meeting will begin Nov. 15. Norman H. Robertson has been pastor of this wide-awake church for the past three years and every department is in a healthy condition. Brothers Fleming and Robertson will be a strong combination for gospel work and a large ingathering is expected.

The church at Goodland, Kansas is enjoying prosperity these days. The Kendalls have just held a meeting in the church which resulted in 45 additions to the local church as well as additions to some of the other churches of the city. The meeting was shortened by the death of Mr. Kendall's brother. There have been 100 additions in the year just closing. J. M. Lowe is the pastor.

The church at Port Arthur. Canada, is hoping to build a new house of worship the coming year.

J. H. Hill held a meeting at Hartselle, Alabama, recently that resulted in twenty-two additions.

Dan Trundle held an eight day meeting at Rialto, Col., which resulted in ten additions in spite of discouraging weather.

The church at Toulon, Illinois, is having a steady growth in its regular services. Seventeen have been added lately in this way.

H. A. Davis has just closed a meeting at Liberty, Illinois, which resulted in thirty additions, most of them by confession of faith.

J. C. McCartney has accepted a call to Fullerton, California, and began there Oct. 25. He has been located at Grand Junction, Col.

Evangelist F. A. Sword held a meeting recently at Shaws Point which brought thirty-six into the church membership. He has recently moved his family from Polo, Illinois, to Lanark.

C. H. Shipplett held a meeting with his own church at Fandon, Illinois, recently which resulted in twenty-eight additions to the church. Mr. Shipplett preaches for the church half time.

H. B. Robison has closed his first year at El Paso, Texas. There have been sixty-five additions to the church and a loss of twenty-one. Missionary offerings have increased thirty-five per cent.

Evangelist Fannon held a meeting at Fouts church near Centralia, Illinois, recently, which brought a great uplift to the church. People drove in for miles and the additions finally numbered thirty-six.

W. D. Terrell, who is pastor of the church at Loogootee, Indiana, preached a week in a schoolhouse recently. There were nine additions to the church through this effort. W. F. Shearer will hold a meeting in Loogootee in January.

Most fratifying word comes from Hiram college announcing that the student body will be 25% greater this year. This fine old college where Pres. Garfield once presided has a great place in the hearts of the brotherhood.

The state convention of Florida is being held this week. The various societies have proper representation and at the close is an interesting institution called "Sermon Day." This ought to be introduced into some of our northern conventions to relieve the theological ache that sometimes gets into our preachers.

Pastor Sniff of the church at Paris, Illinois, held a meeting for a country church near by called Bell Ridge, recently. There were 101 additions in the meeting and the present membership of this church is now 350. It is one of the strongest country churches in our brotherhood. Albyn Esson, who studies at Butler college preaches for them.

The Aetna Street church in Cleveland, Ohio, is having a series of special services that are unique and must be of great service. The series is called "Neighborhood Problems discussed by the Neighbors." The lay members of the community accept special topics and speak on them. The different topics to be discussed are as follows: The Church and the Neighborhood, Shop Morals and the Neighborhood, The Man and the Neighborhood, The Saloon and the Neighborhood, The Home and the Neighborhood.

The church at Ponca City, Oklahoma, has called G. B. Kellum of Dexter, Mo., as their pastor.

Evangelist J. E. Moyer recently held a meeting at Maud, Illinois. There were eighteen additions to the church.

C. L. McKim is evangelizing in Iowa these days. His meeting at Garwin resulted in twenty-three additions and the meeting at Troy Mills in twelve additions.

The church at Carlock, Illinois, is growing in membership. Six were added on a recent Sunday. They came as a result of a meeting held at the Bethel church.

Evangelist L. Harbord held a meeting at Williamstown, Mo., recently with eighteen additions. He is now in a meeting at Harristown, Illinois, where J. H. Briston ministers.

W. H. Harding of Maroa has just closed a meeting at Maroa, Illinois, which brought great blessing to the church there. Twenty-one were added among whom were five heads of families.

A. R. Spicer who ministers to the church at Dixon, Illinois, recently held a meeting at Pine Creek, a country church near there. This meeting resulted in seventeen additions to the Pine Creek church.

The church at Grayville, Illinois, has just had an epoch-making evangelistic enterprise in their community. Evangelist C. M. Smithson has been preaching there and twenty-eight have been added to the church.

C. W. Cauble, who is pastor of the Sixth church in Indianapolis, has held a meeting in his own church recently with the assisting of Singing Evangelist E. C. Mannan. In a three weeks' effort, forty-seven were added to the church.

John D. Zimmerman has closed his work at Horton, Kansas. During his three years there, there were 131 additions and many other encouraging indications of the efficiency of the church. He will minister in the future at Winchester, Kansas.

The First church at Springfield, Illinois, where F. W. Burnham ministers, has been receiving a great uplift recently from the presence of some of the returned missionaries. Among those who have spoken at this church since the New Orleans convention are H. P. Shaw, Rose T. Armbruster and Dr. Wakefield.

A. A. Doak, Colfax, Washington, at the invitation of the Y. M. C. A. secretary, was the principal speaker in a prohibition rally Oct. 23, in the State College at Pullman, and enjoyed addressing 400 of the students. The previous night his Colfax people had made a reception for 22 new members, the occasion of including himself and Mrs. Doak in the reception, and expressing appreciation by presenting each a $10.00 gold piece. The next Lord's Day saw the church happy in its largest yet Bible-school, 111; large audiences both morning and evening, and the day crowned by two additions by enrollment and a man from the pastor's Bible-class confessing Christ.

WITH THE WORKERS

SOME AUTUMN LEAVES IN KENTUCKY.

W. J. Cocke was at Trenton, Todd county, and Pembroke, Christian county, for meetings. These churches paid for their work and made offering for State Missions. Then were eighteen additions. Dr. Ferguson was ordained as preacher of the Pembroke church and one of the elders. Six other good men were set apart as officers of the church. The Secretary was with them on this occasion and helped in the matter.

W. J. Hudspeth did some fine work, adding twenty-six at two points—Falls of Rough and Pleasant Hill. He is in great demand for meetings and has his dates for a long time ahead. All that region recognize his value in evangelistic work.

The month was a great one for D. G. Combs. He is in the evangelistic field entirely now. 108 added and much other good accomplished. He is enjoying greatly his opportunity to be in the evangelistic field all the time.

J. W. Masters was in the field half time—added five and is now engaged in a meeting in Southeastern Kentucky.

G. H. Thomas, who was selected as District Evangelist in Lee and Owsley counties baptized thirty-three and added four otherwise. He is commended as a worthy and efficient man for that field.

Nine added by H. L. Morgan in Clay and Laurel counties.

Three added by labors of J. P. Bicknell in Wolfe and adjoining counties.

Fourteen added in Pike county as reported by H. H. Thompson and much other good accomplished.

The work at Jackson moves on about as usual. Some repairs being made on the house of worship. C. M. Summers has been absent part of the month.

Jellico had one addition and R. G. Sherrer reports the work as doing very well.

Six added in Breathitt county by J. B. Flinchum.

Three added by Robert Kirby in Cumberland county.

Work moves on about as usual at Bromley as reported by L. A. Kohler.

Latonia work is progressing well as indicated by H. C. Runyon.

Lebanon is almost making a new house in the remodeling of the old one. W. P. Welden is doing a fine work there. W. J. Cocke will dedicate the house November 22nd, and follow with a meeting.

J. B. Lockhart, Clarence, Mo., has received and accepted a call to the South Louisville church, and began work there november 8th. He is highly commended and a good work is hoped for.

H. W. Elliott was at New Orleans during the convention; but aside from the time spent there he has been in the work all the time. He attended two of the South Kentucky District Conventions and received a most cordial welcome. The collections since the Hopkinsville Convention amount to $861.01—an amount unprecedented in the records on file. Some of this was money that did not reach us before the convention; but for the most collections made on the new year's work. We hope that this good beginning is a good omen for the new year's work. The November offering has only fairly begun. Let us make it the greatest in our history. Do not allow anything to interfere with attention to this matter now. This is the best time to attend to it. 500 churches in line for November offering would be a great victory. Remit promptly. At the earliest possible moment let us hear from your effort.

H. W. Elliott, Secretary.

FIRE AT THE SOUTHERN CHRISTIAN INSTITUTE.

A great calamity has come to our Training School for negroes at Edwards, Miss.

Monday evening, October 26th, Allison Hall was burned. This hall contained girls' dormitory, dining room, kitchen and store rooms.

The fire was probably caused by lamp explosion and was discovered while they were at supper. It spread so rapidly that nothing in the upper story of the building could be saved; furniture, bedding, clothing, of girls and teachers was a total loss. All the stores in the cellar, including canned fruit, the work of a summer, were burned.

Everything there is chaotic. They are moving the printing press out of the shop to make a dining room, and are at work building a temporary kitchen. J. B. Lehman writes: "We must forage for our meals and the boys are at work roasting potatoes in the fires of our misfortune."

The hall was insured for enough to purchase material to erect a more permanent building, but temporary buildings must be erected, cooking range, baker, clothing, bedding, furniture must be replaced at once to prevent suffering. The loss (outside of the insurance) will be not less than $2,000. I want to ask churches and individuals—friends of this work to come to its aid in this time of calamity. Will not ministers read this letter to their congregations, and will not all come to the aid of this work in this hour of need, by making a money offering.

Every room in Allison Hall was full. It will take hard, brave work to hold the school together. We must come to their aid at once. All hearts will go out in sympathy to Brother and Sister Lehman and also to the teachers who must control these people under such conditions.

I believe that the churches, the brethren, will want a part in this, and that they will respond promptly and liberally, to help make good this loss at the Southern Christian Institute.

Send offerings to C. C. Smith, 1365 Burdette avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio.

IN THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTIAN UNION.

In the city of Chillicothe, on the 17th, 18th and 19th inst., there will be held the Missouri Sunday School Convention, or as we commonly say, the Union State Sunday School Convention. This will be a notable gathering. Among the distinguished persons who will take part on the program, will be Mr. McElfresh, the recently appointed International Teacher-Training Superintendent. I hereby urge the ministers, superintendents, teachers and other workers of the Bible Schools of the Christian churches of Missouri, to attend this convention in large numbers. In such bodies as this we have the opportunity of manifesting the spirit of Christian Union, and thus help on toward the accomplishment of Christian Union, itself. I have often felt humiliated to see so few of our people in attendance at the sessions of these Union Conventions. Some things may be said and done which we cannot all approve, but this is liable to be true in the gatherings of our own people; but for the most part, nothing will be found calling for objection. Let all who can possibly do so, attend this convention, get the good which it offers, and help on with its good purposes.

J. H. Hardin.

THE CHURCH IN COLUMBIA, MO.

I have just spent nineteen days in this beautiful little city, justly famed as the Athens of Missouri. I have had exceptional opportunities of studying the conditions of our cause in this Mecca of the faith. I know of no city of similar size in the Brotherhood where such a splendid combination of factors and forces and conditions are at work for the achievement of great ends. The great State University with its two thousand students enrolls this year more than four hundred disciples of Christ. Christian College for young women—one of the greatest, if not the greatest woman's college in the west—brings annually a large constituency to the church from the best and most cultured homes of the Middle West. Here too the Missouri Bible College with strong, scholarly students like Lhamon and Sharpe, is equipping young men for the highest ministry of the Word. And these pour the tides of their life into the church. The church itself with a glorious history and the heritage of some of the noblest minds and hearts of the Reformation, is the dominant and commanding force of the city. The church still holds and cherishes some of the rarest and choicest spirits of the Brotherhood in Mrs. Pearre, founder of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, Dr. W. T. Moore, the sage and the cosmopolite, and F. W. Allen and a score of others scarcely less famed.

But the pre-eminent force in the Columbia Church today is Madison A. Hart, the gifted, cultured, consecrated, minister. He is young, vigorous, virile, vital. He is aware of the spirit of the age and is interpreting to it the glorious gospel of the Son of God. He is far from being a moss back and he lacks much of being a destructive radical. He is loyal to the Lord Jesus—absolutely loyal in message and method and ministry. And he enjoys the confidence and the affection of everybody in Columbia, both in and out of the Church. Unless every indication goes awry he is entering upon a career of unparaleled success with all the conditions of triumph at hand—the field, the force and the consecrated passion for Jesus and for souls.

H. O. Breeden.

John T. Brown, Minister of the Johnson City Church, has been delivering a series of lectures before the students of Milligan College for some weeks past. The subjects included in the course have been, among others, "Education in Heathen Lands," "Japan," "China," "India," "Palestine," and "Australia." The lectures contained an extraordinary amount of valuable information, such as one does not usually find in a platform lecture. Brother Brown's style is easy but forcible. It has been the writer's pleasure to hear some of the best known lecturers in America upon similar topics, but he does not recall any superior to Brother Brown in this field. For College or Y. M. C. A. purposes his lectures approach the ideal. It would prove an inspiration to college students everywhere if they had the privilege of listening to them. For one thing, it would seem impossible for any intelligent person, after hearing Brother Brown's statement of conditions in foreign lands, to be any other than a hearty and earnest advocate of Foreign Missions.

WITH THE WORKERS

SPRINGFIELD ILLINOIS.

A. B. Moore, of St. Louis, preached at the West Side Christian Church, Springfield, Illinois on Sunday, Nov. 8, and C. A. Gray, of Eureka College, spoke Nov. 1. The church is pastorless since F. M. Rogers' removal to California, but is actively engaged in securing the right man to take up the work.

The revival meetings at the Stuart Street Christian church began Sunday, November 8 and will continue for two weeks. The preaching will be done by the pastor and Rev. F. W. Burnham, minister of the First Christian church. Miss Della F. Cheney of Hoopeston, Ill., one of the leading singing evangelists among the Disciples, will have charge of the music during this series of meetings. Topic of the morning sermon, "Christ at the Door." In the evening, the third in a series of song sermons will be given. Topic, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." Miss Owens and Miss Cheney will sing this song to several different melodies. Service every night during the coming week at 7:30 o'clock, Springfield, Ill.

A. P. Cobb, of Decatur, Illinois, is preaching Sundays for the Illiopolis church, and in addition to this conducting evangelistic services in Central Illinois.

The Protestant churches of Springfield, Ill., are making ready for an evangelistic campaign under the leadership of "Billy" Sunday, to be held in February.

C. C. Buckner, second son of G. W. Buckner to enter the ministry, has accepted the work at Aurora, Ill.

A. P. Cobb, Decatur, Ill., recently conducted a meeting at Timewell, Ill., which resulted in eleven additions, two confessions, four by letter and reclamation, and five from other religious bodies.

D. Dunkleberger, Canton, Mo., has taken the church at Ripley, Ill.

Edgar S. Potter, one of the elders of the Quincy, Ill., church, is a business man, who does things for the cause. He is planning already to make the Foreign Rally there next January, a bi-state affair, with delegations from churches within forty miles in all directions.

The Christian University banquet at New Orleans was pronounced one of the best. Dr. Clinton Lockhart, a former president acted as toastmaster, and rousing speeches were made by A. I. Myhr, G. L. Bush, A. L. Cole, and others.

J. E. Teaney, the converted saloonkeeper of Litchfield, Ill., now at Canton, Mo., added ninety-six to the church during the first year of his ministry, which began only six months after his conversion.

SOME ENCOURAGING WORDS FROM KENTUCKY.

The Kentucky Bible Schools are planning for a great observance of Children's Day for Home Missions, November 22. 179 schools have already signified their intention of observing the day, and every mail brings new assurances. Last year 174 schools contributed $2,124.32. This year the offerings will unquestionably go beyond $3,000. Kentucky is determined to keep the National Banner. The following are a few of the many encouraging reports we are receiving from over the state:

TELEGRAMS.

Canton, Ohio, Nov. 9th. 1908.—34 added today 200 in 13 days, 1604 in bible school. Preaching audiences packed the house, president Bates of Hiram spoke to the overflow to-night. WELSHIMER & KENDALL.

Pomona, Calif., Nov. 8th, 1908.—Big tent overflowed. Crowded nightly, 127 in two weeks. Unusual revival outbreak for this hitherto impregnable town. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

The ministers meeting of Southern California is unique. It is held in the First church, Los Angeles, the first Monday in each month.

The railroad fare is pro-rated. Thus it costs the preachers who come two or three hundred miles, no more than it costs the pastors in the city. This makes a larger attendance possible. Usually one hundred persons or over, both men and women, are present.

The fellowship is of the best. The excellent dinners provided by the ladies of the First Church do the rest.

W. G. Conley, pastor of the Cavina church is Chairman this year.

Herbert Genell, who is in a fine meeting at Pamona, with M. D. Clubb, was present at the November meeting. He conducted a round table on "Methods in Evangelism," "The secret of a successful meeting is atmosphere," says Rev. Genell. He elaborated. He meant a psychologic, philosophic, apostolic atmosphere. Evidently he succeeds in creating it for brethren are drawn fifty miles to the meeting and there were over seventy additions the first week. How the old story told in love with earnestness always makes an "atmosphere!"

A. C. Smither, F. M. Dowling and Grant K. Lewis, have returned from the New Orleans convention.

H. W. Rogers, of Springfield, Ill., is established as pastor of the Long Beach church, succeeding E. W. Thornton.

Jesse M. Hunter, of Eugene, Washington, takes the work at Hollywood.

J. H. McCartney becomes pastor at Fullerton.

F. W. Emerson, of Freeport, Ill., the well known temperance orator, has accepted a call to the Redlands church.

Dan Trundle of Rialto has been in a fine meeting with Prof. B. P. Stout as singing evangelist. There were fifteen additions and the church greatly strengthened. Prof. Stout will assist Sumner T. Martin the Santa Barbara pastor, in a meeting during November.

O. P. Spiegel is supplying the pulpit of the Broadway church, Los Angeles, since J. W. Utter began his work with the new church at Glendale. He will hold a meeting for the Broadway church in January. We suspect that the lure of the California "atmosphere" will keep him away from Alabama permanently.

E. E. Lowe, of San Bernardino, reports a Sunday-school revival and frequent additions to the church.

The Oceanside church expects to dedicate its new building December 6th. Grant K. Lewis of Los Angeles will assist the pastor in a meeting following dedication services.

PHARMACIST

Tells Facts About Caffeine in Coffee.

"About twelve years ago I stopped coffee," writes a Colo. man, "and began Postum. As a result, instead of being a confirmed dyspeptic as I was for many years, I enjoy good health and fine digestion.

"I formerly weighed 115 lbs., now 140. My waist measure was 29, now 36 inches. Not only this, but I enjoy Postum and my meals, while for years eating was an annoyance and often a torture.

"Like an old whisky toper I always thought I had to have my coffee and then always felt its ill effects in my stomach and on my nerves.

"Now I have so completely lost my taste for coffee, that recently, when a cup was given me by mistake and I tasted it, I found it nauseated me. On the other hand I not only like the healthful effect of Postum, but the taste is peculiarly agreeable to me.

"I have tried other cereal drinks but always come back to Postum. Realizing as I do, the evil effects from the poisonous alkaloid in coffee, and being a Postum Pioneer, I am a very successful missionary.

"One man, a school superintendent, from my recommendation, has had quite as happy an experience with Postum as I have had. My wife has also found great benefit from Postum, as coffee was the only thing which disagreed with her stomach at table.

"Being a graduate in pharmacy I know the alkaloid—caffeine—in coffee is a poisonous drug. As there is no drug in Postum I naturally drink it and recommend it to others." "There's a Reason."

CHICAGO

The annual meeting of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society was held at the First M. E. church Monday evening last. This meeting is arranged on the delegate plan and almost every one of our churches and missions were represented.

The various reports were read by Leon L. Loehr, President of the society, Parker Stockdale, Secretary, and A. L. Roach, Treasurer. These reports all spoke in the most optimistic vein of the success of the past year. The Treasurer's report showed that Chicago churches gave $1,300 for Chicago missions last year. The largest amount was the Englewood contribution, of $500. Nearly $3,000 was contributed by the American Christian Missionary Society and $2,000 by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Pastors have received part of their support for work done at Chicago Heights, Elgin, West End, Garfield Boulevard, Armour avenue, Harvey, Maywood, Logan Square, Humboldt Park, Sheffield avenue, South Chicago, West Pullman, Ashland avenue, Elizabeth street, and Douglas Park. Some of these points will be self-supporting this coming year.

W. J. Wright, of the American Christian Missionary Society, was present at the meeting and spoke briefly on the work of the past year. He congratulated the board on its efficient administration and recommended larger undertakings in the future promising his cooperation for a larger work in Chicago. He called attention to the fact that there were more people within ten miles of the place where the meeting was held than in almost any one of the southern states. He said a population so vast demanded money and men just the same as we were accustomed to think it did in other parts of the country. His remarks were received most enthusiastically.

The new board members elected for the ensuing year are as follows: President, Leon L. Loehr; Vice, W. G. Morse; Treasurer, A. L. Roach; Board members for two years, Parker Stockdale, E. S. Ames and O. F. Jordan. For one year, L. Roy Moore and W. E. Palmer. The Trustees for the coming year are E. M. Bowman, W. R. Caddis and W. P. Keeler.

The spriit of the meeting could not have been better. There was perfect fellowship and a determination to pull together for a better Chicago. The persons who in days gone by have had meteoric careers as heresy hunters have failed as soul-savers and have gone their way. The heart-burnings that their ill-advised strife occasioned is a thing of the past. Our Chicago preachers are all true to the plea. They have all the various brands of theology. But whatever theology they hold, they never forget to be human and fraternal. The future of our work in this city is most auspicious indeed.

As we go to press, word comes that C. G. Kindred has been operated on in an Englewood hospital. Our prayers and best wishes go out to him in the time of his need.

Mrs. Willett returned home from the hospital Monday, improved in health.

The church at West Pullman had one confession last Sunday.

The Oak Park ladies raised a hundred and twenty-five dollars at a rummage sale last week. The West End leads them in the Sunday-school contest.

An effort is being made to revive the old Central Church, which has been defunct since last spring. A group of 36 former members met in a hall last Sunday at 3120 Forest avenue. Prof. Irish preached to them.

The services at Jackson boulevard were well attended Sunday. There were six additions.

Mr. Sarvis of the University of Chicago preached at Chicago Heights last Sunday. The sudden departure of W. S. Lockhart has been discouraging but they are getting ready to call another preacher soon.

The church at Douglas Park is ambitiously planning for the day when it shall have a new building.

An epidemic of disease, chiefly typhoid, prevails at Maywood. There is also diphtheria and scarlet fever. This is a great hindrance to the church there.

West Pullman is getting ready for coöperation in the Chapman meetings next spring. The churches meet in union meeting every Thursday night for a gospel song service. Mr. Chapman will hold a meeting for all Chicago next spring under the leadership of the Laymen's Evangelistic Council.

Voliva, the man who dethroned Elijah III, held a meeting at Orchestra Hall last Sunday afternoon. He had about 1,500 people wait through a three hour service. He has the same stock in trade as Dowie, a denunciation of everything and everybody. He is not devoid of oratorical ability, though lacking in the magnetic personality of Dowie. It may be of interest to note that Voliva was educated in Hiram College. Zion City now has its lace industry in the hands of Marshall Field & Company. Many of the devotees who lost all are moving away to make a living.

W. D. Endres preached a sermon to children last Sunday. He proposes doing this every two months. One addition there last Sunday.

Dr. Ames preached last Sunday on "Criticising the Past." An unusually large audience was present.

Dr. Ames is now engaged in writing a book in the general field of the Psychology of Religion, which may come from the press next spring. It is awaited with interest by his many friends.

The Ministers' Association of Chicago meets every Monday at the Grand Pacific Hotel in the English Room. All out of town visitors are cordially welcomed to these meetings. Among the visitors this week were Sec. W. J. Wright of Cincinnati, and Rev. Claire L. Waite of Milwaukee.

As we go to press the men are gathering for the Congress of Baptists and Disciples. We promise a full account for next week of this meeting, maybe epoch-making with both bodies.

O. F. Jordan of Evanston delivers his lecture on "Chicago on Boulevard and in Slum" at his former parish at Rockford, Illinois, Nov. 17. He has carried his camera about Chicago and secured nearly two hundred pictures of things significant. These have been made into lantern slides. He has pictures of all our churches and mission halls in the city. He has pictures of such social waifs as the girl coal-pickers, the newsboys and the beggars. In the list of pictures are the things that make Chicago proud.

G. A. Campbell delivered his review of Chesterton's "Orthodoxy" at the ministers' meeting this week. Chesterton has been described as a man who defends orthodoxy in an unorthodox manner. He is one of the most brilliant writers in England. His paraphrase "If thy head offend thee, cut it off, etc." aroused the mirthfulness of our group.

The choir of the Monroe Street Church sang West's "Faith and Praise" on last Sunday evening. The house was well filled and the Cantata was thought by many to be the best production given by them for some time.

What has become of our Chicago Disciples Social Union? We must not allow that happy organization to lapse for want of care. Isn't Parker Stockdale the president? Oh, we see, he has been sick since the summer and has had no chance to call his committee together. But he will no doubt do it soon and arrange a banquet.

OBITUARY.

The report of Mrs. W. F. Rothenberger's death in Cleveland has been received with a shock by her friends in Chicago and especially in the Irving Park Church. The following letter has come to us from Rev. F. D. Butchart of Cleveland:

A deep sadness has come to Rev. W. F. Rothenberger, pastor of Franklin Circle church, in the death of his wife, Mrs. Catherine Teachout Rothenberger, and to her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Teachout, and family. A host of friends have stood near to offer all the comfort that Christian fellowship can bring.

Mrs. Rothenberger's health has been seriously impaired for some months, but most painstaking treatment here in the Palmer Sanitarium and an extended summer trip to the Muskoka Lake regions, gave promise of restoration. Recently her health broke again, complications developed and in spite of all that indulgent love and care could bestow she passed from this life Sunday eve., November 1st.

Mrs. Rothenberger was one of the best known and highly esteemed of the young people of Cleveland and especially in the circle of our own brotherhood. She has been a consistent member and most earnest worker in the Franklin Circle church since the age of nine years. In Christian service her life was distinguished by these three that abide, Faith, Hope and Love. Few lives are as thoroughly consecrated to the life and program of the Master as was hers. A teacher in an eastern school of music, on coming into touch with her life of great unselfishness said of her, that she had found a new type of womanhood. Her democratic kindness and sympathy were the delight of all who knew her. She has made for herself thus a host of friends in this and other places.

Added to the sympathy of these friends, a real comfort comes to the sorrowing ones in the consciousness of her deep Christian character, for the truest comfort lies in life itself, the life eternal.

Funeral services were held at the home, 4515 Franklin avenue, Wednesday, November 4th, conducted by Lloyd Darsie of Hiram. Memorial services were held at the Franklin Circle church Sunday November 8th, conducted by John E. Pounds and H. R. Cooley.

THE NEW ORGANIZATION FOR MEN.

R. A. Long Elected President.—Prize Offered for a Name.

One of the most important things done at the New Orleans Convention was the definite decision to enter vigorously upon the work of organizing the men of our brotherhood for definite Christian service in an endeavor to realize effectively the aims of the association authorized at the Detroit Convention, and to go beyond those aims by as much as our present vision goes beyond that of a few years ago.

A committee was appointed at New Orleans with power to act, being constituted as follows: R. A. Long, Burris A. Jenkins, Fletcher Cowherd, J. W. Chilton, W. Davis Pittman, J. H. Allen, and one other, whose name has escaped memory at the moment of writing.

The committee met at 2:30 p. m. on Monday, Nov. 2nd, in Kansas City, with the following present: Fletcher Cowherd (in the chair), J. W. Chilton, B. A. Jenkins, R. A. Long, Dr. Geo. H. Combs, W. F. Richardson and Brother Ridges, all of Kansas City, joining in the conference.

R. A. Long of Kansas City was elected president. Mr. Long was reluctant to add to his already heavy administrative burdens by assuming the direction of a new work of such a vast importance, but the earnest expresion of every one present and his own sympathetic appreciation of the necessities of such an organization combined in leading him to undertake the responsibility. The significance of this to our whole brotherhood is at once apparent. It means that we are to have at the head of the new movement one of the great captains of industry whose name is everywhere in the business world synonymous with success.

Brother Long accepts the work with expressions of genuine humility and his usual spirit of high consecration; and under his leadership we may confidently seek and expect the richest blessing of the Father upon the enterprise.

The headquarters of the new organization were fixed at Kansas City, and P. C. Macfarlane of Alameda, Cal., was invited to become secretary. Mr. Macfarlane was present and, after full conference, agreed to accept the work as soon as he could be relieved from his charge at Alameda without jeopardizing the local interests. The committee instructed the secretary to enter into communication by correspondence and otherwise with the leading men in our brotherhood and with the leaders in men's work of other denomination communions, and form a plan of definite organization to be presented for discussion and adoption at the next meeting.

It was further decided to offer a prize of $25.00 for the best name for the national organization, the name to consist of from two to four words, either alliterating or combining euphoniously, and to be suggestive, if possible, of the scope, spirit and aim of the work, as, for example, "Christian Endeavor" is. Send names proposed to the secretary at 876 Laurel St., Alameda, Cal.

The aim is not a male Christian Endeavor Society, nor a masculine C. W. B. M., but an organization of men by men for Christ and for the Church, which will come to have just as settled a place in the work of every church and pastor as has the Christian Endeavor Society or C. W. B. M. auxiliary.

A study will be made of all existing organizations in the church, including men's clubs of various kinds, men's bible classes, and laymen's missionary movements, with a view to discovering the golden thread of unity that runs through all, and incorporating this in the national organization as the norm of the local fellowship, and allowing the widest latitude for adaptation to peculiar needs and conditions of particular fields.

Correspondence or suggestion with plans of organization and history of success and failures already made in local fields, is earnestly solicited by the secretary, whose address is given above.

"ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK."

As in the breaking of bread, so in the laying by in store, this means every First Day. Slowly but surely the churches are restoring to their practice this item also of approved Apostolic precedent. The restoration is slow, not only because of the tenacity of custom, but also because of the power of gold and the near-incurability of haphazardness. Most churches now have weekly offerings for current expenses, though few have yet trained even a majority of their members to use the system.

Every argument that can be made for this applies with equal force to a like weekly offering for Missions and Benevolences. But additional special reasons exist for this. It enables the minister to preach giving as Christ and the Apostles did, without seeming to beg for his own salary. It proves another reason for coming to church or sending the offering. "A two-fold cord is not quickly broken." It keeps the Christian's horizon as wide as the world and reminds him every week of the noble company in whose fellowship he is working.

It works well. Of course no system will work itself. No sort of envelopes, single or double, printed or plain, numbered or lettered, can take the place of sound instruction or overcome invincible selfishness or incurable indifference. But this easily doubles and quadruples offerings without fret or strain. It enabled a Baptist Church in Boston under A. J. Gordon's ministry to give $20,000 per year for missions—but Gordon and grace were there also.

This is merely a hint to ministers, elders and deacons, with the suggestion that, at once, before ordering next year's supply of collection envelopes, you look into some continuous system. Be as wise as the street railways that distribute their appeals to every passenger and every ride!

W. R. Warren, Centennial Sec'y.

EAGER TO WORK

Health Regained By Right Food.

The average healthy man or woman is usually eager to be busy at some useful task or employment.

But let dyspepsia or indigestion get hold of one, and all endeavor becomes a burden.

"A year ago, after recovering from an operation," writes a Mich. lady, "my stomach and nerves began to give me much trouble.

"At times my appetite was voracious, but when indulged, indigestion followed. Other times I had no appetite whatever. The food I took did not nourish me and I grew weaker than ever.

"I lost interest in everything and wanted to be alone. I had always had good nerves, but now the merest trifle would upset me and bring on a violent headache. Walking across the room was an effort and prescribed exercise was out of the question.

"I had seen Grape-Nuts advertised, but did not believe what I read, at the time. At last when it seemed as if I were literally starving, I began to eat Grape-Nuts.

"I had not been able to work for a year, but now after two months on Grape-Nuts I am eager to be at work again. My stomach gives me no trouble now, my nerves are steady as ever, and interest in life and ambition have come back with the return to health."

"There's a Reason."

HOW A WOMAN MADE MONEY.

A woman writing to the Globe from Mexico, says: "While I am way down in Mexico I do not want my friends who read the Globe to think I am out of the world, for I am making more money now than I ever did in my life. Four years ago I took up a fruit claim. They give you the land if you will pay for setting out five acres of tropical fruit trees within five years. The Department of Improvement set out my banana trees, 1000 on five acres, and attended to them for two years, or until the first crop was ready to gather, and it cost me only $6.20. The Department of Improvement will care for your trees and gather and market your fruit continuously for one third of the crop, so I just let them attend to my orchard. In 1907 the Department paid me for my share $1,281.30 in gold. For the first six months of 1908 I had received $708.76 in gold, and expect the second half of the year will bring me a little more. You get your money every three months, as bananas are picked and marketed every day of the year. You do not have to come to Mexico to take up land. You can pay for planting the trees in installments of $5 a month if you wish, and need never go to Mexico yourself." Write to the Jantha Plantation Co., Block 69, Pittsburg, Pa., for Fruit Claim Blanks, as literature printed in English, regarding Mexican Homestead, is distributed from Pittsburg.

FOREIGN MISSIONARY RALLIES.

The Foreign Society will conduct a three-months' campaign of Missionary Rallies, beginning Nov. 15th. Moving picture machines showing life scenes from heathen lands, and stereopticon views of the work around the world will be used at the night service. These Rallies will be conducted in two itineraries by President McLean and Secretary Corey. The Rallies will be held from 1:30 to 5 in the afternoon, and at night. They will be assisted by the following missionaries: Hermon P. Williams, of the Philippines; H. P. Shaw, of China; Dr. Jas. Butchart, of China; M. D. Adams, of India, and W. H. Hanna, of the Philippines. The following Rallies will be held before the holidays:

A GREAT BIBLE SCHOOL AT KING CITY.

The writer spent Sunday, Nov. 1st, at King City, Gentry Co., Mo., in a rally for "Larger Things" for that school and church. Often when we advocate the present-day features of Bible School work, the answer comes "these things cannot be done in the country and village school." Now, King City is a village of about one thousand people. They set their mark at 200 in the Bible School, for last Sunday, and when the reports were made they had present that morning, 224. The membership of the church is about 175 or 200. The church house is not a very large one and will soon have to be rebuilt or enlarged in order to accommodate the Bible school. Six Adult Bible classes authorized me to send them application blanks for organization under the International Standard, and I expect to send recognition certificates to all of these in a few days. J. M. Asbell is the hustling minister of the King City church, and T. J. Hasty is the superintendent of the Bible School. If we had such a man at the head of every one of our Bible Schools in Missouri, teacher-training and all other advanced movements would soon be unanimous.

King City is located in the midst of a splendid farming country, and is one of the very best small towns in Missouri, or any other state. The Rally of last Sunday was the beginning of a protracted meeting which will be led by the minister, and F. H. DeVol, of Union Star, another excellent town church near by. Bro. Butler, the sightless sweet singer, conducts the music. I fully expect a large ingathering during this meeting, which began under such favorable auspices.

If the reader would like to know how to put into operation the aggressive features of Bible School work in a village church, let him write to T. J. Hasty, King City, Mo. They have one of the best teacher-training classes in the state, and in every particular are doing their work on high grade, scientific principles.

THE CHRISTIAN WOMAN'S BOARD OF MISSIONS ANNUAL DAY IN THE MISSIONARY CALENDAR.

TIME—The first Sunday in December, unless a later date is preferred. It is especially urged, this last year of the Centennial period, that wherever there is an auxiliary, and the program is given by the members, that the messages be carefully prepared and the service be held early in the month of December. Then seek to find a near by church where the women are not yet organized for missionary effort, and secure an invitation to carry the message to them and thus double the influence of the C. W. B. M. Day program. Many pastors will welcome such assistance and will heartily co-operate and suggest some home talent for use while the visiting auxiliary serves with their people.

PLACE—Great and significant are all our Centennial aims in every department of the church, and God is aiding us far toward attainment. This last quarter period of the Centennial the Christian Woman's Board of Missions covets also the co-operation of every pastor where there are no auxiliaries, that in all our churches the work and claims of the Woman's Missionary work may be preserved to the entire church and an offering be accepted from all. Savely to covet such best gifts of time and thought and of gold is worthy.

PURPOSE—First, to enlist and equip all our women for service—not only an offering in money value, but a gift of a new company of women for the work is our hope for C. W. B. M. Day, in hundreds of new unorganized places, and a greatly increased membership where the auxiliary is now organized. To reach the significant Centennial air—The double membership by October, 1909, we need the aid of all our pastors.

A new auxiliary such has been the record so for EACH DAY this year, but we must do even better. May we not hope for fifty new Circles and Auxiliaries as the result of C. W. B. M. Day services.

MRS. M. E. HORLAN.

MISSIONARY DIAMOND POINTS.

Leading Churches.—The ten leading of our brotherhood last year, including Sunday-school gifts, were as follows: University Place, Des Moines, Ia., $1,590; Akron (First), O., $1,274; Kansas City (Ind. Blvd.), $1,012; Cincinnati (Central), O., $1,006; Richmond, Va. (7th St.), $900; Eureka, Ill., $888; St. Joseph (First), Mo., $750; Hopkinsville, Ky., $725; Owensboro, Ky., $713; Frankfort, Ky., $711.

Living-Links.—The Foreign Society now has more than 100 Living-links. It is hoped a large number of new churches will swing into this rank this Centennial year.

Money Expended.—Last year money was expended as follows: Japan, $48,369; China, $71,872; Tibet, $6,155; India, $47,837; 395; Hawaii, $1,153; Cuba, $15,418; England, $12,069; Scandinavia, $9,034; Turkey, $250.

The Wonderful Blood of Man

Dies and Is Born Again With Every Breath of the Lungs.

Human blood contains red and white corpuscles. The little red soldiers carry food, strength and vitality to all parts of the body and the little white warriors fight the battles of the body.

When through poor eating, wrong digestion, disease or whatever the cause may be, the blood becomes filled with poisons and impurities the little red and white soldiers cannot do their work properly and hence they become a menace rather than an aid to the rest of the body.

20,000,000 corpuscles die with every breath of the lungs. To rid their ranks of enemies they throw them into the cells of the skin or down deep in the tissues and man has to suffer pimples, boils, blackheads and eruptions.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers are scientifically prepared under the highest of expert supervision and give to the blood through its regula nourishing channels—the stomach and digestive canal—a purifying food and invigorator.

Calcium Sulphide is one ingredient—the greatest blood purifier known to chemistry: Quassia, Golden Seal and Eucalyptus are other component parts, each having a particular office for the elimination of impurity and the upbuilding of the blood.

The remarkable feature about Stuart's Calcium Wafers, is that they act so speedily and so efficiently that they tone up the whole system from the standpoint of perfect blood almost beyond conception.

Their peculiar charm lies in the method of manufacture which insures the fullest strength of the ingredients beyond all other manner of preparation. One does not purchase an untried blood cleanser in Stuart's Calcium Wafers but a blood builder nd purifier backed by thousands of men and women whose use of it is its greatest testimonial tribute. Ask your druggist. He sells them for 50c, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. . ldress F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

FIRST STUDENT BIBLE CONFERENCE.

The first international Bible conference held under the auspices of the Student Department of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations, to consider the extension of Bible study in the colleges, met in Columbus, October 22-26. There were present 1022 students and professors and instructors from 250 institutions. Mr. J. R. Mott presided. The conference went to Columbus on the invitation of the United Brotherhood of that city who provided entertainment for the delegates and arranged for the meetings to be held in Memorial Hall and in the Auditorium of the Board of Trade Building.

The forenoons were devoted to addresses and discussions bearing directly on the development of the Student Bible Study movement. In the afternoons the conference was divided into groups according to classes of institutions; and plans for promoting efficiency in Bible teaching and for reaching a far larger proportion of college students than ever before, were presented. The evening sessions were devoted to inspiring addresses on the Influence of the Bible on individual and national life.

The two morning sessions, open only to delegates, were devoted to consideration of the problem of promoting Bible Study. On Friday morning, Mr. William D. Murray, a member of the Student Department Committee for many years, outlined the aim and scope of the Student Bible Study work of the Young Men's Christian Association. The progress of the work in colleges was briefly sketched by Messrs. Cooper, Weatherford, Billings, Hunton and Elliott, Secretaries of the Committee; and the "Secret of Efficiency in Bible Study in Colleges" was discussed by Prof. Miller of Princeton who spoke on the "Necessity of Capable and Trained Leaders." Other speakers were Prof. Brown of Vanderbilt, who spoke on "Adequate Courses of Bible Study," and Prof. Jenks of Cornell, who spoke on "Thorough Preparation by the Student."

On Saturday morning, representatives of a number of institutions told of the scenes in their institutions in the enlistment of college men in Bible Study. Col. Larned of West Point showed how Bible Study had gone forward at the Millitary Academy in spite of the limited time at the disposal of the cadets. President Falconer of the University of Toronto, set forth the "Contribution of Scholarship to the understanding of the Bible," and Mr. Lutner D. Wishard of New York, one of the founders of Association work in colleges, spoke of the "Opportunities of the College Graduate in the Promotion of Bible Study."

On Friday and Saturday afternoon the conference was broken up into sectional gatherings in order to consider the special problems of the different classes of institutions. At one conference the problems of promoting Bible Study in colleges in which the Association has general secretaries, was considered; and in another the problems of those having no general secretaries. Also there were conferences for those interested in the Bible Study work in preparatory schools and military academies. The esponsibilities of the alumni and graduate students to promote Bible Study in churches, Sunday-schools, men's clubs, city Associations, etc., etc., were discussed by those especially interested in this problem. The students and professors in theological institutions considered the special responsibility of the theological student for the devotional study of the Bible. The members of faculties present met in conference to consider the relation of professors and instructors to the Bible Study movement.

In Memorial Hall the evening meetings were held. On Thursday evening, the opening session of the Conference, Mr. Victor G. Bebee, the chairman of the United Church Brotherhoods of Columbus, welcomed the conference on the part of the Brotherhoods; and the Rev. Washington Gladden spoke on behalf of the city. Dr. Francis L. Patton, President of Princeton Theological Seminary, who was to have spoken on the "Bible as a Means of Culture for College Men," was kept away by illness. Mr. John R. Mott traced the beginning and development of the Bible Study Movement among college men throughout the world, and General O. O. Howard testified as to the "Value of Bible Study for the Educated Man."

On Friday evening, President King, of Oberlin, spoke on the "Call of the Church to College Men for Bible Study," and Mr. Robert E. Speer of New York, on the "Bible and the Culture of the Spiritual Life." The theme on Saturday evening was the influence of the Bible on national life, the Hon. H. B. F. Macfarland, Commissioner of the District of Columbia, speaking of the "Call of the Nation to College Men." Mr. Mott spoke of the need of extending the Bible Study work in the colleges of the United States and Canada, and of the invitation that had come to Mr. Cooper to assist in forwarding the Bible Study Movement among the students of Japan, China, and India. Opportunity was given to the delegates and friends present to share in this work by subscribing toward the expense of a great extension of the Bible Study Movement. The subscription was something over $1,600.

Before the delegates only, on Sunday morning, Dean Bosworth of Oberlin, gave a most helpful address on the "Relation of Bible Study and Prayer." In the afternoon President Booker T. Washington of Tuskegee, addressed the conference and a large company of Columbus citizens on the "Place of the Bible in the Uplifting of the Negro Race."

The farewell meeting was held on Sunday evening. Addresses were given by Dr. W. W. White of New York on the "Perspective in Bible Study," and Bishop William F. McDowell of Chicago, on "The Bible and Life."

Speaking for the Chickens.

A southerner, hearing a commotion in his chicken-house one dark night, took his revolver and went to investigate.

"Who's there?" he sternly demanded, opening the door.

No answer.

"Who's there? Answer, or I'll shoot!"

A trembling voice came from the farthest corner.

"Deed, sah, dey ain't nobody hyah 'ceptin' us chickens."

Extracts from two letters from Dr. Widdowson to Dr. Dye.

Upper Congo, Bolenge, July 13, 1908.

I believe in my last letter I told you that Iso Timothy went to Bonyeka for a five month's stretch as an evagelist. We have six or seven others up there with him. You remember Bonyeka, about 250 miles from Bolenge. We have had evangelists located there since Mr. Hensey's and my trip in January of this year. The people of Bonyeka and vicinity have accepted the teaching with great gladness. Iso reports 700 earnest seekers as being on his book. They are crying for us to come to them to open a station there and it is one of the richest fields, as far as I have seen, that ever has come to my notice. They will not let Catholic catechist land.

The director of the S. A. B. and the director of the A. P. I. (Conge Trading Companes) have asked us to do their medical work from now on. We should ask for another station in this district at once. Every month of delay will mean a harder struggle later.

We received the following telegram from Brother McLean today: "Proceed with Longo." We consider from this that you of the homeland have had a favorable reply from the government in Belgium. You may be sure we will proceed as soon as we can.

The last time the evangelists came in, the last of June, twenty-nine were baptized and fifty-six evangelists and teachers sent out.

In my last letter I told you about the way the new work is opening up at and about Bonyeka. Around Bonyeka I saw more people than I have ever seen in any one section of the Congo, large towns and plenty of them. These people are waiting and depending on us for the gospel. The Catholics have not yet reached there and the people do not want them. Shall we not, as Hensey has said, "for the third time plant the banner of Christ in Congo, at or near Bonyeka?" I for one am heartily in favor of asking for another station in this section and that soon. Everyone here is heartily in favor of this new move.

Efoloko is doing a splendid work at Mbala Lunzi (this is the new station proposed for Southern California) and there is a very richly populated district in and on this river (Momboyo, tributary of the Bosira) which we have not yet reached, nor have the Catholics.

I am just coming to what I really want to say. It is this: We must have a steamer if our work is going to extend.

Beyond Bonyeka on the Bosir W'onene (this is the station proposed for Northern California) and Mbala Lunzi on the Momboyo are hundreds of miles of navigable river, not counting many navigable branches to each of these.

We need a steamer. We can and will win these people to Christ but much of the traveling must be done on the natural highways, the rivers. The steamer question is no small deal. It's going to take money and lots of it. What is important now is that we get before the people in general the great need for a steamer that we may further extend the work which our Father has so richly blessed. Now is the time to press it home. May they catch a vision of the teeming thousands living on navigable rivers without Christ or hope.

Yours as ever in His work,

Widdowson.

Vol. XXV. CHICAGO, ILL., NOVEMBER 21, 1908. No. 47.

My Confession of Faith—III.

"Our desire for ourselves and our brethren would be, that rejecting human opinions and the inventions of men as of any authority, or as having any place in the church of God, we might forever cease from further contentions about such things; returning to and holding fast by the original standard; taking the Divine Word alone for our rule; the Holy Spirit for our teacher and guide, to lead us into all truth; and Christ alone, as exhibited in the Word, for our salvation; that, by so doing, we may be at peace among ourselves, follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." Thus wrote Thomas Campbell one hundred years ago in the "Declaration and Address," a document whose historic significance he then little understood. Vexed with the divided state of the church, and aware that its partisan strifes were the greatest barrier to the extension of the kingdom of God in the world, he threw his life into the effort to heal those unhappy divisions. In this task he was presently joined by his son Alexander Campbell, and later by several earnest and consecrated men, chief among whom were Walter Scott and Barton W. Stowe. Under their leadership there rapidly grew up a body of believers pleading for the union of the people of God. At first there was no thought of seperate existence as a religious body. But stress of circumstances compelled resort to an independent organization, much against the wish of Mr. Campbell himself. And thus there sprang into being the brotherhood known as the Reformers, the Christian Church, or the Disciples of Christ.

These men were by no means the first to advocate Christian unity. Such a plea was as old as the prayer of the Savior and the epistles of Paul. The mediæval church sought unity by proscribing and persecuting all who varied from accepted orthodoxy. The rise of Protestantism, with its doctrines of free inquiry and individual responsibility, made division not only possible but inevitable. The reformers did not agree among themselves. Yet the sin of sectarianism impressed these men even in the first joy of freedom from tyranny, and sincere efforts were made to unite the sections of the Protestants. Before the death of Luther conferences were held with this end in view, and attempts were even made to reunite Catholics and Reformers. Among the men who labored at this task were Calixtis, Leibnitz, Spinola, Bossuet, Lessing, Grotius, John Owen and Richard Baxter.

The fathers of our own movement, therefore, were not proposing to themselves a new work. But they were trying to meet a new occasion. They felt that the union of Christians was the solvent of all the difficulties which confronted the church in their day. They did not doubt that their views would meet with instant favor and acceptance. Who could resist the pathos of Jesus' prayer or the urgency of Paul's exhortation? Yet to their surprise the Christian world gave no heed to their appeal. They were regarded as presumptuous disturbers of the peace. The boldness of their summons angered the intrenched denominationalism of their day. Not only were their words unheeded, but they themselves were virtually cast out from the fellowship of those they had sought to move.

It was apparent that the plea for Christian unity must wait for a period of preparation. The world was not prepared for it. Too many human devices had obtained the sanction of God's people. These obscured the primitive simplicity and oneness of the church. The only way in which that lost unity could be restored was by the restoration of the apostolic church in its totality—faith, spirit and service. So there came into recognition the second principle of the movement—the Restoration of apostolic Christianity. This new feature of the plea soon became the absorbing concern of the Reformers. Christian union was not forgotten, but it was given a less prominent place, as it was seen that only a church prepared by the study of apostolic conditions could appreciate and desire the union of Christians.

Under the inspiration of this urgent and clear-cut appeal for a return to primitive ideals, the Disciples have grown into a great body. The causes of this remarkable growth are not far to seek (1) Their appeal was from the creeds to the Bible just at the moment when the power of creed was declining, and the Bible was taking a new and more vital place in the regard of the church. (2) Their protest was equally emphatic against the narrowness of theological conservatism on the one side, and the looseness of unrestrained liberalism on the other. Their position was, therefore, central and attractive. (3) The definiteness of their demand that men should believe, repent and be baptized—a definiteness that often ran the risk of becoming mathematical and formal in the zeal of evangelism—as a relief from the vagueness of much of the preaching of the time. It required no delay for compliance. (4) The ardor of their evangelism swept all before it. It was an appeal to instant surrender to the claims of Christ. And though in the hands of some of its representatives it easily degenerated into a bald legalism or a passion for numbers, it has likewise become an instrument of great effectiveness in winning men to the cross and strengthening the churches.

As I have studied the work of the fathers, the development of the movement to which they gave the initial impulse, and the present opportunities and tendencies of the Disciples of Christ, I am increasingly assured that the task to which they set themselves is the one whose accomplishment is of chief importance to the universal church in our age. I believe that the reunion of Christendom is the logical climax of all the reformations which have preceded it; and the most pressing duty of the hour.

I believe that the program laid down by the fathers—union upon the faith, spirit and service of the New Testament—is the only practicable way in which this desirable end can be attained. By the apostolic faith I mean the centrality of the Person and character of our Lord, the redemptive facts of his life, death and resurrection, and the institutions of baptism and the Lord's Supper by which these truths become the appropriated realities of the believer's life. By the apostolic spirit I mean the Christian character which was exemplified by Jesus, emphasized by the apostles and ever constitutes the fair ideal of a Christ-like life. It is the mind that was in him, the humility, sincerity, prayerfulness, patience and love which vindicate the right of a disciple to wear the name of his Lord. By the apostolic service I mean that devotion to the program of Jesus which so far as individual and collective efforts can go, will make effective his will in the world, in domestic life, in industrial enterprises, in politics, in society and throughout the world.

I believe that the Disciples of Christ can be true to the fathers only by carrying out to its logical conclusions and full results the work which the fathers began. Loyalty to these great men of the past does not consist in camping upon their graves, but in pursuing the march in the direction they pointed out. The curse of most of the earlier reformations has been the tendency to harden the teachings of their leaders—intended for the times then present—into fixed formulas and difinitions to be observed for all time. This is the essence of unfaithfulness, not of loyalty, to a great leader. The lawgivers of Israel, whether in the days of the early kings, or in the declining years of the royal period, or in the time of Jerusalem's revival issued their institutes always in the name of Moses, the great prophet and teacher of the past. Yet those laws were not stationary but progressive, meeting new occasions with new enactments. Moses was always interpreted in terms of the new age. The thought of the lawgivers was. What would Moses say in our time? Similar must be the spirit of one who would be true to the fathers. What would be their counsel if they were alive today?

I believe that the chief dangers that threaten to retard the accomplishment of our hopes and purposes are, (1) The tendency to harden into a denomination rather than to accomplish our historic purpose of uniting the Christian world. There can be nothing more pathetic than the spectacle of a great body of people raised up for a mighty purpose, and then content to exhaust its strength in self-development, even at the expense of the larger work of the Kingdom of God. Whenever we place the interests of "our" churches above those of the entire fellowship of believers, we are untrue to ourselves, to the fathers and to Christ. (2) The temptation to regard the plea for union as doctrine to be preached rather than as a task to be undertaken by every church. It is time that our churches understood that only by promoting unity, by becoming specialists in the inculcation and illustration of fellowship and co-operation in the localities in which they are set, can they justify their existence at all. A congregation which can satisfy itself to live in a city for ten or twenty years without an effort to unite the forces of the kingdom beyond the benevolent desire to absorb all the rest into itself is a travesty upon the plea we make and a hindrance to the cause of Christ in that place. It has merely added another church, denominational to all intents and purposes, to the denominations already there! From such misrepresentation of our aims and spirit we may well pray to be delivered.

From the heights of past achievement a hundred years look down upon us. The fathers whose names we cherish were men of fearless hearts, undaunted faith and above all else, absorbing love of liberty. They had seen too much of the spirit of intolerance and persecution not to be profoundly indignant at its perpetuation. Yet we are witnesses of the attempt made from time to time to bind the tyranny of opinions, traditions, prejudices, upon the necks of our people. It is not for this that we are preparing to celebrate our centennial. As well talk of honoring Independence Day by a return to British servitude. To free our brotherhood from such bondage to tradition and opinion has been the effort of the noblest of our leaders during all these years. To break the chains of religious narrowness and injustice was the heroic task of the fathers. To bring men out from the letter to the spirit, from darkness to light, from hate to love, from sin to holiness, was the glorious work of Christ.

"As he died to make men holy,
Let us die to make men free,
While truth is marching on."

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The Discovery of the Masculine

In the modern church no movement is freighted with such great consequences as the awakening of the men. Our Christianity with all its tenderness and grace is a man's religion—and not the less so on account of its tenderness and grace. Our God is Masculine in the symbolism with which we conceive him. His Incarnation took place in the birth of a Son. The Twelve were men. The New Testament is a man's book. The church is officered by men. The work to be done is a man's work.

The notion that man is just an appendage to the church, dragged to its services and its work by his wife or mother, and at last squeezed through the pearly gates by virtue of the patronage he has given the church in his wife's name, has been held too seriously and too long by a great multitude of respectable husbands and sons.

So long as religion was conceived in other-wordly terms, or in terms of a sentimental experience it could hardly be expected that men would give other than such nominal adherence to the church. Men in modern times do not have leisure or faculty for thinking much about "heaven." Nor are they constituted temperamentally so as to be susceptible to a fixed type of emotional "experience." But when the church is conceived as a practical device for getting certain desirable work done, an engine to furnish power for building the City of God right here in this world—then you have placed the whole matter on the level where a man can get at it and where it can get at him and command his allegiance and his faculties.

It is this practical conception of the church that is the explanation of the awakening of the masculine power of our Christian communions. The chivalry of every Christian man is aroused as he percieves the heroic but ineffectual efforts of Christian women to do the vast work of the Kingdom. "That is a man's work," he says, "and I ought not allow my wife and mother and daughter to bear that burden. It needs a man's strength. It needs a man's bank account not just a woman's pin-money. It needs a man's vote as well as a woman's tears. It needs a genuius for organizing and directing a big enterprise as well as a woman's sympathy. It needs a man's foresight as well as woman's insight. The work needs me —and with God's grace I'll just get into it and do my part." And off comes the coat of his indifference.

This practical appeal of the church comes with singular force to men of the Disciples of Christ. Our conception of Christian life has been from the beginning in more practical terms than that of our religious neighbors. Over against the wierd mysticism of a hundred years ago our fathers set a practical view of conversion. Multitudes of men who failed to realize the promises of a false emotionalism found peace in the sensible teaching of our people. More frequently men led their wives into our churches than women led their husbands. Our gospel seemed peculiarly adapted to the masculine temperament.

With other denominations, however, we have been only gradually taking up the practical conception of the church's function. If our neighbors are following our lead in the preaching of "first principles" we are following their lead in practical organization for Christian service. The Christian Endeavor society, the Woman's Missionary society, the Evangelical Alliance, the Federation of Churches and such organizations for practical service took their origin in other bodies, not in our own. Happily we have followed heartily in the path they blazed and have in some cases overtaken the leaders. The latest practical organization within the church is that of the men. Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Baptists, Methodists and others are ahead of us but not far ahead. They have massed the masculine element of their churches in splendid brotherhoods. In these brotherhoods a new conception of men's responsibility is forming and a virile enthusiasm is being generated.

The definite decision at New Orleans to enter upon the work of organizing our men was not the least important of the forces set going at that convention. Our news columns last week reported the initial steps in consummating this purpose. The selection of Mr. R. A. Long, of Kansas City, for president and Mr. P. C. Macfarlane, of Alameda, California, for secretary, is an earnest of the sort of enterprise the committee will foster. Mr. Macfarlane will make his headquarters at Kansas City and spend most of his time in visiting our churches and enlisting the men in the new enterprise. He is the kind of man men will like to meet—strong, confident, simple, brainy, warm-hearted, progressive, consecrated. May God's blessing attend him and the rich ministry he will render the men of our churches!

Does the President's Creed Matter?

The question as to Mr. Taft's religious creed became a somewhat interesting one as the campaign progressed and has been made yet more urgent since the election. We do not believe there was in any quarter any serious opposition to Mr. Taft because he was a Unitarian. But the suggestion that he did not belong on the orthodox side of things religious was too good a text for our political preachers to let go without saying something. Hence, a considerable discussion of the relation of a man's religion to his officeholding has developed. Three weeks ago Dr. Gunsaulus in his Auditorium service in Chicago, devoted his sermon to a passionate attack upon those who could think of raising such an issue. A well-known clerical magazine contained, several weeks ago, a symposium by a number of ministers on the subject.

What life the question has had has probably been due to the desire of the defenders of religious liberty to prevent the issue coming up rather than to the insistence of the intolerant that Mr. Taft's creed rendered him inacceptable as a president.

Mr. Roosevelt, however, has broadened and enlivened the issue. In a post-election statement he condemns those who would raise such an issue with his characteristic vehemence. The entire question of religion, he argues, is a matter between the individual and his Maker. To make conformity to any particular religious creed a qualification for the presidential office would open the door to hypocrasy and cant, obscure vital political issues with irrelevant theological issues, set creed above character, and probably plunge the nation into a religious war—the most bitter and costly of all kinds of warfare. Mr. Roosevelt points with pride to his cabinet table where a Unitarian, a Jew and a Roman Catholic have places beside those of orthodox confessions.

In connection with Mr. Roosevelt's statement, the hope recently expressed by Archbishop Ireland that the United States might ere long have a Catholic president, becomes doubly significant. Here is, perhaps, the only conceivable form in which the religious creed of a candidate for president could become an issue in the United States. With most Americans it would not matter whether the president was a Unitarian or a Presbyterian, but if a Roman Catholic presented himself as a candidate he would find himself squarely up against a deep-seated sentiment of opposition. Mr. Roosevelt contends that a man's religion is a purely private affair—between himself and his God. If he chooses to worship in a particular form it is his own business; if he subscribes to this or to that set of religious doctrines it is an irrelevant matter in his candidacy for the people's suffrage. What matters is his moral character, his trustworthiness, his intelligence and the particular political policies he espouses.

With this contention of the president's probably we would all agree. Nevertheless we would have a right to consider a candidate's religion if his religion involved a theory of the state which is hostile to our American theory and traditions. Opposition to a Roman Catholic candidate for president would be justified, not because he held certain religious beliefs or worshipped in a certain ritual different from our own, but because he, as a Roman Catholic, gave allegiance to an ecclesiastical institution which claims certain political preroggatives for itself. Large numbers of Americans would oppose a Roman Catholic because of their fear that with a Catholic president the church would gain its chance to assert again its "temporal sovereignty." Since the Reformation the church has lost this sovereignty. Before that time the kings and rulers of Europe were subordinate to the Roman Pontiff. But while actually stripped of this power the Pope still stubbornly holds to the theory of the subordination of state to church.

Too much blood and treasure have been spent to free the state from churchly denomination to warrant our discerning citizenship running any chances of losing our hard-won liberties. Opposition to a Roman candidate for president would not be a case of religious intolerance.

It would be a case of political difference of opinion in the most vital principle in the organization of our republic. Let the Pope renounce his medieval presumption. Let him give to America convincing tokens of his willingness to be content with "spiritual sovereignty" and the Roman Church will find the American people liberal enough to elect a Catholic to the highest office within their power to give.

Provided only: that he be equally qualified in character and independent intelligence with the candidate arising from the Protestant bodies. And this kind of man the church will discover when it begins to search for him is pretty hard to find!

The Union Congress

The Joint Congress of the Disciples, Baptists and Free Baptists which was held in Memorial Church of Christ in this city last week was the most notable event of many years in the history of immersionist bodies. The congress idea is older and more fully appreciated among the Baptists than with us. The Free Baptists have never had such an organization. To unite the strongest and most representative men of the three bodies in this fellowship was a most interesting achievement. But the astonishing feature of the gathering was the unity which pervaded the thought of those present. There were striking contrasts of thought evoked by the discussions, but the joy of brotherhood was always manifest. It is clear that the Baptists and Disciples who mingled in the sessions of the Congress are nearer each other than different sections of either denomination would be. At the higher levels of Christian life there is almost complete union of thought and feeling. ,

The program was thoroughly representative of the different interests of the church today. Biblical teaching was the theme in the session on the Church organization in the New Testament. The deepest question in theology was under consideration when the Atonement from the Modern Standpoint was discussed. The practical sides of the faith came to expression with the subject of the Attitude of the Church to Psychical Healing, and the civil problem of the Proper Limits of Free Speech in the Republic. But the theme that commanded the most profound attention, and was most eagerly discussed was that of the Union of the Churches, especially the three then in conference. It was deeply impressed upon all present that a moment of immense importance in the life of the church had been reached. The spirit of fraternal good will was manifest in all the utterances of these deeply interesting sessions.

The fact that the Baptist Committee extended a formal and hearty invitation to the Disciples to come in with them and hold a joint Congress in the future is a fact of the greatest significance. There is no doubt that the proffer of this invitation is in some regards an act of very great generosity. The Baptists have much of the denominational spirit. This we have proved in many encounters in the past. There is no people who would more fully prize the privilege of separate and exclusive conference on the question of the time. Yet this satisfaction they are ready to relinquish for the sake of the unity which has dawned upon them as a duty. This is one of the most notable of the signs of the times.

The Disciples on their part accepted the invitation in the generous spirit in which it was given. They could do no less, nor did they wish to. This does not mean that our own separate Congress will not be held in the coming spring. It seems better that it should be, and that steps shall then be taken to formulate some fitting plan of co-operation with our Baptist brethren upon the congress idea. We shall be prepared to give fuller and more competent attention to the entire question at that time than could be given in the intervals of the joint meeting of last week.

It is evident that a new leaf has been turned in the history of comity and co-operation among immersionists. No one can foresee the end to which this may lead. But the fact that the Congress was held in a church which is already a living illustration of the union idea was impressive to many who would not have believed that Baptists and Disciples could thus come to oneness. That such unions will take place in increasing numbers few can doubt who discern the tendency of things. It is in this manner that the desired result will come. Resolutions and conferences, congresses and conventions, help to bring the broader spirit of toleration and good will. But the union of the immersionists will come about first by the union of individual churches, then by the exchange of ministers and pastorates, then the unification of missionary work on the foreign field, and lastly by the merging, not of either into the other, but of both into the united church whose foundation shall be the simple Word of God, and whose passion shall be the realization of the Master's prayer and the evangelization of the world.

The Christian Standard's Responsibility

It is an occasion of no little embarrassment in the Christian Century office that we felt constrained to take issue with Prefessor Willett last week upon hearing of his agreement to resign from the Centennial program provided Russell Errett would pledge his paper to drop the fight on the missionary societies and the Centennial program. Mr. Errett is the owner of the Christian Standard and the dictator of its policies. Dr. Willett is perfectly willing to obliterate himself from the discussion if he can be given assurances that other men on the program will not be attacked and the missionary societies menaced by the continued opposition of the Standard. He sees nothing to be gained by withdrawing from the program if the Standard's fight is to continue. He earnestly desires peace, especially in this Centennial year. If his resignation will bring peace he will cheerfully resign.

In this position his colleagues in the Christian Century differ with him. We believe the present controversy is not merely a personal matter. We believe the attack upon him should not succeed because it is an attack upon the vital principle of our reformation —the principle that calls for unity in faith, liberty in opinion and charity in all things. It seems to us therefore that for Dr. Willett to regard it as a personal matter is to overlook the most important element of the situation. The letters which we print herewith indicate that many of our brethren agree with us that our very plea is vitally involved in the controversy and that for Professor Willett to surrender to the tyrannous presumption of the Standard would put us back in history more than twenty-five years.

Our missionary secretaries and the members of the Centennial Committee are greatly perplexed. As long as there was any hope that the Standard would give genuine and bonafide assurances of its willingness to cooperate to make this Centennial year a year of vast blessing to our cause, these brethren urged strongly and persistently that Professor Willett resign. It was probably due to the urgency of an officer of one of the societies more than to any convincing argument in the case that Dr. Willett agreed to resign if his resignation would bring peace. Now they and the entire brotherhood are awaiting Russell Errett's answer. The sky is clouded, however, with the rumor that not only will Mr. Errett not agree to cease his attack but has repudiated the pledge signed by J. A. Lord. If this rumor had not reached us by authoritative channels, not confidential, we would not mention it here. But we feel that the brethren should know the whole truth in order to place the responsibility where it belongs. For ourselves we will be comforted if the odious bargain is not made. And when we read these letters we are assured that in holding this position we are in the best of company.

Men Who Protest

Editor Christian Century:

Dear Brother:—I say "amen" to your trenchant editorial of last week. It would be a great mistake for Professor Willett to resign. The demand for his resignation is not nearly so wide-spread as a few brethren suppose. I have recently talked with several men who do not agree with Prof. Willett's theology, yet they hold that he should be retained on the Pittsburg program.

His withdrawal would not bring peace. Some other pretext for continuing the war would speedily be found. The contention is not a personal one. A great principle is at stake. Prof. Willett represents the strong virile element in our brotherhood who believe in freedom. This dearly-bought privilege for which our fathers suffered we must now maintain even at the cost of peace. Let the decision be final. Do not open the question again. Unalterable firmness will now bring a swifter and more lasting peace than any sort of a compromise. James M. Philputt.

St. Louis.

Editor Christian Century:

You ask if Dr. Willett should resign from the Centennial program at Pittsburg. I certainly hope he will not do so, or rather that he will reconsider the action he has already taken. He should not be allowed to resign if it is possible to prevent it.

Eunice D. Martin.

Dear Brother Willett:—As one who holds you in high esteem, and believes in your integrity, though not always agreeing with you in your conclusions, I want to register my protest against your resigning from the Centennial program. Do not do it. The foundation of our plea, our movement, is at stake. We need men now. It will not help matters in the least for you to resign. It may conciliate some few conservatives but the rank and file will resent it. Our missionary societies will suffer worse in resigning than in remaining firm in the right. God bless you and grant you the riches of his grace. Yours in gospel bonds, J. E. Chase.

Men Who Protest

North Bend, Neb.

Do not compromise the freedom of the gospel.

I want to tell you that if the report is true that you have withdrawn from the Pittsburg Centennial program, I am deeply grieved at your action. Many of your other friends regret it as much as I do. I expressed that sentiment in my sermon last Sunday morning; and again in an after dinner talk here last night. I don't believe you ought to have done it, and I believe you ought to be prevailed upon to go back upon the program, and some of us will raise our voices in protest against your withdrawal.

If every man who happens to utter sentiments at variance with the general opinion of our Brotherhood upon doctrinal points of minor importance can be run off the platform of our conventions by popular clamor, we are in no better shape than the creeded churches which can try and excommunicate. Does not your action admit that we are in just such shape as they? And an admission of that sort goes far, does it not, to establish that very condition.

If I were you I would wait till I was put off the program, and I'd like to see the body of men who would quite dare to put any man off for doctrinal differences. I do not for an instant, believe that the Convention would be injured by the controversy that would, or might, arise in hotel lobbies over your presence on the platform. Controversies are not bad things, in the long run. Of course, I know I am uttering platitudes in all this, but I only want you to see how more of us feel than you have any idea of. If the step is not irrevocable, I hope you will retrace it; and if it is, then I hope we can take some means to make you retrace it by brotherly suasion. Burris A. Jenkins
Kansas City.

I desire to express my opinion about Professor Willett resigning as speaker on the Centennial program. Without at all passing judgment on the validity of his recent utterances, I must say that I cannot lend my influence toward any limitation of our American and priceless freedom of speech. Our church is a free church. We cannot consistently go to Pittsburg to celebrate the Centennial of this free church with the right of free speech curtailed. In this crisis let us all "keep sweet" and remember the advice of Gamaliel to always rest our souls with the reflection that God sustains the truth. Parker Stockdale.

Editors of Christian Century:

I firmly believe that the forcing of Dr. Willett off of our Centennial Program because of any theological views he may or may not hold, would be little short of a calamity and the saddest commentary that could be written on the plea of the Disciples for Christianity unity.

It would be in my opinion as logical and as just to protest against the appearance of our "grand old man of Lexington" on that program because he may or may not hold certain theological positions. Both of these men accept Christ as their personal Savior, both accept the New Testament as a sufficient rule of faith and practice, both are men of blameless lives, why then any discrimination between them as speakers at our State or National Convention.

As I have understood it, one of the protests of the Disciples has been against theological opinions as tests of fellowship and if this sort of discrimination is not that very thing, I should not know what to call it.

Hoping that the good men, brave and true, of our brotherhood, whether "progressive," "conservative" or of "the mediation school," will all strive to be one in our blessed Master and not present to the world this unlovely spectacle of a people who plead for Christian unity, divided and at war among themselves.

I am most fraternally yours,
Bloomington, Ill. Edgar D. Jones.

P. S. I wish to say further that I read this letter in the presence of our elders and that I am sending it with their hearty endorsement. E. D. J.,

---

To the Editors:—In response to your query relative to the Willett matter, may I say that notwithstanding the fact that I regret, as many do, that the affair came up as it did, I heartily endorse the action of the Centennial Committee in refusing to request Professor Willett's withdrawal from the program.

Further, I deplore the fact that from a certain quarter from which has already come too much disturbance, an attack has been made upon our Missionary interests with this little incident as an excuse. To me this attack is wholly unwarranted as the Centennial Committee, if I remember correctly, was appointed by Brother Breeden and that those upon this committee do not serve as representing any special interests but as representing members of the Christian Church in America. Why can we not allow Brother McLean, Brother Wright and others the freedom of American citizens once in a while?

Wishing the New Century Company success and believing that our people generally approve of the Centennial Committee's action, I am, Fraternally yours, V. W. Blair.
Greenfield, Ind.

Editor Christian Century:

I am not in sympathy with some of the views of Prof. Willett, but the opposition to his appearing on the Centennial Program I regard as not only very discreditable, but also as out of all harmony with the spirit of our movement. We have all along stood for Christian liberty and we cannot surrender any of that liberty now.

At the same time we must not forget that this "liberty in Christ" carries with it the spirit of Christ and we must lose none of that spirit while contending for Christian liberty. If we can stop this unchristian contention, even for one year, let us do it; and if this voluntary resignation of Prof. Willett from the program will insure peace, it would be a very graceful and manly thing for him to resign. But if his resignation will not bring the coveted peace, I am opposed to his resigning. He should not be asked to make a sacrifice unless it will do some good. S. S. Jones.
Danville, Ill.

Editors Christian Century:

In answer to the question, "Should Professor Willett Resign?" I say no. If protests are in order why not open the columns of the Christian Century and let its readers speak their minds on this question. I believe that a worse thing could not befall our people and the cause of Christian union at this time than to take Bro. Willett's name from the Centennial program at the dictation of the Christian Standard.

Your Brother,
Blue Mound, Ill. E. T. Clements.

Dear Century:

Having just read the article in the Christian Century of November the 14th headed "Shall Professor Willett resign?" having in view the coming Centennial program in which he has a place, I wish from a personal standpoint to register an emphatic no! My fellow ministers of this section whom I have met recently are of the same very decided opinion.

Very sincerely yours,
Hoopeston, Ill. Lewis R. Hotaling.

To the Century:

I would be pleased to have the Disciples come up to their Centennial in perfect harmony. I would be pleased to have the missionary societies make the best reports in their history. But there is something more important than peace and finances, and that is the liberty of which we have boasted for a hundred years. Hence I protest against Professor Willett withdrawing his name from the Centennial program.
Cincinnati, Ohio. A. W. Fortune.

The question involved in the effort to prevent Prof. Willett having a place on the Centennial program is one as to whether men holding to certain opinions shall make those opinions tests of fellowship. We may differ widely as to many things but so long as we agree on the Lordship of Christ and accept the New Testament as authoritative we are true to the fundamentals. Thos. Campbell held it to be a great wrong to "judge our brother to be absolutely wrong because he differs from our opinions." Prof. Willett has ever stood on the above fundamentals. He is no farther from the great body of this brotherhood in his progressive views regarding the Old Testament than his critics are in their radically conservative views; therefore he is quite as representative of the brotherhood doctrinally. Spiritually he is certainly quite as representative for he has called no names, challenged no man's integrity, endured the unjust representations of many of his critics with singular Christian patience and withal shown himself a Christ like man through these years of attack upon and misrepresentation of his teachings. His theme at the Centennial is to be the Lordship of Christ. That is the "rock of the corner." No man among us more consistently stands upon it and no man among us can more adequately set it forth. To deny him the right to speak after he has been invited to do so by as representative a committee as could be chosen from the brotherhood is to yield to as sectarian a demand as any we have ever protested agaist in the world of sectarianism,

Eureka, Ill. Alva W. Taylor.

Christian Century, Chicago, Ill. Why should the Disciples of Christ in their Centennial celebration refuse a place to the man who stands pre-eminent in the brotherhood as a great scholar, a gifted and artistic orator, a cultured, Christian gentleman in one splendid personality, because forsooth some are displeased with his critical teaching?

In his own Confession of Faith he avows his fidelity and loyalty to the Plea in language as strong as was ever used by the Fathers. Without endorsing his critical views we can accept his allegiance to the Christ, his unflinching loyalty to the essentials of the Faith and the eternal verities.

Let us have our greatest men to represent us at Pittsburg and surely none will deny Prof. Willett a first place in the shining galaxy of stars in our firmament.

Fraternally,
Eureka, Ill. H. O. Breeden.

My Dear Dr. Willett:

I learned last week of the action of the Centennial Com. in regard to your place on the program, and I need not say to you that I was gratified. The brethren are in no state of mind to be driven by the Standard.

Fraternally yours,
Philadelphia, Pa. Levi G. Batman.

My Dear Bro. Willett:

I am rejoiced to see that you have drawn the sword and thrown away the scabbard, and now "lay on MacDuff and d—be he who first cries, hold! enough!" The insolence of The Standard has become unbearable. I hope it isn't true that you are declining to appear on the Centennial program. A nice lot of people we would be going up to our Centennial wearing a dog's collar on our necks. Above all let us be free, Centennial or no Centennial.

I will not bore you with a long letter nor with any advice, only be strong and of a good courage. You are fighting the Lord's battle and ours too. God be with you.
Spokane, Wash. J. W. Allen.

I most earnestly protest against the withdrawal of Professor Willett from the Centennial program. This is no longer a personal matter but one in which the principle of religious liberty is involved. I cannot submit to any doctrinal test of fellowship other than that involved in the "baptismal confession," and to this Bro. Willett adheres. His own avowal of loyalty to the principles for which the Disciples stand is amply sufficient, since his personal integrity is unquestioned and his knowledge of the nature of "our plea" is unchallenged. I know of no one who can more fitly represent the genius and spirit of this religious movement. I believe the vast majority of those who oppose Bro. Willett would say the same were they correctly informed as to his views and not misled by false reports. His withdrawal now would do the cause of truth and justice incalculable injury by placing an apparent sanction upon these incorrect reports of his teachings. But the far greater injury would be the placing of a credal "yoke upon the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear."
Milwaukee, Wis. Claire L. Waite.

Dr. H. L. Willett:—Dear Brother—I have just written a prominent member of the program committee Centennial Convention urging that you be not allowed to resign your place upon the program. I fear my voice will not be very influential in the matter but I felt inclined to do what I could in combination with others to ward off what I think would be an everlasting disgrace to our movement. Indeed it would transform it from a progressive movement into an ignominious retreat. I said "I am unable to see what particular phase of our work we can fitly celebrate at Pittsburg if we go up thither with this blot upon the 'scutcheon of our religious heredity." Many like words also I added.

I sincerely hope that you upon your part will stand firm, contending earnestly for the goodly inheritance which has ever been ours. A great cloud of witnesses hovers above this battlefield of the spirit, and the spirit voices of our heroic dead call to us "Look to yourselves that you lose not the things that we have wrought."
Columbia, Mo. Chas. M. Sharpe.

To the Christian Century:

I desire to say a few words about the effort to get Dr. Willett to withdraw from the Centennial program. I have been a preacher for the Disciples of Christ for more than twenty years. I was reared in a Disciple family and think I understand the genius and spirit of our movement. I have sat at the feet of some of the men who are now active in attempting to force upon all, their views as tests of standing and fellowship in the ministry of Jesus Christ. They are endeavoring to put upon all a yoke which they and our fathers refused to wear. In their zeal to have their interpretations accepted as infallible they have gone into the creed-making business. Twenty years ago no one would have thought it possible for these men, even under any conditions, to have receeded so far from the position of the Disciples of Christ. They are now actually making for us a creed which is to be a test of fellowship for the ministry. The movement is reactionary. Many of the other religious bodies have advanced to that position and beyond it. I utter my protests against it. Under no conditions should Dr. Willett withdraw his name from that program. We have traveled too far and enjoyed the atmosphere of freedom in Christ too long to go back into bondage now.

The question as to whether they or I agree with Willett's interpretations is not before us. He holds to the fundamental verities of the Christian religion as firmly as any. The whole question is one of freedom in Christ. It will be a dark day for the Disciples of Christ when we must submit to such standards as are now being erected before we can speak in public.
Springfield, Mo. F. L. Moffett.

WHY I WANT PROFESSOR WILLETT ON THE CENTENNIAL PROGRAM.

With malice toward none and charity for all, these lines are written. In this mind and spirit (and I believe that I have the mind and spirit of Christ) I desire to register my protest against the withdrawal of Prof. Willett from the Centennial Program. The reasons for this protest I desire to briefly state.

1. The Centennial Committee appointed at the Omaha Convention has seen fit to place him on the program. The power to do that was delegated to the members of that committee by the Omaha Convention. This committee having made its selection we should abide by its decision.

2. The character and personnel of this Centennial Committee is of such a nature as to warrant the fullest confidence in it to do that which is right in the sight of God and for the good of the kingdom of God.

3. I know Prof. Willett. For four years I met him in the class room. I have often been in his home. I have broken bread with him. I have prayed with him. I have studied the word of God with him. I have studied the History of the Disciples with him. I have heard him preach the story of God's redeeming grace to the edification of my soul. I know of his love for the kingdom of God. I know him as one of the purest of men that I have ever met in my life. As a scholar and platform man he is a challenge to the whole religious world. He is preeminently qualified to appear on the Centennial program. If our brotherhood is not large enough to afford a platform for Prof. Willett then we have indeed reached a critical stage in our history. I have faith to believe that we are large enough.

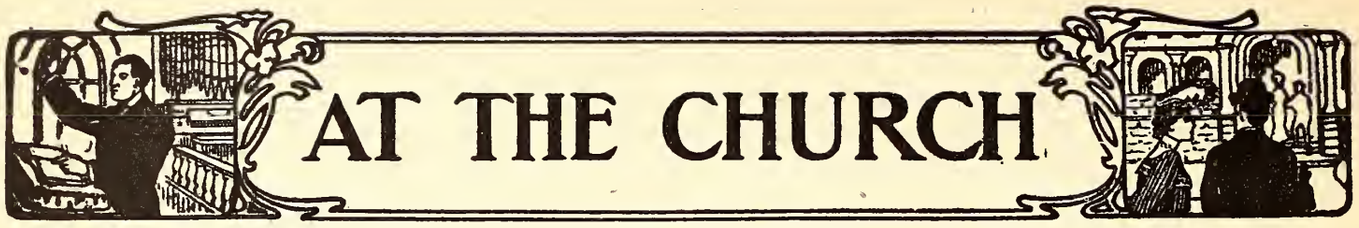
In conclusion I want to say a word relative to this Centennial program and the Missionary Society interests. For me, I do not say that it would be so for others, to in any way injure the cause of missions because some person was placed on the Centennial program with whom I was not in accord on Theological questions, would be a sin against the Holy Spirit of Christian Conquest for which I could not forgive myself in this world nor in the one to come. To me it would be an unpardonable sin.
Vincennes, Ind. William Oeschger.

Does Prohibition Prohibit?

One of the specious claims of those opposed to the suppression of the drink traffic has been that prohibition does not prohibit, that it only changes the methods and channels by which the drink is got to the drinker. The president of the Whisky Trust in his report a year ago expressed his opposition to prohibition on this ground. We have always been so naive as to wonder why if prohibition does not prohibit, the brewers and liquor dealers should go to so great pains to defend their business against it! The disingenuousness of the argument, we believe, has always been obvious to the unprejudiced mind.

But now comes this year's report of the president of the Distillers Securities Corporation (the Whisky Trust), and we look in vain for a repetition of last year's argument. Instead, we have an exhibition of facts which makes such an argument absurd. In the fiscal year, 1908, the production of all kinds of distilled spirits in the United States was only 127 million gallons, against 168 million gallons the year before. The decrease amounts to twenty-five per cent! This year's output was the smallest since 1902, but greater by one-third than that of 1899.

The contempt with which the liquor interests have always regarded the prohibition movement is being supplanted by a wholesome fear. The indifference of the large class of respectable citizens is changing into respect and enthusiasm. Whether the Prohibition party or the Anti-saloon League has the secret of success in its organization is a question that should not for an instant divide those who wish the saloon banished from society. Probably both these organizations have been instrumental in bringing about such a shrinkage in the output of liquor. Every lover of the cause will be heartened by the facts which bring dismay to the enemies of the home and the state.



Sunday School Lesson

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

DRUNKEN SAMARIA.*

Although Isaiah was a citizen of Jerusalem, and so far as we know never traveled outside of Judah, yet he concerned himself with the affairs of other nations, especially with those of Israel, the Northern kingdom. His ministry covered the period from 739 to 701 B. C. In the midst of these years the kingdom of Israel came to its end by the downfall of the city of Samaria, its capital. This was in 721 B. C., when the siege of the city begun, three years earlier by the Assyrian King Shalmanezer, was brought to a successful issue by his successor, Sargon.

Indirect Rebuke.

Isaiah had watched the affairs of this Northern Kingdom with close scrutiny. He knew that it lay too near Jerusalem not to influence his countrymen powerfully. He perceived that its sins were the very ones from which Judah had most to fear. And as it is possible sometimes to reach men by denouncing, not them, but others, who are guilty of the same things, the prophets chose this method of warning other nations regarding the result of their doings, in hope that their words might be heeded at home. There is no hint that that large body of prophetic discourses recorded as the utterances of Amos, Micah, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel against the nations about them, was ever intended to be delivered to those nations, or that such messages were ever sent. It was for the prophets' own people that the words of warning were spoken.

Samaria.

The condemnation of Samaria's rulers in this lesson is graphic and scathing. It was the capital of the kingdom of Israel. It stood upon a hill, well fortified, beautifully situated, a very "crown of pride," towering above the valleys which ran out from it on all sides. Those "fat" valleys which were among the most fertile in Palestine. It had all the natural advantages of a strong city. It had been built by Amri, enriched by Ahab, and brought to its greatest glory by Jeroboam II. It had advantages of location far beyond those of Jerusalem. It was in the track of commerce, it was surrounded by an opulent country, and it was one of the most picturesque sites in the land. Its wealth and power were very great. Through most of the history of the two kingdoms it was the virtual overlord of Jerusalem. The kings of the latter were summoned as vassals in time of war, and compelled to supply their quota of troops to the army of Israel. Thus Jehosaphat was the forced ally of Ahab, and Ahaziah of Jehoram. If, swollen with pride as result of some petty victory over Edam and Amaziah tried to throw off the yoke of his master, Jehoash, he was speedily taught the lesson of submission by the loss of half his army and the dismantling of Jerusalem.

Popular Sin.

Yet in spite of this power, Isaiah saw that Samaria was tottering to her fall. Her natural resources were not less than of old, but her people were degenerating, and her princes were drunkards. Such a state could only be fatal when an enemy like Assyria lurked on the frontier with the greedy eyes of a beast waiting to spring upon its prey. Assyria was this "mighty and strong one, which as a tempest of hail and a destroying wind or a flood of mighty waters overflowing" was to shatter the power of the Northern capital. It was a city of revels. Not that all of its people were victims of riot and debauch, but the men to whom its leadership and defense were committed were of depraved habits. In their feasts they crowned their heads with the garlands of flowers which their rich gardens furnished in such luxuriance. But how quickly would all that short-lived beauty pass away when the enemy came. It would be like a fading flower, or a trampled wreath. Samaria was ripe for destruction, temptingly ripe. The loveliness of her situation, the greatness of her wealth, made her a fascinating prize for the Assyrian. He could no more resist the impulse to pick and devour this luscious fruit than an orchard visitor could refrain from eating the first ripe figs of the summer.

Drunken Leaders.

Not to such defenses as their beautiful situation, their drunken captains or their undefended walls could they look for safety. Their garlands of flowers would only be a mockery of their distress when the Assyrian trumpets sounded for the assault. God only could be a fitting refuge. His glory would be a garland that would not fade like the flowers. There might yet be time for deliverance, but not if they trusted in men. What they needed and what should insure safety was their return to God with whole hearts. When first judgment was given to the oppressed and sobriety reigned in the council chambers of the princes, then might they hope for strength in the day of batttle. Many things were wrong in the state, but one chief evil there was—drunkenness. No nation could exist long in such plight. Long afterward Wendel Philips was to utter the words, "no nation can survive half free and half enslaved," and still later to find telling paraphrase in the words of Gaugh, "no nation can survive half sober and half drunken." Isaiah's protests were never more timely than now. There are many dangers that threaten the state in our time. None of them compares with the danger from the drink habit. No wonder the nation is rousing itself to deal with the traffic as it deserves. The hope of the war is in the children. The French boys in the days before the revolution paraded the streets of Paris with banners bearing the words, "Tremble tyrants; we shall grow up." The next generation, now growing up, will deal with the liquor power as this one has been powerless to do. And the ability of that coming generation to sweep back the tide of destruction from our land will depend on constant temperance instruction in the day schools and the Sunday-schools. Every telling blow a teacher strikes in favor of a rum-free land, pure manhood and uncorrupted houses, will be multiplied as many fold as there are pupils in that class.

Jerusalem Also Condemned.

With a sudden turn to his own city, which must have staggered the corrupt politicians in his audience, Isaiah cries, "These too have erred through strong drink." It was of little avail to point out the sins of Samaria, now fast hastening to its doom. It was his own city and its welfare that filled the prophet's mind. Even the religious leaders, priests and prophets, stumbled in the common sin. Their gatherings were disgraced by excesses of drunkenness, their feasts were vile with the riot of debauch, and when Isaiah had reproved them as now, stinging them with his swift rebukes, they had resented it with indignation. They were no children, they said, to be instructed by another. For whom did he take them? Did he think they were infants who required the instruction of a teacher? Yet he was always prating in the same fashion. He never ceased to rebuke them for their enjoyments. His monotonous preaching was a weariness to them. It was line upon line, precept after precept, here some and there some more, till they were sick and tired of being told of their evil lives. It is generally so. People dislike words of rebuke. Saloonkeepers and patrons become weary to death of the constant denunciations of temperance workers. "Let us alone" has been the cry of every evil business since the swine-feeders of Gadara begged Jesus to depart out of their coasts.

The Coming Doom.

Yet there is no other way, unless the transgressors against decency prefer to await the sudden and overwhelming wave that shall sweep them away. Isaiah said to the men of Jerusalem, "You do not like my constant and monotonous teaching, very well God will send upon you the Assyrian, whose speech shall be rough and sharp, and whose rebukes you will be unable to despise. He will teach you with a discipline by the side of which my words have been but the mildest protests." If pleading will not avail, then something sharper must be tried. It is even so with the drink problem in America. The people who prefer sobriety and decency to the insignificant revenue which the state derives from the sale of intoxicants, are patient almost beyond belief. But their protests are becoming louder with each month, and it cannot be long before their united power of denunciation, instruction and ballots shall hurl the traffic back into the abyss from which it came. If it were possible to believe that this purpose is to be frustrated then we might well fear that our cities should fall as did Samaria of old through the sin of drunkenness and the consequent degeneracy of her people.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan.

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

LESSON IV. HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.—The Period of Organization.

I. THE PERIOD OF ORGANIZATION—BEGINNINGS. We come now to the period of Sunday-schools proper. Like all great moral and religious movements, this can be traced back to the example and inspiration of one man—Robert Raikes. There are a multitude of other claimants to this honor but these are mere curiosities of history, and whoever may have held schools on Sunday before him, to Raikes alone belongs the honor of making the Sunday-school idea effective as a great world-movement. He was a native of Gloucester, England, and was first awakened to the need of providing Sunday instruction for the young by seeing the poor children of his city roaming the streets, uncared for and undisciplined on Sunday afternoons. His first Sunday-school was opened in the year 1780 in the house of a Mrs. King. Four lady teachers were employed at a small salary, and the instruction was in reading and the church of England Catechism, the "secular" element predominating. There was both a morning and an afternoon session, and church attendance was required. "I endeavor to assemble the children as early as consistent with their perfect cleanliness,—an indispensable rule; tne hour prescribed in our rules is eight o'clock; but it is usually half after eight before our flock is collected. Twenty is the number alloted to each teacher; the sexes are kept separate. The twenty are divided into four classs. The children who show any superiority in attainment are placed as leaders in their several classes, and are employed in teaching the others their letters, or in hearing them read in a low whisper." (Letter from Robert Raikes, 1787.)

II. EARLY DEVELOPMENTS. The idea embodied in Raikes' work was too vital to remain merely local, and within a very short time similar schools sprang up elsewhere, which proved so successful that in 1785, or only five years from the opening of the school in Gloucester the first step toward unifying the movement was taken in the organizing of the "Society for Promoting Sunday-schools throughout the British Dominions. Two years later the movement had grown to such proportions that it included 250,000 children. During these years and for some time afterward the schools were individual rather than church ventures, and were designed to supplement the defective system of secular education for the poorer classes rather than to provide religious education as such. At first the teachers were paid, but this was later found to be a clog on the movement and was gradually abandoned.

III. BEGINNINGS IN AMERICA. The Sunday-school idea took early and firm root in American soil. Within a few years quite a number of schools were organized in different parts of the country, notably in Virginia and Connecticut. As in England they were individual enterprises; but in 1790 the first step was taken towards affiliating the movement with the churches when the Methodist Conference of South Carolina formally adopted the school, and, concurrently with this, the old system of paid teachers began to give way to the voluntary system now in vogue. Another change which took place about this time and with which the name of Dr. Lyman Beecher is associated, was the beginning of the attendance of the "upper classes" on the Sunday-school.

IV. AMERICAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION. The first attempt at organization was made in the establishment of the "First Day or Sunday-school Society of Philadelphia" in 1791, for the purpose of establishing Sunday-schools for the poor children of that city. This was the forerunner of quite a number of similar unions, local in character which sprang up in various parts of the Northern and Eastern States, but the union idea did not become really effective until 1824 when the American Sunday-school Union was organized in Philadelphia. This Union is still in existence and in spite of its eighty-four years continues to be one of the most widely effective Sunday-school organizations in the world. Its objects are four, namely, "to concentrate the efforts of Sunday-school societies in different portions of the country; to disseminate useful information; circulate moral and religious publications in every part of the land, and endeavor to plant a Sunday-school wherever there is a population." This society has been the pioneer in the department of Sunday-school literature. As early as 1826 it originated the idea of selected uniform lessons now so closely associated with the work of the great International Association. Among the books published by this society and distributed at a nominal cost for the behoof of needy schools, have been bibles, primers, spelling books, hymn books and tracts, together with innumerable lesson-helps for teachers and scholars. The famous "Sunday-school World" is one of its current publications. To this society is also due the introduction of the library feature into Sunday-school work.

(2). MISSISSIPPI VALLEY ENTERPRISE AND STEPHEN PAXSON. In pursuance of the last or missionary part of its aim the American Sunday-school Union took immediate steps toward planting schools in needy portions of the country, especially in the Western states. In 1829 Cincinnati was made the headquarters of this Western development scheme, and from that centre missionaries were sent out for the purpose of organizing a school within two years in every destitute place in the Mississippi valley. Great success attend this effort and it remains one of the landmarks of Sunday-school history. One of its heroes was Stephen Paxson, who had himself been won to a religious life through one of the schools founded by the society at Winchester, Ill. The story of his life reads like a romance, and deserves to rank with the great missionary biographies of the world. From his home in Pike county, Ill., where he had moved his family in order to cut expenses, separated for days and weeks from his family, he traversed the country in his horse and buggy speaking, organizing, instructing, making out reports, ordering literature from headquarters, at the pittance of one dollar a day for every day of work. Later his salary was raised and the nature of his work changed, but during these years of pioneer work he is said to have "organized 1,314 Sunday-schools, with 83,405 scholars and teachers, where no Sunday-schools had before existed, besides encouraging and aiding 1,747 other Sunday-schools." The West has never lost the impetus given to Sunday-school work by his years of service.

THE PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

Topic November 25: "Enjoying Ministerial Things." Deut. 8:7-14; 1 Tim. 4:4-5.

There are many sayings of Jesus which may seem to be inconsistent with the belief that a Christian ought to enjoy material things. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." "Woe unto you that are rich." "Blessed are ye poor." "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth." "For a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." "Thou foolish one, this night is thy soul required of thee; and the things which thou hast prepared, whose shall they be?" Lord Bacon helped to give currency to the conceit that prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament and adversity is the blessing of the New. In no part of the Bible is it taught that a man should give heed to the advice, "Get money, honestly if you can, but get money." The Old Testament saints were not all rich and comfortable nor were the New Testament men whom Jesus commended all poor. Jesus called men to the highest life. "Seek ye first his kingdom." As long as material things are subject to spiritual uses, Christians may enjoy them. Treason to our Lord occurs when we put comfort above principle. There is nothing praiseworthy in sacrifice that is not for spiritual ends.

Many great peoples have been brought to ruin by prosperity. They have displayed marvelous energy and foresight in wresting from hard conditions the right to live a life complete only to fall victims to tyrannous lusts and ambitions as soon as they had attained economic freedom. Poverty compels men to honor certain of the virtues. They must practice self-restraint or perish. The wealthy peoples can put off the evil day and they do put it off if they are ignorant enough not to know that sin is destructive. It is easier for some to feel their dependence upon God while their possessions are small. In times of prosperity they trust in themselves. Israel cried unto Jehovah out of the depths of poverty and servitude and forgot him when ease and comfort came. Rich America must deliberately bring the austere into her life or she will perish. The difficult tasks imposed by adversity must now be matters of free choice. If the wealth of America is employed to spread the gospel throughout all the earth, if American citizens enjoy their abundance only as it goes to promote the highest welfare of all, then the land will remain free. But if there is no vision of the kingdom of God, if the eternal hope is smothered in material things, then America will be the shame of the nations. Her wealth will sink her to the lowest depths of sin or it will be the means of the world's redemption.

Material things cannot be fully enjoyed by one who thinks they are absolutely his own. The fields yielding grains and fruits, and the mines rich in silver and gold, iron and coal, are the gifts of God. The foolish man imagines that by his own strong arm and by his great wisdom he has acquired economic power and dignity. He has no sense of obligation to God or man. The joy of gratitude is incomprehensible to him. Songs of praise to God are meaningless jargon to his ear. He despises the poetry that expresses the affection of man to man. An outburst of generous emotion is answered by him with a cynical smile. He cannot look forward and rejoice in the progress of unborn peoples. His life is poor and mean. He cannot sing of the eternal goodness.

"If he hath hidden the outcast, or let in
A ray of sunshine to the cell of sin;
If he hath lent
Strength to the weak, and, in an hour of need,
Over the suffering, mindless of his creed
Or home, hath bent;

He has not lived in vain, and while he gives
The praise to Him, in whom he moves and lives,
With thankful heart;
He gazes backward, and with hope before,
Knowing that from his works he nevermore
Can henceforth part."

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett.

Do you regard the testimony of Jesus as final and sufficient upon all matters on which he taught?

Kansas City. F. M. B.

Yes, if the questioner has stated his inquiry just as he wishes it answered. There can be no doubt in the mind of any reverent student of the New Testament that on the themes regarding which it was our Saviour's purpose to give instruction his words are final and authoritative.

But lest there should be doubt as to the precise limits of the question, it is well to go further with the inquiry. It would fall naturally into two divisions. (1). Was Jesus omniscient? (2). If he was, might he still use the law of accommodation, employing the common language and ideas of the age to make his teachings more easily understood?

(1). It is natural for us to think of our Lord as possessed of complete knowledge. He was so fully the master of himself, of the men about him and of the ages, that such a view of his nature seems both logical and necessary. Yet there are certain facts which must be kept in mind. First, Jesus never claimed to be omniscient. He did claim complete authority over men, but universal knowledge he nowhere named as his own. Second, he distinctly disclaimed knowledge of the future on one classic occasion at least, when the question was raised as to the time of the end. His words were, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels of heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." (Matt. 24: 36). Third. It seems at first glance a reverent and believing attitude to insist upon our Lord's omniscience. But one is compelled to ask himself, Does not this insistence come dangerously near the point at which Jesus is robbed of the reality of his human experience in the interest of the honor supposed to be due him? May not that very limitation of knowledge suggested both by his words and his silence be a part of the gracious ministry of self-renunciation in virtue of which he "became like unto his brethren"?

(2). We know but little of the mental processes of Jesus. In fact our interpretation of our own way of thinking is very partial as yet. Psychology is still in its youth. How should we expect to pronounce with finality upon the unique mind of our Lord? Yet aware of the danger of dogmatism, and with fitting hesitence, let us face the second question. If Jesus was omniscient, might he not employ the ordinary language and ideas of his time to enforce the truths he was teaching? Did Jesus in his references to nature, to the history of his nation, to the Scriptures of the Old Testament, feel the obligation to correct common misconceptions on such minor points as scientific and historical details, or on such matters as the dates and authorship of Old Testament books? It is easy to say that he must have done so, and that if he permitted himself to vary from the absolute fact, his authority as a teacher is invalidated. But against this partial view we have his entire method as a teacher, and the plain statements regarding the things he taught.

He did not come among men to remove their erroneous views regarding nature, history or literature. These matters may well be left to human investigation, and our Lord had a vastly more important work to do. To have spent his time correcting popular errors regarding nature and the writings of the past would have left him no time for the essential work of his life. Even to have mentioned such matters in casual ways would have diverted the thought of his hearers from the great things of the kingdom he was endeavoring to make clear to them. It is hard enough to make men concern their minds with first-rank truths by total concentration of appeal, without any intrusion of second-rate themes. Jesus used the model method of centering everything upon his one great purpose, and in so doing he employed the common language and beliefs of his time in the popular sense. To have done otherwise would have been fatal to his purpose.

When he said that the queen of the South came "from the ends of the earth" to visit Solomon (Lu. 11: 31), he used the language of the age. That the phrase involved the error of a flat earth, and is wholly inapplicable to the world as we know it, is perfectly clear. Yet Jesus did not hesitate to use it. To have set right the unscientific views of his age upon that matter would have been to wholly divert attention from the truth he was stating, and to throw into hopeless confusion the thought of his unprepared listeners. It was quite enough of a shock to them to be told that they beheld in him the teacher from Galilee, "a greater than Solomon," their wisest king. Nor is it any adequate response to say that he might employ the language in a figurative sense, as we do today. It is perfectly evident that our use of any such term is accepted as figurative by both speaker and hearer. We may employ the shell of a discredited belief as a figure of speech, but always with assumption that no one is deceived by it. No such claim could be made for the phrase as used by Jesus.

Similarly when Jesus spoke of the Father as making his sun "to rise on the evil and the good" (Matt. 5:45), he employed the unscientific language of his time. Did he thereby commit himself to the since-discredited geocentric view of nature? Must we suppose that he thereby lent his sanction to the theory that the sun actually moves about the earth, so valiantly defended by tradition from the days of the Ptolemists to John Jasper, the colored preacher of Richmond? It was with such arguments that the schoolmen at Salamanca attempted to silence Columbus when he pleaded for the newer view. They said that if the authority of Jesus was to be questioned at one point, it failed everywhere. Yet that view of nature and of the words of Christ is today as dead as its authors and defenders.

If there is one conclusion of modern historical study of the Bible more generally accepted than another, it is that the Book of Daniel is a Maccabaean writing of the second century B. C., whose unknown author employed the figure of an earlier prophet as the oracle of his hopes for the immediate future. The view that the book was the work of the Daniel who is described in it has now been abandoned not only by constructive biblical scholarship, but even by the champions of conservatism. Professor Franz Delitzsch, who maintained his stout conservatism till the evidence in favor of the historical view convinced him at the very close of his life, wrote of the Book of Daniel that, "if this book does not date from the Maccabean times, there is no such thing as a history of the Hebrew language." Professor Sayce, who wrote "Higher Criticism and the Monuments" at the request of a group of orthodox defenders of the Conservative views to attempt the disproof of literary criticism by archæological data, accepted the late date of Daniel in the very volume he was writing, in words which brought astonished protests from the trustees of the fund which employed him. And Professor Zahn, the leader of the Conservative school in Germany, has made clear the futility of the protest against the late date of the book. Yet our Lord quotes the statement regarding the anticipated defiling of Jerusalem as "spoken of by Daniel, the prophet" (Matt. 24:15.) Are we therefore to suppose that the Master has given his sanction to an authorship and date, or that he was using the language in the accepted sense in which his age would have employed it? Does unreflective eagerness to maintain the validity of Christ's language at all points wish to commit iteslf to the fatal claim that Daniel is an authentic work of the prophet, or else that Jesus is discredited as a teacher sent from God?

But where those beliefs conflicted with the ideals of the Kingdom of God, he attacked them with relentless severity. His concern was with first-rank things alone. For them he reserved his strength, and for these first-rank things his authority and authenticating witness may likewise well be reserved.

ers who followed each other, this searching question. The Disciples have scarcely realized how troubling to Baptists this misconception of the position of the Disciples has been. Dr. Crandall made perfectly clear the ground of Baptist fear of the Disciples. And well may they fear if the Disciples hold any such superstition as that the Divine favor rests upon the performance of a ceremony. That would be heathenism pure and simple. Kant has declared: "Everything outside of a good life by which a man supposes he can make himself well-pleasing to God is superstition." According to this test there is quite as much superstition in the Protestant position of the saving efficacy of good doctrine and correct ceremony as in the Roman Catholic position of the saving efficacy of good works and the worship of relics. So long as there is a lingering remnant of belief among the Disciples that baptism is necessary to salvation, so long will the impression be made, and rightly, on the outside world that they believe in baptismal regeneration. The Baptists can not render the Disciples a more useful service than to help them smite this superstition hip and thigh.

Dr. Sanders on Unity.

The discussion of "Christ's Prayer for Unity," at the closing session on Thursday afternoon, steadily rose in convincing power and fervor through the addresses by Rev. A. W. Jefferson (Free Baptist) of Portland, Maine, and by Rev. Vernon Stauffer, (Disciple) of Angola, Ind., and reached a thrilling climax in the inspiring utterance of Dr. Henry M. Sanders of New York, chairman of the Executive Committee of the Baptist Congress. It was due in very large measure to the catholic spirit of Dr. Sanders that the Disciples were given equal participation with the Baptists in the program of this Congress.

Dr. Sanders said: "Can any one in his senses believe that the present condition of Christendom is pleasing to Christ and in accordance with his mind and prayer? Who does not feel that our separations and sectarianism and alienations are most deplorable and disastrous? Who is not infinitely weary of the old acrimonious battles over jots and tittles, iotas and prepositions, tithing mint, anise and cummin, and forgetting the weightier matters of the law, to say nothing of the gospel? Who is not disgusted at the zeal to proselyte that is out of all proportion to the zeal to Christianize? Who that knows his New Testament does not see that heresy there does not mean aberration of opinion but the recklessness of faction, and that therefore the worst of all heresies is the heresy of hatred, that odium which to our eternal shame has acquired the distinctive title 'theologicum.' And all the while that we are disputing and wrangling about the uncertain, and almost always about the infinitely unimportant, the enemy is at our gates.

"Perhaps we can not hope to see the end of our divisions for a long time to come. But all we have to do is to go on as we have been doing in recent years and it will come about before we know it. For that matter you cannot stop. You can't prevent that which God in his good and gracious providence is pushing on with powerful pressure. You might as well try to stop time elapsing by tying the pendulum, or think to prevent the sunrise by wringing the neck of the cock that announces it. But we can, in our day and generation have a lot and part in this great matter. We cannot refuse any longer to encourage it, to tolerate it. To all fostering party spirit, perpetuating party rancor, we can cry out in the indignant protest of the aposle: 'Has Christ been parcelled into fragments?' Oh, my brethren, do your best and utmost, I beseech you, in every possible way to break down the barriers between Christ's people. Let us never cease to be pained and penitent about this sin of separation. Let us protest against them, let us repudiate them. They should not be. The church left the heart and hands of Christ, one in inward spirit and in outward order, and we should never rest content until that condition is restored. To my mind ecclesiastical separation is schism and sin. The present condition of the church of Christ is directly opposed to every purpose and principle made known to us in the New Testament. The church ought to be one externally. All who are in Christ, should be ecclesiastically united. Every other arrangement is a rending of the body of Christ. Those who are one with Him in spirit ought to be one with Him and with one another in body. There can be nothing more sad and few things more hopeless than the excuses and extenuations which men give for the present disordered, unfriendly, even antagonistic condition of the church, and seek to justify the unhappy and disastrous divisions, even going so far as to advocate the ridiculous idea that the cause of Christ is helped forward by rivalries of numberless sects.

"Oh, I pray you, set your face against all such captious, specious arguments for a divided Christendom. 'Speak, exhort, rebuke with all authority,' those who still stand out against this clear and urgent duty of the Christian brotherhood. Be willing to make any concessions, yielding any prejudice, defy any trivial tradition, ignore any incidental difference, if only we can hasten even in the slightest degree, the time when all who love our Lord, Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth, may be brought together, and the whole church of God be one, as our Lord prayed it should be."

Drs. Goodchild, Dodd and Sanders.

Can the Disciples doubt that here is one more Baptist who believes in Christian union and is not afraid to say so? They are an increasing cloud of witnesses in the Baptist brotherhood. What clear, ringing tones run through Dr. Sanders' address! Three Baptists—Drs. Goodchild, Dodd and Sanders—have done more during the last year by their addresses at Baltimore, Bloomington and Chicago, to renew the hope of a union between Baptists and Disciples, than all the conferences and committees on union during the last ten years.

Permanent Joint Congress.

At the close of the first session on Tuesday afternoon, a meeting of all who were interested in continued congresses of Baptists and Disciples was called, and Dr. A. G. Lawson, of New York, on behalf of the executive committee of the Baptist Congress, presented the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That we most heartily approve the election of Disciples and Free Baptist ministers to membership in the executive committee, which has already resulted in the enlargement of our programme for this congress.

"Resolved, That in order to unite the Disciples congress with our own we request their executive committee in conference with our own executive committee to take immediate steps to perfect such a union."

At a separate meeting of the Disciples in attendance at the congress, the following resolutions, addressed to the Baptist committee, were adopted:

Resolved:

1. That we (Disciples of Christ) express our deep appreciation of the large fraternity and Christian courtesy of the executive committee of the Baptist Congress in opening the programme of [illegible] receiving them to

Psycho-Therapy

The session on Psycho-therapy was well attended and proved one of the most interesting sessions of the series. All speakers agreed on the fact of psycho-therapy. That Christian Science, Dowie, Catholic shrines and such enterprises had produced cures in the past was generally conceded. The real crux of the discussion was on the question whether psycho-therapy was a function of the church. A. B. Philputt, of Indianapolis, insisted that the innovation was a dangerous one. It would lead to the neglect of the more spiritual functions of the Christian ministry. He believed that in many cases quackery had developed and that there was always a strong temptation to take fees, which, he said would become fixed like "the ministerial graft in wedding an point of view was th a science and not a rel physicians should hav functions and they sh in college. Side Lights on Serious Problems

As Seen From a Busy Pastor's Study.

The pastor's study has just been made pleasant by the presence of two visitors. It is always a matter of joy to receive those who come seeking fellowship and good cheer or perchance a word of advice and helpfulness. Both of these recent visitors came with difficulties, concerning which they desired to speak with the pastor, in the hope that he could give them a solution to their problems. Our life has been made richer by their coming, and we trust that some help was taken away by them.

The first of these to call is a worthy and able minister of the Word. His trouble is of a two-fold nature—he has a domestic sorrow and this sorrow is deepened by poverty. It is the latter fact which makes us most serious, for the former one will come about all right, but for the latter we see little hope of relief. This preacher has been a faithful servant for thirty years. He is now fifty years of age. His hair is white—made so by heavy burdens. He has made untold sacrifices for the advancement of the kingdom. He has served weak churches because he saw the need, when he might have had a larger field. He has been penniless at times and his wife and children have gone hungry. While he has served some strong churches, yet he never received more than a thousand dollars a year. He has a large family, and children that need an education. He is receiving a bare living at the present time. He can hope for little more in the future, for he has already reached the cruel limit which we call the "dead line" (what an irony), a limit that comes all too soon in the preacher's life.

Do not these facts make us think seriously? These perplexing questions press for an answer, which answers the pastor is totally unable to give. What is to become of this hero of the cross and his heroine, when they are old? The very churches for which they gave the best days of their strong, young lives will not receive them as their ministers, then. Who is to give to him as he has given to others? He needs money now and he comes to ask the pastor, his friend, to loan him a small amount for awhile. It is a pleasure to help him; but what of the humiliation to his sensitive soul, to have to ask help? He has paid every debt that he ever incurred, but has the church paid him the great debt which she owes him? If he were to refuse to pay his honest debts what would the church think of him? What must he think in the coming years of a church which refuses to pay him what is honestly due him? He is only one of a great, great number who are wrestling with the same problem, as nearly every minister who reads these words can testify. Will it ever be different? We ask the laymen to answer.

The second visitor has a different problem with which he is perplexed. He is a young man—just turning into his twentieth year. He has the vigor and bloom of youth. He is endowed with an excellent body, good mind and fine appearance. He is a graduate of High School and has had one term in college. He is spiritually minded and has high ideals. He is poor in worldly goods but has a rich inheritance of body and mind. He has already demonstrated that he can succeed in the business world.

He is trying to answer the question, whether or not he shall enter the ministry, and comes for advice on this all important question. If he decides to devote his life to the preaching of the Gospel, he must spend at least six more years in preparation in order to be thoroughly prepared. He will lose some time in making money to pay his expenses so that he will be well on to twenty-eight years of age before he takes a pastorate. That means that he is to spend eight years more and at least two thousand dollars in getting ready. In these eight years he can be well established in the business world and in all probability have accumulated some of this world's goods. And when he is ready to begin his work of preaching he must labor for a while, at least, on a meagre salary, and he never can hope to earn any large income. But what is more serious and important, his parents oppose his becoming one of the messengers of the good news. And strange as it may seem, the father is an officer of the church, and it was certain ideas received from parents that caused the conscientious son to consider the putting of these ideas into practice. But the father wants his son to make money. Let others attend to the extension of the kingdom.

Now in the face of these conditions and in the light of the experience of our first seeker of help who has been so recently in the same study, what is the pastor to advise? Shall he tell this earnest soul to go on with his business career and there live the Christian life and give of his earnings to the support of others who may choose to preach? There is need of a high type of minister among us, and many of them; here is a young man who gives promise of becoming just such a minister; but these same qualifications will give him larger returns, in terms of worldly things, elsewhere; shall the pastor advise him to use his talents elsewhere? Or shall he be advised to take upon himself the same life of poverty as has been the lot of our first caller? What would you have advised? And what is more, would you be willing to follow your own advice? You may be anxious to know what the pastor did. Suffice it to say that he laid before the young man, as nearly as possible, all the advantages and disadvantages of the preacher's life and urged the young man to fit himself for the paramount work of preaching the Gospel of the Son of God to a dying world. The pastor wonders, after all is said, if these two experiences shed any light on our need of more and better ministers.

his brief and particularly helpful sentence sermons have given satisaction to many readers. The chapters in this book were most of them published in the Sunday edition of the same newspaper under the title "A Sermon for Today." Among the themes treated are, "The Higher Levels," "Invisible Allies," "The Sovereignty of Service," "The Right to Happiness," "The Price of Success," and "Does He Care?" The message of the book is one of encouragement, and its chapters are full of bits of wisdom and inspiration which any attentive reader will prize.

This is one of the volumes in the Westminster New Testament, edited by Professor Garvie of New College, London. It is a modest volume, less elaborate but more practical than the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges. The treatment is conservative and constructive.

THE DAWN AT SHANTY BAY

By Robert E. Knowles, Author "St. Cuthberts" and "The Undertow"

CHAPTER VIII.

The Doctor's Verdict.

The changing scene had little charm for Ronald this late autumn day as he gazed from the doctor's window upon the busy street of the near-by city. The vehicles of commerce rumbled on their way, resplendent carriages told of wealth and station as they hurried by, and innumerable pedestrians jostled one another in selfish haste—but Ronald stared through the window with unseeing eyes.

For his heart was in an adjoining room, to which, taking Mildred with him, the famous specialist had retired, bidding Ronald wait for their return. Meantime the lonely man employed himself in retrospect; before his mind there passed all that had filled the months since that eventful Christmas eve when first he had looked on Mildred's face—and now snowflakes could be seen drifting here and there in the already wintry air. The summer had been so sweet. Sweet had it been with its genial sunshine and fragrant flowers and balmy air and abundant harvest; but more precious far than these had been the welfare of those he loved. His wife had been restored to fullness of health, beautiful again with the peachlike bloom that had enriched her earlier years—laughter had come back to cheek and lip and eye. And Mildred had filled all their sky with light. Fragile and delicate though she was, her beauty of face and form, joined to spiritual loveliness and charm of soul, had been an ever-deepening joy to the lonely hearts that now claimed her for their own. Tender, affectionate, even heavenly-minded, with the sweet yearning for the Better Land where her mother watched and waited, the child had tarried among them like an angel of light, and Ronald had come to cherish her with a consuming love.

But all through the golden summer something like anguish flowed about Ronald's heart. For Mildred did not gather strength, except of soul; the treacherous pink upon her cheek deepened amid the encircling pallor, the dainty appetite grew more fastidious still, the cruel cough continued, and the morning found the golden tresses more often damp and cold with the dreaded moisture of the night.

And now Ronald had come to consult the far-famed authority of the city. How slow he is! thought the suffering man, as he turned from the window toward a table whereon lay a pile of books and magazines. The restless hand had scattered them again, the third or fourth attack, when the door opened, and Ronald heard the doctor's voice:

"You sit in this chair, dear. Come in, Mr. Robertson."

Ronald was a strong man, but he staggered a little as he passed within, his eyes searching for the doctor's as the latter closed the door behind him. Only a few words were spoken, very few, and then Ronald came back to where Mildred was waiting, his face as white as death, his lips drawn and dry, while his eyes seemed to fix themselves anywhere except upon the little bundle in the chair.

Mechanically he helped her to put on her wraps, the doctor discoursing genially the while upon deep breathing, and sea-salt baths in the morning, his counsel falling like so much idle prattle upon Ronald's ears. And as the latter passed without the door he turned and shook hands with the smiling doctor, almost smiling himself at the unnaturalness of the act. Then he walked dumbly down the street, Mildred swinging by his arm as she gazed this way and that at the myriad wonders of the city.

(Copyright, 1907, by Fleming H. Revell Co.)

"I'm tired," the child said presently; "don't let us walk any more."

The words cut his heart now like a knife, though he had often heard them before.

"Say, 'I'm tired, daddy,'" his words coming thick.

"Oh, yes; I always forget, don't I—dear old daddy," said the child; "you look tired too."

Ronald hailed a carriage and they drove rapidly to the station. Once in the car, the little one soon fell asleep, her head pillowed on Ronald's arm; and he ate the bitter herbs of sorrow as he gazed down on the unconscious face. The dusk was about them when she awoke.

"I've had such a lovely dream," she said as she sat upright.

"Did ye, Mildred?" said Ronald. "What was it?" he asked, smiling bravely, though some strange fear possessed him.

"I saw my mother," she began with the simplicity of childhood. "I dreamed I did, you know—and she looked so happy, and everything was beautiful—only she said she was lonely without me. And I said how beautiful everything was, and she said: 'Mildred, aren't you lonely too?'—and I didn't know what to say. Then she said, 'I want you, Mildred,' or 'darling,' or some name like that. And I said I'd come if you'd come too, daddy—perhaps I knew I was sleeping on your lap. And she was just taking me in her arms when I woke up. Don't look like that, daddy—you musn't look like that—why, you're crying," and the pale hand went up impulsively to banish the offending tears.

"It's naethin', lassie,"—the husky voice told how much. "Only I cudna dae wantin' ye."

Mildred was looking out of the window at the scurrying landscape. "Wouldn't it be wonderful," she began slowly, "if I really had to go—and would you come, too, daddy, if I really had to? It was beautiful—would you go, too?" turning her face up to his as she pressed the childish question.

Ronald's averted face bore witness to the storm within as he pretended to pick up the little coat that had fallen to the floor.

"We're a' but hame," he said.

But Mildred asked again: "Would you go too, daddy?"

"Aye, aye," he answered quickly, in a voice that sounded far away; "aye, lassie, I'd like fine to gang." And as they descended amid the fast falling snow, his heavy heart said to him that it were well indeed, were he and his treasures but safe beyond, where Everlasting Spring abides.

The passing days had brought to Ronald and his wife, so far as Mildred was concerned, at least, only ever deepening anxiety. Colder weather had set in, and very welcome was the resounding fire by which Ronald and Mary Robertson were seated this November night.

"She's sleepin'—but I'm feart there's some fever aboot her," the foster-father said, as he returned from the room where the little sleeper lay.

Mary Robertson laid down her knitting. "Ronald," she began earnestly, "we've tried one specialist near here, why shouldn't we take Mildred to New York? We could see some great doctor there—and he might help her." A little more special pleading followed, but Ronald maintained a portentous silence. Finally he spoke. "Mary, lass, div ye think I dinna ken what ye're after? Ye ken fine it's no' a doctor can cure oor little yin. But ye think ye'd mebbe see yir—ye ken wha ye think ye'd mebbe see i' New York. And I winna gang—I tell't ye afore as ——"

"But, father," his wife broke in, "surely you don't blame a mother for—oh, father, if you only knew! I've watched and ——" the rest was lost in the outburst of grief that she could not restrain.

"I had a letter from Hugh today," the mother went on as soon as she could control herself, "and my prayer's been answered—partly answered, father; he says he's got the victory at last. He says he fought it out with help from above, and he's won his fight."

"Did he gie ye his address?" Ronald broke in eagerly. "What's the guid o' talkin' if ye dinna ken where he bides?"

"No—no, he didn't," the woman began slowly, "but he gets my letters—he goes to the postoffice, and ——"

"I only thocht we micht send him a wee bit help—no' that he deserves it, mind ye. But that ither—what he ca'ed me—neabody can mend that but himsel'. There's nae guid o' buildin' on the sand; the Bible itsel' tells us no to dae that," and Ronald set his lips in final determination, his face showing how vivid was his memory of the outrage that still rankled in his heart. "There's sic a thing as the fifth commandment," he added, in final justification of his attitude.

His wife's sweet face was very tender as she looked up. "But there's a new commandment, father! And we're bidden seek the wandering. You took in the little wanderer that we've come to love so well, and she's brought her own reward; so I thought we might go and seek our very own," her eyes filling again with the words, "and I know God would help us find him, father. Couldn't we watch the postoffice?" she said in pathetic hopefulness.

Ronald rose to his feet, coming closer to his wife, his hand resting on her bended head.

"Mary, I'd lay doon my life for ye—but I'll no' gang there. I'm sufferin' tae—but I'm standin' for a principle, for the richt, as I see the richt. He maun come back like ony ither prodigal—he maun confess his sin," and the stern lips closed in decisive tightness.

The old clock ticked drearily on its way while a long silence reigned. Ronald suddenly broke it. "Mary," and his voice was significant, "I've got summat to tell ye—look up, lass."

"Yes, Ronald," the head uplifted slightly.

"I'm gaein' awa'; I'm gaein' Thursday morn. Ye mind how vexed we was when the word cam aboot the Sanitarium bein' crooded full, an' they said we cudna get the bairn in till spring. Weel, Ephraim gied me some news the day. I'll tell't till ye. He's got a freen wha runs a lumber camp a lang way north—the doctor says it's juist as guid air as the Sanitarium. An' if I gang wi' the bairn, he'll gie us the foreman's wee hoose; we'll tak oor meals at the camp, ye ken. An' mebbe it'll cure her yet," he concluded, sighing.

"Where is it, Ronald? Where is this lumber camp?"

"It's at Shanty Bay; it's a bonnie spot, they say. An' Ephraim says he'll come up himsel' later on," gladness in the tone.

Far into the night they talked, the unselfish wife sharing eagerly in the plan, though it meant long lonely weeks at home for her.

"We must do the best we can, Ronald," she said as they stood together looking down upon the dew-damped face; "and we're all just God's little children after all."

"Aye," said the strong man, struggling with his voice; "aye, we're a' in oor Faither's hands."

CHAPTER IX.

Pilgrims of the Night.

It was once again the day before Christmas; how different from the last, Ronald could not but think as he looked out from the cozy cabin upon the scene that stretched before him at Shanty Bay. The spacious lumber camp built of rough logs, was little more than a hundred yards away, its snow-clad roof relieved only by the out-jutting stovepipe from which the smoke seemed to be tossed so merrily, as if conscious of the wealth of pork and beans, of pies and doughnuts, of bannocks and of buns, offspring of the cook's creative genius, and but for which that billowy smoke had never been.

A few husky toilers could be seen moving between the stables and the shanty, or wending their way toward the smithy whose cheery music rang through the echoing woods. Very picturesque did they appear, with their stockinged legs or red-topped boots, and with flaming mufflers around their waists, some with axes and others with cant hooks in their hands, while others were guiding glossy teams toward the forest shadows that were to swallow them up till the deeper darkness of the night should call them forth.

Ephraim, who had, according to promise, arrived a week before, was standing at Ronald's side as both looked out upon the wintry scene, the snow-floored lake beyond stretching away to the amphitheatrical wooded hills that rose in crescent stateliness around it.

"That's a sight for your life," pronounced Ephraim.

"Aye, it's a bonnie place, is Shanty Bay," agreed his friend. "Where's the wee girlie?"

"She's on the upper balcony, snug as a bug in a rug. All wrapped up warm and cozy—she's gainin', sure enough," Ephraim added, looking jubilantly into Ronald's eyes. "She says she's going for a little walk this mornin'."

Ronald answered with a smile. Smiles came so easily now; the dread disease had certainly been arrested, yielding to the magic air of this wondrous North.

"It's you that cove wants," Ephraim said suddenly.

"Wha?" asked Ronald.

"That feller out there; he sees you. Don't you see him beckonin'? Come on out—I'm goin' up to the roll-way."

Seizing cap and mittens, Ronald walked to the end of the veranda, the man moving forward to meet him. He was carrying a heavy logging-chain.

"I wanted a word with you alone," he began abruptly; "is it true your name's Robertson—Ronald Robertson? I only began work here yesterday—but one of the teamsters told me."

"Aye, that's what I maistly gangs by—what's yir ain name?"

"That don't cut any ice," replied the other, grinning; "anyhow it's Sam—Sam's enough. Is the name of your place Cloverhill Farm?"

"Aye; that was the name, tae, o' the farm my faither was hired on i' Scotland," rejoined Ronald.

"Then I know your son, your son Hugh—in New York."

Ronald's face looked gray as he stepped, almost leaped, nearer to the man.

"What's that ye're sayin'?"

"I know Hugh, I say—boarded in the same house in New York."

Poor Ronald's voice was shaking. "Is the laddie weel?" he asked with almost passionate eagerness.

"You bet. The last time I saw him, he did me an awful good turn—got a heart like an ox. He was well enough, all right."

WITH THE WORKERS

J. M. Lowe is conducting a meeting in Agra, Kansas. This is his second meeting there.

There was one addition last Sunday at Salt Lake City where Dr. Albert Buxton preaches.

The church at Hoopeston, Illinois, has recalled their pastor, L. R. Hotaling, for an indefinite period. There have been 339 additions for the past year and the present membership is 838.

The meeting which N. M. Ragland is holding with his own church in Springfield, Missouri, is drawing to a close. There have been two additions. He has been assisted in the music by Charles McVay.

H. C. Holmes, of Lawrenceville, Illinois, spoke to a neighboring Y. M. C. A. recently. The local paper in writing up the meeting speaks in the most eulogistic way of the address. The subject was, "The Measure of a Man."

Good news comes from the church at Marceline, Mo., where F. M. Cummings is pastor. Seven were added to the membership on a recent Sunday, six of them by primary obedience. The church is making extensive repairs on its building.

The church at Galesburg, Illinois, is in a meeting under the leadership of their pastor, J. A. Barnett. He is assisted in the music by Wm. Leigh. The meeting had been running for two weeks at our last report and 22 had been added to the church. Both pastor and singer are much in favor with the people.

T. L. Read is holding a meeting with his own church at Chapin, Illinois. He is assisted in the music by J. Wade Seniff. Large audiences are in attendance each evening. Our report states that when the meeting was five days old twelve had been added to the church. The outlook for a great gospel harvest is promising.

There was one addition at Fitzgerald, Ga., last Lord's day and one at an evening service of the state convention held there. E. Everett Hollingsworth is the pastor of the church.

The Ladies' Glee Club of Eureka College will sing in the First Church of Springfield under the auspices of the King's Daughters circle on December 10. A Ladies' Glee Club from a college is sufficiently unusual that they will surely be greeted everywhere with appreciative audiences.

Rev. James M. Gray, D. D., dean of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, teaches an interdenominational Bible Class of about 1,500 members each week in Grand Rapids, Michigan. This class, composed of representatives of all the churches, is held in the old Opera House, now the headquarters of Melville Trotter's great rescue mission work in that city.

Permit me to congratulate you upon the recent issues of the Christian Century and to prophesy for the paper a larger success under the new management.

The particular feature for which I wish to thank you is the "Correspondence on the Religious Life," edited by George A. Campbell.. Always have I read with thankful heart his splendid deliverances in the past and must say that I consider his page alone worth the price of the paper. It seems to me that he is peculiarly fitted for just such work and I know of no man in our ranks who seems capable of treating such subjects as he handles with that spirit of understanding and sympathy which immediately wins its way with all of us. I an not particularly interested in his views on other subjects, but when it comes to interpreting the heart of religion to the hearts of religious people I think he is in a field where he is both happy and helpful. May he continue his contributions along this line to the enrichment of many of us who need just this sort of thing in our reading and from one of our own.

Assuring you of my best wishes, and believing the very frank and open policy you are now following will be of benefit, I am

Fraternally yours,

HOWARD T. CREE.

Augusta, Ga.

The Central Church at Syracuse, N. Y., has engaged Miss Lemert to conduct their Rally Day in the Sunday-school which will be held Nov. 15. She has recently conducted most successful rallies in Detroit and in Rochester.

One of the most interesting little handbooks to fall into our hands recently is the manual that is put out by the Seventh Street Christian Sunday-school of Richmond, Kentucky. It contains the constitution, the course of study and various other matters of importance. The program of the school is modern in every respect.

In the list of special annual events, are Christmas, Decision Day, Children's Day, Examination Day, Promotion Day, Visitors' Day, Cradle Roll Call and Dedication Day, and College Night. On Easter Day the Cradle Roll Call is held and the parents of children are invited to formally dedicate them to the service of God. Each of these annual events is observed in a significant way.

The courses of study are very interesting. The school is divided into different parts called, Main school, Post Graduate, Catechumen's class, Home Department and Cradle Roll. In the main school, the children above the primary are divided into thirteen grades. The plan of study abandons the uniform lesson system and adopts lessons adapted to the different ages. The manual training methods are brought into the service of the Sunday-school in the most suggestive way. The emphasis placed upon missions, social service and church attendance is most helpful. All that modern theorists have said about the Sunday school that is practical is here put into operation.

We do not know whether the Sunday school in Richmond has any of these little booklets for sale but would suggest to them that they be offered for sale. They contain much that will help the enterprising superintendents of our brotherhood.

A. A. Doak, in addressing the students of Washington State College at Pullman, Oct. 23rd, on the occasion of their prohibition rally, touched on conditions in the county-seat of Whitman county. The Spokesman-Review (Spokane, Washington) published him as saying that Colfax was the most immoral town in that state. Already uneasy over his stand for civic cleanness, the saloon interests caught at this straw, and for a week by cartoon and signed statements stirred the accusation that Brother Doak had falsified. On the night of Nov. 1st the church house in Colfax was overflowed to the approach outside and some 500 heard Brother Doak when from his own pulpit he plead for the betterment of the town. Both the curious and devout gave him respectful hearing in silence broken but once and that by applause. J. A. Pine, Sec'y of the East Washington State Missionary Society, under whose auspices Brother Doak works at Colfax, wrote as follows: "I was present at the meeting when Brother Doak answered the statements of the paper. Many men heard him. His people are standing by him. He made a splendid address and completely won his audience. In my judgment he is decidedly a victor, and the incident will increase his influence for good."

Last Sunday was Home Coming Day at the Milwaukee church. A special program was arranged and former members living at a distance were present. The occasion will renew many bonds of Christian friendship.

The church at Deland, Illinois, has arranged to become a Living Link to the Illinois state society. They have chosen Villa Grove as their station. Another Living Link is the Quincy church. Their station is not yet arranged.

One of the members of the church at Salina, Kansas, writes as follows: "Wilhite and Gates a great team. Meeting one week old and 52 additions to date. Fifteen hundred in the tabernacle last night. Let us put the Christian Century on the front seat."

Orders are coming in continually for the back numbers of the series of articles Dr. Willett is running on "My Confession of Faith." The frequent lists of new subscribers all insist on having the paper begin Oct. 31. We shall be glad to supply these back numbers as long as they last, though at the present rate that will not be for long.

A series of prayer meetings have been held at high noon each day, by the student body at Cotner University, during the week of prayer as set apart by the Y. W. C. A. and the Y. M. C. A. These meetings were under the direction of H. O. Pritchard, the minister of the college church. There was a special speaker each day. The spiritual life of the young people was wonderfully deepened and several young men and women made confession of Christ.

The following report from Enid, Oklahoma, will meet with interest and appreciation from our readers: "The work of the First Church at Enid, Oklahoma, prospers. Five additions last Sunday, 102 in six months, and $1,106 paid on the church debt. We have a membership of 614. The work grows all over Oklahoma. The university here has 225 students and President Zollars has raised about $8,000 for school since Oct. 1." Randolph Cook is the pastor of our church at Enid.

The corner stone for the new church building at Bethany (Lincoln) Neb. was laid on Monday afternoon, Nov. 9th. J. E. Davis of Beatrice, Neb., made the principal address and the ministers of all our Lincoln churches took part in the ceremony. It was a great event in the life of the church. The building will be one of the best that we have in that state. Cotner University is located at Bethany and the new building is for the University church. This church is noted for having the largest number of tithers of any church in our brotherhood. Mrs. Dr. Dye is its representative on the foreign field and H. O. Pritchard is the minister at home.

Hannibal, Mo., Nov. 16.—Thirty-four added yesterday, 103 last week. Great increase in Sunday-school. Will pass four hundred mark tonight. Hannibal will have three churches instead of one. Both new churches under the direction of Brother Levi Marshall and First Church. The blessed spirit of coöperation and unity will win any city. Chas. Reign Scoville.

Andrew P. Johnson and Charles E. McVay, song evangelists, are in a meeting at Bethany, Missouri.

J. W. McGarvey, Jr., has accepted the work at West Point, Mississippi, and is leaving Lexington at an early date.

One of the interesting experiments of the American Christian Missionary Society, is the empolying of an evangelist to serve in the coal fields in the east.

The Quincy, Illinois, church took a step forward and became a living link in Illinois state work last Sunday. They are greatly rejoiced. Good work by Pastor Darsie and Clarence Depew made the giving easy.

A new church building was dedicated at Colchester, Illinois, Oct. 25. The building cost $7,000 and there was $2,000 to raise on dedication day. N. E. Cory is the minister. He is the oldest active minister among the Disciples in the state of Illinois.

The disaster which has befallen the Southern Christian Institute, our school for educating negroes, should awaken the sympathy of all. The building must be rebuilt and the work continued. We trust the friends of the Christian Century will not be slow in offering their assistance.

The church at Fort Smith, Arkansas, has had the ministry of E. T. Edmunds for the past fifteen years. In that time a beautiful $30,000 building has been erected. The congregation has been built up until it now numbers 500 to 600 members. E. B. Bagby recently of the Franklin Circle church in Cleveland has been called to the pastorate.

The church bulletin of the Milwaukee church makes a cordial announcement of the new Christian Century and urges the members to send in subscriptions. This is the logical thing for churches that stand for liberty to do. In days gone by, it has often happened that an obscurantist journal has been able to command the loyalty of its constituency for subscription campaigns while the people who read liberal journals applauded their journal but took no subscriptions. "By their fruits" will be the test with us. If you like the Christian Century we shall appreciate your cordial word through the mail but will begin to take interest in your statements when they are accompanied with substantial tokens of your support in the good cause.

F. W. Burnham of Springfield has put out a set of Centennial ideals for his church that might be copied with profit by every congregation among the Disciples. They are as follows: A Deeper Religious Life in Every Home, and Every Heart; A Social Application of the Gospel; A Men's Brotherhood, Active and Efficient; Our Youths Training for Service; Every Family in the Church coöperating in Its Work; A Bigger, Better Bible School; Twelve Hundred Dollars for Missions and Benevolence. If every congregation in our fellowship would adopt some worthy ideal and live up to it, the centennial year would mean more than a great convention at Pittsburgh. It would mean a church with a renewed life in all its fartherest reaches.

FROM THE HUB OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

In my last letter the men and churches in the western portion of the state were treated; in this the work nearer the center will be considered. In a subsequnt article the churches in the eastern portion, as well as in Greater New York, will be outlined.

Central New York must have been settled by men who were familiar with the classics, for many of our cities and hamlets are named after famous places or men of Greece or Rome. Witness Troy, Albany Rome and Syracuse among the cities, or Cato, Cicero, Delphi, Pompey, Homer, Tully, or Fobius, among the villages. And these names must have had their attraction for our forefathers when they planted our churches. They were near-New Testament names. Today we have churches in Troy, Cato, Pompey, Tully and Syracuse.

Our preachers are discovering Auburn Theological seminary, and are colonizing about it. Brothers Braden of Auburn, Bradbury of Pompey, and Stauffer of Syracuse, are taking work there this year. President George B. Stewart expressed himself as fearful that now that the Disciples have captured Keuka college, they had designs upon Auburn seminary, in order to make the Empire state educational scheme complete. Our men report the most cordial treatment and a wealth of good things to be had for the asking. Auburn is well endowed and equipped, and offers unusual advantages for men who desire to do advanced work.

Word just comes that one of our good country churches within three miles of Auburn, is shortly to be without a pastor, as Brother A. B. Chamberlain has resigned because of ill health. It was here at Throopsville, that R. H. Miller, now of Richmond Avenue church, Buffalo, preached during his student days in Auburn. It is a good country church and is now connected with Auburn by an interurban trolley line.

Brother Chamberlain claims the distinction of having preached longer in New York state than any other man of our Brotherhood. He was at one time state secretary and evangelist. Besides having held many important pastorates here, he was pastor in Philadelphia, Pa., and Worcester, Mass. He goes west to make his home with a son and ought to be used by some good church to bring his message of good cheer to many.

DeWitt H. Bradbury has the distinction of being "higher up" than any other preacher in the state. His parish, Pompey, is 1850 feet above sea-level, and is the highest point in the state where any settlement is located. It is fourteen miles from Syracuse and 1470 feet above the city. The writer went up for three nights to help in a series of meetings and the wind and snow made him feel as though he were on top of some snow-capped mountain. The people like their preacher and he is doing a fine work for them. He spends three days in Auburn and the balance of each week among his highland people.

C. R. Stauffer is in his second meeting for the Rowland Street church here. He never stops working and as a result his church has entirely outgrown their present building. They now have two sessions of Bible school in order to accommodate the pupils, and unless all signs fail, it will be necessary to divide again before spring. As soon as winter is over they will build a modern and commodious house of worship on lots recently purchased near the present site.

Watertown has been without a preacher for some time, but we understand they will soon be supplied. They have a new building and are well located for a good work.

Auburn is soon to begin a meeting, W. C. Prewitt of Niagara Falls, doing the preaching. The pastor, Arthur Braden, has promised a meeting to the South Butler church for an early date.

The most successful men's meeting our churches have ever held occurred in the Central church, Syracuse, recently, when exactly one hundred men sat down for a feast of good things. The Men's leagues of the Auburn and Rowland Street churches sent goodly delegations. The league of Central church acted as hosts, the men preparing the dinner and serving same without the help of the ladies. It was an inspiring sight to see so many men assembled to hear and plan for the work of our Master among men. Speeches were made by Arthur Braden, C. R. Stauffer, Dr. A. G. Dowst, C. G. Van Wormer and T. F. Burgan. The president of the local league, W. A. Cately, acted as toastmaster. The Empire state takes pride in its State Men's league, and well it might. It seeks to interest every man in some phase of church activity. We must have the men if we are to win America for Christ.

TEACHER-TRAINING GRADUATION AT GOLDEN CITY, MO.

This occurred on the evening of Friday, November 6. Eight persons having finished the First Standard Course, received diplomas. The class was never very large, and eight was a high proportion of their number to hold out to the end and get safely through. The writer had the pleasure of making an address on "The Office and Mission of the Teacher," and of delivering to the members of the class their diplomas. Though the occasion was during election week and on a week night, yet a fine audience came out to participate in the services. Among those present were a number of persons from the other churches of the town; their presence showing the general interest which we find among Christian workers on the subject of Teacher-training. The pastor of the Golden City church is John Quincy Biggs, who graduated with the class, as did also his wife. Another First Standard class will be organized, and those who graduated will take up the Second Standard Course, we hope, in a short time.

J. H. Hardin, State Sup't.
311 Century Building, Kansas City, Mo.

J. L. Reed closed a two weeks' meeting at Willow Branch, Illinois, with two additions.

S. D. Dutcher of Omaha has accepted a call to the Central Christian Church, Terre Haute, Indiana.

Dr. Royal J. Dye is visiting several of the Indiana churches this week. He is at Greenfield Tuesday, November 17th.

C. H. Winders is leading the Downey Avenue Congregation, Indianapolis, in a series of meetings (evangelistic.) Clay Trusty is also in a series of evangelistic meetings with the Seventh Congregation, Indianapolis. He is assisted in song by Mr. Blackman of Butler College.

MISSIONARY DIAMOND POINTS.

Educational.—Sixty-two schools and colleges are supported, with an addendance of 3,669, a gain of 281.

Churches, First Sunday in March.

Sunday-schools, First Sunday in June.

Individual gifts, Every day in the year.

The Meaning of "Chauffeur."

A correspondent of The Nation writes as follows:—"I do not know what originated the title of 'chauffeur' as applied to the driver of an automobile. The name is certainly appropriate, and the chauffeurs of the present day possess the qualities which made their prototypes famous. Balzac, in 'L'Envers de l'histoire contemporaine,' says:

"'Here you will need a few words of explanation as to an association which made a great noise in its day. I mean that of the raiders known as the chauffeurs. These brigands pervaded all the western provinces. Nocturnal raids were frequent. These bands of destroyers were the terrors of the country. I am not exaggerating when I tell you that in some departments the arm of justice was practically paralyzed.'

"The modern chauffeurs certainly equal or excel their predecessors, and the arm of justice is still paralyzed."

A CONGRESS NOTE.

The discussion on the legitimate limits of free speech developed no very radically different points of view. Disciples and Baptists both believe in freedom of speech. They have insisted that the remedy for freedom was more freedom. It was agreed, however, by all the speakers, that such speech as led to anarchy or immorality was to be curbed. The work of Anthony Comstock was a good work. The suppression of Emma Goldman was in the interest of the larger freedom of the community. The free expression of opinions, however, in a way that does not interfere with the freedom of others was to be commended and encouraged.

UPWARD START.

After Changing from Coffee to Postum.

Many a talented person is kept back because of the interference of coffee with the nourishment of the body.

This is especially so with those whose nerves are very sensitive, as is often the case with talented persons. There is a simple, easy way to get rid of coffee evils and a Tenn. lady's experience along these lines is worth considering. She says:

"Almost from the beginning of the use of coffee it hurt my stomach. By the time I was fifteen I was almost a nervous wreck, nerves all unstrung, no strength to endure the most trivial thing, either work or fun.

"There was scarcely anything I could eat that would agree with me. The little I did eat seemed to give me more trouble than it was worth. I finally quit coffee and drank hot water, but there was so little food I could digest, I was literally starving; was so weak I could not sit up long at a time.

"It was then a friend brought me a hot cup of Postum. I drank part of it and after an hour I felt as though I had had something to eat—felt strengthened. That was about five years ago and, after continuing Postum in place of coffee and gradually getting stronger, today I can eat and digest anything I want, walk as much as I want. My nerves are steady.

"I believe the first thing that did me any good and gave me an upward start, was Postum, and I use it altogether now instead of coffee." "There's a Reason."

CHICAGO

In a series of studies which we shall make in the weeks to come, we shall set forth the importance of Chicago as a field of religious work for the Protestant church and for the Disciples of Christ. The war carried on against "Chicago" theology by one of our reactionary journals has quite obscured the great strategic importance of Chicago as a field of missionary enterprise and social endeavor. This week we shall consider some respects in which Chicago is the greatest city in America.

Chicago is the greatest railroad center in America and in the world. Six terminal stations receive more trains each day than come into any other city. At these stations a great suburban business is cared for, thirty thousand people being unloaded at the Northwestern depot every morning between seven and nine o'clock. It is the point of exchange between the east and the west. Both freight and passenger business in the United States look to this as a natural center. Not only do the railroads carry on an enormous transportation business, but the lake as well. The bulk of lake transportation has greatly increased in recent years. When the lakes and the gulf are properly connected with deep waterway, Chicago will be as great a center of water transportation as the ocean seaports of the country.

Chicago is the greatest manufacturing center in the United States. The pork-packing industry is the largest here that is found in the world. The number of people depending upon this one industry in Chicago for a living number well up into the hundred thousands. In Chicago and around Chicago are the great works of the steel trust turning out the great bridges that span the rivers of the country and the material for the steel construction of sky-scrapers. In these factories men work in the most highly specialized way, each man having some small part of the whole which he does monotonously from one year's end to another.

Chicago is the leading educational center of the United States. Five theological schools have 700 divinity students, the largest number in a single city in the United States. Besides these theological schools there are two missionary training schools and a biblical training school with a two year course conducted by the Moody church. Probably about a thousand people in Chicago are studying for special work in the Protestant church. In addition to this there is being built at the present time a great Jesuit university on the north shore that will furnish theological instruction. Three great universities now operate in and around Chicago, Northwestern, University of Chicago and Lake Forest University. Over ten thousand students are to be found in these institutions training for the work of life. It is said there are thirteen medical colleges in the city. There are numerous other schools preparing for professional life. The city has great technical schools of which Armour Institute and Lewis Institute are the better known. Private schools of various kinds are in abundance. In addition to these are the public schools.

Chicago is great in the diversity and cosmopolitan character of its life. Ninety per cent. of the population is either foreign born or the children of people who are foreign born. Of this foreign population, the Germans are the largest element numerically. They number 700,000 in Chicago. The Scandinavians have a representation of 300,000 in the city. The recent tendencies of immigration, however, will change this preponderance after awhile. The tide is now set in from southern Europe. 160,000 Poles are now in the city. Italians are coming in great numbers. While New York continues to receive the greater number of the Jews, they are coming to Chicago in larger numbers than before. The Oriental races are here. It is said that forty-three languages are spoken in the city. The Germans have six daily papers. The Jews have five journals. No linguist is so learned that he may speak to all Chicago.

Chicago is phenomenal in the rapidity of her growth. New York exceeds her population, but has several hundred years of history. Chicago has less than a hundred years of history. In 1804 a trading post was established here and a fort erected called Fort Dearborn. During the war of 1812 this fort was destroyed, but was afterward rebuilt. The first school was opened in Chicago in 1832. The city of Chicago was not incorporated until 1837. Within the last twenty-five years its greatest growth occurred. Some years ago it was growing by the influx of people from the country districts. Now this source of growth is outshadowed by the incoming thousands from across the sea.

The Disciples of Christ have grown in Chicago far in excess of the money or effort that has been expended. An encyclopedia giving the churches in 1890 reported four Christian churches. At the present time we have twenty-two. These churches all have a regular ministry and carry on the usual lines of church work. The reported membership of these churches is five thousand, and over, making Chicago a claimant to the honor of having more Disciples than any other city in the United States. When it is remembered, however, that Chicago has a Catholic population of a million people, our pride subsides. When we learn that only one out of every fifty Protestants is a Disciple, we grow more modest still. When we compare the seven thousand dollars a year that we spend on city mission work with the fifty thousand dollars that is spent by the Presbyterians, we see that we are merely playing with the problem here.

Let it not be thought that five thousand Disciples in Chicago is such a host that they ought to finish the evangelization of the city alone. Not a single church in this city has a building worth fifty thousand dollars. Nearly every church here has a large debt on its building and struggles along handicapped with fearful interest charges. Furthermore the Disciples of Chicago have no millionaires. Our people are a poor people compared with Indianapolis, Cleveland or Kansas City. Most of them are employed and on such terms that their continued stay in the city is a matter of uncertainty. Our churches frequently lose twenty-five per cent. of their members in a single year. Our churches have a larger per cent. of additions each year than do the down state churches, but their losses materially reduce the net gain.

We shall in later studies report the enterprises of the various denominations and the enterprises of the social settlements. We shall hope in this page to give such information from time to time as shall arouse the Disciples with the sense of the strategic nature of this city and of the possibility of their having a far larger place in working out its redemption.

Dr. Errett Gates preached at the Englewood church Sunday morning and evening. He reports a great church there, developed largely through the work and "spiritual genius" of the pastor, C. G. Kindred. During Mr. Kindred's sickness the church has held strongly together, its organization has been maintained in a truly admirable manner considering the long absence of the pastor. Reports from the hospital indicate that Mr. Kindred is doing grandly, and confident hopes of his complete recovery are given out. A fervent prayer in his behalf is offered weekly at the minister's meeting, where his genial presence is greatly missed.

Harry F. Burns, of the Douglas Park Church, read an admirable paper on the Sunday School Curriculum to the ministers, last Monday. He contended for a straight-out graded system of organization and a straight-out graded system of lessons to match it. The desire for uniformity at the expense of effectiveness he greatly deplored. He pleaded for a larger freedom in choosing the materials for religious instruction, suggesting the necessity of building up in the child's mind a religious conception of all good literature. The facts of missions and modern social life and problems, he contended, should enter into the curriculum as well as the Bible text.

Some interesting confessions followed this paper. One pastor of a large SundaySchool declared that his school was a "jamboree." It had a capital orchestra, but its teaching force was not trained as it should be. Only twenty-five per cent. of a recently graduated teacher-training class had become teachers. Another pastor argued that the one hour on Sunday was insufficient to allow for any serious instruction. Another said that he was in the habit of spending as much thought and preparation on the Sunday School service as on the preaching service. This pastor confessed that he was now teaching a class of children of about seven years and that he had to hustle to keep up with them.

It was announced that the Hyde Park Sunday School of which Professor MacClintock is Superintendent, proposes to print the results of their interesting experiment in this work shortly.

A special meeting of the C. W. B. M. was held recently at the Jackson Boulevard Church. The society was addressed by the pastor, Parker Stockdale. He told the ladies that the C. W. B. M. stood third in the United States for compactness of organization. Mrs. Ida W. Harrison will visit the society some time the coming month.

Parker Stockdale reported that of one thousand dollars pledged a month ago to the Jackson Boulevard Church, all of it had been paid save twelve dollars, and that will be paid. We are glad to have this testimony that among their many other virtues, the Jackson Boulevard Church possesses common honesty! Too many church members lack just this.

The Oak Park Church reports one added last Sunday and one hundred in Sunday School.

Richard W. Gentry has accepted the position of Director of Religious Instruction at the Monroe Street Church. He will be associated with the pastor, C. C. Morrison. It is planned to recognize the teaching function of the church in this way as well as the preaching and pastoral function. Mr. Gentry brings a splendid equipment for just this type of work. He has had experience in city work, having been assistant pastor for Dr. C. H. Parkhurst's church in New York City, and associate pastor with Dr. Willett, at the First and Memorial churches in Chicago. His graduate education has been received at Union Theological Seminary, New York, the University of Missouri, and the University of Chicago. He has specialized in the field of pedagogy, and will bring to his new task not technical skill alone, but a lovable and consecrated personality.

F. W. Norton, of Hiram, Ohio, spent the hour with the ministers' association, Monday afternoon.

A BIBLE COLLEGE AT VIGAN.

In recent years the Foreign society has established Bible colleges at Tokyo, Japan, Nanking, China, and Jubbulpore, India. These have proven marvelous instruments of good.

The next task is a Bible college at Vigan, P. I. Only a few years of labor in that field results in about 3,000 converts, thirty-four churches and 171 native evangelists. This is one evangelist out of every seventeen members.

Our colleges in this country are crying out for ministerial students. Our young preachers in the Philippine Islands cry out for a college. "In bare-footed simplicity; with thumb-worn testaments, they search out the people of God. They tell winningly the glad tidings; they baptise disciples; they inaugurate the Lord's supper and organize congregations."

When the college is once erected, it will be self-supporting. We already have the beginning of such a college at Vigan in a small rented building. Hermann P. Williams, our missionary at this place, states the possibilities as follows: "Our proposition is to enlarge the college at Vigan, to buy a farm, build suitable houses, and provide an equipment. We would make it an industrial school for evangelists, where the preachers and teachers may come, support themselves by their own labor and learn in their own language the further counsel of God. They can make brick and erect for the school large, permanent buildings, and they can learn handicrafts that will enable them to reproduce the example of Paul, the tent-maker, among their own villages. In this way every dollar spent from America would buy its full value in each of these benefits. It would build up a permanent college plant; it would develop a higher standard of thrift in our Christian communities; it would provide a numerous, trained and self-supporting ministry for our churches."

Now is the nick of time in the Philippines. The missionaries and evangelists are welcome everywhere. The people read the Bible and religious literature with eagerness. A trained force of native preachers means a marvelous growth of the church and a speedy evangelization of the islands.

It will cost $25,000 to establish this college. The friends of the work ought to provide this at once. We are hoping that some wide awake, enterprising disciple, will suggest in each community steps to be taken to aid in this great enterprise. This is one of our Centennial aims. We hope a number of people will give $500 each; some even larger amounts.

F. M. Rains and S. J. Corey, Secretaries.

MISSIONARY NOTES.

A sister in Iowa has just sent the Foreign society $1,000 to aid in the building of a Bible college at Vigan, Province of Luzon, P. I. The importance of this new enterprise is very great. The society hopes that many others will follow this liberal example at once, that the $25,000 may soon be secured.

J. C. Archer and wife of Ohio, have recently sailed from New York for Jubblepore, as missionaries of the Foreign society. Mr. Archer has gone out to devote his life to the work in the Bible college at that station. His robust health, his complete consecration, his scholarly attainments, all eminently qualify him for the responsible position.

During the month of October thirty-nine churches made offerings to the Foreign society—a gain of thirteen on the corresponding month 1907.

James Ware of Shanghai, China, is now on a trip to Australia, where he will visit the churches. He will return by way of America, reaching this country in February or March next. He has been a missionary of the Foreign society in China for nearly twenty years. The Australian brethren are sure to give him a cordial reception; they made a special request for a visit from him.

A CORDIAL APPRECIATION.

W. D. McClintock, who has recently returned from a trip to the Far East, writes the Foreign society as follows:

"I returned in September from my long trip in the Philippines, China and Japan. Of course, I was, as you may remember, chiefly engaged in educational work, but I kept aware all the time, when possible, of missionary conditions. I am glad to say that I came home deeply convinced of the legitimacy, necessity and success of Christian missions. I keep feeling, as I think most people in the East now do, that China is the great country—a place where we ought to put most of our efforts. I think that Japan at the present moment seems to yield the quicker return, but the future is all on the side of China. They are to dominate the East, and ultimately even overshadow and control Japan. The Chinese are a deeper, nobler, more intelligent people than the Japanese. I found the folks at Manila in good shape, as far as they have gone, though of course, things are really just beginning. They certainly have secured a magnificent location, and I felt deeply satisfied with the way their money had been spent. I had short interviews with the people in Osaka and a visit with the schools in Tokyo. I was very sorry to be there when Place was in the mountains. What a great pity that Guy had to return home! Everybody is speaking regretfully of that. The Tokyo plant is splendid. I got reflections from the other missions of the city that they all envied us.

If you ever could be tempted to discouragement, I could do my part in putting heart into you. But I am sure you do not need it."

Charcoal Purifies Any Breath

And In Its Purest Form Has Long Been Known As the Greatest Gas Absorber

Pure willow charcoal will oxidize almost any odor and render it sweet and pure. A panful in a foul cellar will absorb deadly fumes, for charcoal absorbs one hundred times its volume in gas.

The ancients knew the value of charcoal and administered it in cases of illness, especially pertaining to the stomach. In England today charcoal poultices are used for ulcers, boils, etc., while some physicians in Europe claim to cure many skin diseases by covering the afflicted skin with charcoal powder.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges go into the mouth and transfer foul odors at once into oxygen, absorb noxious gases and acids and when swallowed mix with the digestive juices and stop gas making, fermentation and decay.

By their gentle qualities they control beneficially bowel action and stop diarrhœa and constipation.

Bad breath simply cannot exist when charcoal is used. There are no ifs or ands about this statement. Don't take our word for it, but look into the matter yourself. Ask your druggist or physician, or better still, look up charcoal in your encyclopedia. The beauty of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges is that the highest pharmaceutical expert knowledge obtainable has been used to prepare a lozenge that will give to man the best form of charcoal for use.

Pure willow and honey is the result. Two or three after meals and at bedtime sweeten the breath, stop decay of teeth, aid the digestive apparatus and promote perfect bowel action. They enrich the supply of oxygen to the system and thereby revivify the blood and nerves.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are sold everywhere in vast quantities, thus they must have merit. Every druggist carries them, price, twenty-five cents per box, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

A FAT BABY.

Usually Evidence of Proper Feeding.

Babies grow very rapidly and if they do not get the right kind of food they grow backwards instead of forwards; that is, when their food is not nourishing they grow thin and cross and some of them die from the lack of the right kind of food. A girl writes:

"My aunt's baby was very delicate and was always ill. She was not able to nurse it and took it to one doctor after another, but none of them did the child any good.

"One day mother told my aunt to try Grape-Nuts for the baby, but she laughed and said if the doctors couldn't do the baby any good, how could Grape-Nuts? But mother said 'try it anyway.'

"So my aunt put one tablespoonful of Grape-Nuts in a quarter cup of hot water and when the food was soft she added as much milk as water and gave that to the baby.

"In a month and a half you would hardly have known that baby, it was so fat and thrived so fast. A neighbor asked my aunt what made the baby so healthy and fat when only six weeks before it was so thin. She said 'Grape-Nuts.' The neighbor got Grape-Nuts for her baby and it was soon as fat as my aunt's child."

HOW A WOMAN MADE MONEY.

A woman writing to the Globe from Mexico says: "While I am way down in Mexico I do not want my friends who read the Globe to think I am out of the world, for I am making more money now than I ever did in my life. Four years ago I took up a fruit claim. They give you the land if you will pay for setting out five acres of tropical fruit trees within five years. The Department of Improvement set out my banana trees, 1000 on five acres, and attended to them for two years, or until the first crop was ready to gather, and it cost me only $6.20. The Department of Improvement will care for your trees and gather and market your fruit continuously for one third of the crop, so I just let them attend to my orchard. In 1907 the Department paid me for my share $1,281.30 in gold. For the first six months of 1908 I had received $708.76 in gold, and expect the second half of the year will bring me a little more. You get your money every three months, asbananas are picked and marketed every day of the year. You do not have to come to Mexico to take up land. You can pay for planting the trees in installments of $5 a month if you wish, and need never go to Mexico yourself." Write to the Jantha Plantation Co., Block 69, P...sburg, Pa., for Friut Claim Blanks, as literature printed in English, regarding Mexican Homestead, is distributed from Pittsburg.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTH ANIVERSARY CELEBRATION.

The Central Christian Church of Warren, Ohio, where J. E. Lynn has ministered for almost five years, celebrated its 105th anniversary as a congregation during the week leading up to and on Sunday, Nov. 8th. It proved to be one of the most notable occasions in the long and celebrated history of this famous old church. An anniversary banquet was held on Wednesday evening, Nov. 4th, at which time a number of toasts of a reminiscent nature were responded to and an address given by Pres. Miner Lee Bates of Hiram College, a former pastor. On Sunday the day was crowded full of excellent services. It was made Home Coming Day for all former members and pastors and a large number took advantage of the occasion to go up to their Jerusalem. The Second Church organized by the Central two years ago, and their pastor, C. C. Reynard, joined in the festivities of the day. A very happy part of the program was the speeches from the Baptist pastor as a representative of the Baptist ancestry of the Disciples. He was ready to remove the last rail from the division fence that separated the Baptists and Disciples. As representative of the Presbyterian ancestry of the Disciples, Dr. Reinhold of this church spoke of the great loss to the Presbyterians occasioned by the going forth of such men as the Campbells from their fold.

Letters were read from the following who were unable to attend: Rev. J. M. Van Horn, Toronto, Can.; Rev. J. L. Darsie, of New York City; Rev. M. L. Bates, president of Hiram college, all former pastors, and Revs. Howard Weir, Jas. Brown and C. S. Medbury, young men of the church who entered the ministry. Rev. Charles Louis Loos, of Lexington, Ky., Henry Christy of Cleveland, Miss Mary Johnson, Ft. Wayne, Ind., Mrs. Mary Cross of this city, and Miss Effa Hall Newton.

From the historical address delivered by J. E. Lynn we give the following interesting items concerning the history of this church:

Warren was in earlier years the capital of the Western Reserve of Ohio, the territory of the greater part of the Mahoning Baptist association, the soil upon which the Reformation first took root.

The Central Christian church at Warren, Ohio, is, therefore, a church of considerable historic interest. It was organized over one hundred years ago, on September 3, 1803, as the Concord Baptist church. The book containing the minutes of the meeting of organization and the signatures of the seven charter members is now in possession of the church. It contains the minutes of the official meetings down to 1836. The great name in the first chapter of the congregation's history, was that of Adamson Bentley, the pastor for twenty years, from 1811 to 1831. In his farewell discourse, at the end of his long pastorate, he spoke of his "travel from Calvinism to the simplicity of the gospel." In this change, which had taken place in the heart of Adamson Bentley, the entire congregation shared. No exact date when the church ceased to be a Baptist church, and became simply Christian, can be definitely fixed. It was not the work of a day, but a gradual evolution. Certain phrases found in the minutes of these years indicate the process going on. The now famous meeting held by Walter Scott in the winter of 1828, was one of the turning points. This was in fact, the first meeting held by the reformers, in which the New Testament laws of pardon were laid down. True, at New Lisbon, Ohio, the previous November, Mr. Scott had made his first public statement of these laws, but no protracted evangelistic effort was held at that time.

Mr. Scott came to Warren to "lay siege" as he put it, to the city. The meeting shook the whole community, resulting immediately in fifty confessions, the practical persuading of Pastor Bentley to the new view and great strides forward toward the apostolic teaching on the part of the entire church.

The church has had a number of notable men as her pastors and preachers. Conspicuous among them is the name of Isaac Errett, who was pastor from 1851 to 1856. He was then a young man of thirty-six years. Alex Campbell, W. K. Pendleton, Charles Louis Loos, B. A. Hinsdale and James A. Garfield often preached here. J. W. Lamphear was pastor from '61-'65. It was the war times. Men needed comfort and strength and found them in this Godly man. There were many young people in the church. Nineteen young men from Miss Lottie Sackett's class went to the front at the first call. This number was later increased to twenty-eight. Many times the services were interrupted by news from the battlefield or the return of the wounded or dying. When peace was restored and the news was brought of Lincoln's assassination, the people came with one accord to this old church, and listened to a memorial address by Mr. Lamphear. The church was draped in black and the national colors.

George T. Smith and wife went from the pastorate of the church to their work in Japan. During Dr. Thayer's ministry, the membership of the church was largely increased. In 1888, while E. B. Wakefield was pastor, the present church building was erected at a cost of $30,000. Soon after the dedication of the building, he accepted a professorship in Hiram college, where his fragrant life has been a continual source of inspiration and power to young men and women. During J. M. Van Horn's eleven years of service, the church was steadily strengthened and built up into a commanding position in the city and a substantial addition was made to the material equipment by the erection of an unusually fine parsonage.

Miner Lee Bates, now president of Hiram college, followed with a short but brilliant pastorate.

The history of the church is notable for its even tenure, for the entire absence of dissension and strife, for its high standard of intellectual and spiritual life, for the loyal devotion and hearty co-operation of the entire church to the pastors that have been chosen to lead. The resident membership of the congregation is, in round numbers, one thousand, and constitutes a veritable bee hive of activity. With the present pastorate dating from 1904, the second century of the church life began. In this pastorate of less than five years, 594 persons have been added to the church. The Second Christian church has been built at a cost of $11,000, and has now a flourishing congregation of 350, under the wise leadership of C. O. Reynard, making the Disciples the strongest in this city. One letter of 216 names was granted to the members who organized the Second church. In these not quite five years, $16,465.00 has been raised for all purposes. In this amount is included $7,000.00 of the Second church building fund. Of the above amount $10,133.00 was for missions.

Among the young people of the church who have entered the ministry are: C. S. Medbury, Des Moines, Iowa; Raymond A. McCorcle, Japan; Eva Raw, China; Howard Weir, Bowmansville, Ontario; James Brown, Hartford, Mich.

"Man Is As Old As His Stomach"

This Persian Epigram Is the Real Gauge of A Man's Life.

The Persians were a very sagacious people, noted among other things, for their deep thinking on life and the things which make up life.

The above epigram shows the wisdom of their thought.

When a man's stomach is able to furnish new material to the system as fast or faster than the natural decay of man requires, then such a man lives his fullest and his best.

When through wrong living or disease a man's stomach begins to tax the other organs and takes from the blood strength which it cannot give back in nourishment taken from food, then begins the death of man and he decays fast. The stomach is strong, splendidly strong, and can stand an untold amount of abuse and neglect, but when it dies, man dies.

The stomach gives tons upon tons of good rich blood every year to the system and draws only 680 lbs. of nourishment for its own use. If, however, the food which it receives cannot be turned into blood which is capable of use by the body, then the stomach receives no help from the other organs.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets contain the most perfect digestive qualities known to science and at the same time the most powerful. They will mix with the poisonous juices of a sick stomach and digest food in spite of this handicap.

They will stop gas making and bad breath. They tone up the nerves of the whole digestive canal, including those of the stomach.

A single ingredient contains strength enough to digest 3,000 times its weight in mixed food.

They have stood the test of time and today are more sought after than all their imitators combined.

They are used and endorsed by 40,000 physicians. Every druggist sells them, price 50c. It costs nothing to demonstrate their value. Send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

JUST BOYS.

Sunday School Teacher—"Now, boys, be quiet, please, while we take up the study of the lesson. Take your feet off the chair, James; that isn't gentlemanly. The Philistine army fought the people of Israel and beat them, and Saul was killed."

Jimmy—"And his three sons and the caddy that carried his things."

Billy—"Get on to the candy kid! Knows his lesson like a book! Quit kickin' me!"

Teacher—"Stop fighting, boys! Saul and his armor bearer fell on their swords and died."

Sam—"Was they the long kind that gets between your feet? I seen a actor fall on his once."

Teacher—"No, I mean they killed themselves with them."

Jack—"Why didn't they shoot theirselves?"

Jimmy—"They didn't have guns in those days."

Jack—"Aw, they did, too!"

Jimmy—"They did not!"

Jack—"What do you know about it? You wasn't there."

Billy—"Feller on our street shot a burglar. I had a ride in a police patrol."

Sam.—"Like fun you did!"

Billy—"Well, on the step. Copper chased me off."

Teacher—"Silence, boys! When Saul was dead the enemy cut off his head."

Sam—"What good did that do? He was a deader, anyhow."

Teacher—"It was a way they did in those days."

George—"Glad I wasn't living then, or maybe I'd 'a' been dead. I'm going to bring a new feller to Sunday School next Sunday. He'll have to go home fifteen minutes early to feed his dog."

Billy—"Who, that long-legged guy I seen you with Thursday? Whose room in school is he in?"

George—"He goes to private school."

Sam—"Aw, a regular Willie boy!"

George—"He ain't neither!"

Sam—"He is, too! Guess I know him!"

Teacher—"Sit over here, Samuel. Stop swinging your feet, George. The people of Jabesh Gilead were grateful to Saul and gave him a decent funeral after the Philistines went away. What do you think about Saul?"

Jack—"Nothing. I don't let him bother me."

Teacher—"He was conceited——"

Billy—"Conceited' Gee, you ought to see Mamie Kelly! She walks into school like this!"

Teacher—"Sit down, William. Saul was jealous."

Sam—"I seen a feller in a show called 'The Jealous Lover.' There was more shooting in that show than would 'a' killed a army. It was bully."

Jimmy—"I can shoot a revolver."

Billy—"Yes, you can—not. Maybe you can shoot a bean-shooter."

Jimmy—"I can, too. I'll show you some day."

Teacher—"Saul did not keep up as he started out. He failed——"

Jack—"My uncle has failed three times. Is there a picture in your locket?"

Teacher—"Saul failed to——"

Jack—"Is it a feller's picture?"

Billy—"Susie Andrews got a locket for geeting passed. Wisht somebody would give me something for passing. Maybe I would, then."

George—"You get something for not passing. Who's Susie Andrews?"

Jimmy—"She lives on our street. She's the limit."

Teacher—"David was probably very sad over the death of Jonathan, his friend."

Sam—"Who was it I seen you with last night? Did you go to a show?"

Teacher—"Yes, downtown. Listen, boys, Saul—I mean David had——"

George—"Aw, look at Miss Wheeler's class! Those girls don't come half the time. I seen one of them buying gum with her Sunday School nickel."

Billy—"How do you know it was?"

George—"I ast her."

Sam—"What did she say?"

George—"Said the gum wasn't any good anyway and she wisht she'd used the nickel to go to a moving-picture show."

Teacher—"David had——"

Jack—"How could she go to a nickel show when it's closed?"

Sam—"Aw gee, there's others."

Jack—"There ain't!"

Sam—"There is!"

Jack—"Not near here."

Sam—"Aw, there, now! You didn't say that!"

Teacher—"Silence for a little longer, boys. Jonathan was a lovable young man and we should have liked to see him live and be the friend of the new king——"

Jimmy—"I don't care about it. He's more interesting dead."

Billy—"Ain't it most time for the bell?"

George—"Wisht there was kings nowadays."

Jimmy—"There is. Ain't you read nothing about the kings of England and France and Italy?"

George—"I mean in America."

Sam—"Aw, ain't we got enough trouble without having kings?"

Jack—"Bert Wheeler's got the mumps."

Teacher—"David's character shows strongly in his acts at this time."

George—"Our room at school's going to have a party."

Sam—"Aw, it is not!"

George—"It is, too, I'm getting it up."

Sam—"I ain't coming."

George—"You ain't asked. My brother's going to get a feller to do tricks."

Jack—"I can beat him. I can make disappearing cards."

Sam—"So can I. It's a cinch."

Teacher—"David had trained himself——"

Jimmy—"My father says anybody can train himself. Specially to run. I seen a race on Labor day."

Teacher—"There's the bell. Turn your chairs around now. Quietly, boys. Pick up your book, William; it's on the floor."

Billy—"Song 342. Aw, gee, regular baby song! Wisht I'd stayed at home. Ain't that the limit?"—Chicago Daily News.

AUSTIN, TEXAS.

Dr. J. W. Lowber, pastor of Austin Central church for twelve years, has offered his resignation to take effect at the end of the present year. The church has accepted the resignation. Dr. and Mrs. Lowber expect to evangelize, lecture and travel in the future. The church has extended a call to Brother Kerns, now at Carbondale, Ill. It is more than likely that Brother Kerns will accept the call.

The two Bible Chair buildings at Austin, Texas, are to be completed by January 1. Work is progressing rapidly. These buildings have been made possible through the gift of Mrs. M. M. Blanks, Lockhart, Texas. This new movement assures permanency and character to the Texas Bible Chair.

The C. W. B. M. of Texas, through the very earnest labors of the state secretary, Miss Virginia Hearne, is making elaborate preparations for the celebration of C. W. B. M. day. The proceeds of this day in Texas go to the support of the Texas Bible Chair.

Probably the greatest union revival in Austin in several years has just been closed by Evangelist George R. Stuart. It has been an unusual demonstration of sanity and emotion. The good accomplished is certainly wide reaching.

Frank L. Jewett.

EFFECTUAL THANKSGIVING.

Americans have many ways of observing their holidays. Perhaps the most common and most popular is by eating too much. It is generally agreed that most of us eat too much every day in the year. But on Thanksgiving day, especially, we double the transgression. There are very few of us that fail to do this. Perhaps there is no home in which these lines will be read where there is not a deliberate purpose to overeat on Thanksgiving day. Then how can we plead that we cannot afford to help in the Bible School offering for home missions?

Another popular way of celebrating holidays is by visiting those who visit us. Would it not be well this Centennial Thanksgiving to vary the order and visit some that we have not heretofore honored by a place on our calling lists? Let us remember also the great company of noble men and women that are engaged 365 days in the year under the auspices of the American Christian Missionary society, in continuing the work of the Master, going about doing good. The Bible school that makes an offering for this purpose brings every one of its members into the fellowship of this blessed work.

Some of us spend our holidays gloating, like Nebuchadnezzar, over our own sordid achievements, and others, like Elijah, repining over our hard luck. Let the former make practical acknowledgment of God's hand in his prosperity, and let the latter observe that however sad his case, but for God's mercy it would be worse.

The only effectual way of observing Thanksgiving day in a Christian land, is by doing something positive and worthy toward bringing to pass the thing that God wants done. This means in every Bible school an offering for Home Missions. However we may have missed our chances in other years, and failed of our duty at other times, let everyone do his best for the Centennial.

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

OXFORD Pictorial Palestine BIBLES

From 55 cents upwards

The originators of this new Pictorial Bible hope they may claim to fill a want. There are many illustrated Bibles. Some contain copies from the Old Masters, and grand as these pictures are in color and artistic skill, no one would venture to say they are correct, either as to place or costume. Other editions contain modern pictures drawn by very capable artists unfamiliar with the East.

"Of all the pictorial Bibles I have seen for children, and for giving to the children on Children's Day, this easily stands first."—The Intermediate Sunday School Quarterly, April, 1908.

In this Bible, the pictures, whatever merit or demerit they may have, are at least true.

To New Friends.

Certain Brethren who wish the truth concerning Professor H. L. Willett's teaching to be known by the ministers of the brotherhood have become responsible for circulating a number of extra copies of this issue of the Christian Century.

Professor Willett is one of the editors of this paper and conducts a department on Biblical Problems each week which is crowded out this week by the Protests against his withdrawal from the Centennial Program.

Since the reorganization of the Christian Century Co. two months ago the support of the paper has been enthusiastically increased. Ministers and laymen conservative and liberal, unite in approving the policy of frank, plain-spoken discussion of the problems of religion and the church.

During this our Centennial Year our columns will be especially interesting both to ministers and laymen.

NOT TOO LATE

Children's Day for Home Missions was celebrated the Lord's Day before Thanksgiving more generally than ever before. Many schools, however, were unable either to have Mr. Fillmore's "New Crusade," or to celebrate the day formally.

I am anxious that every Bible-school should be enlisted this year—THE CENTENNIAL YEAR. The names of the Bible-schools actively interested in Home Missions in THE CENTENNIAL YEAR will present an interesting historical record. I want every school therefore to send in an offering just as soon as convenient, a special offering—if possible—hearty and generous, taken at some agreed-upon time. But if that is impossible send us the regular offering of some Lord's Day. This is a great year and a great cause. You want to be in line I know.

If you can fall into line—and will—write to

The Christian Century

Vol. XXV. CHICAGO, ILL., NOVEMBER 28, 1908 No. 48.

My Confession of Faith—IV. A Summary

In the statements made under this title in foregoing numbers of the Christian Century, I have recorded the more important of my convictions regarding the Old Testament, the New Testament, and the program announced by the fathers of this reformation, a century ago. It remains only to add in this concluding section, a few observations upon the significance of what has been set down.

It must be quite apparent to every reflecting reader that I have not attempted a comprehensive presentation of my beliefs regarding the Bible or the work of the Disciples. There are many other things which might be included in such a confession of faith as I have here recorded. But I hold them to be of lesser significance and have not thought it necessary to include them. I have endeavored to make clear at least the central convictions of my heart, as well as a few of those views which I hold as opinions, but not as tests of fellowship.

I wish to repeat with emphasis what I have already explained to be the purpose of these statements. In all that I have said there has been no effort to bring any reader to my views on these matters. I have not taken time or space to set down the evidence for any one of these convictions. That evidence lies ready to hand in abundance, and during the twenty years which I have spent as teacher, preacher and writer among the Disciples I have set forth that evidence, in the class-room, on the platform and in the press. This I expect to continue as long as I live.

But all that I am concerned to accomplish in this series of utterances is to make quite clear my own position on the most important themes of our faith, and then to ask the question, "Is one who holds these views entitled to a place in that brotherhood which began its labors a hundred years ago, pledged to a fresh and searching study of the Holy Scriptures, to an abandonment of human traditions, to the acceptance of the lordship and leadership of Jesus and to the sincere effort to unite the children of God?" I do not wish to have this issue obscured by any disagreement over mere opinions either regarding the Bible or the plea the fathers made. I am not concerned as to whether any particular reader assents to my opinions on special points that I have mentioned. I am perfectly confident that every Disciple who is entitled to bear the name of Christ shares with me the great convictions of our common faith as to the essential facts and duties of the gospel. More than this, I am assured that a great company of the Disciples share my opinions regarding the main issues of biblical study and Christian teaching. Of this I have been made aware of late by messages specific and convincing beyond all misreading. Not a few have written me that my statements have been more conservative, not only than they expected from me, but more so than they would themselves make.

But this entire question of agreement in matters of opinion, in conclusions regarding the dates and authorships of certain books of the Bible, in views of science and its relation to theology, and in the interpretation of our own history and purposes, is absolutely secondary to the inquiry which has been raised, to which every man is giving an answer either publicly or in his own soul. And in the answer which he gives, whether he desires it or not, he is passing judgment on the plea the fathers made that the appeal must be to Christ alone and not to any human interpretations or opinions; he is pronouncing his verdict on the whole history of Protestantism, which arose as a protest against the uniformity and limitations of Rome, and a plea for liberty of conscience as enlightened by individual study of the Word of God; and he is uttering sentence on the work of Christ, whose first task it was to emancipate men from the legalism and formalism of Jewish traditions and rites, and lead them out into the freedom of the sons of God.

I have no desire to play fast and loose with the term liberty. No one wishes to foster a freedom which is anarchy, nor to think so loosely as to allow our Christian faith to degenerate into a mere limp and lavender liberalism which possesses no convictions and renders no service. We have not so learned Christ. It is not such liberty that the men of this generation are seeking. But they are seeking the privilege of honest inquiry into the greatest questions of life, of frank and fearless investigation of the teachings of Scripture both about the Christ and about themselves. And as I come to know the generation better and become more sensitive to its inquiries, its aspirations, its yearnings after firmer faith, and its profound wish to waste no time with useless and outworn dogma, ritual or machinery, I am increasingly assured that the answer which Christ gave to his own generation, with his insistence upon personal faith in himself and relationship to God; the answer which the fathers of Protestantism gave to the men of their time, in their employment of the plain and convincing historical method in the study of the Bible; the answer which the fathers of our own movement gave, with its emphatic call to the Christ himself, and unity in him, and the answer which the noblest, most consecrated and prophetic spirits in all the churches are giving today, is a true and convincing answer. It is the assurance that God is our Father, that we know him in Christ the Revealer, that freedom from sin is possible only by his redemptive aid, that prayer is heard and answered, that the program of Jesus is practicable and satisfying, and that when our earthly tabernacle is dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. I am convinced that the men of this age are, in their deepest hearts, concerned with no questions so profoundly as with these. It is because I have found the interpretation of the Christian faith to which I have given expression in these papers the most satisfying, final, comforting and inspiring, not only to myself, but also to the people—students, artisans, merchants and professional men—whom I have had the privilege of helping to firmer ground, that I am glad to include such items in these confessions of my faith.

The Disciples of Christ should be by right of origin and of history, the most open-minded, intelligent, progressive and fearless champions of the truth needed by our generation. Many of them have these qualities. Our danger lies in failure to recognize our opportunity for testimony and leadership, and to fall into the easy, careless, fatal satisfaction with past attainments or the equally fatal self-seeking which means insularity, stagnation and death. The choice is upon us. We cannot serve Christ and the mammon of self-interest. To do so would be to retreat into that very traditionalism from which the fathers and the Master made it their task to rescue us. To stand fast in the true liberty, the liberty wherewith Christ has made his people free, loyal to him, to a free and open Bible, and to our historic purpose to unite all believers in one, this is our vocation and our glory.

My life has been spent thus far in the work of this brotherhood. The noblest and most endearing memories of the fathers were my prized inheritance. The names of the brethren who were princes in our Israel were household words in my boyhood home. The fellowship of the master spirits in our ranks today is my constant satisfaction. The future of our work is the subject of my greatest concern. To promote its fulfillment of the noble promise made thus far is an ambition sufficient to make rich all my future years. I have labored too long in its service to be content to see any backward steps taken. So far as in me lies, I shall endeavor to prevent its decline upon lower levels, from which it should be leading the entire Christian world to the higher ground where there is a clearer air and a broader view. These past experiences, these present convictions and these future hopes must be my justification for what might otherwise seem a needlessly personal intrusion upon the good will of those who read what I have set down. That my own views are of special moment to my brethren among the Disciples, I do not for a moment permit myself to believe. But that the principles which I have attempted to consider are of profound significance, and that our attitude toward them will interpret favorably or otherwise our whole enterprise in the thought of the Christian world, no one can question.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

C. W. B. M. Day in December

The C. W. B. M. has a number of distinctions which are not generally known, for the women are not very much inclined to spend time in self-glorification. First of all this society had the largest income of any society in our brotherhood last year. This fact alone entitles the organization to consideration. Again, these women are doing things which no other organization in our brotherhood is doing. It has missions in South America and Mexico, the only ones sustained by our church in these sections. The organization does most of the mission work carried on in the West Indies. Again, this organization has been a pioneer in a new field, that of planting the gospel in the great state universities. Bible chairs are being sustained in Virginia, Michigan and Kansas at the state universities. These chairs sometimes lead young men into the ministry and even where this does not happen, the young people of the universities are given biblical instruction which will do much to make them take a place in the religious forces of the community where they shall be doing their life work.

The missionary situation in our brotherhood quite contradicts the usual estimates of the psychologists as to the character of women. It is usually said that men are systematic while women are emotional. Yet in our churches the women take their missionary offerings by monthly dues while the men still depend upon mass meetings and frenzied appeals. There is no more compact and effective organization among us than the C. W. B. M. Some may question whether it might not have a more representative form of government but none would question that it gets things done.

For all of these reasons, the preacher should give the C. W. B. M. a cordial representation in his church. Let none think that it occupies a place as some mere side issue in the church's life. It has become one of the really effective forces for the fighting of the King's battles. On the first Sunday in December the pastor should be willing to vacate his pulpit to the good women if they have a speaker and if not, he should then set to work early to get acquainted with the varied lines of work the organization carries on. Free from the least shadow of newspaper dictation, possessed of an income already larger than any other society and continually growing, this society is destined to hold a great place in the future progress of the Disciples of Christ.

The Freemasonry of Souls

Why have churches? Religion is a spiritual matter. It is devoutness toward God, mercy toward men and purity in the heart. What has going to church to do with this? Why not worship God under the open sky in field or park, or in the home? Why not be content to keep the mind free of evil and filled with clean thoughts, and extend the open hand of kindness to our brothers?

In the days of old there was good reason for going to church. The minister was the educated man of the community. Books were few, newspapers scant, and the church meeting was a clearing house of information and instruction. Today the press is prolific of books and magazines and newspapers. They are the carriers of truth to each soul. The best sermons are printed. The sermons spoken in the church often lack the spiritual character of such idealistic teachers as Emerson and Carlyle and Maeterlinck. Why not, then, find communion with the greatest souls through their books and shake off the conventional "going to meeting" habit?

Moreover, Jesus founded no church; had, indeed, very little to do with the church, except to expose its leaders. He wore no vestments. No acolytes carried his train, or marched before him with the insignia of a new or an old religion. A preacher, yet he held no official position. A boat was his pulpit or a smooth rock on the hillside. He never asked men to go to church or to join one. He appointed no "days" or services; he wrote no Bible. He preached the kingdom of God, an ideal republic of souls, not an overt institution with officials arranged in a hierarchy. And, as if to make yet more individualistic his message, he declared that this kingdom was within men, not outward and observable and ceremonial.

Why have churches, then? It would seem that our conventional church habits are an appendage to the Christianity of Christ.

But let us look a bit further into what Christ did.

He did get men together. Their getting together was informal, his own person was the unifying factor of their company. He called men to follow him and they found themselves forthwith in a social company of others who had likewise been called. He knew that the social give and take among his disciples was necessary in order for his message to be understood and to become effective in their lives. He kept these men near to him and near to one another. They shared life in common. There was no ritual, no plan for an institution. There was just this gathering of men together to talk together over what their life might mean at bottom, to learn from the One who was able to teach, to question one another on the meanings of the lessons, and to plan together how they could teach others and help others. This Jesus did do; He brought men together that they might think and pray and plan and work together.

And this is not the least of the secrets of Christianity's power: it presupposes that the goods of life are procured through a social exchange and it provides a way for this exchange to take place. The religion of Jesus is not just an individual experience but a social experience—socially conditioned and socially obligated. Being a Christian is not to go away from the world to think and think, but to think in company, to talk your thoughts, to listen to others talk their thoughts and to plan to make the big, common, social thought a practical reality in the world.

And the church is just this spiritual intercourse taking place. The church is not an institution, it is not a building, not a time or a place, it is an assembling of souls, a coming together that, doubting, we may be strengthened by the faith of others, or believing, we may bring courage to the soul that is distressed.

The church is the organized freemasonry of the Spirit.

What is the unifying principle of this free masonry of souls? It is not an aesthetic bond—a similarity in tastes, or an equality in "society." It is not an aristocratic bond—an equality in culture or wealth. "The rich and the poor meet together; the Lord is the Maker of them all." Nor is it an intellectual bond—an agreement in a creedal statement of truth. The church is the one level upon which man meets man, where the accidents and artifices and limitations that separate them, soul from soul, in business, in society, in education—where all these barriers are broken down and the really human of us holds communion with the really human of others. The Holy Spirit is the bond of the fraternity.

The church is on the level. Its level is the spiritual nature of man, not any accidental possession he may have.

It is this freemasonry of souls that gives meaning and argument to everything we do in the church. The ordinances derive their value as means of promoting this free-fellowship. The great argument for baptism is not that Christ commanded it, but that man needs it. The heart would have invented it had not Christ authorized it. And so the commission of Christ to baptize is really an argument for Christ as well as an argument for baptism. It shows how well he knew our needs, how well he read our natures and how adequately he provided in the church for our deepest life. Baptism initiates into this fraternity. It marks with a beautiful symbol each soul's self-committment to the common life. It is his oath of allegiance to the republic of the Spirit.

The Lord's Supper, too, derives its value as a function in maintaining the communal spirit. It is the sweetest symbol of our fraternity. The common loaf, the common cup, the common Christ of whom we all partake—it is more than a feast of memory, it is a fraternal communion, it is the holy altar of the freemasonry of souls.

In this view how meaningful are our gatherings together in the house of God! What lack in the lives of those who refuse to assemble with their brothers on the level of the Spirit! The singing together, the praying together, the thinking together, the resolving together, the working together—the together-ness of our religion is the essence of it. Who can sing the "Hallelujah Chorus" alone? If closet prayer has certain values that public prayer does not possess, let us also freely grant that there is a unique thrill and uplift, an enlargement and enriching of soul, in a true preacher's leading his people together to God's throne.

Moreover, the high themes of life gain in cogency when discoursed in the assembly. Sheer truth makes little progress by itself. It seeks to socialize itself. It likes to find men together. It gets cogency from the reciprocity of minds.

Where in all the world is there a meeting of souls so beautiful, so stimulating in its presuppositions, as that of a congregation reverently gathering in one place to be instructed in the things of God by a man of God?

And the prayer meeting, treated with contempt by ninety-five per cent. of the Christian people, what an ideally beautiful occasion it might be! It is the soul's big chance. Here even the distinction between teacher and taught is broken down and all are teachers and all are taught. It is here that the freemasonry of souls finds its most characteristic expression. The weak show their weakness and the strong lend their strength. Self-importance and self-seeking have no place. We are gathered together on this level because we are soul's with aspirations aching in us, with great deep needs for companionship and faith. Some of us blunder along in the valley. Some climb bravely up the steep ascent. Rare soul's achieve the heights and stand above us with the golden crown of the morning upon their heads.

And the church is the invisible upland to which the blunderers and the climbers and those who dwell in the heights may come, those above to help those below, while all cling fast to the hand of Christ.

The Simplest Way to Lasting Peace

Our brotherhood is in the throes of a grievous controversy. A theological controversy is bad enough at any time. But this is not merely a difference of opinion about theology. The well being of our missionary societies is manaced by one party to the controversy. The Christian Standard threatens to throw its influence against the missionary societies unless certain brethren are removed from the program of the Centennial Convention. One of these brethren, H. L. Willett, comes forward and agrees to resign from the program if the owner of The Standard will give assurance either in the columns of his paper or by private pledge that there will be no attack on the remainder of the program, and that the missionary societies will be relieved of further menace. Dr. Willett has taken this position in the face of a storm of protest from many of the best brethren of the church. He feels that the burden of a depleted missionary collection this year would be a responsibility he could not personally endure to bear. Therefore he has graciously placed himself in a position where, if the brotherhood is able to estop the Christian Standard's further attack, there will be no occasion for further agitation.

It is interesting to note how prolific in "solutions" our brethren are. Many proposals to solve all our difficulties have been suggested to us. The latest is certainly the most interesting of all. It proposes that a new Centennial committee be appointed to make a new program altogether!

We have a proposal to make. It is brand-new. It is original. No one seems to have thought of it. But it is the most obviously right method of all. It would settle the controversy not for this year only, but for all time. It would bring a lasting peace.

Our proposal is that the Christian Standard tell the truth about Professor Willett to its readers! It does not seem to us sufficient that the Standard keep still merely, that it sit with folded hands while we march up to Pittsburg. The cause of peace which many brethren are pleading now, can be realized easily if the Standard will do a simple act of justice. It has poisoned and corrupted the minds of many of its readers against Professor Willett. It has taken the headlines of newspapers in preference to his own statements. It has said things about him that were simply untrue. Now the surest way of bringing in true peace is for the Standard to make a statement to its readers somewhat as follows:

1. Professor Willett believes in one living and true God.
2. He believes in Jesus Christ as the Son of God, his Savior and Lord.
3. He believes in the Holy Scriptures as the Word of God, able to make all men wise unto salvation.
4. He believes that Jesus was born of a Virgin.
5. He believes that Jesus worked miracles.
6. He believes that Jesus rose from the dead and is a living, regnant Christ today.

If on these points the Christian Standard would enlighten its readers, we believe we would have peace indeed. And why should not the Standard do so simple an act of justice as this. That paper is itself responsible for whatever sentiment against Professor Willett prevails among its readers. Its so-called "protest" against his being on the program is largely the reflection of the Standard's own instruction of its readers. The paper calls Dr. Willett an infidel. He is made out a destroyer of the faith, disloyal to our plea, a treacherous teacher of young men.

Why should not the Standard make the "amende honorable." Here is a chance for Russell Errett to show his Christian character, which he so vigorously defended against the exposure of A. McLean a year ago. Here is a simple Christian act to be done. Let the Standard say: We stated thus and thus about Professor Willett's views. We find now that we based our statements upon misinformation or misconstruction of his utterances. Dr. Willett now tells us that he does believe in those verities which, by direct statement, and by implication, we charged him with denying. We accept his statements and assure our readers that any man of Christian character who confesses his faith in these facts is our brother and may have the fullest fellowship with us.

Is not this the way of real peace? Is there any other way to real peace? Is it not simply Jesus' way? Professor Willett will cheerfully withdraw from the program if his withdrawal will bring only so much as nominal and apparent peace. That kind of peace might do very well for a political party, but is it the kind of peace this is worth anything in the church of Jesus Christ? In the nature of the case Professor Willett's withdrawal from the program can procure at the most only a show of peace. His withdrawal will outrage the consciences of thousands of our leading brethren who will go to Pittsburg with bleeding hearts.

Some who want peace at any price urge that it is a condition not a theory that confronts us. Dr. Willett has been misrepresented, they admit. He is in reality true to our plea and our Christ. But many brethren are prejudiced against him. They know him only as he has been caricatured in the Christian Standard. There is no hope of setting their minds right. The personal Confession of Faith printed by Dr. Willett in the Christian Century reaches only a small fragment of the Standard's readers. Therefore, helpless as we are to get the truth known, the only course left is for Dr. Willett to withdraw and bring peace. This is the reasoning of some.

Our point now is that we are not helpless unless the conscience of the Christian Standard is calloused. The Standard's columns are the channel by which a misinformed brotherhood can be reached. Let the Standard tell the truth about Dr. Willett. That will stop the letters of protest they are receiving. That will relieve the anxiety of the missionary secretaries. That will spread abroad among us such a spirit of good-will that our treasuries will not hold the offerings the churches will send in. That will give the young man newly called to edit the Christian Standard a place in the heart of the brotherhood that will make him a true successor to Isaac Errett.

The Christian Standard has the key to the situation. It can bring about a peace that is peace, indeed.

They Speak For Themselves

The voice of the brotherhood is speaking in emphatic tones to Professor Willett and the Christian Century protesting against his withdrawal from the Centennial program. Men who stand highest in the counsels of our people, who know what our plea is, insist that there is room with the Disciples for such as he. The revelations of our issue of two weeks ago have shocked the brotherhood into a consciousness of the gravity of the present situation. The Disciples of Christ demand open discussion. They abhor a subterranean "arrangement." No compact between Russell Errett and H. L. Willett involving a sacrifice of one to save the face of the other will be tolerated. These letters call for no comment from us. They speak for themselves.

To The Christian Century:

For nearly twelve years I have tried to present Christ to this community in such a manner that men would love and obey him. I have been too busy to find fault with my brethren. I have marveled how men in dead earnest about Christ could find time to write the stuff that appears in some of our papers. I pause for a moment in the midst of a great revival to enter my most earnest protest against Brother Willett resigning from the Centennial program. If the time has come when one man can browbeat a million freemen in Christ Jesus we ought to know it. If anyone is to resign let him resign whose hands are red by the life blood of our missionary societies, who has put Christ to shame oftener, who has caused more grief and bitterness, who has stirred up more strife for six or eight years than any other man or set of men in our brotherhood. God cannot hold this man guiltless. Let him resign. Let us exalt Christ.

Salina, Kansas. David H. Shields.

Loyalty to the faith and liberty of opinion are the two pillars of our distinctive plea for union and both must be maintained in their full strength and scope. If either is weakened or denied, our whole movement will prove a disastrous failure. Infringement of the right of opinion is a surrender of the plea of the pioneers of our restoration as clearly as the denial of the faith. If this is permitted by the Disciples the Centennial should be declared off, since we shall have nothing worth while to celebrate after we have thus demonstrated that the famous declaration and address of Thomas Campbell is a prodigious farce.

This Cincinnati apostasy must be arrested in its downward and destructive tendencies. It is the mightiest force for the ruin of our cause that has ever appeared in our history. As Peter said of certain of the sect of the Pharisees, so say we: "Now, therefore, why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we are able to bear."

Indianapolis, Ind. W. L. Hayden.

Dear Brother Willett: I wish to express my approval of the course you are pursuing in the Centennial program controversy. I well understand that you care nothing for the mere fact of being on the program, but there is a great principle involved in the attitude of our brotherhood toward those who differ in matters of opinion from the traditional views of things. I am glad that the program committee desire that you deliver the address as they first had planned, and I am glad that you are willing to leave this to their judgment. In my judgment it would be very wrong to yield to the narrow and carping criticisms of the Standard. You are right in your position on miracles, besides opinions on such matters cannot be made a test of fellowship among the Disciples of Christ. I am much pleased with the New Christian Century and the more vigorous attitude it is assuming on the questions before the brotherhood.

Boise, Idaho. A. L. Chapman.

Men Who Protest

My Dear Dr. Willett: I have just read the article in the Century on page 665 and am amazed at the facts presented. The situation seems to me to be very grave. I realize the exceeding delicacy of your situation, and I appreciate somewhat, I think, the nature of the pressure brought to bear upon you. The situation in respect to our missionary societies is also precarious, but it seems to me that we have arrived at a point where neither personal preference nor expediency can be relied upon to determine our conduct. If the situation is as presented, I, for one, cannot approve of surrender. If you withdraw, the fight is hopeless. In view of that for which you have always stood, in view of the cause of liberty of conscience, I hope you will not withdraw out of any personal feelings of modesty.

I have never taken personal hand in the conflict because I was in no way thrown into it, but if the issue can be drawn as clearly as the present article draws it I am ready to support the Century position and lend whatever aid lies within my power. The fight is on. I am unwilling to go muzzled to Pittsburg.

Yours sincerely,

New York. J. P. Lichtenberger.

Dear Brother Willett: I have just read with considerable interest the account in The Century that there was a likelihood of your agreeing to withdraw from the Centennial program in order to prevent an attack by the Lord-Errett faction upon the missionary offerings for the ensuing year.

I desire to express to you my personal disapproval of such a step on your part for the following reasons:

First, Messrs. Lord and Errett are assuming a prerogative which is not theirs either by right of inheritance or election.

Second, If all charges made by them were true you yet might be representative of quite a large following who by right of their choice would demand a representative.

Third, That if any men or set of men can by threats of such a character as they have made, control our brotherhood the sooner we know of this and overcome such a power the quicker we will attain our ideal.

There might be reasons ad infinitum offered but it seems childish to wrangle over such matters. Suffice to say that your frank statements that have been appearing in the last three issues of the Century have taken from "our friends" all grounds on which to stand and they now resort to methods quite in keeping with other efforts. I have never felt it my duty to declare myself before over the many controversies which have been going pro and con but I could not resist the impulse to assure you of our belief in you and to urge a firm stand for principles which you believe to be true.

Fraternally yours,

Table Grove, Ill. W. L. Hipsley.

Dear Brother Willett: I am happy. I want to write you. It has been a long while since I enjoyed myself as much as I did last night reading the November 14, New Christian Century.

I think it is wise on your part to print your "Confession of Faith," the way you are putting it. I sympathize with you in your efforts to teach us legalists. Some of us are deep in the darkness; but we will get out, or into the twilight, perhaps, if you will patiently keep on helping us. Personally I enjoy your writing.

I have just written Brother Geo. A. Campbell. He is fine. His articles are unique, and wonderfully helpful.

The New Christian Century is great! Whoever it is that is writing such articles as "Shall Professor Willett Resign?" is competent to handle Russell Errett and the Christian Standard. If the Century will keep up the fight as well as they have started in of late, they will win. You have the truth, you have the favor of God, and it seems to me that the Century has struggled along for just such a time as this.

J. H. Fillmore.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

My Dear Dr. Willett: I cannot tell you with what interest I have read the two installments of your "Confession of Faith." But for bigotry and malignity your statements would convince any honest man that there is not only room in our brotherhood for you, but that you are absolutely necessary to us in our work. Your "Confession" is really the confession of multitudes of our preachers. Many of us could sign our names to it. Must this multitude sit down and let your enemy, the Standard, malign and harrass you? God forbid. In my own little corner I have done all I could to drive that viper out. No man who values truth more than partisanship is safe with that insidious influence at work among his people.

I want to protest against your resigning from the Centennial program. I recognize the unpleasant position in which this controversy has placed you. I know that you never sought the place, nor coveted it as a personal matter. But I also know that the Centennial will be ruined for multitudes if you are not on the program. We want you there because your ability and your sacrifices for our cause justly place you there. Yes, we want you there because of the principle involved. If our secretaries have advised your withdrawal they have "gone on the war path" instead of on the road to peace. If you are not on the program then let us go to Pittsburg to mourn in sack cloth and ashes our slavery, rather than to make a hurrah for a professed liberty that has no existence.

Cecil J. Armstrong.

Troy, N. Y.

I see no reason why H. L. Willett should not give an address at Pittsburg. I expect to go to the Centennial and shall hope to hear him.

As to his orthodoxy I do not know who is to decide. I am a devoted "Campbellite" and Alexander Campbell gave definition of orthodoxy as "my doxy" and heterodoxy as "your doxy."

In this day of searching for truth I think we should deal very charitably and considerately with each other.

H. F. Barstow.

Grand Rapids, Mich.

Editors of Christian Century: Your center shots at the would-be archbishop, Russell Errett, are grand. Continue the war! If you give up now, go to Pittsburg and elect Errett and Lord dictators of the Christian, then come home and wait for your orders. In the name of heaven stand by the Eight (8) on the Centennial program who said, "no man shall dictate who shall speak at Pittsburg." I have read our papers for forty years, the Century is up to any of them.

J. C. McArthur.

Salina, Kansas.

C. C. Morrison, Editor Christian Century: Now is the time to stand by the guns. Professor Willett is right. The far larger part of the better brains and hearts of the Disciples know that he is right in this controversy. Is so great a people with such a heritage of heroism, to now fear such a paper as the Standard?

Yet I am convinced that this matter should be decided chiefly by the feelings of Brother Willett. Only he and his Father in heaven can foretell the manner and method in which he will be able to most effectually continue the noble propaganda that the Lord has seen fit to commit into his hands and ours.

If he should resign, the Pittsburg convention will demand to hear his voice, and will give him such an ovation and endorsement as no man among us has ever received.

Jesse B. Haston.

Denver, Col.

My Dear Dr. Willett: Having carefully read your "Confession of Faith," as published in successive issues of The Christian Century, I wish to say that I think you "stand on the platform which the fathers of this reformation declared to be sufficient for the people of God."

May I also express the hope that you will not resign the place assigned you on the Centennial program. This I do both as an act of simple justice to a fellow Christian and fidelity to the spirit of liberty which has always characterized the Disciples of Christ. Wishing you every blessing, I remain in all Christian affection, Your friend,

N. M. Ragland.

Springfield, Mo.

Editors Christian Century: It has been with a pained heart that I have followed the attack upon Professor Willett by some of our brethren. It would be a severe blow to our plea for liberty if he were removed from the program. For the life of me I cannot see anything wrong in having a man of Brother Willett's unquestioned Christian character represent us. Jesus Christ demanded nothing as a test of fellowship which could not be reduced to the terms of life. Shall we make intellectual conceptions in the realm of theory, or vital connection in the realm of experience, the standard today? The very genius of our movement says "make room for Willett." George H. Coombs said at Norfolk that we ought to have a platform big enough to hold a Willett and a McGarvey, and why not? Where is the jury to try one accused of heresy, by what canons shall he be judged and who will appoint the inquisitorial board?

God pity us if we have come to the point where any great number of us would use the "big stick" and say to our missionary boards "put him off or we will quit paying." Whereunto would such a program carry us? I cannot believe this would be true of our great royal brotherhood. When I was a lad I heard one of our preachers describe with what certain victory this movement would be crowned if we were not sidetracked somewhere along the way. Have we come to the siding? Are we to pull off the main line of our splendid successes when we were headed right and making good time, there to wait and watch other good brotherhoods go by in the accomplishment of their great purposes, while all who behold us shall say, "they took the wrong siding"? May the God who has given us our mission guide us to His own glory.

Most fraternally,

Augusta, Ga. Howard T. Cree.

The Brotherhood's Conscience Outraged

Editors Christian Century: Basing an opinion on the magnificent address which Dr. Willett delivered at the Presbyterian Church in this city during the convention, I would consider it a great misfortune not to have the privilege of hearing him again, in Pittsburg.

I have not kept up with the controversy carried on in the papers concerning the matter, but whatever truth there may be in that, we cannot afford to put ourselves on the side of the dogmatist, who is afraid for his teachings to pass the scrutiny of the thinking minds.

I have always been one of the most conservative of the conservatives and I am very loyal to the Word, if I know my heart; yet am not afraid but that the Word can stand the light of scholarly research. Paul said, "For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth."

In the first years of my ministry I very unfortunately used invective and denunciatory methods of opposition against those who would dare to differ from me, but since carefully studying the scriptures I find that this was not the spirit and method of Christ, but on the other hand he courted investigation and seemed to fear more the dead weight of the non-thinking minds than he did the possibility of error growing out of vigorous research: in fact it seems to me that God, Christ and the writers of the Old and New Testaments challenged investigation always and everywhere.

It is a demonstrated fact that we cannot put these questions down by casting our votes to seal the lips of those who are propounding them, and it is just as certain that any church which undertakes to settle them in that way is but sounding its own death-knell.

Let our church papers take up these questions of criticism and discuss them—not the men—in a brotherly and scholarly way and leave the people to be the jury to decide who is right; our brotherhood is not a body of weaklings that they should have some to draw their conclusions for them; they are quite expert in deciding the merits of a friendly controversy. Any other kind is more destructive than higher criticism.

I am quite certain that Dr. Willett has the tact and the wisdom to deliver only such a message at our centennial convention as will strengthen our faith and reflect glory upon our fathers and the Christ of the Gospels; to this end it is my great desire to hear him in Pittsburg.

Yours fraternally,
W. M. Taylor.

New Orleans, La.

Dear Brother Willett: I wish to write you expressing my appreciation of the most splendid manner in which you have written your "Confession of Faith" in the Old and New Testaments. Your statements are safe, sane and constructive. I find no difficulty in agreeing with you on nearly every point. Unless a man is so wrapped in a dead medieval theology that the light of the twentieth century cannot penetrate it, I don't see how he can object to your statements. If he can not acknowledge it all, he should certainly be willing to grant you the "liberty of opinion" he assumes for himself.

As one individual, I want to urge you not to resign your place on the Centennial program. I am opposed to giving up the slogan that has guided us safely for a hundred years—"Where the scriptures speak, we speak, and where the scriptures are silent, we are silent." I am opposed to a "moss-back" and out-grown theology, or even a selfish paper skillfully manipulated for self interest to dictate the policy of a great brotherhood. When we assemble in Pittsburg in Centennial Convention, with the whole world as spectators, I think the "moss" should be scraped off of our backs at least in spots. If a man is loyal to Christ, I am willing that he represent any school of theology that may seem best to him and that meets his needs most completely. And I urge upon him to give to every one else the same liberty of conscience.

I am constrained to think the great body of our brotherhood will want you to fill your place on the Centennial program. I don't think the voice of this great people has been spoken, on this subject, in the columns of the Christian Standard.

I have written this letter because duty and the spirit of fairness has prompted it. I also want you to know that I appreciate the fight you are making for our brotherhood as well as in defense of self.

Yours in His name,
J. W. Reynolds.
Salem, Ohio.

P. S. We are in a good meeting with M. J. Grable, a former pastor, as evangelist.

Dear Bro. Willett:

I am deeply grieved, I am amazed that the Missionary Secretaries should ask you to resign. Better that the missionary offerings should show a decided falling off even in the Centennial year than that you, or any man, should be dictated to by the cut-throat paper at Cincinnati in the interest of a pseudo-peace.

The great body of Disciples who love and trust you do not for a moment imagine you are coveting a place on the program, but believing you to be the prophet of a better day soon to dawn they want you on that program.

J. P. Rowlison.
No. Vernon, Ind.

To The Christian Century: I have expressed the conviction to a member of the program committee that Dr. Willett should not be moved nor requested to resign, for the following reasons:

First, If Dr. Willett has convictions not in harmony with some then he is entitled to a place on any platform of the brotherhood to which he may be called. If he is not in good standing with any one or any number of his brethren elsewhere, let him be tried at home, and if condemned, then it will be time to exclude him from our platforms.

Second, If Dr. Willett has expressed convictions on any question not in harmony with some editors and brethren among us, who gave them the right to condemn him without trial?

Third, If Dr. Willett is loyal to the Christ who shall declare his convictions on other questions, right or wrong, unfit him to appear on any platform among the brotherhood?

Fourth, If Dr. Willett is forced to retire from his place on our Centennial platform, then alas for our boast of liberty in Christ. Alas! for our boasted love of learning and freedom.

Fifth, If Dr. Willett has convictions not in harmony with some even a majority of his brethren, he is not worse than Alexander Campbell, when he was practically driven from the Baptist church.

Finally, the writer is not in harmony with the views recently expressed by Dr. Willett. He does not believe that one per cent of the Disciple Brotherhood holds his views, but while he is pure in heart and clean in life and loyal to Christ, there is room for him in any department of our work to which he is called.

Fraternally,
T. P. Haley.
Kansas City, Mo.

Dr. Willett resign? What for? He's a Christian, he's a Disciple; he's competent; he's without a peer upon the platform, and his character is beyond reproach. Why, then? Why? For the sake of peace? But there is no peace. For more than ten years to my personal knowledge, the Christian Standard has been attacking some good man or cause and will probably continue to do so until an economic danger is scented.

Moreover is our liberty to think and speak freely to be surrendered for the sake of a few musty dollars to swell the annual report of the societies. A. McLean whipped the opposition to a standstill a year ago, nevertheless, more of our churches gave more money to foreign missions this last year than ever before.

Professor Willett and the committee should stand by their guns and we will support them.

W. D. Endres.
Harvey, Ill.

Christian Century, Chicago, Ill.: I do not think Dr. Willett should withdraw from the Centennial program. I do not look upon this as a personal matter, the whole question is one affecting the liberty of every man in the brotherhood. Dr. Willett's withdrawal would be tantamount to an acknowledgment that somebody or other has the right to pass on the orthodoxy or heterodoxy of a member of the Christian Church. And that nobody has such a right is the very thing for which we have been fighting and for which we must continue to fight, or give up our appeal. We have no right to exist if we once acknowledge that any body of men or any man or any authority of human character can be constituted to pass on our intellectual positions. As soon as we admit that we are done for, because if we stand for anything, it is for union; and to constitute any authority on matters of intellectual opinion, however important, would immediately tend to disunion.

I do not consider this a question of expediency; expediency has absolutely no place where freedom is involved. Personally I do not believe that one dollar of missionary contributions will be sacrificed by a firm stand in this matter. But I would rather see every dollar sacrificed than to see our entire position as a brotherhood jeopardized, subverted, annihilated. In my mind this is a time to die in the last ditch, if that were necessary. The language is a trifle heroic, I know, because no one is going to kill us in the last ditch; no one is going to turn us out of the brotherhood; they can't. But if they were, it seems to me right here is the ground on which we should give our last gasp as free citizens in the Kingdom of God.

Burris A. Jenkins.
Kansas City, Mo.

I would like to add a word in protest to Dr. Willett withdrawing from our Centennial program. I feel I can say with Patrick Henry, "Gentlemen may cry peace, peace; but there is no peace only in submission and slavery." Besides we have no election if we are true to the liberty in which Christ hath made us free.

Very sincerely,
Mrs. E. N. Holmes.
Peoria, Ill.

I am unalterably opposed to the resignation of Professor Willett from the program of the Centennial Convention. I believe in and crave peace, but not at the price of liberty. The only peace and success worthy our great plea must come through the exercise of Christian love and charity by all, toward all, believing in the Sonship of Jesus.

A Ministerial Association Protests

The question as to whether Professor Willett shall appear on the Centennial program is not, as I apprehend it, a question regarding what people think of his orthodoxy or lack of orthodoxy. He has appeared many times before on our national programs and he is the same man with the same faith today that he was then. The Centennial committee, as I apprehend it, is not a tribunal to discriminate as to the relative faith of our preachers or any others whose names may be proposed. There have appeared on our programs men of many denominational creeds and at times men who presumably had none. The question, as I apprehend it, is whether good men, whose faith has never been impeached, selected to perform certain duties for a great brotherhood and who proceed to perform these duties to the best of their ability must submit to the dictation of the opinions of others. The question is one of Christian liberty and is far more vital than the views of any individual. If the actions of the Centennial committee or any other servant of the brotherhood do not suit any individual he has an inherent right to object as vigorously as he pleases and to seek by all honorable means to have something different done. But he has not the right to use the big stick or to threaten the interests of the church of Christ. Our believers in Christian liberty and courtesy will never submit to the dictation by any class. The question is settled from one aspect. Professor Willett will appear on the program. The practical question now is whether our great missionary interests are to be knifed by men whose opinions differ from the opinions of the Centennial committee. Concerning the personal views of Mr. Willett, these words are neither a defense nor an offense.

Valparaiso, Indiana. Bruce Brown.

Editor Christian Century: I am in accord with what you say on "Shall Professor Willett Resign?" It is surely a bad precedent to make a man's opinions on religious questions a test of his fitness to appear on a missionary program. Besides this the attack on Willett is a direct attack on our missionary work and should not be allowed to go unrebuked by a great brotherhood. The idea of not supporting our missionaries because this or that man appears on a convention program is absurd. The man who makes such an excuse is searching for an opportunity to follow the desire of his heart.

SHOULD PROFESSOR WILLETT RESIGN?

From what is he asked to resign and why? From the program of the Centennial Convention to be held in Pittsburg next year. Of what will the Centennial Convention be a celebration and why is it appointed for the year 1909? The Centennial will celebrate one hundred years of the history of the movement known as the Christian or Disciple Church, a movement for the union of the divided forces of Christendom upon the principle "that the Church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one; consisting of all those in every place that profess their faith in Christ and obedience to him in all things according to the scriptures and that manifest the same by their tempers and conduct." (From the address of Thomas Campbell.) The movement was a protest against the division of the Church of Christ through the principle of excluding from membership in the various churches all those who did not hold the formulated doctrinal statements contained in the creeds of those churches. The year 1909 has been selected in which to celebrate this movement because the declaration and address setting forth the above principle was issued September 7, 1809. No one will claim that that declaration and address were intended to be a new creed or standard for the church, but they do set forth the spirit and purpose of the movement. Proposition six of the address runs as follows, "that although inferences and deductions from scripture premises, when fairly inferred, may be truly called the doctrine of God's holy word; yet are they not formally binding upon the consciences of Christians farther than they perceive the connection, and evidently see that they are so; for their faith must not stand in the wisdom of men; but in the power and veracity of God; therefore, no such deduction can be made terms of communion, but do properly belong to the after and progressive edification of the church. Hence it is evident that no such deductions or inferential truths ought to have any place in the church's confession."

Now Professor Willett is asked to resign because, it is said, he does not represent the brotherhood. In what? Not in the fact of Christ's divinity. He even holds to the fact of the virgin birth. Not in the fact of Christ's miracles, but, we are told, in that he holds to a certain philosophy of miracles. Is not the demand that Professor Willett resign because he does not hold a certain philosophy of miracles a return in principle to the very thing against which our movement is a protest? The question at issue is not whether his philosophy of miracles is true or false, but what have his views upon that subject to do with his representing the brotherhood? Must we as a Christian brotherhood agree upon a philosophy of miracles before we celebrate our Centennial? If so I fear we will have to set a later date than October, 1909, for the celebration.

AN OVERTURE FOR PEACE.

The Ministerial Association of Indianapolis and vicinity deeply deplores the controversy occasioned by certain appointments on the Centennial program.

The necessity for ignoring all personal and party peculiarities and receiving one another in a common faith without regard to opinions, is manifest in order that our Centennial may be a magnificent celebration in which the whole brotherhood can join.

We therefore, believe it to be for the best interests of our cause and the plea for Christian union that all the brotherhood should acquiesce in the decision of the committee having the responsibility for the program and that further agitation of the matter in our church papers should cease at once.

We cordially commend our missionary boards for confining themselves to their expressed purpose and have full confidence that the brethren at large will approve their course as eminently wise.

Therefore, brethren in the Lord, let us all "endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" and "follow after the things that make for peace and things wherewith one may edify another."

SHALL WE GO BACKWARD?

The Christian Century:

I regret more deeply than I can express that in our great Brotherhood, seeking so sincerely to follow Jesus only, seeking also, thereby to lay stress upon a great principle of unity and manifest to the Christian world that same spirit—I regret that in such a body the very opposite spirit should be so evident in the effort now being made to strike Prof. Willett's name from the Pittsburg program. I rise to champion the cause of no man or movement among us. I belong to the brotherhood and feel myself akin to every member of it, and every phase of its thought and life, and believe sincerely that we have abundant room for every man in it. Whence comes this insistence that somebody has authority to say what somebody else shall do? Who shall presume to spy out the liberty we have in Christ? In Christ are we not free, and what man is qualified to say which one of us is not in Christ? These are questions that will never be answered. For a hundred years we have been saying that our faith is in a person rather than a doctrinal statement, and that the personal faith in a person is the basis of unity. Are we going to wake up at Pittsburg and find that we are further back on the dial of progress than we were in 1809? Let a host of free men answer that question. I am wedded to this great movement, the fair daughter of the west; born and reared in it, and for nearly twenty years have done my poor best to make it appear the big, broad thing that it really is, and shall proudly stand there, not for the sake of the movement, but for its glorious ultimation—a united Christendom. God has given me as much authority to tell a man to step aside as he has to anybody else, and that is absolutely none. My candid opinion is that if each one of us will keep himself in the straight and narrow way he will do well.

If we are to insist upon a dead and monotonous uniformity and strangle that spirit that permits variety and unity to go hand in hand, we are a mistake. If our plea is not large enough for all who love the Lord in sincerity, it is not a union plea, but a sectarian plea. The question is not, who shall speak on the Pittsburg program, but who has placed somebody to be a ruler and a judge over us? Therefore we urge that the program committee be left free to use their wisdom in making up the bill of fare. Speaking personally, I never saw Professor Willett attempt a task that was not gracefully and efficiently, and I will say scripturally, accomplished. To demur because he does not always walk in familiar paths is not the spirit of progress. Let all men speak, and let them speak in the open, for truth cannot perish but rather thrives in the arena of free, open discussion. "Truth wears no mask, bows at no shrine, seeks neither place nor applause, and asks only a hearing."

Our Essential Plea Imperiled

SHALL PROF. WILLETT RESIGN?

If it is the intention of the Disciples of Christ to celebrate the Centennial of the Declaration and address of Thomas Campbell in October, 1909, in such a way as to sacrifice the fundamental principles—liberty in Christ, loyalty to Christ, and love for Christ and his followers—of that historic document, then let Prof. Willett resign or be put off the program. But if it is our wish and intention to celebrate that memorable event in a manner that shall exemplify to our whole brotherhood and to the world at large, the meaning and spirit of that instrument then let Prof. Willett remain on the program. Personally, I would rather see this whole Centennial proposition collapse and pass into innocuous desuetude, going where the woodbine twineth, than to see it enacted along the farcical lines on which it is now moving.

Is Prof. Willett intellectually qualified to hold a place on the Centennial program? No man in our ranks is more so. Does his moral character disqualify him? No one would dare make the suggestion. Is he a genuine believer in and a true follower of our Lord Jesus Christ? Of this there is not the shadow of a doubt. Then on what ground is he to be denied a place on the Centennial program? If it is not on the ground of personal malice, as I fear it is with some, it can only be on the ground that Prof. Willett holds some peculiar philosophy concerning inspiration and miracles. So does every other man who allows himself to think on these subjects. I do not agree with Prof. Willett in some of his views. Neither do I agree with Brother McGarvey or Brother Briney, or Brother David Lipscomb in some of their views. But is this a valid reason why I should object to any or all of these, my brethren, appearing on the Centennial program? It will be the chief glory of that occasion to see these strong Christian men of divergent views sitting together in unity, and celebrating the historic event that made possible such liberty, such loyalty and such fraternity.

So far as known to me there is no church, from the Roman Catholic to the Mormons, that has not within its fold different schools of thought. There are "many men of many minds." They cannot all think alike. Recognizing these facts it was the purpose of the "Declaration and Address" to find a tolerant platform on which the loyal subjects of Jesus Christ could stand together with differing opinions but united hearts. The Church of Christ was rent and divided into discordant and jarring sects, when in 1809 the voice of Thomas Campbell was heard "crying in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord." Are we, now, on the eve of celebrating that conspicuous epoch in the religious history of America, going to turn the hands on the dial back a hundred years by fomenting strife, creating dissentions and divisions and sects among the very people who have fought their way out from these very conditions into a broader vision? God forbid.

In the Christian Standard of Nov. 14, 1908, is an editorial on "The Conserving Creed." In it I find this paragraph:

"The spirit of fraternity is abroad today among Christian believers, and good men of all communions are considering what may be done to consummate Christian unity. The impossibility of agreeing on any human confession of faith is easily demonstrated. The necessity for ignoring all personal and party peculiarities, and receiving one another in a common faith without regard to opinions, is manifest. If it is asked who should be united, we answer, All the children of God, all who have been redeemed by the blood of Christ. The saved should be one people, uniting in one creed and granting to each other the fullest liberty of opinion consistent with loyalty to the common faith."

When I read this article my heart expanded. It was a new note in that periodical. I had not found such a sentiment in the Standard for ten years. I thanked God and took courage. But, now, listen. In the very same paper of the very same date in another column was another editorial. In this there is a threat held over the brotherhood, that if Prof. Willett is retained on the Centennial program, then the dogs of war will be turned loose from the Standard office on our organized missionary work and on the Centennial celebration to the discomfiture of the whole brotherhood. "Consistency, though art a jewel." "Doth the same mouth send forth blessing and cursing?" "Doth the same fountain send forth sweet water and bitter? These things ought not so to be." (James 3: 10).

The Christian Standard seems to me to have lost the capacity of blushing for shame. This persecution of Prof. Willett—and this is just what it is—only makes for him a larger place in the sympathies and affections of the brotherhood.

Peter and Paul had a dissension, Paul and Barnabas had a difference, yet they did not seek to ostracise each other or to depose one another from any program of common Christian work. Shall Prof. Willett resign? No. A thousand times NO. If this battle has to be fought, let it be fought now, and fought to a finish.

A. B. Jones.

"BRETHREN, YE HAVE BEEN CALLED UNTO LIBERTY."

As one knowing, loving and trusting H. L. Willett as an able, consecrated, Christian man, it seems the least that friendship could do to declare one's faith in him, when prejudice and criticism are rampant.

From the days of Luther onward, Protestant critics have questioned the purity of the Biblical record and made many corrections. Every revision of the Bible text strikes out previously accepted passages and makes the truth of Scriptures more impregnable.

Scholars must be free to investigate and reach conclusions for or against questionable parts of the sacred record or there can be no such thing as Biblical criticism. Our own free principles could never have been formulated or proclaimed by the Campbells had they not claimed and exercised the right of Christian liberty in Biblical criticism. Our movement could have made no progress except in the direction of narrowness and bigotry were it not for our brave and able men who have been willing to be criticized unkindly and be misunderstood by the opponents of intellectual and spiritual liberty.

The effort to cripple our missionary work by cutting off contributions to the missionary societies unless they knife Dr. Willett is utterly ignoble. It may certainly make it hard for our missionary secretaries who desire to make this our geatest year but they would betray the cause they are working to support if they yielded in a matter so clearly involving our liberty in Christ. We had better go to Pittsburg with a depleted treasury than with a treasury swollen by the barter and sale of our birthright.

Every living thing has organs that reach out and appropriate the food that makes for new growth and organs that conserve and protect the accumulated material. Something corresponding to bark and bud is found in every living, growing institution. The bark needs the bud; the bud needs the bark. We need men like Professor McGarvey, we need men like Professor Willett, and the right spirit enables both to work together in mutual toleration and love.

We hope the New Christian Century will stand firm for the full integrity of our plea, in a big, kindly, patient way; that it will not be intolerant toward the conservative and less liberal brethren; that it will convince the brotherhood that the Chicago Disciples are neither puffed up by a boasted knowledge nor supercilious in unwarranted conceit, but on the contrary, that centered around Chicago University we have a band of able men loyal to our plea and to the brotherhood, who can and will do much, if we will permit them, to give us results of modern scholarship and thought, promote union between Baptists and Disciples, and in every way advance the world wide Kingship of our Lord.

The Gospel must be preached in University circles as well as in the country districts. The preaching that might be edifying in the back counties might neither be edifying nor convincing in University circles. There is probably not a modern University religious lecturer in the land whose utterances would not arouse criticism and opposition if reported by the daily press to the public.

I thank God for Brother Willett and I thank God for the humblest and most illiterate preacher who in the loving spirit of the Gospel is helping his fellowmen Godward.

Wm. Bayard Craig.

My dear Brother Willett:

I cannot begin to tell you how glad I am that you are lifting your voice in the defense of that liberty of life and conscience which belongs to every last one of us. If I should chide you it would be for the silence with which you have borne the direct attacks, and more deadly insinuations, that all too long have been made against you and your work. If the position that is now being taken by the Century is the correct one, then it deserves the cordial reception of its plea; if it is indefensible in its position, in time it can be dislodged. But for one I am willing that you turn on the light and let us have done with the covert assaults that are made against the Lord's own.

To the Editor of the Christian Century: I wish to add my protest to the effort that is being made in one way and another to secure the resignation of Professor Willett from the Centennial program. The noise of the Standard should be regarded as childish ranting. Our secretaries should be reminded that it is better to serve God than mammon. Now is a very good time for the brotherhood to decide once and for all whether Jesus is the Christ and the Bible the Word of God, or whether Russell Errett is the Christ and the Standard the Word of God.

Very sincerely yours,

PROTEST AGAINST BROTHER WILLETT'S RESIGNATION.

I want to enter my protest against Brother Willett's resignation from the Centennial program. I do not do this in the personal interest of Brother Willett. It little matters what becomes of any one man in a great movement, but it all matters what becomes of the movement.

I do not take my orthodoxy from either Brother Willett or Brother Lord. Neither of them suit me. What shall I do about it? Become agitated and read them out? It is presumptuous. What shall they do? Read each other out? It is farcical; yet this is what Brother Lord proposes to do with Brother Willett.

In this is involved a principle of Christian liberty that is the life and soul of our movement. The personalities in the case are mere incidentals, but the principle is everything. Shall any man have authority to read another out of our fellowship, who is loyal to the life and teaching of Jesus, simply because he may differ from some of his brethren in theories of interpretation? And that man, too, who proposes to do this a self appointed one? This is what the Christian Standard proposes to do. That means not back to Jerusalem, but back to Rome; not back to Christ, but back to the Pope.

Some of our brotherhood think Brother Willett is unorthodox about the miracles of Christ, if the public press has correctly reported him. However, the Christian Standard of November 14th, prints a statement in which Brother Willett denies the truth of these reports. But grant for the sake of the case Brother Willett is a little wobbly theologically. What are you going to do about it? When on the other hand there is another equal number of our brotherhood who think Brother Lord is equally unorthodox in the practice of the ethics and liberty of which Jesus taught, if the Standard editorials correctly report him.

Surely the man who lifts his big stick to strike our Missionary Secretaries and thereby thwart the spreading of the message of salvation is not to be regarded more orthodox than the man who gives his life unreservedly to the spreading of the gospel though he may hold revised thoughts concerning old theories of interpretation.

Is the man who assumes an attitude toward our missionary institutions which in effect says the confession shall not be taken except by men of my mold to be regarded more orthodox than the man who takes the confession and supports the institutions that propagate it, though he may hold a different opinion as to how historically that confession came to take certain form?

Of the two, I regard the former decidedly more unorthodox. If there is any departure from the Faith it is on the part of the Standard. If this controversy were a mere matter of men we could let either or both of them go, but since it is a matter of our Position, which means Christian liberty, we must keep both. Read Brother Lord out and we introduce a principle which closes the sky above us. For the same reason read Brother Willett out and we go up to Pittsburg with suicided hopes and to weep at the grave of the sage of Bethany. But no one proposes to read Brother Lord out; yet this is what the Standard proposes for Brother Willett. Not by a direct process, but by the process of boycott and lance on our Missionary Societies.

Read Brother Willett out and we descend religiously to factional lawlessness where even Haman himself may be executed on the very scaffold he erected for Mordecai.

If necessary, which I do not believe, I would rather go up to the Centennial with an empty Missionary treasury, but with clear sky above us and the liberty of free speech in Christ, than to go up with a gagged tongue and a full treasury. With the liberty of the Fathers we can acquire money, but money cannot buy their liberty.

I protest against Brother Willett's resignation in the name of the Kingdom, which always suffers from pharisaical devotions, in the name of Our Imperial Position, in the name of Brother Lord as much as Brother Willett, neither of whom do I believe the Almighty has yet dammed, and why should we? Last of all I protest in the interest of myself. For, if this proposition should prevail, I have lost the liberty wherein I was born.

I have been a reader of the Christian Century for ten years, but have never had a copy cause me the deep regret that the one of November 14th, in which I find Professor Willett is considering a resignation from the Centennial program. I want to protest against this. Thousands of people will be disappointed. I am going to cross the continent to be present at that convention; yet one of the most pleasant of my anticipations, that of hearing Dr. Willett, will be taken away. Are we to let a narrow-minded editor dictate to us who shall represent us on our national program?

Dr. Willett may be a heretic according to the Christian Standard, but he has given back to me a faith that was fast slipping away; he has made Christ nearer and dearer to me, and God the Father a reality.

Sincerely,

Effie B. Brooks.

PROFESSOR WILLETT AND THE CENTENNIAL.

I ask the privilege of making a few observations on the situation relative to Prof. Willett and the Centennial program. I, with multitudes of others, am deeply grieved and humiliated by this whole un-Christian controversy. I do not write as a champion of any man, but in the hope that I may throw some light on the principle involved in this discussion. I may best put my thought by asking some questions.

First—If Prof. Willett is to resign the place he has been officially asked to fill because some persons object to his appearing on the program, ought not the names of all other speakers be published, and ought not all those to whom objection is made resign their places?

Second—Have not I and any other member of the church as much right to object to any man's appearing on the program as have Mr. Lord or Mr. Errett? If not, we must confess to having on our hands, indeed, some "paper Popes"!

Third—What are we to think of the consistency of a so-called religious paper which confesses its unfriendliness to our organized missionary work but at the same time agrees to pretend to be favorable to it for one year, if its demands for Prof. Willett's resignation are granted? If I were at the head of any one of our missionary societies, I would much prefer the open hostility of such a paper to its purchased friendship. The time has come, it seems to me, when the battle for freedom from the dictation of the Standard must be fought, and I regard it as unmanly to try to buy peace at its hands! If this question must be settled, it may as well be now as later on. I am unalterably opposed to the surrender of our Christian liberty, even if such surrender will buy us the insincere friendship of the Standard for a year. I think I will feel ashamed to go to the Centennial, if the proposed truce is entered into. How can we consistently celebrate the issuance of our Declaration of Independence, by going to Pittsburgh with the shackles of a publishing house on our wrists? Let us be free, even if we have to be divided to do so! I am opposed to the "peace at any price" policy.

Liberty, Mo.

Editor Christian Century: I have read with profound interest the editorial in your paper "Shall Dr. Willett Resign?"

I regret exceedingly the situation which it records. I fear we may become fanatical and over-strenuous in our desires and efforts for peace. My pugilistic days have long since passed, but not my willingness to stand for principle. Peace is good, but only good when deserved, and no people is deserving of it if they would buy it with unholy compacts and compromises.

My faith in our great, good brotherhood would suffer considerably if I believed our people were willing to accept peace at so great a cost as you suggest the salesmen are demanding. We have admired too much the courage of Luther, and the heroism of our fathers to procure a truce by compromise.

I am jealous of our brotherhood's interests. I want to spare the missionary societies, Dr. Willett and the Christian Standard from any such disgrace. I cannot yet believe the Standard would allow its editors to sign a statement to cease the attack on the missionary societies simply on Dr. Willett's resignation from a program. If the Standard's war on missionary interests and officials during the past years has been just, the desired voluntary resignation of a man from a program, which produces no change in the societies or their officials, cannot be sufficient ground for a peaceful attitude.

I want to protest most vigorously against the editor of any of our papers being encouraged or permitted to compromise himself or his paper in such an unholy cause.

If the Standard's attitude has been sincere let us demand that, without changed conditions, its policy shall not be changed.

I believe in clean journalism, and would be grieved if a christian paper among us would permit the sincerity of its columns to be modified.

Let us go to Pittsburg next year with divisions in our ranks, if we must, but let every loyal heart pray that we may not go with a well-patronized debased journalism.

Very truly,

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates.

Some Questions For Prof. McGarvey.

Prof. J. W. McGarvey comes to the explanation and defense of Lexington against statements made in this department concerning the "Lexington Creed." The Professor takes refuge behind the words of Jesus, and practically admits with respect to the second and fourth articles of the creed that they are made tests of fellowship by him at least.

Article 2 reads: "I believe that Moses wrote every word of the Pentateuch." Concerning this the Professor says: "Everybody in Lexington, so far as I know, believes the assertion of Jesus that the books called the Pentateuch are the writings of Moses; but not one, so far as I know, is so silly as to believe that Moses wrote the last chapter of Deuteronomy describing his own death and burial."

Why should Professor McGarvey except the "last chapter of Deuteronomy?" That is a part of the Pentateuch, and just as integral a part, as the first chapter of Genesis. Why should it be any more difficult or unreasonable for Moses, under the inspiration of God, to look forward than to look backward. Yet the Professor says no one is "so silly as to believe that Moses wrote it." Where in the New Testament Gospels does Jesus except the account of Moses' "death and burial" from Mosaic authorship. Jesus makes no such distinction.

Article 4, in the "Lexington Creed," reads as follows: "I believe that the whale actually swallowed Jonah." Professor McGarvey says of this: "If Gates had put it 'the great fish,' instead of 'the whale,' this article would have been correct, except that nobody in Lexington makes this a test of fellowship. In believing this, the Lexingtonians believe what Jesus affirms about Jonah, as they are bound to do because they believe that he is the Christ, the Son of the living God. Errett Gates denies that the fish swallowed Jonah, and this is partial infidelity, because it is denial of what Jesus affirms."

"Gates" has neither affirmed nor denied that the whale swallowed Jonah; that was not the question at issue; but he does deny that Lexington or Cincinnati or any other school among the Disciples has any right or authority from Jesus or any precedent from "the fathers" for making either the affirming or the denying of it a test of fellowship. Professor McGarvey shows that he does not make this article a test of fellowship by declaring that "Errett Gates denies that the fish swallowed Jonah, and this is partial infidelity." If Errett Gates is a "partial infidel" for denying that the whale swallowed Jonah, it would certainly make him an entire infidel, if he denied in addition that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, and should say that any one was "silly who believed that Moses wrote the last chapter of Deuteronomy describing his burial."

Jesus' Terms of Fellowship.

If the words of Jesus settle any question for Christian men, they must settle the terms of Christian fellowship. Professor McGarvey and Errett Gates would probably agree in making a final appeal to Jesus in this matter. Let me ask the Professor where in Matthew, Mark, Luke or John, Jesus gave him the right to call a man "a partial infidel" for not believing that the whale swallowed Jonah? If the Gospels contain any such teaching by Jesus, it is singular that the Disciples as a whole have overlooked it to the present time, and have not made it a test of fellowship. A man who is an infidel or even a "partial infidel" has no right to fellowship in a Christian church. The church is composed of believers, not infidels, and whatever makes a man an infidel or "partial infidel" disqualifies him for Christian fellowship. Professor McGarvey has made himself perfectly clear in this most recent statement, and the brotherhood of the Disciples ought to know what his position is, for he has great influence with students in the Bible College at Lexington, and in all the affairs of the college. It would be interesting to know whether the colleagues of Professor McGarvey—Professors Deweese, Calhoun, Jefferson and others—hold his views and propagate his tests of infidelity and terms of Christian fellowship.

Why should the Professor say that "nobody in Lexington makes this a test of fellowship," when he himself in the same paragraph makes it the basis for a charge of "partial infidelity." In another part of his criticism he charges that I have "slandered Lexington" and calls the "articles of the Creed" "misrepresentations." It would be pleasant to believe that they were "misrepresentations," but his own admission that he holds one who denies that the whale swallowed Jonah, as guilty of "partial infidelity," and the repeated applications through years past, of the term infidel to teachers and ministers who have not accepted one or another of the articles of the "Lexington Creed," fully justify all that I wrote of that creed. But it is still encouraging to witness even the slightest revolt in the venerable professor from the Lexington Creed, if he would only stand consistently by it. He repudiates the "Creed" as a test of fellowship in one sentence, but in the next he drags it in and charges "partial infidelity" for its denial.

Scholarship and Infidelity.

It is quite as serious as has ever been thought of Lexington—"partial infidelity" for denying that the whale swallowed Jonah! Lexington has made great boast of "speaking where the Scriptures speak," but this looks like a case of speaking where the Scriptures are silent, and making that a mark of semi-infidelity which neither Jesus nor his apostles have made a mark of infidelity.

It has been all too easy for Professor McGarvey to declare or imply (and one is as damaging as the other) that men were infidels for not agreeing with his opinions in matters of historic criticism. Does he realize what a menace to free scholarly inquiry and what a gag to free speech among the Disciples his department of "Biblical Criticism" has been for more than eighteen years, all because of the reign of fear established by the easy use of the word "infidel"?

What a profound silence has fallen upon the voices of our teachers during these years, except those who agreed with Lexington! Men who should have been leading us into the light and liberty have been silent with fear. What an aversion toward the world's advancing biblical scholarship has sprung up in our churches; what prejudices toward universities, the higher criticism and modern science, all because the word "infidel" has been steadily hurled at them by Lexington. Is it any wonder that our own colleges are struggling for an existence? It is impossible to make the declaration repeatedly and continuously for eighteen years before the brotherhood that "universities propagate infidelity" that "modern biblical criticism is destructive," without putting every college among us under suspicion. How far it has put back education and scholarship among the Disciples it is difficult to say. No greater disaster could overtake the church of God than to assume an attitude of hostility and fear toward the world's growing knowledge. It is both an attitude of cowardice, and a confession of weakness.

McGarvey vs. Jesus.

Professor McGarvey deals in some pleasant bantering at my expense on account of what he implies was a grievous blunder in my biblical information. He says:

"If Gates had put it 'the great fish,' instead of 'the whale' this article would have been correct." "When Jesus says one thing and Errett Gates says the opposite, Lexington believes Jesus rather than Gates."

If the Professor will turn to Matthew 12: 40, he will find my authority for calling it 'whale' instead of 'great fish.' Jesus himself says it was a 'whale'; "for as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale."

Does Professor McGarvey take issue with Jesus? Did he know what Jesus said, and then deliberately put his own construction upon it, that he might put my profound scholarship in bad light?

When Jesus says one thing and J. W. McGarvey says the opposite, Chicago believes Jesus rather than McGarvey.

The Bears.

The seventh article in the Lexington Creed reads as follows: "I believe that God sent the bears to tear the boys who made fun of Elisha."

Concerning this the Professor says: "We believe that the bears went for the children because they were hungry. They didn't wait for either God or the devil to send them."

Read more carefully the account of that incident in 2 Kings, 2: 23, 24.

"And he went up from thence into Beth-el; and as he was going up by the way, there came forth young lads out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, Go up, thou baldhead; go up, thou baldhead. And he looked behind him and saw them, and cursed them in the name of Jehovah. And there came forth two she-bears out of the wood, and tore forty and two lads of them."

I am willing to leave it to the youngest student in Professor McGarvey's class whether the account does not imply that the coming of the bears was a divine judgement upon the boys for their meanness.

Yet he says they came because "they were hungry"!

It would be a far more rational inference that they came because they were angry—, a thing you might expect from the fact that they were "she-bears."

But Professor McGarvey will have it that they came not because God or the devil sent them but because they were hungry!

Who, now, has turned rationalist and destructive critic! Who, now, is "dropping his obnoxious sayings!"

Will the Professor leave them undefended, "as an ostrich is

Sunday School Lesson

SOLOMON'S CHOICE*

The events which lead to Solomon's choice as king have already been reviewed in these studies. David's death soon afterwards left the young king in full power with an admirable opportunity to shape his kingdom as he would. There were two paths open to him, either one of which might have been regarded as successful from certain points of view. The first was to continue the policy of David, his father, making himself the friend of the people, continuing to honor the prophets, and developing the resources of his land as opportunity offered. Israel would in this manner have remained practically where David left it so far as its industrial with those in Matthew and Mark. See Luke 24: 46, 47; John 20: and political life was concerned. But it would have deepened its religious interests and would have grown in the direction which the prophets were most anxious should be the path of development.

A Secular Ideal.

On the other hand, it was possible for Solomon to organize his kingdom upon the plan of an autocratic monarchy, making himself the chief figure in the state, grouping about him the priests and officials as the proper setting for such a king as he proposed to be, and leaving the question of religious instruction and the development of piety on the part of the people largely out of consideration. In harmony with this plan, he would place emphasis upon the architectural features of his city and the military strength of his kingdom. He would increase its revenues by commence and would make neighboring nations contribute as far as possible to his riches.

Solomon's Choice.

This second plan was precisely the one which Solomon adopted. In nature and disposition he was quite the opposite of David. The latter had been deeply interested in the religious life of his people. He himself was a man of piety, though by no means perfect. But his relations with the prophets were always intimate and appreciative. Solomon on the other hand had been reared in the hot-house atmosphere of the court. He had the conception of the person of the king and the character of a court which could only grow up in the cloistered solitude of such an establishment and had become possible in the prosperous days of the late reign. Almost at once Solomon began to give evidence of his shrewd, far-sighted, calculating unemotional nature. He proposed to make a success of his rule beyond everything else.

Solomon's Wisdom.

We may not doubt in the least the genuineness of his desire for such wisdom as would enable him to succeed. Whether the request made at Gibeon was the genuine sentiment of Solomon or was colored by the favorable views of later biographers is immaterial. Solomon stands out on the page of the Old Testament as a most wise and diplomatic ruler. A part of this wisdom of his was the result of natural shrewdness, and a part of it came from close observation of men and things. We are told that Solomon spoke of plants and animals in proverbs that became current among the people; that he composed a thousand and five songs, and that his wisdom was known to distant lands. Instances of his unusual shrewdness in discerning the motives of people are pointed out; such as his decision in the case of the two mothers, each of whom claimed the living child.

The Wise Man.

In this manner Solomon became the reputed head of that school of thought in Israel which in later times developed to a considerable strength and was called the School of Wisdow or of the Sages. Through this later view of the ancient king he was credited with the authorship of the Book of Proverbs, the Book of Ecclesiastics, the Song of Songs, and even by some he was made the author of Job. By the men of the Greek period he was supposed to have written the Psalms of Solomon and the Wisdom of Solomon. Later generations attributed to him unusual sagacity not only in matters of science and administration but as well in the secrets of the black art, so that the Jews of the first Christian century believed that Solomon had control over the spirits of the abyss and could call them to the accomplishment of his will.

A Truer Estimate.

But a careful study of the life of Solomon shows that the usual view that he was very pious and humble at the opening of his reign, but declined more and more into sensuality and pessimism toward the close, in spite of his wisdom, does not meet the test of the facts. The dominant characteristic of Solomon's nature was his thoroughgoing policy of self aggrandisement. He was bent on turning everything to his own account. He made himself the leading figure in the state; he developed the priestly order in so far as it assisted him in presenting to the people the gorgeous pageant of court and temple life. He built the temple as one of the architectural features of his growing city, and he organized his kingdom in a manner to exact from it all possible revenues and to make it the center toward which the caravans and ships of other lands should come.

Solomon's Religion.

Solomon's religion never impresses the readers of the Old Testament as having been more than a professional attitude, a part of the diplomacy of his highly successful life. He was not an irreligious man, nor was there any proof he was profligate or addicted to the follies which have so often ruined the lives of kings. He was too cool, calculating, and far-sighted for this. But he made government, trade, even religion itself, a means of securing for himself the supreme place in the state.

The Wise Lesson.

It remains then for the teacher to ask the question, to just what extent this lesson may be made useful in the instruction of the child. The response must be that we are not judges of Solomon, only students of his attitude and character. Certainly his request for wisdom, whether it really expressed his early aspirations after ability to rule with moderation and justice or was merely a part of his personal ambition, was an admirable desire and request. His petition is a model for imitation. It presents the only way in which the larger wisdom of life is to be found. The man who demands for himself personal success, wealth, political power, or social influence, is likely to find that the very devotion to these things as ends in themselves has robbed him of a certain quality of mind, a certain strength of character, which is the very essence of true living. The man who seeks first the kingdom of God, the higher good of himself and the world, is the one to whom, as Jesus said, desirable things are sure to be added in the proportion that they are needed. That does not mean that every wish will be gratified, but it does mean that this is the kind of man who may be trusted, not only to desire blessings for the highest purpose, but to use them with this intent. Viewed from this angle, the lesson of Solomon's request for wisdom is valuable in every class. The worst of men furnish us with qualities worthy of imitation, and Solomon was certainly far from being the worst of men, even though he was equally far from being an ideal man or ruler.

The Prayer Meeting.

SILAS JONES.

Topic December 2: The Consolation of God. Job 15:11.

Eliphaz the Temanite had a theory. He believed it had been held by all the wise men of the past and therefore he had no doubt that it was true. To attack it was to raise impious war against the throne and monarchy of God. And this is the theory: All suffering is caused by the sin of the sufferer. The exceptional sufferer is an exceptional sinner. Eliphaz was consistent and heroically applied his theory to the experiences of friend and foe alike. As soon as news came to him of the appalling calamities that had befallen his friend Job, he hastened to Job with an invitation to repentance. To his horror Job indignantly spurned the wisdom of the ancients. He said in substance: "Your assertion that I have sinned beyond the measure of other men and that therefore I am plagued beyond them is false. I do not know why these afflictions have been visited upon me, but I do know that your explanation does injustice to me."

"Are the consolations of God too small for thee?" Who puts this question? Is it Eliphaz the Temanite? To him Jehovah said: "My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends; for ye have not spoken to me the things that is right, as my servant Job hath." God accepted the man who boldly met the facts even when he could not explain them and he condemned the men who thought facts ought to conform to preconceived opinions. Life is so complex that the wisest man will overlook some of its most important aspects. When we attempt to speak for God, we dare not presume to declare all the mind of God. The mystery of suffering is great. The fact that sin is punished does not sustain the conclusion that men in trouble are wicked. To come in the name of God to the broken in spirit and to speak the thing that is not true is to alienate them from God. A Job is great enough to go into the very presence of God for an answer, but many souls will accept our explanation as final and turn away from God.

Where there is actual sin the consolations of God are sufficient. "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." It is our privilege to say to every man of every land and of every condition that there is salvation from sin. The business of the church of Jesus Christ is to deliver the message of salvation. It should be interested in the whole life of man. It should denounce the oppressor, whether he be king of money magnate; it should plead for the right of working men to breathe pure air and eat wholesome food; it should be the champion of the child against all who would rob it of its heritage; but when it ceases to point men to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world it will no longer be needed. Other institutions can then do its work better. The Lord's Supper tells of sins forgiven and of restored fellowship with God. Baptism has no meaning if it does not have behind it repentance and the belief that God can and will cure souls of sin. Many men think too meanly of themselves. They do not believe it is possible for them to live worthily in the sight of God. Some have not learned that confession of sin is the assertion of a claim to the highest human dignity. They have no conception of the consolation that is the portion of one who humbly acknowledges his transgression and receives the divine forgiveness. They need instruction.

The consolations of God are needed by the afflicted. It is mockery to the bereaved to reason that the heart can be satisfied without God. Is this great universe heartless? Is man the highest power that sympathizes with us in the hour of pain and anguish? Then I have not much respect for the universe. If it is not concerned for me I have no inclination to praise it. But if God is our refuge and strength, if his loving purposes are manifest in the ongoing of nature and in human history, if no sparrow falls unnoticed by him, I have comfort for every time of meed.

"No offering of my own I have,
Nor works my faith to prove;
I can but give the gifts He gave,
And plead His love for love.

And so beside the silent Sea
I wait with muffled oar;
No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care."

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan.

PART II.. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY.

LESSON V. HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION. MODERN DEVELOPMENTS.

I. THE CONVENTION SYSTEM. Quite early in the history of Sunday-schools City and District Conventions began to be held for the purpose of mutual inspiration and helpfulness, but it was not till the year 1832, in New York, that the First National Convention was held. The time, however, was not ripe for that regular system of Conventions which is the keynote of modern Sunday-school work, and more than a quarter of a century elapsed before another National Convention was organized. Again the movement was interrupted, this time for nine years by the Civil War, but the idea was far too vital to be abandoned, and in 1869 the Fourth National Convention was held in Newark, New Jersey, since which time the series has been unbroken.

II. INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM. After 1869 the response to the Convention idea was so hearty and unanimous, that it was soon found impossible to confine the work within merely national limits, and in 1875 the First International Convention was organized at Baltimore. Since that time these internationl gatherings have been held regularly every three years. Their "international" character consists in the catholic spirit of their efforts and, specifically, in their recognition of representatives from Great Britain, Canada and other co-operating countries. In addition to the international conventions the following World's Conventions have been held: London, England, 1889; St. Louis, 1893; London, 1898; Jerusalem, 1904.

III. OTHER CONVENTIONS. Meanwhile we have to mark the rise of a lesser convention system. We have already spoken of the local conventions that preceded the first National Convention, but these seem to have been inspirational rather than systematic, and the real value of this class of work was not developed until later. In 1856 Massachusetts held what is known as the First State Convention, and in the following year her example was followed by New York and Connecticut. Thus began the system of state organization. Other states soon followed the lead of these pioneers until today state conventions are part of the alphabet of Sunday-school work the country over.

(b.) COUNTY CONVENTIONS. To Stephen Paxson belongs the honor of organizing the First County Convention in the United States. This was at Winchester, Ill., in 1846. Since then the county convention has become a regular part of the Sunday-school machinery of the country, and with the state convention is closely affiliated with, and tributary to, the work of the International Association. In some states County Secretaries are employed.

IV. THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION. This is the organization that represents the corporate functions of the International Conventions, and gives to them as it were, a continuous personality, and a "local habitation and a name."

(1.) ORGANIZATION. It has under its a control a system of organized work that covers every state and territory in the union. The "convention chain" is as follows: International, State, County, Township or District, each of the lower being under the jurisdiction of the higher gatherings. Of course some states are more perfectly organized than others, but the above is the standard.

(2.) DEPARTMENTS. From time to time new interests have arisen and these have been regularly recognized, as the demand became imperative, by the creation of special departments. As these will be considered later in detail a bare mention of them will be sufficient here. They are: Home, Elementary, Intermediate, Adult, International Reading Circle, Teacher Training, Missionary, Temperance. These departments are regularly organized and carry on continuous propogandas for the furtherance of their special aims.

V. UNIFORM LESSON SYSTEM. As far back as 1826 the American Sunday-school Union had made an effort to unify the lesson material and introduce systematic Bible study by publishing selected portions of scripture for each Sunday. But the reach of the plan was limited and as the Sunday-school work throughout the country became more unified there arose a demand for a thorough working out of the principle of uniformity through the inspiration and initiative of the national conventions. The first step towards this was taken at the fifth national convention held in Indianapolis in 1872, when a committee was appointed to select a series of uniform lessons for the first seven years course. The principle thus established has governed the policy of the International Association ever since and the work of the Lesson Committee of 1908 differs only in detail from that of 1872.

(1.) LESSON COMMITTEE. As at present constituted the Lesson Committee consists of fifteen members distributed among the denominations with reference to their numerical strength, together with corresponding members from other countries. Six or eight meetings are usually held during its term of office. The aim of the committee is to cover the whole course of Bible literature in each period of six years. In doing so its method has been in the main chronological, that is to say, mechanical, though of late years there has been a tendency to give more time to certain leading portions of scripture and to study the prophets and epistles in connection with the history that gave rise to them.

(2.) GROWTH OF GRADED LESSONS. Certain weaknesses in the rigid carrying out of the uniform lesson scheme soon came to be felt. One of these was the piecemeal nature of the Bible study and the lack of any connected view of the book as a whole. This was in part remedied by the provision of Supplemental Lessons, prepared by the International Primary Union and graded to meet the requirements of the differnt ages up to the close of the junior period. Another weakness of the uniform-lesson plan was that it provided the same lesson material for pupils of all ages. The pressure of this difficulty began to be felt in the primary grades, and a first step towards remedying it was taken at the Denver Convention when an optional two years series of primary lessons was authorized. Since then the principle of graded instruction has grown rapidly and at the latest convention held at Louisville, Ky., the Lesson Committee was instructed to prepare an optional series of graded lessons for the use of the whole school. It is safe to predict that this series will eventually replace the old "uniform lessons."

VI. OTHER PRODUCTS OF ORGANIZATION. In addition to the organizations already mentioned, the following should be familiar to every student of religious education:

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Death.

The Correspondent:—"I believe in Christ's message of immortality; at least I profess to the world and to myself that I do. But I find this faith in the unendingness of ourselves does not keep me from the fear of death. Do Christians generally welcome death? With security do they draw the drapery of their couch about them and lie down to pleasant dreams? Do they let not their hearts be troubled because they believe in the many mansions Christ has gone to prepare? Even when the saints have come to the cold river's edge I find that death is so foreign to their desire that it is very rare that any of them will invite conversation as to their passing from this life. Even preachers who are supposed to be the ministers of the eternal are not now accustomed to converse much with the dying."

Lightfoot and Tennyson made the Gospel of Christ to be the gospel of the life beyond. They were right. Our present day is made glorious by the eternal day. "Eternal" may imply the quality of life; but its significance is lost if robbed of endless duration. Bunyan said: "Children, the milk and honey are beyond the wilderness." While this world tremendously needs to be humanized and brotherized; we must not for one moment forget that our glory, stay and progress are to be found in our immortality. It is not true that man will keep hard at high tasks even though he believes that at the end of the road he dies, to think and to love never again. Christianity means defeated death, the sundered grave. It is victory. It is life. If there was no hope in death there would be no Christianity. Love is love because man is undying. Purpose and conseeration are determined and meaningful because they build for aye. Fatherhood is eternal, and brotherhood without fatherhood is a manufactured sentiment, not a sustained feeling. We clothe the naked not simply because their bodies which die tomorrow are cold; but because their souls which never die, in order to rise to their best, need good houses.

Christianity Not Hum-drum.

If the church is neglecting the dying, she is neglecting the tragedies of her mission. The Christian and the Christian ministers are in danger of viewing all happenings as a mere matter of course. Life is not hum-drum. There are awful mountain tops and terrible valleys. The soul of man is a pulsating, quivering, suspended spirit ever liable to fly to heaven or drop to hell. Man is not an animal that merely eats and sleeps. He is a tumultuous ghost that prays and blasphemes, that worships and curses. He walks not on a plane. He shouts on some vast peak. He weeps in some bottomless pit of gloom. He smells a rose and wonders as to God and the devil and all their angels and imps. He scurries across some awful desert; and longs to gain water for his parched lips and his infinite thirst. He gives a penny for a daily paper and sells his soul to the devil for an evil love. He is a vulgar, smattering creature. He is Mozart, Beethoven, Raphael, Angelo. He is a fiend. He is a Christian. He is not a mathematician. He is a singer of songs not lawful to be uttered. He does not die by rule of Euclid. He wonders, he prays, he doubts, he believes, he denies. It is to man, awful in his varied moods, that the church must come with her ministry of healing and comfort. The church too has her mighty, high places. There are thundering and lightning at her inception, there are moving stars, heavenly singing angels, miraculous cures of healing; the dead restored to their startled associates and relatives. Blood as sweat flowing in a garden because of a heart-breaking soul pain, a cross on a hill with lights and shadows that encircle infinity, a vacant tomb that sets a universe writing and singing anthems of hope. The spirit descending to give courage and vision. Ah! let no one think that either life or Christianity is hum-drum. Let the church visit the dying. Let her know the transcendence of death. Let her not talk of Pneumonia or Consumption. Let her talk about God. Let her not be a slave to the doctor. Let her say, "a soul that belongs to God is about to set out for its eternal home, and we must sing the songs of Zion to speed it on its way." Let her talk repentence to the sinner, comfort to the saint, Christ to both.

Experience in the Presence of Death.

I used to be afraid of death. When he threatened one of the members of my flock I would steal quietly into the sick home, inquire as to his probable success, and then hurry away. I would not talk to the sick of the deep things of life, for fear they would be made worse. The real reason was that fear was in my own heart. Cannon Farrar said in all his pastoral work he made it a practice to talk frankly with the dying as to the future. He said in no instance were there bad results. If the minister has conversed with his member while the latter was in good health about the transcendent things, he will find little difficulty in giving comfort in time of illness. I have witnessed some beautiful triumphs of faith in the hour of death. Doubtless it is natural for health and youth to shrink from death. But nature and God are kind. When we hunger, we take pleasure in eating. When tired and sleepy it is a joy to sleep. When old and exhausted there is often longing for the rest of death. Recently a friend of mine passed to the beyond. He knew he had received the summons to be graduated from this world. He was as happy as a high-school senior. Often did he expostulate to me on his contemplated journey. He wondered about its surprises and the new duties. He expected to continue a workman of God; and an agent of His redeeming Grace. The last time I saw him alive he quoted with clear voice and full appreciation of their far reach the following words:

"The longer I live and the more I see
The struggle of souls to the heights above,
The more these truths comes home to me:—
That the universe rests on the shoulders of love—
Love so vast, so deep, so broad
That men have renamed it and call it—God."

Another friend who long lingered in great pain, spoke often to me in the deepest longing of the spiritual world. He talked with God "as a friend talketh with a friend" and then told me all about it. The last that he wrote on earth was, "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep." Think you, the faith that can so write is of small moment.

As long as men die the preacher of "The Resurrection of the Dead" need not lose courage. Death itself is his ally. Conscience, sin, judgment, God, the soul, redemption, atonement and forgiveness, will all have reality of meaning while death continues.

Jesus Christ died for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.

An Appreciation of the Congress.

After returning from the Congress recently held at Chicago and thinking over it again I can not refrain from writing a note of appreciation of that splendid gathering. I was greatly blessed in spirit and profited in mind by it. The program was an excellent one, and it was admirably arranged. The Disciples of Christ that were upon it acquitted themselves with great credit.

The interchange of thought by the leaders from different parts of the country was most helpful to all. The fellowship of the Congress was most delightful. The close contact with new minds and hearts was such a rich spiritual and intellectual treat. On the matter of Christian Union it was a great privilege to see the question from the angle that others see it from. The addresses on the question of Christian Union by the Baptists were broad and frank; difficulties were freely acknowledged and favorable factors pointed out. I came from the Congress feeling that it was indeed good to have been there. I trust that we may have many joint congresses in the future.

said to leave her eggs uncared for to the fate that may await them?" "Perhaps he will learn something from his new experience." "He ought to have 'girded his loins with truth,' before he enlisted as a soldier in the war."

To say that God did not send the she-bears, but that they came because they were hungry, is the same as to say that the lions into whose den Daniel was cast did not devour him, not because God shut the lion's mouths, but because they were not hungry.

Would Professor McGarvey go through the Old and New Testaments, explaining away miraculous narratives by rationalistic inferences, as he has done in the case of the she-bears? Will he now take care of his "obnoxious sayings"?

What must the student in the Bible College, and the colleagues of the Professor think of this bit of delicious rationalism, that would do credit even to the University of Chicago?

Two Questions.

Will Professor McGarvey answer two questions. He has appealed to the words of Jesus concerning Jonah and the authorship of the Pentateuch.

Here are some words of Jesus: "He (God) maketh his Sun to rise on the evil and the good."

1. Do you believe that the sun rises and sets according to the Ptolmaic system of astronomy or that it stands still according to the Copernican system?

2. On what grounds do you affirm that Moses did not write the account of his own death and burial?

We shall await with profoundest interest the Professor's answers to these questions.

THE DAWN AT SHANTY BAY

By Robert E. Knowles, Author "St. Cuthberts" and "The Undertow"

CHAPTER IX—Continued.

"He got that frae his grandfaither," Ronald relaxed long enough to explain. "Where's the laddie bidin' noo? . . . but it doesna maitter," he added, the light dying from his face. "He's naethin' till me ony mair," the lips hardening as he spoke. "Ye ken, nae doot, what he did afore he left us? He was in a bank, ye ken; an' what's mair, he ca'd me a liar till my face," the depth of darksome feeling showing on the strong Scotch countenance. "An' that left me wi'oot chick or child—save yin that was an after-thocht frae God," he concluded sorrowfully, his face turned tenderly toward the little house.

At this juncture the conversation was interrupted by a cry from behind the cabin: "Oh, daddy, daddy, come here quick. Take me down there—look at that!" Ronald hurried in the direction whence the child's voice proceeded, snatching up Mildred in his arms. "Look, look there!" and the child pointed as she spoke. Ronald looked—then started swiftly down the slope, still bearing the precious load.

And as he came close to a heaving stain upon the snow-white surface, a lonely spectacle met his gaze. For a rough box lay within the shadow of the silent soil upthrown; and beside it there yawned the narrow cell that awaits all of woman born, a shallow grave, evidently digged the night before by hands unfamiliar with the sombre industry. And stealing stealthily across the snow, his heavy eyes fixed in dull grief upon the waiting sepulchre, there came an Indian form, one of the surviving fugitives of the forest, creeping in his loneliness closer to the haunts of men, seeking in his sorrow but to touch the hem of humanity's garment. Behind him trailed his long toboggan, heavy-freighted with the slient form of his only child. She had died far off in his lonely tent; but, responsive to that mystic sense that the forest breeds, he had heard the voice of echoing axes speaking as if with human tongues. And here, doomed to restless roving as he knew his own life to be, he would lay the precious dust close to the beating hearts of men, his brothers, though he knew it not.

Only a few words of broken English the Indian spoke, but they told the story of his loss. Silently, Ronald standing bareheaded the while, the child of the forest untied the thongs that bound the silent form to its humble bier; but as he began to raise his daughter from the sleigh, Ronald's hat was thrown upon the ground, and, with reverent hands he helped to lay the girlish form in its lonely resting place. Together they filled in the little grave, each relieving the other. Then the father's tawny hands thrust a tiny picket far down within the yielding earth, solemnly producing a little ribbon of black which he tied about the slab. A dim sense of civilization's ways had prompted this; whereat Mildred, her face glowing with a light as from afar, quickly stripped from her face a dusky veil she wore to shield her from the wind, binding it about the paltry emblem of a father's grief. When this was done, Ronald and the red man took a long look into each other's face. The same language leaped from both; for the Indian cast one swift glance at Mildred, then in tenderness fixed his eyes again mutely on the man, extended his hand in the strong swift clasp of human sympathy, turned, stopped to recover the rope of his toboggan, and strode swiftly back into the shadowy bosom of the tender woods.

Ronald and the girl started slowly back toward the cabin, both pondering deeply. Suddenly Mildred spoke, turning and looking back at the new-made grave:

"It looks lonely, doesn't it, daddy?"

"Aye, lassie—aye, it luiks lonely."

"Is her mother in heaven, too?" the child asked simply.

Ronald hesitated; the destiny of the soul was a dark problem to such as he. But the child's eyes were upturned for an answer.

"Aye, Mildred, I dinna doot—aye, her mither's in heaven tae."

"Then she won't be lonely, will she?" pursued the little questioner.

"No, dear; no, she'll no' be lonely ony mair."

"If he could have his little girl back again, I guess he'd do anything she wanted him to, wouldn't he, daddy?"

"Aye, lassie, she'd have it a' her ain way, I'm thinkin'," Ronald agreed, smiling down at the little reasoner.

"Daddy!" after a long pause.

"Aye, lassie—what is it?"

"I'm nearly well, daddy."

The man's face shone. "Aye, dear," he said gladly, "I'm hopin' ye'll sune be weel." But he glanced at the delicate lips and wished that a rosier hue were theirs.

"You prayed for that, didn't you, daddy?" the child pursued.

Ronald was silent. Recounting religious feats was not his favorite pastime.

"Of course I know you did," Mildred went on, "and I often wonder if you pray for ——— ——. You could get lots of things if you prayed for them, daddy. I'm just sure you could," the child assured him in an earnest voice, swinging round in front to look up into his face.

"It's bonnie to see my wee lassie gettin' weel again," he responded dexterously. "Luik, there's Larry—he's beckonin' on ye; run till Larry."

CHAPTER X.

When the Night is Gone.

"I'll slip it in while you're unharnessin' the kid an' gettin' her to bed; it's a peach of a Christmas tree—the prettiest balsam round Shanty Bay."

"I'm feart she winna be up till't," Ronald's troubled voice replied; "the bairn's no sae weel the nicht."

Wherefore, after Ronald had bidden her good-night, he went back once again, holding the hot little hand as he sat on the edge of the bed beside her.

"We're haein' some bonnie fixin's for the morn," he said, hoping for a glad response.

The soulful eyes glowed up toward him through the brief silence that followed. Very sweet came the earnest voice.

"I want it to be Christmas for the men."

"To be what? What men are ye meanin'?" Ronald asked perplexed.

Mildred pointed toward a carpetbag on the shelf—it had borne her choicest treasures to the toyless North.

"They've been so kind to me," she explained. "Larry let me turn the grindstone, when I wasn't too tired, and Barney used to let me ride on Sleepy Jake, and Jim, he let me blow the bellows—and the cook used to let me wind the clock. So I want to give Larry my necklace, and Jim my Martha Washington doll, and Barney my music-box, and the cook my set of dishes—and if I'm not up, give my love to all the rest and tell them all Merry Christmas for me, daddy," the voice a little fainter. "Oh, daddy," she cried suddenly, "what's that? Give me my handkerchief: it's coming again—it's red—it's blood, daddy. it's blood!" the voice rising to a cry.

Ronald leaped for the light, mutely praying for better than he feared. But the ruddy glare mingled with the dread insignia as he held the lamp above, and the crimson burned itself into his soul.

He called Ephraim, then lifted the child and held her in his arms. The Christmas balsam lay on the floor without.

Gazing into the pallid face, his lips were moving slightly, and Ephraim caught the words: "Oh, God, if ye'll gie her back, I'll come back mysel'—I'll gie in, Oh, Lord, if ye'll gie her back," and the untutored listener joined in the prayer as best he knew.

Suddenly Ephraim leaped from his chair. He had remembered, joyfully, that the company's doctor had reached the camp that very evening on his periodical visit; and his hurried word of explanation was scarcely uttered before he had closed the door behind him, disappearing in the direction of the adjoining shanty.

Only a few minutes had elapsed before the youthful physician was standing by the bed, the little patient's bright and eager face in striking contrast to the pale and quivering features that betrayed the anguish Ronald was enduring.

After an exhaustive examination, the doctor turned toward the bending man. Ronald rose unconsciously to his feet; he knew a verdict was to be pronounced. But the smile upon the doctor's face was like the light of Heaven to his soul. "The news is good, Mr. Robertson," he began in answer to the silent pleading of Ronald's eyes. "This little one has evidently had a sore time of it—but the trouble's acute only, I'm glad to say, a kind of congestion—mostly in the bronchial tubes; and this effusion ought to give her the greatest of relief. It will, too," he added confidently; "it's the beginning of the end of the trouble—why, she's looking better already, and the thermometer shows normal!" he affirmed, holding it again to the light as he spoke.

"Thank God," Ronald murmured beneath his breath; Ephraim leaned over and kissed the little one on the forehead.

"Wud it be safe to tak her hame?" Ronald ventured timidly.

The doctor thought a moment "'Twouldn't do a bit of harm; good care, and lots of nourishing food, and she'd be just as well there as here. She's got the turn, and I believe she'd be just as well at home.

There was no sleep that night for the rejoicing Ronald; nor did he seek it. Wherefore, when Mildred called him some time later he answered almost before she spoke.

"Come and lie down beside me, daddy."

"Ye're no feart o' the dark, are ye?" he asked as he took his place beside her, feeling for the hand that was already seeking his.

"No, oh, no—but I wanted to talk a little. Daddy, I've been thinking about last Christmas Eve. Santa Claus gave me——"

"Aye, aye, lassie," Ronald interrupted: "I heard aboot it," he averred. This was followed by a swift prayer for forgiveness; how deceitful is the natural man! thought Ronald.

"And I don't want any Christmas tree this year," the child went on. "Santa Claus gave me such lots of lovely things last year—but I want something else this year, daddy. I just want one thing—and I want you to give it to me. Nobody else can give it to me only you; won't you, daddy?"

"What micht ye be wantin'?"

"I want you to give Hugh back—to his mother. She's so lonely; and it'll be a lovely Christmas present. It's the time God gave us a wonderful present—and it's lovely to fast, with coward footsteps, before the all-be able to do something like that, to be able to give somebody to somebody, don't you see, daddy?"

Ronald's face was close beside the little advocate's pleading face upon the pillow. "Aye, lassie, aye, I see, I see, an'——"

"You see, daddy," broke in the earnest voice, "that's the very best kind of a present. And anyhow, daddy, it's only fair. You prayed for God to give me back to you—and He's doing it. I heard you. Well, I prayed for God to give Hugh back to you and Nanna—and I want my prayer answered just like yours. And there isn't anybody can help Him as much as you, daddy. Won't you give him back, daddy?"

In that hour God had all His will with Ronald Robertson. "Aye, lassie," he sobbed in broken accents; "aye, my darlin', I'll gie him back—I'll gie him back, my bonnie," his lips straying among the tangled locks.

Then Ronald Robertson arose and went out into the night. But it was retreating conquering Dawn. Over hill and lake, over the towering cliffs and the whispering forest, the light was breaking with grave rejoicing, healing everywhere the ravages of the dark. And in that redemptive hour, all the bitterness and resentment and wrath of Ronald's long beshadowed heart vanished to return no more, even as the mists of the night, writhing as if in torment, will flee away before the rising sun.

WITH THE WORKERS

C. E. Chambers has just closed a meeting at Marble Rock, Iowa, which has resulted in seventy additions.

Herman P. Williams, who has recently returned from the foreign field, was compelled to submit to an operation but is doing nicely.

The church at Jackson Center, Ohio, dedicated a new house of worship recently. L. L. Carpenter officiated in his favorite capacity.

L. L. Carpenter will dedicate a church at Atlanta, Mo., soon. An invitation is extended to people in surrounding districts to attend.

The church at Tamaroa is much in need of a minister. A meeting has been held there by G. W. Wise of DuQuoin and a pastor should be caring for the results.

The church at Versailles, Kentucky, is now in a meeting aided by Evangelist B. H. Melton. There have been twenty-two conversions to date and the meetings continue. The pastor is R. J. Bamber.

The church at Enon, Va., where W. L. Burner ministers, has been having a series of union meetings with the Baptist minister, which will improve the opportunities of effective gospel service in both churches.

The Parkland church at Louisville, Kentucky, has just closed a helpful series of special services. The preaching was done by the pastor, G. W. Nutter. He was assisted in the music by Miss Mabelle Meyers.

Over forty thousand dollars have been added to the equipment of the Eugene Bible University this past year. $35,000 of this has been expended in the erection of a new building. Morton L. Rose was master of ceremonies at the dedication services.

The new Christian church which is in process of erection in Aurora, Missouri, is now almost complete. Iit is costing twenty thousand dollars. It will be dedicated the last Sunday in the month with the assistance of H. O. Breeden. The pastor hopes to follow the dedication with a series of evangelistic meetings.

A year ago, S. M. Martin held a meeting in the church in Los Angeles, where W. S. Myers preaches. That meeting resulted in 185 additions. He was recalled for a meeting this fall and 177 were added. Of this number, 112 came by confession of faith. In the five years of the present ministry, 662 people have been added to the church.

The church at Puyallup, Washington, has just concluded one of the most successful evangelistic enterprises that has ever been held on the Pacific coast. Evangelist Olson did the preaching, assisted by competent singers. Two hundred were added to the church, 138 of them by primary obedience. The church building proved to be too small and a tent was placed on the church lot, which made room for 1,200 people. J. T. Eshelmann is the pastor of the church.

The church at California, Pa., is in need of a pastor. Their salary is nine hundred per annum.

A. Munyon has just finished a twelve day meeting at Lentner, Mo., with ten additions, eight by primary obedience.

J. T. Stivers of Los Angeles has recently closed a meeting with the church at Corona, California, which has added twenty-eight to the membership.

J. M. De Lezene believes in doing home mission work in his own district. In a meeting held at a schoolhouse near his town, he had twelve additions.

Evangelist C. E. Chambers has held a good meeting at Marble Rock, Iowa, which resulted in seventy additions to the church. B. W. Hampton is the pastor of the church.

The church at Ladonia, Mo., has had a meeting with Evangelists Spicer and Douthit assisting. The meeting resulted in fifty-one accessions, thirty-three by confession of faith.

The Mt. Auburn (Ill.) Christian Church desires to call a minister. They have a good parsonage and can pay six hundred per year. This is a good opening for gospel work for some young man.

Z. E. Irvin has closed a successful year at Montpelier, Indiana. Attendance at the public meetings of the church has doubled and fourteen have been added to the membership of the church.

J. J. Nudson held a good meeting at Shiloh, Ilinois, recently. There were twenty-five additions, twenty-one of them by confession of faith. He has also had six additions in his work at Reeves.

N. E. Cory, one of the veteran preachers of Illinois, has resigned at Colchester to take the work at Keokuk, Iowa. Before leaving the Illinois field he assisted in the erection of a new house of worship.

J. H. Jones has been holding a meeting at Ash Grove, Mo., which has met with the discouragements of bad weather and election excitement, but which brought twenty-seven into the membership of the church.

Church building activities continue in Kansas City, Mo. The Jackson Avenue Christian Church is beginning the erection of a twenty thousand dollar building. The ladies of the church are collecting a mile of dimes and have half of them already. These dimes will be valued at ten thousand dollars.

The congregation of the First Christian Church of Louisville, Ky., E. L. Powell, minister, has decided by majority vote to authorize the trustees of the church to sell their property. It is their notion to move out of the business portion of the city and build a more comodious and up-to-date building. Some time ago they were offered $165,000 for their present site.

The small congregation at Forrest City, Ark., desires a minister. They are able to pay six hundred per year.

F. M. Rains will be master of ceremonies at the dedication of a new house of worship at Robinson, Illinois, where G. S. McGaughey ministers. The church cost twenty thousand dollars and will be dedicated November 29th.

A number of the Disciple divinity students of Yale are assisting in a meeting at Bridgeport, Conn., and are meeting with success. We have 20 men enrolled in the divinity school of Yale university this year, more than in any other divinity school outside our own brotherhood in the country. The presence of Prof. Hiram Van Kirk on the faculty as a teacher of systematic theology will do much to solidify the group.

F. B. Sapp of Fargo, N. D. sends in an account of the funeral of Mrs. F. B. Gannon, of Aberdeen, who died November 11. Mrs. Gannon was one of the leading Disciples of the state, an active business woman, sharing with her husband in the management of two of the leading banks of North Dakota, and a woman of deepest piety and humble spirit, notwithstanding her wealth and social leadership. She was a student at Hiram, under Garfield. Her death takes from our work in the Northwest one of the choicest spirits.

Another disaster has happened to James Gage, who is the pastor of our church in Roff, Oklahoma. Last summer he was fearfully beaten by a ruffian, barely escaping with his life. He recovered, however, and now a new calamity appears in a fire which wiped out practically all of his earthly possessions. Some of the churches of his state are taking up collections to relieve his necessities. It is suggested by one of the ministerial brethren that others outside of Oklahoma lend a helping hand. "Bear ye one another's burdens."

The Northside Christian Church of Kansas City, Kansas, had a jubilee service last Sunday to rejoice in the progress made in their work recently. When James S. Myers, the present pastor, took the work there was an amount of $4,000 owing. This has been paid and the mortgage has been cancelled. The membership of the church has increased from 200 to 500. In the early spring they hope to begin the erection of a $25,000 church building. This will be built on the basement, which has been constructed already, at a cost of $8,000.

We shall always be glad to receive significant news from our brethren with regard to their own churches or those in their section. Church news has a value in spurring others to renewed efforts in the work of the kingdom and is not to be regarded in the light of personal puffs. It is to be regretted that many of the ministers of the larger churches have discontinued sending news notes to any of our papers because of the abuses that have crept into the news columns of our journals. The Century is inaugurating a reform in the character of its news service and invites the men with really significant news to send it

WITH THE WORKERS

There were two more additions at the church at Hoopeston, Ill., last Sunday.

V. M. Elston and Charles E. McVay will hold a meeting at Atlantic, Iowa, in January.

F. M. Green, of Akron, Ohio, has been appointed chaplain of the county infirmary in his home city.

J. R. Beard has been in a meeting recently near Hugo, Oklahoma, which resulted in fifteen additions.

The meeting at Beaumont, Texas, resulted in over a hundred additions. It was held by William J. Lockhart.

Edward Chitter is in a good meeting at Osborne, Kansas, where sixty have been added the past seventeen days.

Prof. Noblitt has received 160 members into the church at Guthrie, Oklahoma, 105 of htem coming in the Brandt meeting.

Evangelists Snively and Altheide began a meeting in Warrensburg, Mo., with the First Church last Sunday. The pastor is George B. Stewart.

Ben F. Hill has had a large increase in the membership of the church at Okmulgee, Oklahoma, since he took the work there. Over 100 were added.

The Brandt meeting in Walla Walla, Washington, is meeting with great success. There were 90 additions in the first two weeks. On Nov. 15 there were 27 additions.

W. W. Burks of Nevada, Missouri, will take charge of the work at the 56th Street Church in New York City about January first. J. L. Darsie is the retiring pastor of the church.

The meeting at Clarinda, Iowa, is meeting with great success. There were 53 additions in the first two weeks. Evangelist Fife and son are holding the meeting. The people are co-operating loyally.

The Central church at Joplin, Missouri, is now in a meeting with Evangelists Cooksey and Miller in charge. The first night of the meeting there were 20 additions. The outlook is especially favorable.

The church in South Omaha where F. T. Ray ministers is starting the erection of a new house of worship. The building is to cost nearly seven thousand dollars exclusive of the stone which is now on hand.

The church at Hastings, Oklahomo, has been having a period of spiritual blessing in their work. Forty-four have been added to the church there recently, and a thousand dollars has been raised for a new church.

J. E. Chase of North Bend, Nebraska, will hold a meeting in his own church during the month of November. A debt on the parsonage has been recently paid off and exerything looks bright for an aggressive year's work.

The pastor of the church at Maywood, Nebraska, J. R. Radcliff, has held a meeting and organized a church of twenty members at Lamar. Eight hundred dollars was raised towards the erection of a new house of worship.

The West Side Christian Church at Bridgeport, Conn., has recently dedicated a church building. With a small membership of 28 and great odds to labor against, they have come up throught adversity to the present victory. President Cramblett assisted in the dedication.

TELEGRAMS.

Akron, O., Nov. 23d, '08.

We are in a great meeting with Mitchell and Bilby. Largest crowds ever in this field; forty additions to-day. Our minister Brother Stahl, has done splendid work. New-Berlin gave Clarence Mitchell a reception for his revival work in helping bring about their new twenty thousand dollar church building.

Dr. Chas. E. Held.

Anderson, Ind., Nov. 23d, '08.

We are back here where we had 1,271 converts three years ago. 350 in Sunday-school first Sunday then, 900 last Sunday and 1201 to-day. There were 5 added first day then. Began here Wednesday night and had 79 added first invitations to-day. Brother and Sister Grafton have two of the greatest adult Sunday-school classes in the brotherhood and have proven themselves major generals in handling this work. I am amazed at the work going on in this great church. The Sunday school superintendent and thirteen of the strongest men on the church board and hundreds of the best workers in the church are converts of our former meeting. Brother Grafton addressed overflow in basement tonight, Vancamp and Rockwell singing.

Chas. Reign Scoville.

Sumner T. Martin reports from Santa Barbara, Cal., that there were six additions at the close of the first week of the meeting which he is holding with his own church. Prof. Stout is singing to the delight and profit of all attending.

The East Side congregation of Denver is having a nice growth since moving into its permanent location. There were seven added last Sunday. Evangelist C. G. Stout comes to them on the 29th of the month to assist in a series of evangelistic services.

The revival effort under the direction of Charles Reign Scoville at Hannibal, Missouri, is meeting with such success that two new churches will be organized there as a result. The pastor, Levi P. Marshall, has prepared the way with many years of faithful work and this harvest is due to his faithful sowing.

The annual Sunday-school convention of Stockland township of Iroquois county in Illinois was held at the Fair View Christian church last Sunday. The president of the convention was Mrs. Decker of the Fair View school. J. K. Arnot of the University of Chicago assisted in the program and preached in the evening.

Pastor Welshimer has been holding a meeting in his own church at Canton, Ohio, that is remarkable for its success. Nearly three hundred have been added and many are compelled to worship in overflow meetings. There are many pastors who could hold their own meetings with a greater number of additions and a greater permanency of results.

In the great city of New York, with its teeming population, we have only six churches in the city and surrounding suburbs. In addition, we have recently founded a mission among the Russians, under the supervision of the American Christian Missionary Society. This is entirely inadequate to the needs of so great a field. There are more people in this one city alone than in any two of the ordinary states in the south or west. New York will be a radiating center of either good or evil in the days to come, and now is the time we decide which.

A new house of worship will be dedicated at Oceanside, San Diego, California, about the first of the new year. The building is costing $2,500 and has a seating capacity of 150 people.

THE GEORGIA CONVENTION.

The Georgia State Convention was held with the church at Fitzgerald on Nov. 9-12. At the opening session, Monday night, the delegates were welcomed by City Attorney Wall, and Secretary J. W. Greer, of the Business League. State Evangelist E. R Clarkson preached.

On Tuesday were given the reports of the year's work in the several districts, as well as reports by the state officers. There were addresses by H. A. Denton, of Cincinnati, on dersville, on "Lining Up the Churches;" "American Missions;" L. M. Omer, of San-Howard J. Brazelton, of Macon, on "How to Increase the Efficiency of the Churches;" and J. J. Haley, of Eustis, Fla., on Foreign Missions." The Woman's Society for Georgia Missions also had a short session.

On Wednesday the speakers were Claud Mayne, of Winder, State Bible School Superintendent; H. A. Denton, of Cincinnati, on "Utilizing Our Youg People;" President Ashley S. Johnson, of the School of the Evangelists, on "Giving the Boys a Chance:" J. H. Mohorter, of St. Louis, and W. B. Shaw, of Baldwin, on the benevolent work; Mrs. L. M. Omer, of Sandersville, on the Centennial Aim of the C. W. B. M.; John H. Wood, of Winder, and Marion Stevenson, of St. Louis. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions held a very interesting and instructive session.

On Thursday morning a short session was held, and the remainder of the day was spent in seeing the city. The convention came to a close at night with a sermon by President Ashley S. Johnson.

Marion Stevenson, of St. Louis, conducted four Bible study hours during the convention, and pledges were made by the delegates present for the organization during the coming year of fifteen adult Bible classes and six teacher training classes. Brother Stevenson was a revelation to all, and his work will bear fruit.

An auxiliary of the C. W. B. M. for the Fitzgerald church was organized on Thursday with twenty members.

The next convention well be held at Dublin. The state board for the coming year is as follows: President, T. E. Patterson, Griffin; vice-president, H. K. Pendleton, Atlanta; secretary, Bernard P. Smith, Atlanta; treasurer, F. J. Spratling, Atlanta; W. H. Roper, Macon; H. M. Patterson, Atlanta; John H. Wood, Winder.

LIFE AND SERVICE.

Christ sets His followers no task. He appoints no hours. He allots no sphere. He himself simply went about and did good. He did not stop to do some special thing which should be called religious. His life was His religion. His pulpit was the hillside. His congregation a woman at a well. We never think of Him in connection with a Church. We cannot picture him in the garb of a priest or belonging to any of the classes who specialize religion. His service was of a universal human order.

WITH THE WORKERS

THIRD DISTRICT, MICHIGAN.

A convention of the Third District of the Michigan Christian Missionary Society was held at Wayland, Mich., Nov. 4-6, 1908

The convention was called to order by Pres. C. A. Preston of Ionia. Addresses were given by pastors of the district as follows:

"The Church and Men," O. W. Winter, Belding.

"Incidental Evangelism," E. E. Barnes, Grand Rapids.

"A Plea for Enthusiasm," W. A. Bellamy, Grand Rapids.

"The Country Church," J. W. Curch, Ballards.

The addresses were suggestive and helpful.

Thursday afternoon was given over to the session of the C. W. B. M. The session was exceedingly interesting, inspiring and practical.

The closing session of the convention was held Thursday evening. The address on "The Work of the C. W. B. M." by Miss Crozier revealed a thorough knowledge of the organization, its purpose, and activities and was well received by the audience.

The closing address was delivered by Cor. Secretary F. P. Arthur of Grand Rapids. With characteristic optimism and force he presented a splendid view of the attainments and aims of the Disciples of Christ.

The Christian courtesy of the Congregationalist brethren in giving us the use of their church for the evening session is fully appreciated. Our houses of worship could not be lighted because the plant of the electric lighting company was out of commission.

The royal hospitality of the Wayland brethren will be long and delightfully remembered. Much credit is due Pastor E. G. Campbell for his work of local preparation for the convention. The church at Wayland is prospering under the leadership of Bro. Campbell. Five hundred dollars ($500) has recently been spent in improving the property.

The attendance at the convention was not large but what was lacking on account of numbers was more than made up by the earnestness and enthusiasm of both speakers and hearers.

Strong emphasis was placed on planning and accomplishing larger things during this Centennial year. Two conventions are to be held one with the Lyon Street Church, Grand Rapids, March 30th and 31st and April 1st, '09, the other with the Belding Church soon after the Centennial at Pittsburg.

The officers for the year are: President, G. Webster Moore, Ionia; Vice-President, W. Muir, Grand Rapids; Secretary, O. W. Winter, Belding; Treasurer, W. P. Workman, Grand Rapids.

The command God gave his people centuries ago was that they "Go forward." Let the disciples of Christ of the Third District go forward! Let us make an irresistible advance all along the line.

O. W. Winter, Sec.

G. A. CAMPBELL AT DANVILLE.

Have just returned from Danville, Ill., where I spoke five nights for the Second Church, Andrew Scott pastor. I had a delightful fellowship with both the pastor and the church. Brother Scott has led this church to worthy position and is deeply entrenched in the hearts of the people. The Second Church has a mission in Oaklawn, a new and growing section of the city. Brother Ainsworth of the First Church is holding a meeting at Catlin with good results. Knox P. Taylor, our veteran Bible teacher and preacher, was helping Brother S. S. Jones. It was a great pleasure to meet these brethren twice, once with Mrs. Ainsworth and again with Mrs. Scott. Mrs Jones was also with them on both occasions. The cause in Danville has grown with the rapid growth of the city. But those leading have done their part. Brother Scott's son, Walter, led our singing. He is but sixteen. He has a future.

Brother Scott and I visited S. E. Fisher one day at Champaign. This church has two mission points which Brother Fisher reports as prosperous.

It will be interesting to some to know that Brother Scott says the strength of his church was doubled by the Scoville meeting.

"I'M THANKFUL FOR YOU."

This was the sweet, consoling word that came to a woman struggling with fresh bereavement at the Thanksgiving season. Instantly a well of thankfulness was unsealed in her own heart. All was not over, then! There was still something left to live for. Someone yet leaned on her. Someone turned to her for help and strength and comfort. It set a whole nest of singing birds caroling in the very ruins of her own happiness.

Does this not give us a hint how to comfort the sorrowful? "I don't want to be 'poor-deared'!" cried one whose best-beloved had been taken. "All I want on earth is just once more to hear him say, 'I need you.'" That comfort, alas! was nevermore to be hers, but time showed her a helpless worldful of people always saying it. It is the true soul-tonic. The solace of helping others is within the reach of every sufferer. Added to that is sometimes vouchsafed the reward hinted at in the beginning of this paragraph. Now and then someone will feel a warm throb of thankfulness toward us, and say so. It pays a thousand times for the little we are able to do out of our weakness. It is a thousand times better than sitting be life's wayside and holding out pitiful hands for beggars' alms of condolence and sympathy. Nobody wants to have anybody thankful to him, but it is a high form of happiness to know that someone is thankful for us.—Congregationalist.

OUT OF THE MOUTHS OF BABES.

"Tommy," said the teacher to a small pupil who had got the short end of a fistic encounter, "don't you know it is wrong to fight?"

"I didn't till I got licked," was the significant reply.

Bemused Minds.

The truth is that fiction-reading is like dram-drinking. It becomes an inveterate habit, and the patient speedily loses whatever slight inclination he or she may once have had towards good literature.—"Daily Telegraph."

NEW LIFE.
Found In Change to Right Food

After one suffers from acid dyspepsia, sour stomach, for months and then finds the remedy is in getting the right kind of food, it is something to speak out about.

A N. Y. lady and her young son had such an experience and she wants others to know how to get relief. She writes:

"For about fifteen months my little boy and myself had suffered with sour stomach. We were unable to retain much of anything we ate.

"After suffering in this way for so long I decided to consult a specialist in stomach diseases. Instead of prescribing drugs, he put us both on Grape-Nuts and we began to improve immediately.

"It was the key to a new life. I found we had been eating too much heavy food which we could not digest. In a few weeks after commencing Grape-Nuts, I was able to do my house work. I wake in the morning with a clear head and feel rested and have no sour stomach. My boy sleeps well and wakes with a laugh.

"We have regained our lost weight and continue to eat Grape-Nuts for both the morning and evening meals. We are well and happy and owe it to Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason."

CHICAGO

O. F. JORDAN CONTINUES HIS ACCOUNT OF CHICAGO'S MORAL CONDITION. FROM WEEK TO WEEK HE WILL PRESENT SIGNIFICANT SIGHTS AND EVENTS IN HIS WALKS AND TALKS ABOUT THE CITY.

The Enemy in the City.

One of the first needs in planning the redemption of the city is to take note of the strength of the enemy. This may be a discouraging and ungracious task but a necessary one, nevertheless. We shall, in this study, present some of the problems of the city's life.

One of the first facts that strikes the visitor in Chicago is the congested character of the poorer sections of the city. In the stock yards district, the policemen claim that there are houses where twenty people sleep in a single room. These people are men, women and children. There is no embarrassment over the morning toilet for the previous day's attire was not removed. In these places natural modesty is obliterated under the debasing conditions of a struggle for existence. New York has a law of long standing restricting the amount of a lot that may be covered with buildings. No such law exists in Chicago. In one tenement block in Chicago where a census was taken recently, it was found that two thousand, three hundred and twenty-seven people were living in one tenement block. Under such conditions, disease gains fearful headway. These tenement districts are the centers from which the dreaded tubercular infection comes to blanch the cheeks of even the children of millionaires. From these districts the children wander to seek more congenial surroundings, sleeping in barrels and in outhouses rather than endure the filth and depression of their home life. It is true that out of such terrible homes boys have arisen to positions of public honor. It is not true that environment is a fatalistic limitation to the opportunities of life. But it is also true that the percentage of those who can rise out of such surroundings to noble character is much less than from homes where the conditions are more favorable.

Poverty Handicaps The Churches.

Again, the poverty of large classes of population renders efforts at gospel work difficult or impossible. Many sections of the city cannot be made to support religious work of any kind or even the simpler forms of social co-operation. In the rear of the wholesale houses in S. Water street can be seen people hunting over the garbage for rotten vegetables or for fowls that have died in transportation. Families sometimes subsist entirely in hard times from the garbage cans of their more affluent neighbors. This same poverty demands similar economies in dress and rent. Without the service of a bath-tub to be clean, without the forms of clothing prescribed even in our more modest churches, without the manners which association with even people of modest means gives, it is easily seen that we cannot get the neediest people in all Chicago into our churches.

Not only is there the absence of the environment that makes for good citizenship and righteousness, but there are also the secret schools of crime that have made Chicago a terror to the visitor. It is reported that Chicago has more murderers than any other city in the United States and more than any city in Europe except Rome and St. Petersburg. Other forms of crime have entrenched themselves behind systems of bribery so that they are not subject to frequent interference by the police, so it is charged. The lawless spirit is fostered by saloons which remain open all night in spite of city ordinance and remain open on Sunday in spite of the state law. In some of these saloons hold-ups and other forms of crime are planned. This criminal element has great influence in politics in some parts of the city. "Hinky Dink's" place is the rendezvous of the worst element of the ward. Here the tramps and bums of the city congregate at election time and continue in office one of the foremost representatives of the undesirable in politics. Thus it comes about that not only does Chicago have more than its share of the criminal elements, but they have a power with the politics of the city that is hardly surpassed in any city in the world.

Saloons and Their Adjuncts.

The haunts of vice are numerous in Chicago. A hundred million dollars are spent in Chicago every year in the saloons for liquor. While Chicago has something like a thousand churches and it is said to have five thousand grocery stores, it has seven thousand saloons. With many of these saloons are adjuncts such as gambling hells, houses of ill-fame, low vaudeville, exhibitions and other evil things. Ten thousand women live a life that is worse than death and die of disease more dreadful than leprosy after an average of five years spent in the most degrading servitude known in the annals of the race. These become the means of contaminating the population in nameless ways. In New York City a company of physicians made blood tests of several thousand men passing a fairly respectable street. It was found that eighty-five per cent of these men were infected. It is commonly believed by physicians and preachers that less than ten per cent of the young men in Chicago are pure. The dance halls are the means by which the red light district is supplied with its denizens. Evil resorts like that of Freiberg continue to flourish, though now under some embarassing restrictions. Some of these haunts of evil are said to be property of a leading brewery in Milwaukee. Not only is the dance hall a source of contaminating influences but the little shows of the city as well. Many of the penny arcades have pictures as nude as a liberal police supervision will permit and inflame the youth at a penny per. Other influences that break down the morals of the people are of an economic nature. The department stores in many cases pay young women wages which are too small to live on. Where the girls come from homes, they get along but those that have the entire burden of their own support find in the pinch of poverty an incentive to evil living.

Loose Family Life.

Not only is Chicago endangered on the side of the vicious elements, but it threatens to lose the sense of the sanctity of the home among the respectable elements. Divorce is easy and common. Perhaps many of the judges of the city are stringent in their regulation of divorce but others well known to the public, grant them with little ceremony. We once visited a divorce court in Chicago where three divorces were granted in just fifteen minutes by the watch.

This is a problem in other sections of the country as well, but the number of desertions of families on the part of men in the better walks of life and the general loosening up of the sense of the sanctity of the home bodes no good for the future of the city.

We might mention many another entrenchment of evil in our city. We pass many of them by to mention in closing the distinctly anti-Christian movements of the city. In the Bohemian sections particularly, there is an organized teaching of an infidel cathechism with blasphemous references to the birth and life of Jesus. Among the better grade American people there is a following for such a ranter as Mangasarian who attracts an audience by denying about everything that the race affirms. He insists that the church has been an enemy of civilization. With the culture obtained in the Princeton Theological seminary, he influences a considerable following of people to stay away from the church.

Let not those outside Chicago who read this dreadful story of human sin imagine our city is in moral quarantine. The Church of Jesus Christ must take Chicago or the Chicago of evil will take the church and the nation. The continual shifting of population will cause to filter through the entire citizenship the contagion of evil. Chicago is today in her worst spots a Sodom of iniquity. The sins for which the ancient cities were condemned are here. But Chicago redeemed can become the new Jerusalem. The new Jerusalem was not to be a heavenly city but was to be let down to earth. We who are Christian must usher in its coming.

CHURCH NOTES.

During the illness of C. G. Kindred, Dr. Gates of the University of Chicago has been supplying his pulpit. We are glad to report that Mr. Kindred is rapidly getting better though he will probably not be able to get back to work for two months yet. While he is away the faithful workers keep things going. Just now a canvas for subscriptions for the Christian Century is being pushed with vigor.

The New board of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society met and organized last Friday afternoon. The plans of work for the past year were for the most part continued. The plan of district committees was continued and the committees enlarged. O. F. Jordan, pastor of the Evanston church, was elected to succeed Parker Stockdale who finds that the duties of his large church engaged his entire time. Mr. Jordan was secretary of the First District of Illinois for three years and comes into the work with enthusiasm.

John Ray Ewers preached last Sunday at the Irving Park church.

Prof. Gerald B. Smith spoke at the ministers' meeting on Monday on "Christian Science." He made a keen analysis of the subject and explained why the movement had gotten such headway.

The Jackson Boulevard Church had a Harvest Home celebration Sunday. The house was packed at the evening service. There were two additions to the church.

The Armour Avenue Church had one addition last Sunday.

The Oak Park Church had two additions last Sunday. The Sunday-school offerings were $17.

John Ray Ewers spoke briefly on his social settlement work in Youngstown, Ohio, at the ministers meeting Monday.

Sheffield Avenue Church has had additions every Sunday for five Sundays.

Dr. Gates spoke last Sunday at Chicago Heights. The work there was left in flourishing condition by Mr. Lockhart.

Next Monday the Ministers' meeting will listen to an invited speaker on the subject of the new Chicago charter.

ILLINOIS NOTES.

The offerings are coming in strong now from the efforts of churches and brethren on our state day. The illness of our treasurer, J. A. Harrison, prevents the mailing of receipts to many.

The business interests of Brother Harrison make it necessary for him to surrender the treasurer's place and we regret it because of his careful and friendly service. The new treasurer is W. H. Land, Eddy Building, Bloomington. As soon as Brother Harrison can check the books with him orders will be paid and receipts mailed.

The Century kindly gives us space and hereafter we hope to have Illinois Notes every two weeks.

I assisted Brother N. E. Cory, Colchester, in the dedication of the new church building. The Stevens Brothers, Chicago, made a handsome gift of $2,800 to the church in honor of their parents who once lived there.

The new Living-Link churches to our state society are Normal, W. G. McColley; Deland, W. T. McConnell; Quincy, Clyde Darsie.

The old Living-Links that continue with us are Arcola, John I. Gunn; First Church, Springfield, F. W. Burnham; Carthage, W. W. Denham; Central Church, Peoria.

These seven Links cannot possibly spell twenty-five which is one of our Centennial Aims. However, there are others on the way and we fully expect to realize our Aim with the good fellowship of churches and ministers.

Brother Birkey of New Bedford is supporting an evangelist himself.

A HOUSE TO BE SOLD FOR DEBT.

A little congregation of 22 members, at Weldon, near Brandenburg, Meade county, Ky., is confronted by the advertisement for sale of their house of worship, Dec. 7th. This is near the wonderful lithographic stone quarry of 260 acres—the finest in the world—and the only one in the United States. There will be great developments in that section and this house ought not to be sold for the $170.00 they owe on it. They are going to try to pay this themselves; but they despair of doing so. They have asked me to appeal to the Kentucky brotherhood to help them in this emergency. Any money sent to me will be used promptly to relieve this situation. The State Board is not expected to pay money for houses; but to use the funds entrusted to them to pay for preaching. Will not enough people send at once from one dollar to $10.00 each to pay this debt and start this work afresh? Meade county belongs to one of the Western Kentucky districts. Let East and West and North and South Kentucky "lend a hand" at once.

"A DOUBLE-LINKUM."

This is a word coined by E. J. Festermacher, Bowling Green, to tell the story of the big advance made by that church in the support of Kentucky Missions. They have provided enough money to insure the putting of two men to work in the 20th District. One man agreed to pay enough for one worker—if the church would do as much. This has been done and so this church is a double-linkum—or double-header. That is a fine record for the Bowling Green Church and their new preacher.

Cadiz has joined the living-link class. Mayfield has agreed to do likewise and of course Owensboro will not fall behind her usual record—with Dr. M. Gano Buckner at the helm and the splendid foundation left by Pres. R. H. Crossfield. Hopkinsville may be counted on in the same class without fail and that makes six of that class in Western Kentucky. Central Kentucky must hold all we have in that line and ought to make some advance. Already Richmond has signified her purpose to do this and assured me that it will be done. That makes ten in upper Kentucky in this class—if all the last year "living-link" churches stay in line. Sixteen altogether and we ought to reach twenty.

The reports from the November offering are not very full; but all that has been heard is of cheering nature. We plead with every church to have fellowship with our state work and to do so now. Do not put it off. Do not let January, 1909, find you without having provided for the needs of Kentucky missions. We urge all who can do so to remit as early as possible.

SUNDAY IN DAVENPORT.

Yesterday was the greatest day in the history of the First Christian Church. God was certainly with His people in mighty power. There was great rejoicing among the members for they realized that their prayers were being answered. Twenty-six additions, of which twenty-five made the good confession. A wonderful victory for our Christ.

This makes forty-one additions in two weeks, thirty-four by confession. Great crowds have attended every service, giving the very best of attention. This city of 50,000 people is being aroused.

Too much cannot be said of our beloved pastor, S. M. Perkins. We believe that since the days of the apostles, the gospel has never been made more plain, searching and powerful. He leaves nothing uncovered. He is true to his convictions and is wonderfully in earnest. His appeal to the sinner to come to Christ is masterly and convincing.

A large chorus choir is doing a most excellent work in singing the gospel. Brother Perkins says, "he never had such good music." The best of it all is, the work is being done by the members of the church, under the able leadership of Brother Perkins. We are expecting great things this week.

Your brother,
E. R. Moore.

A LAY SERMON TO FATHERS.

Vacation has taught fathers and sons a good many lessons, but none more startling than the fact that boys grow up. And, what is stranger, your boy is growing up. Some day he will be a man; some day he will be where you are, and life will have pushed off on him the responsibilities you bear today.

And yet—God forgive us!—too many of us fathers are trusting schools and clubs and haphazard circumstance to fit our boys for this inevitable usurpation. We are too busy to give them the companionship we owe them; too tired and irritable to read the promise of strength in their restlessness; too indifferent to their unspoken hopes to share in and shape their ambitions. Life and work close in upon us and we forget that they and not we ourselves are to be our successors.

Schools and school-teachers are no substitutes for fathers and mothers. The winter has its opportunities just as truly as has the summer. And the home can have its friendships for father and boy just as truly as have the trail and the camp and the farm. Happy is the boy who knows this! And happier is the father.—The World Today.

Orange, Cal., Nov. 18, '08.

We are having a splendid meeting here with Prof. J. A. Carroll conducting the music and pastor doing the preaching. Meeting 10 days old and 10 additions. House crowded every night. Field was thoroughly gleaned last year by evangelist Stivers so we cannot have a great number of additions.

C. C. Bentley, Pastor.

Evangelist C. E. Shultz, New Castle, Ind., is open for meetings for January and February.

Forgetful.

A minister's wife, a doctor's wife, and a traveling man's wife met one day recently and were talking about the forgetfulness of their husbands.

The minister's wife thought her husband was the most forgetful man living, because he would go to church and forget his notes and no one could make out what he was trying to preach about.

The doctor's wife thought her husband was the most forgetful, for he would often start out to see a patient and forget his medicine case and, therefore, travel miles for nothing.

"Well," said the traveling man's wife, my husband beats that. He came home the other day and patted me on the cheek and said, 'I believe I have seen you before, little girl. What is your name?'"—Tit-Bits.

CLEVER WIFE.
Knew How to Keep Peace in Family.

It is quite significant, the number of persons who get well of alarming heart trouble when they let up on coffee and use Postum as the beverage at meals.

There is nothing surprising about it however, because the harmful alkaloid in coffee—caffeine—is not present in Postum, which is made of clean, hard wheat.

"Two years ago I was having so much trouble with my heart," writes a lady in Washington, "that at times I felt quite alarmed. My husband took me to a specialist to have my heart examined.

"The doctor said he could find no organic trouble but said my heart was irritable from some food I had been accustomed to eat, and asked me to try and remember what disagreed with me.

"I remembered that coffee always soured on my stomach and caused me trouble from palpitation of the heart. So I stopped coffee and began to use Postum. I have had no further trouble since.

"A neighbor of ours, an old man, was so irritable from drinking coffee that his wife wanted him to drink Postum. This made him very angry, but his wife secured some Postum and made it carefully according to directions.

"He drank the Postum and did not know the difference, and is still using it to his lasting benefit. He tells his wife that the coffee is better than it used to be, so she smiles with him and keeps peace in the family by serving Postum instead of coffee."

DEDICATION AT EAST ORANGE, NEW JERSEY.

One of the most important events to occur in our brotherhood in the East will be the dedication on next Lord's Day, November 29th, of the new edifice of the church in East Orange, New Jersey.

Many efforts have been made in the great centres along the Atlantic coast to establish churches practicing "first principles only," but they have not flourished as in other sections of the country. The great influx of foreigners, the conservatism of the old puritan stock and the general apathy towards religion in large cities have seemed to be the retarding forces; but the great success achieved at East Orange marks the beginning of a new era.

The two large cities, Newark and Jersey City, in the United States that are without churches of our faith are located in New Jersey, and the only organized church we have in the entire state is the one at East Orange. Hence the growth in that state is largely dependent upon their work; and hte influence of their success is of vital importance to our entire work in the East.

In the summer of 1899 disciples from England, Virginia, Iowa, Kentucky and New York state who had moved to New Jersey were brought together for a conference. They decided that if twelve could be found who would work and contribute it would be wise to undertake the laying of a foundation for a future church. After months of hard personal work and advertising in local and our National Church papers, the required number agreed to undertake the work and accordingly these twelve on the first Lord's Day in 1900 came together to break bread. A midweek prayer service and Bible school, with only one child, was also begun.

From the very first, emphasis was placed on missions and that first year's contributions were made for Home and Foreign Missions, church extension, ministerial relief and the American Bible Society.

In October of that year the Home Board came to their aid and made a pastor possible. R. P. Shepherd, now of Pomona, California, being called. For a long time the meetings were held in a plumbing shop and growth was slow. People had never heard of us and we were taken for Mormons, Quakers, Christian Scientists, etc. In the fall of 1901 the Extension Board bought a lot and a chapel was built and dedicated in May, 1902. At this time there was about sixty members. In January, 1904, Mr. Shepherd was succeeded by Miner Lee Bates as pastor. During his ministry the church prospered and obtained a very high standing in the community. In 1906 he resigned to take charge of the 56th Street Church in New York city and L. N. D. Wells of Pittsburg was called. The growth has been steady and substantial until today the church has a membership of 250 with a Bible school attendance of 300.

For some time no efforts have been made to increase the school because of lack of room. It now meets in two sessions and the indications are that the school will reach 500 inside of a year, after getting into the new building when room and proper facilities will be available.

The new buiding consists of a large auditorium with bowled floor, in combination with a modern Sunday-school room: Each part perfect in itself and forming a perfect whole when used in combination; the building will accomodate about 600 in pews of auditorium and a Sunday-school of 700 or more, and providing advantageous seats when in combination for 1,200 to 1,400, all within easy seeing and hearing distance of the speaker. Perfect acoustics, heating and ventilation are essential features. The decorations are simple and in harmony with the Flemish oak doors and trim. The windows are all filled with handsome stained glass of artistic design. The building is perfectly lighted, one of the features being a handsome dome covering the auditorium, throwing in a flood of mellow light. Back of the pulpit opens a baptistry, so arranged that while the central feature of the chancel is entirely out of the way, yet when in use is visible from every part of either room. There is also provided a mothers' retiring room, choir room, pastor's study, robing-rooms, class rooms, etc., all in proper connection. The basement is entirely finished and equipped for all the social work of the church, with rooms adapted to physical exercise, club work, etc., as well as complete culinary and toilet conveniences.

The church is built of white brick, limestone trimmings, red tile roof of Spanish pattern, and in design is of the modern or Americanized Romanesque style. The church is of the domical type, pyramidal in its grouping and has neither tower nor spire. The principal entrance is at the corner, through an imposing porch, with other conveniently located entrances to the various parts. This building complete represents a total cost of about $40,000, exclusive of lot, is located on the principal avenue of the Oranges, that noted residential suburb of New York, and in the center of a population of half a million.

A CENTENNIAL CHALLENGE.

Last week the Foreign Society received an unconditional pledge of $500 for the proposed Bible College at Vigan, Philippine Islands. This friend lives in Illinois.

R. A. Long of Missouri, proposes to give $5,000 for the college at Vigan, and $5,000 also for the one at Bolengi, Africa, upon the condition that $20,000 besides is secured by August 1, 1909. This is a worthy challenge to all classes who are interested in making the Centennial a success and to all who are interested in seeing these great schools provided before the year closes.

We can sweep the province of Luzon in the Philippine Islands with the gospel message if this school can be properly equipped. Already our evangelists are going everywhere, but they need to be more firmly grounded in the faith and to be brought to a wider and more accurate knowledge of the Bible. They must meet the Roman Church upon its own territory. This they are doing with their limited equipment, with unquestioned fidelity and a holy enthusiasm.

Shall we not have many responses to the urgent call for these schools? And shall we not promptly and most cheerfully accept the implied challenge of our large-hearted friend, R. A. Long?

These schools are no wild and impractical experiment. By no means. In the past few years our people have established such schools in Tokio, Japan; Nankin, China. and Jubbulpore, India. They give stability and character and all helpfullness to our work in these pagan lands. What has been done in these fields must now be done for the Philippines and the Congo.

Charcoal Removes Stomach Poisons

Pure Charcoal Will Absorb One Hundred Times Its Volume in Poisonous Gases.

Charcoal was made famous by the old monks of Spain, who cured all manner of stomach, liver, blood and bowel troubles by this simple remedy.

One little nervous Frenchman held forth its virtues before a famous convention of European physicians and surgeons. Secheyron was his name. He was odd, quaint and very determined. His brothers in medicine laughed at his claims. Thereupon he swallowed two grains of stryehnine, enough to kill three men, and ate some charcoal. The doctors thought him mad, but he did not even have to go to bed. The charcoal killed the effects of the strychnine and Secheyron was famous. Ever since that day physicians have used it. Run impure water through charcoal and you have a pure, delicious drink.

Bad breath, gastritis, bowel gases, torpid liver, impure blood, etc., give way before the action of charcoal.

It is really a wonderful adjunct to nature and it is a most inexhaustible storehouse of health to the man or woman who suffers from gases or impurities of any kind.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are made of pure willow charcoal, sweetened to a palatable state with honey.

Two or three of them eure an ordinary case of bad breath. They should be used after every meal, espeeially if one's breath is prone to be impure.

These little lozenges have nothing to do with medicine. They are just sweet, fresh willow, burned to a nicety for eharcoal making and fragrant honey, the product of the bee. Thus every ingredient comes to man from the lap of nature.

The only secret lies in the Stuart process of eompressing these simple substances into a hard tablet or lozenge, so that age, evaporation or decay may not assail their curative qualities.

You may take as many of them as you wish and the more you take the quicker will you remove the effects of bad breath and impurities arising from a deeayed or decaying meal. They assist digestion, purify the blood and help the intestines and bowels throw off all waste matter.

Go to your druggist at once and buy a package of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges, price 25 cents. You will soon be told by your friends that your breath is not so bad as it was. Send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

Nothing worries disease like good health. Tuberculosis specialists tell us that the parasites, or disease germs, can live only with great difficulty in a perfectly healthy body. They thrive in proportion as the tissue is debased. The theory is that they originally grew only in dead bodies—getting their life from inorganie tissue. The same is true of sin. It has little hope for life in one whose spiritual health is vigorous. It thrives in proportion as the tissue is debased. It is satisfied only with death. There is a Physieian who will keep us in such health that sin will starve when it tries to feed on us. —Sunday School Times.

"William," said the teacher sternly to a precocious youngster, "your writing is awful, it's nothing but a scrawl."

"Oh, well," replied the little fellow, "I don't have to learn to write. Papa is going to buy me a typewriter."

THE SITUATION AT THE SOUTHERN CHRISTIAN INSTITUTE.

From recent letters we gain a better idea of conditions at the Southern Christian Institute after the fire which destroyed the girls' dormitory.

The destruction of the contents of the building was even more complete than at first supposed. It took a brave fight to save the other buildings. The fire spread in the dry grass so rapidly that it took a large force to control it. The wood-house with winter supply of wood was burned. Only enough canned fruit was left for one meal from the large quantity "put up" for winter use.

The negroes of the community rendered every possible aid. The white people showed great sympathy and kindness. The scholars were obedient, helpful and uncomplaining. All there are working together and working hard to bring order out of chaos.

How about the loss? Most of the commissary supplies were burned excepting potatoes. There must be a cash outlay to replace these.

Second, most of the furniture, bedding, linen and general equipment were lost. Money is needed to replace this loss.

Third, they have converted the shop into a temporary dormitory and dining hall. The printing press is moved into a shed, and the machinery moved over behind the barn, and some temporary building had to be done. All these things and many more will take money. All will add expense. Then we cannot now put the building back for anything like the sum which put it there in the first place. All building materials are almost twice as expensive as then.

Clothing for the girls is not needed, as enough is now on the way to supply all these needs, but quilts, table and bed linen and tea towels and the like would be very acceptable. These should be packed in strong boxes or barrels and shipped to J. B. Lehman, Edwards, Hinds Co., Miss.

But the great need is for money gifts. President Lehman thinks that $3,000 will hardly replace the loss,—outside of the insurance. Will not the churches and the brethren of our brotherhood send gifts to cover this loss.

Send all gifts of money to C. C. Smith, 1365 Burdette Ave., Cincinnati, O.

THE CENTENNIAL ROLL BOOK.

In 1900 the Wesleyans of Great Britain made up a roll of a million persons, with a thank offering averaging $5.00 opposite every name. At the same time the Methodists of the United States raised $22,000,000.

For the centennial of the current restoration movement, dating from the publication of Thomas Campbell's declaration and address by the Christian Association of Washington, September, 7, 1809, we want a complete roll of every church that is now enlisted in the movement.

The roll books are being prepared and will soon be ready to send out to the churches at a nominal cost of 10 cents each for those with room for 160 names, 15 cents each for those with capacity for 320 names and 5 cents more for each additional 320 names. Duplicates substantially bound to be preserved in the church will also be provided at the lowest possible expense. These books are so ruled and printed as to show after each name four blank squares in which can be indicated with an (x) the fact that the member is enrolled in the Bible school, has contributed something within the current year to local church work, has given something to the general work, missions, benevolence and education, and at last, that he attended the Centennial Convention in Pittsburgh.

All of these books are to be forwarded to Centennial Headquarters in Pittsburgh, September 7, 1909, and to be kept there until after the Centennial Convention. Then they will be bound together by states and removed to the new Home and Foreign Missionary Building in Cincinnati for perpetual preservation. An engrossed copy will also be placed in the Library of Congress at Washington.

The C. W. B. M. is already earnestly endeavoring to complete a roll of 85,000 members before the Centennial. This will not at all interfere with that but will rather help it.

Five purposes are obvious in the presentation of this centennial roll book. First, to make every member of every church feel that he really stands for something and is identified with a vast and vital movement. Second, to quicken and intensify our evangelism this centennial year. Third, to enroll every church member in the Bible school. Fourth, to secure some contribution to local church work from absolutely every member, young and old, rich and poor. Fifth, to enlist every member in the larger interests of the Kingdom of God represented by the offerings for missions, benevolence and education.

Let us make a record in this year of grace that will testify, to our generation and to all that follow after, of faith in Christ, of hope in God, of love in the Spirit. Brethren, redeemed by the blood of Christ, this is the day for which we were called! All together and altogether, let us lift such a voice as shall ring out above the world's mad babel and ring on and on and on, after our own single, human cries shall have been hushed in the grave.

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

THE MANCHESTER SITUATION.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions, with E. M. Todd, as its representative, went to Manchester, New Hampshire, in July, 1907, to inaugurate a work that it was hoped would eventuate in a Church of the Disciples of Christ. There was absolutely nothing to begin with—no buildings, no one waiting for us, nor expecting us, nor interested in us. Mr. Todd, his mother and sister have labored faithfully, but without a building they have been handicapped. If a "faithful few" had been there even a rented hall would have seemed a good place to establish a temporary church home. But to gather people wholly uninterested into such a place and to secure a permanent congregation is always difficult. It was decided that the continuance of the effort must involve at once the expenditure of a large amount of money for a lot and building and that the work could not in many years be self-supporting. Promise of results commensurate with the effort and outlay was lacking, and when it was found that New Hampshire offered no strong inducements to the Disciples of Christ as a point of strategic importance, Mr. Todd advised the discontinuance of the work. Our Board has heartily concurred in his decision. "Fields white to harvest" invite us in many directions, and we are unhesitating in the belief that the decision is right.

Many friends of Mr. Todd, of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and of the cause of Christ at large, have watched this effort with deep interest. We regret exceedingly their disappointment. This plain statement of facts is meant to give them the true understanding of the situation. We have never had a record of easily giving up. The confidence of our great brotherhood is dear to us and essential to the mighty work we have to do. God helping us, we shall still deserve it.

Anna R. Atwater,
President of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

The Young People's Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is this year celebrating its Silver Anniversary. Every Children's Endeavor Society, Mission Band, and other organization that gave less than $25.00 to its missionary funds last year is asked for $25.00 this year in celebration of the 25 years of the existence of the Department. Other organizations are asked for two or more times this amount. For every $25.00 given this work will be granted a life membership in the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

A WORD TO OUR MINISTERS ABOUT C. W. B. M. DAY.

I believe the time has come when C. W. B. M. Day deserves the same recognition on the part of ministers and churches that any other date on our calendar of days has and deserves.

Too long have the few women of the Local Auxiliary borne alone the responsibility of this day. The ministers are our pastors and we are their faithful co-laborers: as we bear with you the heat and burden of the church work, day by day, during all the year, are we asking too much when we ask you, dear brothers, to bear with us the responsibility of this, the one day, when with full hearts and trembling lips we try to tell to the church the story of our efforts "to make Jesus Christ known, loved, and obeyed throughout the world."

NOT TOO LATE

Children's Day for Home Missions was celebrated the Lord's Day before Thanksgiving more generally than ever before. Many schools, however, were unable either to have Mr. Fillmore's "New Crusade," or to celebrate the day formally.

I am anxious that every Bible-school should be enlisted this year—THE CENTENNIAL YEAR. The names of the Bible-schools actively interested in Home Missions in THE CENTENNIAL YEAR will present an interesting historical record. I want every school therefore to send in an offering just as soon as convenient, a special offering—if possible—hearty and generous, taken at some agreed-upon time. But if that is impossible send us the regular offering of some Lord's Day. This is a great year and a great cause. You want to be in line I know.

The Christian Century

Vol. XXV. CHICAGO, ILL., DECEMBER 5, 1908 No. 49.

To All Friends of the Truth

We are going to make a most unusual request of our readers this week. We are going to ask all lovers of the Truth to co-operate with us in sending the Christian Century to every preacher in our brotherhood for the next six weeks. There are about five thousand of them who do not see the Century. They have no other source of information concerning the teachings of Professor Willett than the Christian Standard. The minds of multitudes have been poisoned and corrupted by the wanton misrepresentations of that paper.

J. H. Fillmore says: "I just received my Century for November 28. It is simply great. I doubt if there has ever been a single issue of any of our papers that measures up to this number in value. I hope it is going to all our preachers, and especially to those who, in the Standard, are protesting against Willett."

Now, the Century is not going to all our preachers. And according to the postal rules we are not allowed to send out as sample copies any such number as will be necessary to supply the paper to our preachers. But you who wish the brotherhood to become informed of the truth in the current controversy can send the paper to every minister among us.

You can send the paper to the preachers for the next six weeks.

$100 sent to us will send the Century for six weeks to 1,000 preachers.
$50 will send it to 500 preachers.
$25 will send it to 250 preachers.
$10 will send it to 100 preachers.
$ 5 will send it to 50 preachers.
$ 1 will send it to 10 preachers.

We believe many will feel that there is no more important missionary work to be done in the next six weeks than to tell the truth to the ministers of our own brotherhood who have been too long kept in ignorance of the facts which lie at the basis of our present grievous controversy.

If we are enabled to send the Christian Century to our ministers we will make a restatement of the facts that have already been set forth in previous issues with much additional information. Professor Willett's Confession of Faith will be reproduced either in our columns or in tract form, and certain of the protests already printed will be reproduced together with many others that are coming in.

We believe our brotherhood is torn with strife because it has not been told the truth. We believe the tyranny of a newspaper is suppressing the consciences of many brethren. We believe no argument is necessary. Only the facts are necessary. But the facts must be put into the possession of the brethren. Every preacher should read the Christian Century for the next six weeks at least.

This is the moment to act. Let every one who is disposed to have a part in meeting this strategic opportunity send his gift to us at once. It will be acknowledged promptly in the Century unless instructed otherwise. If the response in the next few days warrants us we will proceed with the plan in our next issue. May God graciously use the gifts of his people in bringing lasting peace to our brotherhood.

Young Men and the Ministry

No one who watches the current of events in the church can fail to be impressed by the urgent need of more young men to enter the Christian ministry and devote themselves to this, the greatest work in the world. The need is imperative. Ministers are dropping out of the ranks and leaving gaps which must be filled. Their departure from the ministry may be through death or through a decline of power which makes it necessary for them to seek other types of work. But far beyond these common losses there is the need of young men to keep pace with the growing opportunities which our own country and the world at large offer for the extension of the kingdom. New cities are springing up in a day; old lands are opening to the approach of the Gospel. For all of these reasons a vastly growing number of young men is needed in the ministry.

In addition to these facts it is scarcely necessary to say that young men are required who are trained to guide the religious thinking of the people committed to their care, to meet the objections and arguments hostile to Christianity, to develop the teaching and training side of the work of the church, and to lay foundations for new enterprises in Christian activity. Our cities are absorbing foreign populations which must be evangelized. Country churches are declining and disappearing. Social questions are pressing for consideration. National interests require new and larger interpretations of Christian truth; and far beyond, on the frontiers of Christian lands, there lies a great non-Christian world waiting for something, it scarcely knows what, to guide it to self-realization and power.

In the face of these urgent and imperious needs, why do not more young men enlist in the ministry? The call for service is by no means being met at the present time. While the number of students in theological seminaries and divinity schools has increased during the past few years and the critical situation which confronted several of the churches only a short time ago has in a measure passed, the need is still very urgent and the question arises why the supply is so inadequate.

There are many answers which may be given. Many young men are not quite sure that they wish to devote themselves to the proclamation of truths regarding which their own convictions are not quite mature or stable. Others are hindered from the ministry because they are fearful that in a time of transition the conservative elements in the church will hinder their liberty of thought and their opportunity for service. Then too the courses of study offered in institutions of higher education are so fascinating that many students who at first are interested in preparing for the ministry are led to adopt other fields of study and activity. There is, besides, that recognition of the high moral standard required of a minister which dissuades conscientious young men, for fear they may not rise to the requirements of the sacred work. And, on the other hand, the number of ministerial failures, both intellectual and moral, alarms and disquiets not a few young men who would otherwise devote themselves to this work.

Perhaps the inadequate financial provision made for the ministry is a potent cause of insufficient numbers entering the field. It is one of the outstanding facts that ministers and teachers are among the most poorly paid of all the servants of the present social order. To this, in a measure, they consent by acknowledging that their work is not for reward, but at the same time the community and especially the church owes to them such consideration as to relieve them entirely of this embarrassment. It cannot be doubted that the love of luxury and success keeps some men out of the ministry, but these are hardly worth considering, if they are to be permanently influenced by such motives. Perhaps the most potent of all causes, however, it the neglect of parents to instruct their children regarding the nobility and desirability of the ministry as a life work. At the door of such parents there lies heavy responsibility.

Reflection upon these and other features of the problem of ministerial supply is suggested by a recent book written by Mr. John R. Mott, of the Young Men's Christian Association, entitled "The Future Leadership of the Church."* Mr. Mott has held numerous conferences with the ministers of this and other lands regarding the urgency of the problem of ministerial supply, and he has placed at the disposal of those who are concerned regarding this theme an arsenal of facts and arguments which have been gathered in the course of his conferences.

It ought not to be too much to expect that every minister will preach, at least once in the year, on the ministry as a desirable and imperative work for some young men in his congregation; and that frequently in his public prayers this theme may receive due emphasis. In the preparation of such sermons, Mr. Mott's book will have very great value. In addition, we are glad to know that a series of pamphlets, written by some of the most eminent Christian teachers and preachers, has been prepared to assist in the same work.

Such titles as "The Claim of the Ministry on Strong Men," by Rev. George A. Gordon of Boston; "The Kind of Men for the Ministry," by Bishop McDowell; "The Minister as a Preacher," by Rev. Chas. E. Jefferson; and "The Preparation of the Modern Ministry," by President Moore, show something of the purpose and scope of these now accessible pamphlets.

The problem is not one of any single denomination, but is a part of the work of all the churches and especially in this period when Christian union is receiving so much attention, and the need of a ministry directing its efforts to this end is so clear.

Heresies of Heresy-Hunters

It has been a matter of complaint with those who live by the vocation of hunting out heresy in our brotherhood, that the calling of heresy-hunting makes the hunter more odious in the public opinion than the victim. It is inquired by these individuals why the public so fails in the appreciation of their labors.

The reason the public has no admiration for the profession of heresy-hunting is that the heresy hunter is more of a heretic than is the object of the chase. There is not supine indifference in the public mind about religion. There is simply a feeling that a man who must smell out heresy in a brother, and call names, and excommunicate, is whistling to keep up his faith, very much like the small boy who would run away if he did not whistle when he ventures into dark corners. Calvin would not trust his doctrines to the judgement of his fellow-men but must needs put Servetus to death lest all men should become disciples of Servetus. If there is any doubt of the sincerity of Calvin in his inner consciousness it arises from his doubt whether his doctrines would be accepted without the death of Servetus. The vocation of heresy-hunter is odious, then, for the reason that it reveals a state of mind which has more hidden doubts chucked into the dark corners than the heretic ever dares to parade to the public view. For a doubter to accuse others of doubt when he himself has important doubts which he reveals in his very persecution, makes him unpopular. A prominent heresy-hunter once confessed, "we all have doubts enough to get kicked into prominence if we so desired." This was intended as a reflection on heretics. Instead it revealed the state of mind of those who would be orthodox in the public gaze.

Another heresy of the heresy-hunter is that new things must needs be wrong in the very nature of the case. He forgets that Jesus was a heretic to the Pharisees. Paul admitted, "after the way called heresy, worship I the God of my Fathers." Martin Luther and John Wesley were accounted dangerous heretics in their day. Alexander Campbell was generally maligned as a heretic. From the day of the Sermon on the Law until the day of his death, the most serious heresies were ascribed to him. History has shown that from Jesus, the Master Heretic, even unto our day, heresy may be but the name of new truth which is to bless the human race. Jesus was accustomed to say, "It was written by them of old time * * *; but I say unto you * * *." He never spoke a single word that would indicate that he did not wish his disciples to enjoy this same liberty. Heresies of today, then, may be the truths of tomorrow, and the heresy-hunter of today may be called of those of tomorrow a false prophet.

Another common heresy of the heresy-hunter is to assume that the intellectual in religion is the most important. Holding correct doctrine becomes a test of fellowship while purity of life is referred to as "mere ethics." Men may be great theologians and yet not have as genuine an experience of real religion as some poor washerwoman who keeps her tryst with God in private devotion and public worship, and whose home has the sunshine of a radiant faith. The washerwoman may not be able to state a single truth of theology, but far better than this she has experienced religion. The botanist who studies flowers from colored plates may have more technical knowledge but the housewife who cultivates real flowers gets closer to the realities.

The supreme heresy of the heresy-hunter, however, is in his practical denial of human brotherhood. A brother minister developes divergence in doctrine. Many years of educational preparation have unfitted the man for other things quite as much as it has fitted him for the work of preaching. His success in securing a pulpit from which to deliver his message depends upon his reputation. This reputation is even more delicate than that of a woman and suffers more from suspicion. Yet the heresy-hunter hesitates not to brand his brother and warns the churches not to employ him. Sometimes the heresy-hunter is so manifestly wrong about his facts that he must needs apologize. An apology, however, does not run down and overcome the original statement. Sometimes the statement of the heresy-hunter is technically true. But apart from other facts of the heretic's life this isolated fact is distorted out of its true proportions. If there has not been the falsehood of wrong statement, there has been the subtler and more injurious falsehood of untrue emphasis. Paul declared, "The greatest of these is love." A man may be a clanging cymbal of oratory, he may be a very marvel of credulity in receiving ancient doctrine, but if he fail in brotherhood he is nothing. The awfullest of all heresies from the Christian religion has been the heresy of an unbrotherly life.

If the heresy-hunter is genuine in his desire to overcome untruth, there is some advice in Holy Scripture which will be of great service, "And now I say unto you, refrain from these men and let them alone: for if this council or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God."

A Note from the Editors

To our host of friends who have sent to the Christian Century their congratulations on our recent issues we have not had time to respond. They will be good enough we are sure, to accept this general statement of our thanks as meant for each one of them personally. In undertaking the new work we considered it a most unhappy matter that we should have to launch at once into controversy. Our temper is not polemic. We do not mean to have an argumentative paper. We believe our people are wearied with debates. For ourselves we are not satisfied with our two months' issues from the standpoint of our ideal. But we have been compelled to meet a situation and we have striven to meet it bravely and candidly. We do not know what the end of the agitation will be but we mean to carry forward the good fight for liberty in such a spirit as will continue to us the good favor of the high-minded men and women who have so graciously praised our work.

The Divorce Problem

For twenty years there have been no federal statistics on the divorce problem. In a general way we have felt that the breaking up of homes was going on at an alarming rate, but no definitely tabulated facts were available. The past week, however, the new federal report on the subject has been made public. It contains facts that are startling enough. It is probable that in the United States more divorces are granted annually than in all the rest of the Christian world combined. Divorces have occurred the past twenty years in the ratio of one divorce to every thirteen marriages. The ratio of divorces to marriages has steadily grown and in no period have there been more divorces in proportion to marriages than in the last six years.

In 1870 the divorce rate was twenty-nine in a population of a hundred thousand married people. In 1905 it was eighty-two in the same population or nearly three times as many. If in a third of a century the rate has increased so greatly, it will be easy to calculate how long it will be until the person spending a whole life with one partner will be the curiosity and not the rule. This progressive polygamy will in the end have social consequences that are serious.

In the New Testament, Jesus plainly said that divorce had been allowed because of the hardness of men's hearts and not because it was ideal. His disciples said, as many a modern would say, "If the case of a man be so with his wife, it were better not to marry." We are not to interpret this biblical teaching in a legalistic way but we cannot say too strongly in our churches that divorce is frowned upon by the highest ideals of the race as they find expression in the Holy Scripture and in the conscience of the best people today. Preaching on the biblical ideals of courtship and marriage could be done in a way that would not be sensational or facetious but helpful and spiritual.

We are in deep need of better divorce legislation. Easy divorce laws, the easiest in the world, have encouraged young couples to rush for court relief after their first quarrel. Easy divorce laws have made divorce respectable. In South Carolina there are no divorces granted and from that attitude our states range to the other extreme of the conditions in South Dakota. A national divorce law would unify legislation and make our home life more secure.

In the causes alleged as grounds of divorce the past twenty years, the leading one is desertion. Twice as many women have sought divorce as men and half of the men have sought divorce on this one ground. The cause we have thought the gospel of Matthew allowed is a relatively small part of the whole. In many cases these desertions were agreed to beforehand by the parties wishing the divorce so that the divorce would be possible. Thus, by agreement any couple may devise a way in some of our states to be separated and be married to new partners in two years or less.

In treating with the divorce problem, we should treat the problem and not the offending individuals. Some of the deepest tragedies of life are in connection with the break-up of home life, and no hasty judgment can do full justice. Our remedies should begin with the cultivation of healthy public sentiment and in the enactment of suitable legislation that will make it hard for people to divorce and remarry because of caprice.

When the Pastor Falls Down

This article is taken from our Presbyterian neighbor, The Interior. It is too good a lesson to be read only by our Presbyterian brethren, so we reproduce it for our readers. Being pastors ourselves, and keenly conscious of our oft falling down, this may look like begging for mercy. We might do worse than to frankly confess it!—Editors.

WHAT DO YOU DO IN YOUR CHURCH WHEN THE PREACHER FALLS DOWN?

No, this isn't any slur on the preacher. Being just one human man on a job big enough for a half-dozen superhumans, he's only too certain to fall down somewhere sooner or later. Asking what you mean to do in that case isn't slurring him; it's just insisting on your giving him the square deal that he's entitled to.

The popular way of meeting such a situation is to turn the preacher off and get another.

That might be fair if the pastor's job was just one plain job that one set of qualifications was sufficient for. Then when he failed in that one line, you'd be justified in saying it was all off —that he had missed his calling.

If a carpenter can't fit two boards together, he'd better go and heave coal; fitting boards is all there is to carpentering. So with most occupations; they are single, narrow lines.

But the business of being a preacher is different; it's about a hundred lines wrapped up into one man's task, and it's beyond any decent and reasonable human requirement to expect any one individual to come out with a hundred per cent success on all of them.

Just give a minute's clear and honest thought to what a variety of abilities a minister's position demands of him.

He needs to be a smooth, fluent orator. He ought to have not merely words but ideas too; he very decidedly needs to be a thinker. He needs a lot of book knowledge—theology, philosophy, history and the like—but it won't do for him to read books all the time; people won't stand for him unless he is also very much of a "mixer"—perfectly at home among men.

And of course the modern preacher should be an organizer—masterful as a general in fitting people into the places where they belong. He doesn't dare, however, to show a bit of a general's spirit of command; he's bound to manage people wholly by persuasiveness—which takes enormous persuasiveness. The preacher should be an acute, accurate, discreet business man—in order to keep the church "temporalities" out of tangle. And above all he must be a spiritually minded man, though at the same time it is highly important that he must not be a visionary; people won't listen to him if he is not practical.

Just see what a tremendous bundle of qualities you've got. You could make a lawyer, a politician, a business man, a teacher, a settlement worker, a popular lecturer, an author, a philosopher, a man-around-town, an ascetic, a military commander, all out of that combination, and have a lot of qualities left over to distribute along a whole line of occupations from family physician to church janitor.

Yet you're supposing that you've hired the whole combination in the pastor of your church, and are expecting to get the benefit of each of these various elements of strength—all out of one man.

But you won't; somewhere in the list you're due for a disappointment. If your minister's a great preacher it's more than likely he won't be very strong on organization. If he's a gentle, comforting pastor, he may very probably be a good deal lacking in the pulpit. If he is a deep student, he may be awkward out among men. If he's a hearty good fellow to meet, he may impress you as not very deep intellectually or even spiritually. Some day before long you'll find a weak side to him.

The question is, What are you going to do about it when you make the discovery? Follow the ordinary way and hint to the preacher that it's time for him to move on?

Well, you'll not better the matter that way. The next preacher will have his weakness too.

And you'll do a rank injustice to the man you drive away. No man should be driven out of a pastorate for his defects of ability. There are only four good reasons for shoving out a preacher—his being lazy, being silly, being selfish, or being morally crooked.

When a minister lacks honor, self-sacrifice, industry, or horse-sense—any one—he's not fit for anybody's pastorate.

But all other deficiencies than these are curable. Many of them the preacher himself should be able to cure. But all the shortcomings that the minister either can't or doesn't cure—these are up to his church to take care of.

Every church when it calls a new pastor, ought to watch narrowly to see where he is going to fall down. But not to get a chance to complain—God forbid! When the pastor falls down, then the church has discovered where it can help him.

If the preacher shows up inefficient in organizing the people for work, then that's the signal for the men in the church who are strongest in the knack of organization to turn in and line up the membership for effective results.

If the pastor seems to get tangled and befuddled when money matters are to be dealt with, then let men used to handling dollars step forward and get the money worry off the pastor's mind.

If the pastor is slow and timid about calling on strangers and diffident in meeting newcomers, let the folks that have easy social graces go in strong for friendly visiting and hand-shaking.

If the Sunday-school lags or the prayer meeting is dull, and the pastor doesn't seem to know what to do about it, let the congregation boom these features of work with their own effort.

If the pastor falls down on his preaching, it's harder for the church to fill in that defect—which, by the way, is reason enough why the pastor ought to try specially hard not to fall down there. But even poor pulpit work a live congregation can do a great deal to remedy.

They can listen hard; that will inspire the preacher. They can praise his best abilities; that will encourage to cultivate his most valuable gifts. They can lift detail matters off its shoulders; that will leave him more time for study. They can give him money for books and conventions; those will freshen him. And they can pray for him; God only knows what that will do.

Finally here's a rule for a going and growing church:

Count on your pastor's abilities as his chance; count on his inabilities as your chance.

A Letter and Five Facts in the Case

"FATHER FORGIVE THEM."

I have been much interested in the articles in The Century on the controversy with respect to Brother Willett, and I have also read most of the letters you have published on the same subject. In the main, I agree with all that has been said, with every inch of my being I sympathize with those who are pleading for liberty, but even liberty must not be used for an offence. This is good Apostolic doctrine.

A few years ago when Brother Willett was under fire for some things he had said, I very strongly defended his liberty in Christ to say the things he had said, and wrote an article entitled: "Shall Willett be damned?" in which article I emphatically declared that the fundamental prineiple of our religious movement was and is yet with those who understand the movement, the right of private judgment with respect to questions of opinion, and consequently I need not affirm my conviction that Brother Willett ought not to be judged in his religious character by certain opinions he may hold, whether these opinions be right or wrong. In some of these I certainly do not agree with him, but I claim for him the right to entertain them if he chooses to do so.

But as I have already intimated there is another side to this matter which needs to be eonsidered. We may not always do the things we have a right to do. All things are lawful, but all things are not expedient, the Apostle says. Paul declares that he had the right to eat meat, but he would not eat meat while the world stands, if it caused his brother to stumble or grow weak. Now there are a large number of people who are stumbling at Brother Willett's alleged views with respect to Old Testament miracles and other things. Most of these brethren are unable to examine into the matter, and must, therefore, depend upon what others say his position is. Evidently he has been misrepresented in many things, and I cannot see wherein he has offended in anything that involves his Christianity as this Christianity is taught by Christ and the Apostles. But, at the same time, since the question has arisen with respect to his taking part in the Centenial program, it seems to me that if he voluntarily declines to serve where he has been appointed, that is a matter which no one has to do with but himself. Granted that the demand made upon the Committee is an unreasonable one, and granted, still further, that the final decision of the Committee in refusing to take him off the program was right and even wise, at the same time, for the sake of the weak brethren, who imagine that Brother Willett is not worthy to occupy the place, it seems to me that he would do himself a great honor and save the cause from disgrace, if he took the matter in his own hands and absolutely and at once refused to serve on the program where he has been placed. While saying this, I protest against anybody else deciding the matter for him, either pro or con. He alone can relieve the situation from all embarrassment.

It is easy enough to say that we must not tolerate the obtrusive interference which has been injected into this matter. I certainly have no respect for it; but I do not have much respect for anything that I have to simply tolerate; still all the same, I am compelled to tolerate some things. While I have a right to eat meat or serve on any program I am placed by my brethren, I declare now that I will not do either if it will cause my brother to stumble or grow weak. Jesus undoubtedly had the very greatest reasons for objecting to the intolerant judgment passed upon him by those who cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him," but all the same he prayed, "Father forgive them, they know not what they do." This is my plea for those who are insisting upon this persecution of Brother Willett. Let us all pray, "Father forgive them, they know not what they do."

It the blame is laid at the door of the Christian Standard the prayer I have suggested is still apropos, provided we can believe that the writers in the Standard are in any degree sincere. For myself I do not doubt that they are, at least very many of them, and it is to meet their case that I would act as I have suggested, if I were in Brother Willett's place. I would absolutely refuse to serve on the program, and by doing so I believe I should conquer my enemies much more readily than if I fought them with fire. "Be not overcome with evil, but overcome evil with good" is good philosophy as well as good religion.

Columbia, Mo. W. T. Moore.

We gladly give especial place to Dr. Moore's communication this week. His judgment we respect as highly as that of any man in the brotherhood.

But we do not think Dr. Moore is fully informed of the facts in the present controversy, for the position he urges Dr. Willett to take is precisely the one he has taken.

We wish to name five facts that should be known and kept in mind by every person interested in the current development.

1. The first fact is that the Centennial committee declined by a vote of eight to three to ask Dr. Willett to withdraw from the program.

2. The second fact is that a proposition was made to Dr. Willett that if he would withdraw the Christian Standard would pledge itself to cease its fight on the missionary societies and the remainder of the program. This proposition came to him through several members of the Centennial committee who had been authorized to make it.

3. The third fact is that immediately upon receiving this proposition Dr. Willett aecepted it in good faith as the happiest solution of a situation, painful and embarrassing to him and fraught with menace to the sacred interests of the brotherhood.

4. The fourth fact is that an editor of the Christian Standard, J. A. Lord, upon receiving word of Dr. Willett's acceptance of the proposal, signed the pledge stipulated in the proposal.

5. The fifth fact is that later, from the Standard office came a telegram to the chairman of the Centennial eommittee repudiating the pledge signed by J. A. Lord.

For what reason should Professor Willett now resign, in the light of these five facts? For peace? What assurance has he or has any one that his resignation would stop the Christian Standard's attack? Does not the Standard's repudiation of Mr. Lord's pledge clearly imply that primarily it is not Dr. Willett's resignation it most wants, but some other object? The Standard has demanded and its protestants are demanding the resignation of others from the program besides Dr. Willett. What assurance has Dr. Willett that if he resigns the Standard will not simply pick the next man and make the fight on him. Braced as it will be by carrying the first trench it can continue the attack with greater assurance of complete victory.

The fact will become clear to our brotherhood sooner or later that the primary object of the Standard's attack is the missionary organization of the brotherhood, not merely this or that man on the program. Mr. Russell Errett does not want to be put in a position where he will be compelled heartily to support our missionary societies. Therefore his paper continues its debauch of misrepresentation concerning the teaching of Professor Willett.

The position taken by Dr. Willett is not based on merely technical considerations. He is not standing upon his "rights." It would be much easier for him to resign than to continue in his place. He lays himself open to the imputation of self-importance—a charge being already made in the Standard. He runs the risk of being held responsible for a depleted missionary treasury. It is a most grave and serious position in which he finds himself. The sense of its injustiee is among the least painful of its elements.

Yet he cannot resign. The brethren who acted as middlemen in seeuring the pledge from J. A. Lord do not advise his resignation in the face of the Standard's repudiation of the pledge of one of its editors. A multitude of letters have come to our office protesting against Dr. Willett's withdrawal and urging that his cause is not his alone, but theirs and the whole brotherhood's. Some of these letters we printed in the nearly seven pages given to them last week. Many more are of a confidential nature, from men in the most representative positions in the brotherhood. They ask us not to publish them—probably because they wish not to draw the Standard's fire upon themselves.

From one we select these words "Your articles in the Century are like apples of gold in pictures of silver. If copies of the Century could be sent to every preacher it would soon accomplish a complete vindication. Misrepresentation and prejudice have made you the most misunderstood man in our ministry."

We cannot continue to give so great space to the publication of this correspondenc and must withhold many times as many letters as we print. In view of the splendid expression of sentiment against Dr. Willett's withdrawal the Christian Century feels amply justified in its recent mild criticism of him for ever agreeing to make such a compact with the Christian Standard.

The Golden Mean

I have read with deep appreciation and much profit the artieles recently published in "The Christian Century," by William Oeschger. The one entitled "A Church Irenic" I regard as especially good and notably timely. It is doubtful if there ever was a period in the history of the Disciples when writings of this character were more helpful and so necessary as now.

Surely there is always "A Golden Mean" to be found in everything. The injunction of the Apostle Paul, "Let your moderation, or forbearance, or considerateness be known unto all men" is a much neglected scripture, these days.

Brother Oeschger's position is mine precisely. I acknowledge a large indebtedness both to President McGarvey and Professor Willett. Each has a message, a view, a personality that I need. I go to each for instruction and inspiration without accepting in entirety the conclusions of either. I am helped mightily by both. I am, therefore, of the "mediating school" as the lovable Oeschger would put it. I esteem my brethren as beloved in the Lord—all of them who are striking after Christ-likeness and nothing so grieves me or makes my heart to ache more than to see "Our Israel" distraught and disrupted as it seems to be these latter days.

I am minded to close with this sentence from Van Dyke: "What we men in the ministry need is not so much an answer to our doubts as more nourishment for our faith." Edgar DeWitt Jones.

The Brethren Continue to Speak

Our issue of last week with its six pages of protests against Dr. Willett's withdrawal from the Centennial program went forth from our presses with mixed feelings of apology and satisfaction. Apology for utilizing so much space in treating of the current controversy, and satisfaction at the number and quality of communications sent to us from men and women of light and leading in our brotherhood. The issue between Christ and creed was never more clearly drawn. Our correspondents appeal to the fathers with confidence that the forcing of Dr. Willett from the Centennial program would be the giving up of the basic principles upon which our reformation is builded.

While Prof. Willett still holds the position he took some weeks ago—agreeing to withdraw from the program if the Christian Standard will cease its warfare upon the program and its attack upon the missionary societies—yet he has been made to feel that his cause is not his alone, but that of a host of brethren whose Christian liberty would be jeopardized by his withdrawal. In this feeling he is reassured by the correspondence now pouring in. If the many other interests of our paper could afford to be crowded out, we would print this week an edition made up solely of the letters of protest that have been received.

But we are not interested simply in the amount of space covered nor in the number of letters we could print. We are interested only in getting the principle of liberty stated and in giving voice to the outraged sentiments of our brethren.

My Dear Brother: Greetings and congratulations! You have made a great fight, and will win it. It is not a contest for personal advantage, but for truth and liberty, for light and progress.

I am anxious for but one thing. It is the feeling that you may become too sensitive over what may appear to some to be a self-seeking desire on your own part. I am sorry you consented for one moment to withdraw, even for so worthy a purpose as the shielding of our material interests. Of what value are they to a people who have lost their liberties, their vision, their prophetic purpose? If I may say it, the committee must be saved from itself.

I am aware that our Centennial Year promises to be a disappointment to our missionary leaders, and a humiliation to all high minded men and women among us, in its division of support for our interests, and in its revelations of narrowness and bigotry. I can well understand that any self-respecting man would prefer at any personal cost, to escape the brunt of such a conflict. But this is not a personal fight. The entire life of our position is at stake. The fate of the movement is involved in it. Success of our money raising enterprises is much to be desired. But success at the price of liberty would be a victory in name only. It would be the victory of pride, prejudice, passion, over the things of the spirit. It would be failure, and nothing could save us from it. We should be disgraced in the eyes of God and of all good men.

But, if you should retire, for any reason, do men think they can hold a convention without free men? Do they think free men will be still?

With all my heart I wish you well, and bid you stand for the freedom of us all. Sincerely yours,

Emporia, Kan. Willis A. Parker.

My Dear Brother: I never was a pugilist, either physical or religious. I never carried a "chip" on my shoulder, and I never looked for one on the shoulders of the other fellow; but I have kept watch until the end of such controversies as have come up in my life, so that I might have all the facts before I rendered my decision.

So far as you are concerned, I believe in you. I believe in your honor, your integrity, your ability, and your Christian character. It hurts me to have you described as an infidel. I am an infidel too, concerning lots of things about which good men and able men differ.

In regard to whether you should address the Centennial at Pittsburg next year, personally I would go if the devils were as thick as the tiles on the houses; but if I believed that the larger good could be secured by remaining off the program, I would do it. I am sure that the end of this controversy will not be to your damage if you maintain the dignity and carefulness which has characterized you during this controversy. I am with you in my understanding of your positions. You may be wrong but until I am convinced that you are I am

As ever yours,

Akron, Ohio. F. M. Green.

My Dear Brother Willett: These are times that move one to serious thought for our people and our cause. I have kept silent so far, but I must register my earnest protest against your resignation from the place assigned you on the Centennial program. The vital principle of our cause is at stake. Shall we be free? Are we to swing to the other extreme and have a "dictator." The plea of the Fathers is at stake. "Don't give up the ship." We should "fight it out on this line, if it takes all winter." God bless and guide and use you to his glory.

Very sincerely,

Carthage, Mo. D. W. Moore.

Editor of Christian Century: Inclosed find one dollar for one year's subscription to the Christian Century. After a careful reading of the issue of Nov. 28, I am more than satisfied that it is a paper greatly needed by our brotherhood. I want you to forward me the back numbers containing Prof. Willett's "Confession of Faith," as the summary was of such an appetizing nature that I am hungering for more. I want to say at this writing that I am glad that Prof Willett is to speak at Pittsburg. Not because he is better qualified to do so than many others in our ranks, but because his withdrawal at this time at the demands of a private corporation bringing its influence to bear upon the program committee legally constituted by the brotherhood in general assembly would bring both ourselves and our plea under a lasting disgrace in the eyes of our religious neighbors.

On this ground then, although perhaps we cannot as individuals indorse some of the philosophy of the gifted professor, we unhesitatingly demand his representative presence at Pittsburg.

Muir, Mich. G. N. Stevenson.

My Dear Prof. Willett: In the name of what I already, with many, many others, owe you, I beg that you will collect the articles you are now contributing to the Century in a book as soon as possible after completion that it may serve as a handbook for those of us who have not known how to express their convictions and acceptance of truth in its fresher revealings.

I beg also that you will withdraw your conditional promise to resign from the Pittsburg program. If the standard-bearer for a large host leaves his appointed place, how shall it be known which way lies the forward movement? What sort of Christian peace is that which is bought by silence on one's deepest understanding of vital truth? I was brought up on the Christian Standard and was at one time under the personal teachings of Isaac Errett, whose memory I revere. I have heard him say—and with most spirited utterance—"So long as I say to the world that I believe in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God, and my only Saviour, no man living has any right to question or dictate to me in other matters of belief." I discontinued the Standard at the time of the Berkeley persecution and have not willingly looked at a copy since.

Trusting that you will have strength given you to continue your leadership along the upward way,

Willoughby, Ohio. Alice E. Hanson.

My Dear Dr. Willett: I desire to enter my solemn protest against your withdrawal from the Centennial program. Whether you will or no, the force of circumstances has made you the representative of the great body of our people who are opposed to the degeneration of our movement into a narrow, bigoted, reactionary sect.

If you are not to be permitted to appear on the program, I wonder what we are going to Pittsburg to celebrate? Certainly not our old motto, "In faith, unity; in opinion, liberty." With your "Confession of Faith" available for anyone who desires to read it, there seems to be no excuse for further objection to your remaining on the program except blind prejudice or a desire to use the brotherhood for ulterior purposes. Neither of these reasons is sufficient to warrant your withdrawal. Furthermore, it seems to me that your withdrawal, under existing circumstances, would give a blow to our cause from which it would not fully recover for many years. Our protestations of "liberty in opinion" and "Christian Union" as parts of our rule of faith and practice are already taken by our religious neighbors at a heavy discount. They say that our teaching and practice do not correspond, except in the case of the minority of our brotherhood. Your withdrawal under present conditions would seem to warrant their contention. Stay on the program.

University of Missouri (Columbia.) J. W. Putnam.

My Dear Brother Willett: Through the Century, I learned that, for the sake of harmony you were considering your resignation from the Centennial program. While I feel a certain sympathy with all the parties concerned as far as they are sincere in their stand for truth, it would seem to me a grave mistake for you to think of resigning for the causes alleged, and an act fruitful of bad effects for our brotherhood. The men who believe we are being rightly led into a broader and freer epoch in our growth would be confused and disheartened. It may be personal sacrifice to your feelings to remain, but I believe, with many others, I hope, that you must recognize the responsibility of leadership which has come to you unasked because of your abilities and liberal attitude. There are no material interests in our brotherhood that out-weigh the importance of freedom in thought and speech concerning advancing truth.

Trusting that you may be sustained by a vision of the larger benefits in this peculiar situation, I am

Yours very truly,

Philadelphia. Arthur Holmes.

Dear Brother Willett: I went to the Chicago convention opposed to your teachings, as reported in the daily papers. But I soon

"Shall We Be a Free People?"

learned that it was impossible for them to tell the truth, so I subscribed for the Century to learn for myself what you were saying, and after reading carefully your "Confession of Faith" I am unconvinced as to the correctness of some of your positions. I was us "young preachers" to do in the present controversy is to "lo-a not taught it that way by Profs. Bruner and Dungan. I was also told by one of the editors of the Standard that the best thing for wise and say nothing."

I also received a circular letter from the Standard last week asking me to name what I considered to be the best things that had been said by our brethren in the past century. I replied as follows: "My Confession of Faith," Prof. Willett; "Shall Prof. Willett Resign?"; "The Simplest Way to Lasting Peace;" "A Sane Convention," by G. A. Campbell; and "Shall Prof. Willett Resign?" by A. B. Jones; all of which are found in the Christian Century. I did it because I thought they were timely articles and the Standard aught to know what I thought of them. Perhaps it would be better for me personally, if I took the editor's advice and kept out of this controversy, but I can no longer wash my hands as Pilate did and say, "I will have nothing to do with it." I cannot keep silent and allow any one to bind a yoke of bondage upon the brotherhood, which we nor our fathers were able to bear. Brother Willett, while I do not agree with all of your conclusions, you are now the target in a fight that is not yours alone, it is a fight for every free-loving citizen of the kingdom of heaven. Stand by your guns. The brotherhood is becoming awakened, and will rush to your support. Stay on the Centennial program. After an experience of eighteen years in the ministry and knowing the feelings of the church as I think I do, I do not believe that we are ready for a pope.

Fraternally yours in His name,

Minier, Ill. W. Harry Walston.

Dear Brother Willett: I desire to express my appreciation of the "Christian Century." I have been reading it from its first issue. It is better now than ever. I rejoice in its manly, Christian spirit.

I desire to enter my protest against your resigning a place on the Centennial program. The committee acted wisely in voting to retain you. It is absurd that you should be asked to resign. The spirit that makes such a request possible is deplorable.

Your writings have helped me much and hearing you at New Orleans was an inspiration to be cherished. Many men think as freely as you do concerning the religious problem, even if they do not think as clearly and are not able to express themselves as gracefully, and are not accounted "unsound."

For you it is a case of what I would call petty persecution. It will pass and the truth will come into its own.

I simply wanted to assure you of my faith in you, and if you have heartaches, that your friends suffer with you because of the unwarrantable attacks made on you.

Selma, Ala. Ernest W. Elliott.

Dear Brethren: I have just laid down the Century of Nov. 21, and I want to add my voice in protest against Dr. Willett's resignation. It will do no good. The same forces would only feel strengthened to similar persecutions. The man or church that would refuse to take a missionary offering, as one Oklahoma brother did, because of Dr. Willett's place on the program, cares little for the cause of missions and probably would do little in any event. Never before has a pope arisen among us to enforce his infallible decrees. To submit to him would be to rivet chains on ourselves. And worst of all, to make a pope of a man would hurt him most—it would damn his soul. I most earnestly hope that Dr. Willett will remain firm.

Your brother,

North Waco, Texas. Elsworth Faris.

To the Century: Since others have registered their "protests" for and against the appearance of Prof. Willett on the program at the Centennial convention, I give the following as reasons why I think he should remain on the program:

1. Because the program committee have selected him; if we do not like their decision, a new committee should have been selected.

2. Because there is no good reason why he should not appear on the program; the motive behind the reactionary forces makes it imperative now, to keep him on the program. It is the principle of liberty that is involved. No man should be excluded because a few people consider him either "radical" or "conservative."

3. He should now be retained on the program since the principle involved is whether we shall have government by the consent of the governed, or by a newspaper oligarchy.

4. He should be retained since the protest comes from people who sit in judgment on his theology. It is not sanctioning all his views by the brotherhood for him to speak, neither is the most "conservative" man representing the brotherhood in all his views. Both represent us in loyalty and service to and for Christ.

5. The issue is: Shall we be a free people? It was not necessary for the committee to choose Prof. Willett. But since they have done so, and because of the motive and spirit of the opposition it is now necessary to retain him or surrender our claims of being free, and promoters of Christian union.

Sioux City, Ia. J. K. Ballou.

My Dear Brother Willett: For some time I have thought of addressing to you a word of encouragement and good will.

Have just been reading for the second or third time your "views" in the Christian Century, Nov. 7, pp. three and four. You ask, are you "out of harmony with the spirit which moved the fathers of this reformation?"

To which I answer no, No, NO, provided you hold the views, as you say, as matters of private judgment. Have just been reading the Declaration and Add, and you seem to be in harmony with the spirit of that sensible document. Have also read Christian Sys., pp. ninety to ninety-four. The Law of Expediency. With these, the Leuremberg Letter. Our position and Errett's lecture on "The True Basis of Christian Fellowship." If I had them all at command I could answer every word of your critics I have seen for the last three months.

I am unalterably opposed to reading any man out of the church of living God or out of that part of it known as the "Christian Church" for any opinions he may hold, although differing from my own, and I deprecate the efforts from certain ones looking in that direction or even tending in that direction

Be true to Jesus Christ and God's blessing will be yours. You are at liberty with this note.

Blackwell, Okla. H. W. Robertson.

Dear Brother Willett: I am awfully busy, but never too busy to remember those I hold high in Christian love and fellowship; especially when persecuted by a lot of Pharisees. I want you to know that I consider it an honor to sit at your feet and be taught the divine word from the Book of Bocks, and you have my prayers and sympathy in your persecution. The Lord chasteneth those he loves, and let us remember and be patient and everything will come out gloriously and triumphantly in the end. In Christian love, I beg to remain,

"There are seven thousand that have not bowed the knee to Baal."

Omaha, Neb. J. C. Pontius.

Dear Brother Morrison: I am much gratified with the way you are taking hold of the "Century." I greatly enjoy every number of it.

I am glad to see the strong sentiment coming to the front in defense of the principle so long cherished by us as a people, "In faith, unity; in opinions, liberty; in all things, charity." There are those among us who can only see the first clause in this splendid motto; like some people who can only see faith in a passage of scripture where the word baptize occurs, also. Men of brain and heart, the calibre of Herbert L. Willett can not be turned down. We may not endorse all of his utterances, nor those of any other man—A Campbell included—but I for one say, Let him speak anywhere and at all times. I abominate the spirit of the dog in the manger, like that of Sir Oracle who says, "When I speak let no dog bark." I wish also to commend Campbell's (George) splendid notes on the "Religious Life." I wish to say success to the Christian Century.

Fraternally yours,

Sullivan, Ill. J. Will Walters.

Dear Brethren: I want to congratulate you on the stand you are taking against the tyranny of opinionism. You will hear emphatically from our preachers' association here next week. You are right and I believe you will win your fight and that "The New Christian Century" will become our best and most popular paper.

Indianapolis, Ind. Chas. M. Fillmore.

Dear Brethren: I think the Century has come into the kingdom for such a time as this. I have read with interest and profit the latest issues of the same and while I do not fully agree with all the contents I have certainly been richly blessed by the rich messages it has brought to me. I have been of the firm conviction all along that it would be nothing short of a calamity for Prof. Willett to resign from the Centennial program. It is not a question of whether he is in agreement with all the men of the brotherhood, but rather is the brotherhood willing to surrender to a faction that would decry a man among us who differs in matters of mere opinion?

I may say of The Christian Standard, "With all her faults, I love her still," but I am not such an ardent supporter of that periodical as I once was. I like freedom myself and I want others to enjoy the same privilege. The Standard does not seem to be in accord with that precious principle of liberty. It will be a grevious day for the brotherhood when the committee submits to the voice of any one paper or any one man on this matter.

Davenport. Ia. S. M. Perkins.

C. C. Morrison, Dear Brother and Friend: I want to congratulate you upon the spirit, purpose, and work of the Christian Century, and I wish you would convey to Dr. Willett my appreciation of the work he is doing for the cause of advanced Christian fellowship in the world. He has blazed the way in the forest of unappropriated truth for the generation to come. I am so glad that we have among us a man of such splendid ability and spirit. The historical interpretation of all religious truth has come to stay. The dogmas of men pass away. Intolerance must give way to sympathy and fellowship, and a man will be judged not so much by what he believes as by what he is. The greatest gift of man to mankind is man. And Dr. Willett is a man.

and deny to God what belongs to him. We need not be monarchs over great empires in order to have the pride of a Nebuchadnezzer when he exclaimed, "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built for the royal dwelling-place, by the might of my power, and for the glory of my majesty?" Most of us have no more intelligence than to be puffed up by small achievements. We need the sense of the Divine Presence to keep us humble. Financial losses, the defection of trusted helpers, the annoyances of waspy men and circumstances, all can be turned to the advantage of character by faith in Christ. If we believe that these are only incidents in our lives, if we can see beyond them the complete life, our courage will remain and love will be increased abundantly.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

(Conclusion of last week's lesson.)

(1.) THE INSTITUTE MOVEMENT. An Institute is a gathering of teachers and workers for the purpose of instruction by competent authorities in the technique of their work. This movement in Sunday-school circles owed its origin to the Rev. J. H. Vincent, the founder of the Chautauqua, which is the institute idea brought to perfection. From small beginnings the movement has spread until there are few parts of the country that have not been helped by it.

(2.) BIBLE STUDY UNION. This is the name given to a movement designed to popularize a lesson system devised by the Rev. Erastus Blakeslee. It was begun in 1890 and marks perhaps the first attempt to furnish a series of genuinely graded lessons for the Sunday-school. Since that time additions and improvements have been made in accordance with the latest pedagogical science. The latest of these is the addition of a "manual training" feature in the "Gospel History Series" for 1908.

(3.) SUNDAY SCHOOL COMMISSION OF THE DIOCESES OF NEW YORK. This is a commission of the Episcopal church and is taking the lead in the forward movement in that denomination. It has recommended a definite curriculum of study which is being more and more widely used. It arranges for institutes, conferences, lecture courses, etc., and publishes some excellent Sunday-school material. It was among the pioneers in bringing manual training into the service of the Sunday-school.

(4.) RELIGIOUS EDUCATION ASSOCIATION. Organized in Chicago in 1903. The scope of its work is to bring the religious instruction of the young into line with the growing knowledge of the age and to serve as an advisory board in the work of elevating Sunday-school standards. It includes in its membership many of the leading educationalists of the country and is doing much by its institute and departmental convention work to advance the cause of higher religious education. Its annual volume of proceedings is among the classics on the subject.

(5.) AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF SACRED LITERATURE. This is an institution founded by the late President Harper of Chicago, for the purpose of furthering religious knowledge by means of classes for the study of special biblical and related themes. Regular correspondence is maintained between the heads of the Association and each member enrolled. Higher courses of study are provided for normal classes, and provision is made for the circulation of the best and latest literature on biblical and sociological themes. It includes correspondence courses, reading courses, summer schools, extension lectures and examinations.

LITERATURE. Same as in preceding lesson; in addition the Annual Reports of the International Association and the Proceedings of the Religious Education Association.

QUESTIONS: 1. Give the early history of the convention system. 2. When was the first national convention held?; the first international? 3. How many world's conventions have been held and where? 4. Explain the rise of state and county conventions. 5. With what larger organization are these now chiefly affiliated? 6. Explain the general organization of the International Association. 7. Name its chief departments. 8. What is the uniform lesson system? 9. When was the first Lesson Committee appointed? 10. How is the lesson committee now constituted? 11. Tell what you know of the progress of graded lessons in the work of the Association. 12. What important action was taken by the Louisville convention? 13. Name and briefly describe some other products of Sunday-school organization. 14. What name is associated with the beginnings of Institute work? 15. What is the distinguishing feature of the work of the Bible Study Union? 16. What do you know of the Sunday-school Commission? What is the Religious Education Association? 18. Who founded the American Institute of Sacred Literature, and what is it?

Moulding a Minister

BY MR. ARTHUR HOLMES.

Put ten seniors of a theological seminary in a crowd with ninety other men and, by sight alone, very few people can assign them to their proper vocations. One decade after these same half-score divinity students have been graduated into the ranks of clergymen, an ordinary observer can pick them out of a crowd of one thousand.

Clothes are not the only marks of the profession. Place a card with an oval opening in it over the picture of any noted divine so that nothing but the face shows through the opening, and most people will guess his profession by his physiognomy alone. It is futile, therefore, for the "progressive" clergyman to disguise himself in a suit of business gray, tan shoes, a red tie, a Derby hat and slender walking stick while he still affects the long hair and leonine aspect of a Beecher. His mouth, though ever so tightly closed will shout his true calling to every passer-by. Hide it as he may, the very stones will cry out and the reeds sigh the dread secret.

Granting the original naivete of the novitiate what is it that stamps the finished product with its glaring trade-mark? To answer this, some little analysis of the principal characteristics of the minister is necessary.

One mark is egotism. In this he has no monopoly. There are many brands of conceit. Clerical conceit, however, approaches most nearly that of the pedagogue. A suspicion seems well grounded, therefore, that both conceits arise naturally from constant association with people doing reverence to omniscience; of living in the atmosphere of Goldsmith's teacher, who with—

> "Words of learned length and thundering sound,
> Amazed the gazing rustics rang'd around,
> And still they gazed and still their wonder grew,
> That one small head could carry all he knew."

Closely allied to pedagogical conceit is that other delusion of every preacher that he sometimes reaches the oratorical. This is the result of a universal conspiracy on the part of the kindly disposed who praise lavishly any "special effort" and keep discreet silence on ordinary occasions. And who could tell the cold-blooded truth to that radiant creature who has spent the last half-hour so gloriously soaring through his labyrinthine circumlocutions to a per-fervid peroration and who now, with voluntary humility—aye, so patently voluntary—stands hungeringly asking, "What-did-you-think-of-my-sermon-this-morning?"

But, nothing to extenuate, nor to set down aught in malice, let it be truly said that most ministers long for intelligent, sympathetic criticism; and failing in that, they finally either succumb to the blandishment of continual praise or sow the Word by faith, humbly trusting that He will make it prosper as He pleases.

Another prominent characteristic closely allied with the minister's didactic conceit is his sectarian dogmatism.

> "Nothin' from Adam's fall to Huldah's bonnet, > Thet I wern't full cocked with my jedgement on it."

expresses his mental attitude in this particular field. On subjects orthodox and doctrinal he comes out boldly, convincingly, profoundly, until we marvel that he says "an undisputed thing in such a solemn way."

Almost opposite to this tendency is his amiableness, his negativeness, his colorlessness of opinion on a multitude of questions demanding for most men, instant settlement. As our good friend, Mr. Biglow, says in his riper age,

> "Its a sight harder to make up my mind,—
> Nor I don't often try to, when events,
> Will du it fer me free of all expense.
> The moral question is allus plain enough,—
> Its jess the human-natur side thet's tough,
> The pinch comes in decidin' what to du."

For example, ask your pastor before several strangers, his opinion of the efficacy of infant baptism, and he answers immediately and decisively, agreeably to his creed. Then ask him his attitude on the local strike and he gives an answer plausibly ambiguous as a Delphic oracle.

This iridescence of opinion—changing like the neck of a dove in every varying light—is reflected in his amiability of temper—at least in public. Sunday morning may find him cross; he may scold the children, berate the house-maid and quarrel with his helpmeet, and finally depart scowling and grim; but the front

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Personal Creeds

The Correspondent:—"I have found the writing of my personal belief a profitable exercise. Can there be any objection to doing so? As I understand, creeds are feared only because of their authoritative pretentions."

A creed is a belief. Certainly it ought to prove profitable to any one to outline the things that he really believes. No one, however, ought to undertake this holy task with a disputatious mind. It is a work for the deepest in the soul. Our beliefs have down-reachings to the minutest details of our lives; and outreachings to the infinite expanses of God. They have to do with what we eat and drink today; and with what vastnesses we shall occupy ten million years from now. They unnerve us, or thrill us with the inspiration of courage. They make saints or demons out of us.

The personal creed should be written with great honesty. It is hard to be honest. Many in attempting to state their beliefs would give unwittingly the beliefs of the books they read, the traditional faith they have inherited, or the creed of their preacher or church. They have not made their faith their own.

Imitation Creeds.

Again many would overstate their beliefs. It is easy to talk pious. Words! words! words! they are the curse of the sermon and the church today. We talk beyond our faith. Great doctrines are insulted by our smatterings. God must be sorely taxed by glib prayers; and by flippant pious assertions. How lightly we array ourselves for and against theories. Belief with some seems to be subject to convenient change. But that which takes hold of the mighty depths of our natures is likely to be endlessly enduring. A man's theories depend largely on the books he reads. One man has a tendency to one view, so he buys the books that give support to his view. Another has a leaning to a different view, so he buys the books that favor his theory. After they have read a sufficient number of books they are prepared to hurl theological anathemas at each other. There is fun in the game perhaps; but it is chiefly satisfying to the foot-ball age of theological students. Faith is a deeper thing—we come to it through the subduing experience of life and by spiritual communion with Him who is Spirit. Let us not deceive ourselves by thinking that because we are theologians that we are therefore Christians. Let us beware of pious platitudes. Let us not talk in the language of angels while we grovel in the dust of earth.

Another danger in writing our personal creeds is that we shall seek to form an unbreakable logical system. It cannot be done. Every attempt has been a failure. We lack sufficient data. We must continue to walk by faith. No satisfactory doctrine of God and evil, satisfactory in the sense of a complete explanation of our paradoxical world, is at all likely to be forthcoming soon. The shadows must first flee away. The veil must be lifted. Neither does the single principle of the materialist, Haeckel, nor that of the idealist, Mrs. Eddy, satisfy. The intellect, working alone, is baffled by the mystery. That Jesus did not attempt to give the philosophy of it all is proof to some of us that we can come to our best without such a rounded and perfected system. Jesus' word was that of faith, not that of philosophy.

It will be well if we get our religion from Jesus; not this side or the other side of Him. All will agree, of course, to this trite saying. But here again it is hard to be honest. Many are deceived in thinking they have Jesus' conceptions, when they are as far from them as the East is from the West. They have read Jesus through the sermons, the books, the creeds, the conversations, the hymns, and others. I suppose it is impossible to go unprejudiced to the Bible; but we should guard well our naked souls. The single eye is a priceless treasure.

Our Creeds Born in Experience.

As we open the Bible to read of its divine message, as we follow Christ's movements and hang on his words, as we close the book to meditate on a verse or a word, as we try to imagine the Christ of Galilee here in our complex civilization, as we sing a hymn of praise, as we offer a prayer on the street or at home, as we think on the unfortunate experience of a friend, as we meet the destitute, as we witness the ruthlessness of death—and then as out of all these experiences we try to formally affirm our beliefs, may great reverence and earnestness and sincerity possess our souls!

And then we remember a creed is to be lived. It is not a puzzle. It is not an end in itself. It is not a party test. It is not a statement in order that some one may know where to pigeon-hole us. It is not something to be voted on, for or against. A personal creek is the obligation of our immortal souls. It is the task of eternity. It is our affirmation of God and heaven. It is a declaration of war to the Devil. It is no plaything. It is no gossip for the gabble of small minds. It is the assertion of God within us. It is the seal of the cross. It is the chart to the skies. It is high walls confining us to the thorny path of duty. It is the comfort in our endeavors and the scourge in our laxity. It is the breath and fire of our very souls.

Our creed ought to be watered by our tears. Well may we be suspicious of it when we can read it without feeling. Life has departed where there is no emotion. Dead creeds are what men fight over. Live creeds are what they pray over and work by.

A personal creed is not the assertion of historical facts. It is the affirmation of confidence in the universe. It is the assertion of personal relationships. It should be intimate rather than propositional. It is the meat of religion and not the skeleton. The creed is to live by, and die by.

My Creed..

I believe in Jesus The Friend.
I believe in Jesus The Poor.
I believe in Jesus The Strong.
I believe in Jesus The Altogether Good.
I believe in Jesus The Worker.
I believe in Jesus The Warrior.
I believe in Jesus The Believer.
I believe in Jesus The Worshipper.
I believe in Jesus The Sufferer.
I believe in Jesus The Defeated.
I believe in Jesus The Victorious.
I believe in Jesus The Divine.
I believe in Jesus The Eternal.
I believe in Jesus the Redeemer.
I believe in Jesus The Christ.

Values in Christ.

I find He would teach me:
To be strong in difficult circumstances;
To arise and press on even when defeated;
To refuse the offer of every evil compromise;
To forgive when not forgiven;
To unfalteringly work and believingly pray;
To undoubtingly trust His Father and mine;
To be good and true to every friend and to every enemy;
To be joyously glad for life;
To be sustained and comforted in sorrow;
To sanctify the common and glorify every task;
To ceaselessly labor for His Kingdom of brotherly men;
To accept burdens rather than to avoid them;
To live the single, open life;
To touch, through every experience, the universal;
To hope on and hope ever.

Christ's Light on the Doctrines.

Taught by Him I am not confused over doctrines.

God is The Unfailing Friend.

The Bible is the story of God's reach after man and man's reach after God. It is the picture of the union of both in Christ.

Miracles are God's affirmation of His Transcendence.

Sin is selfishness.

Salvation is freedom from selfishness; is Christlikeness.

The Cross of Calvary; is the temporary coming into view of God's heart.

Reconciliation is the Prodigal in the arms of the weeping Father.

Faith is surrender.

Repentance is surrender.

Baptism is surrender.

Sanctification is the fullness of our strength given in Christ's service.

The church is an enlisted army. It is the community of souls at prayer.

Eternal Life is the Christ-life wherever found. It is Divine. It is endless.

The Kingdom of Heaven is the Brotherhood of man under the reign of Christ.

Death is graduation from tears to joy; from toil to rest; from the little to the incomprehensibly great; from the flesh to the boundlessness of the spiritual.

Judgment is the love of the Father dealing with the erring child.

Before It Is Too Late.

If you've a tender message or a loving word to say,
Don't wait till you forget it, but whisper it today.
We live but in the present, the future is unknown—
Tomorrow is a mystery, today is all our own.
The tender words unspoken, the letter never sent,
The long-forgotten messages, the wealth of love unspent—
For these some hearts are breaking, for these some loved ones wait;
So show them that you care for them before it is too late.

Hope is faith holding out its hands in the dark.

The only possible personal liberty is found in doing right.

door of his church will melt his scowl into a perfect sun of amiability.

Such a mental and emotional cast grows gradually and unconsciously; it is the reflex of receiving a little criticism here, a little fault-finding there, giving an unintentional slight to a self-important "pillar" or having a deal of difficulty over some careless word multiplied and carried on to be dropped where it will do the most harm, together with the constant necessity of being a men's man, a boys' man, a girls' man, a babys' man and a ladies' man, of being all things to all men that he may save some.

Such diplomacy demands a countenance void of all mental and emotional content, full of pious vacancy; a suit of modest black; whose cut precludes the possibility of any vigorous activity, a tie of stern and snowy simplicity.

Granting the evolutionary causes, the reason why the freemasonry of men is closed against ministers is clear; why a crowd of hearty, joking fellows will chill like a March evening on the approach of an ecclesiastic. His influence is like a woman in the smoking car. And for the reason that he is decidedly feminine. That again is caused by his conformity to a world of women, whom he meets in church, on his pastoral calls, at Sunday-school picnics; who mould his theology and who set his ideals. No large and generous contact with the everyday lives of men is opposed to this. Hence, he is moulded into the kind of a man he is, thinks as he does, wears the kind of clothes he does, bears in his body the brand-marks of his profession as he does.

Is he to blame? No more to blame is he than that northern grouse that changes from leafy brown to spotless white when the inevitable hand of winter covers the dark-stained world with its mantle of purity.

THE DAWN AT SHANTY BAY

By Robert E. Knowles, Author "St. Cuthberts" and "The Undertow"

Chapter XI.
The Full-orbed Day.

The south-bound train was doing reasonably well, lake and forest retreating as it flew. But Ronald wondered why it loitered so, homeward bound as he was, bearing with him the trophy of his exile. For Mildred was obviously stronger, each succeeding day adding to her vigour, even as it added to Ronald's gratitude and joy. But very little had been contributed to his confidence in distinguished city doctors.

Ephraim was on the seat beside him. He was lost in thought, the character of which would have been rarely interesting to Ronald, could he but have known. For Ephraim's meditation was of his friend at his side, and of the long, crying loneliness that must now surely be past and gone, and of the stubborn struggle that had ended in the victory which none but the defeated spirit knows. Something upon Ronald's face, a kind of chastened light, eloquent of the belated peace that had found the weary heart at last, made Ephraim sure that his old-time friend had come at length into the soul's great inheritance.

His reverie was broken by Ronald's voice: "Div ye mind that Sam buddy? I sent for him to come till the cabin, the mornin' Mildred tuk the turn."

"Yes, I mind—he's the New York feller."

"I'm gaein' to tell ye what I wantit; he gie'd me Hugh's address—he tell't me where the laddie bides —an' I;" Ronald hesitated—"I sent it till his mither that vera morn. An I slippit in a wee bit screed for the laddie himself';" Ephraim could see the flush in Ronald's cheek, and thought it beautiful. But he did not tell that he too had overheard the information imparted by the cheerful Sam, and that the same mail as carried Ronald's had borne a letter to his own Jessie, conveying. the self-same precious tidings Ephraim's face softened at thought of his well-loved child, and all the motherless years that had been hallowed by her tender care.

"I kind o' suspected that, Ronnie," Ephraim replied evasively. "Give us a shake, old friend—I wondered what made your face so bright. But I was just thinkin', Ronnie—it's nearly a man's whole pile, isn't it? I mean his kids—if a feller fails there, he fails all over. Lots o' millionaires is paupers," he affirmed.

"I cam awfu' near bein' a pauper," Ronald mused. "Div ye ken, Ephraim—I wudna say it till ony ither buddy—but the licht seems awfu'bricht an' sweet; an' it's no' the wee lassie a'thegither," he said earnestly, smiling at his treasure—"it's somethin' mair; it's a wee bit like comin' oot o' a lang sickness, Ephraim. I dinna want to be comparin mysel' wi' Bible folk, but I kind o' feel like I'd been wrestlin' wi' yin I cudna see—an' He was ower muckle for me; an' He kind o' touched me i' the hollow o' the thigh, Ephraim. An I had to gie in," he faltered in a trembling voice, "I had to gie in—but I didna let Him awa' till He blessed me. An' juist like the ither, d'ye see, at the breakin o' the day! Mebbe ye dinna unnerstand, Ephraim—but it's a wonnerfu' thing when wrestlin' turns intill prayer," he concluded, his glowing eyes fixed in strange tenderness upon his friend.

Nor were Ephraim's eyes undimmed. "I kind o' thought as much, Ronnie; it sort o' struck me that mornin' Mildred came back from sea. I know all the sorrow you've had, Ronnie—I was onto it all the time. An' it'll all be the makin' of you, Ronald."

"It was a sair way o' bein made," said Ronald.

"But it does the business alright," rejoined Ephraim. "I mind hearin' a feller preach once—in th' Episcopal. He was a new minister, an' they was takin' his measure. Some said he was broad; others said he was low; lots said he was high. I thought he was mighty long—an' dry. Only he said one thing I froze to—it was poetry, I reckon. 'Men learns,' says he, 'men learns in sufferin' what they teach in song.' An' I thought he hit the bull's-eye alright," Ephraim concluded.

"It's easier to dae the teachin' nor the learnin'," Ronald said reflectively.

"You can't," returned the other; "they always go in pairs."

The day was nearly gone; and the early evening shadows were creeping about the old farmhouse as Ronald and his wife sat once again by the generous fire, recounting all the intervening days, exulting over the restoration of their threatened treasure. Mildred, too was giving copious expression to the joy she felt at being once again amid the well-loved scenes.

"Fetch yir wee bit toys, lassie," Ronald bade her; "fetch doon thae toys o' Hugh's. Blaw the whustle, an' crack the whup—ye'll nae disturb onybody here."

While the child went on her willing errand, Mary Roberston once again recited the contents of her letter to the distant Hugh. Ronald's hand was far from steady as he held before him the answer, with its precious tidings.

"Then he micht get hame the nicht!" he exclaimed, his voice refusing to be controlled.

"Yes, Ronald—he couldn't just tell the train. But I'm hoping it might be to-night. I'm watching," and the glowing eyes turned again to the window, peering through the deepening dusk.

Ronald Robertson arose, turned toward the stair, and walked slowly to the room above. Tenderly he looked about him. The boisterous prints were still upon the wall; heroic soldiers and gory Indians were not yet through with their astounding feats; the trusty sword still waited for the long vanished hand; the bird's nest was waiting yet for the brood that should return no more, and the silver-mounted collar still mourned the canine whose neck it had caressed so proudly.

Ronald walked over beside the bed. Sounds of childish revelry were wafted from below, but he heard them not. A rush of tears obscured his sight a moment; for the coverings of the bed were folded back, all white and new and beautiful—and ready. A glorious cluster of roses, winter-born, such as none but a mother's hand could have plucked from January's heart, filled the room with fragrance. And Hugh's mother's Bible was on the table, just as in other days.

Ronald knelt beside the bed; and hot tears, the tears of healing, fell like rain upon the waiting sheets, white and stainless though they were.

"Oh, God," the choking voice was pleading, "it surely canna be that Thou pitiest the same as a faither does! Teach a puir sinfu' man, oh God, how to welcome a wanderin' laddie hame. I canna learn myself. Mak me as patient wi' him as th' Almichty's been wi' me; for I've sinned far mair again Thee nor the laddie has again' his faither. It's a late gift, I ken, oh, Lord, but I gie mysel'———"

The prayer was never finished. His wife's voice was calling from below; her soul throbbing in the cry.

Ronald was at her side in a moment. She was by the window, her face close to the pane. She did not move, nor even point, but Ronald's eyes joined the holy chase with a swiftness that only the hungering heart could lend.

"Gang, mither—ye maun gang," he whispered hoarsely.

His wife turned her face full on his—but she spoke no word. Eloquent and wonderful, the swimming eyes poured out their bidding. Ronald knew—and in a moment the door had closed behind him. Then the mother turned from the window and looked no more; but her heart was pouring out its load to God.

It was not long—Mary Robertson knew not how long—when the door was opened again, and Hugh and Ronald entered. Hugh's eyes leaped to his mother's face, and the stalwart son, his arms outstretched, took the trembling woman to his heart. No sound escaped her, no words of welcome marred the sacred greeting; but once or twice, Hugh arms relaxing, she pressed him again closer to her bosom, hungering for its long arrears of love.

"Tak him, mither; that's my Christmas gift to ye," Ronald's trembling lips said low—"it's late, I ken, but that's my Christmas gift," his face averted, gazing through the window from which reverence had turned another's eyes away.

Mildred stood, open-eyed, beside the fire. Ball and whip and whistle lay forgotten on the floor. When Hugh was free at last, his gaze turned in perplexity upon the child; whereupon she ran to him, holding up her arms. "I'd have known you were Hugh," she said confidingly; "I could tell it by Nanna's eyes!"

It was the evening of the succeeding day, a day crowned by splendid revelry. For Ephraim, with the conscious Jessie, had completed the happy circle that had gathered about the generous table or surrounded the blazing hearth. But now a lull had come; and the older folks were by themselves amid the gathering shadows.

"That's auld Jock," Ronald suddenly exclaimed, looking out of the window as he caught the sound of bells. "Wha's drivin' him?—weel, if it's no Hugh!" he said, moving to the door. At the same moment, Jessie, very charming in her wealth of furs, came coyly down the stairs.

"They're off for a little outing," explained Ronald's wife; she and Ephraim had followed to the door. "I wanted them to wait till the morning, but they wouldn't."

"Pressure of business, I suppose," suggested Ephraim.

"Where micht ye b gaein', laddie?" Ronald cried to Hugh.

"Jessie wants to show me the mountain," replied the gallant Hugh; "she says it's grown since I saw it last."

"Ah, laddie! Ye're a bonnie pair, gaein' sicht-seein' i' the dark!" Ronald shouted triumphantly.

"That's all right, father—it's light enough," Hugh answered merrily, his voice blending with the echoing bells.

When Ronald returned to the fire, he found Ephraim there alone. "Aye, that's true; that's true, nae doot," he said musingly as he sank into a chair.

"What's this that's true?" inquired Ephraim.

"What the laddie said—'there's plenty licht,' he said. An' he's no far wrang; there's aye licht where there's love," and the keen Scotch eyes were very tender as they rested on the fire.

It was growing quite dark now; and both men, as such friends may, were drinking deep of the luxury of silence. The fire had sunk to a quiet ember glow when Ronald spoke.

"Ephraim," he said gently, "I want ye to gang wi' me."

"Where to?" asked Ephraim; "not goin' back to Shanty Bay?"

"No, Ephraim—but I'll tell ye where. I'm gaein' till the Saicrament again—it's a week frae the comin' Sabbath. An' I want ye to gang wi' me, Ephraim. We've had mony happy years wi' ane anither, an' I'm wishin' we cud tak the feast thegither. Wull ye no come wi' me, Ephraim?"

The ember glow burned deep and strong and silent while the two men sat in unbroken stillness.

"I'm not fit," Ephraim said at last; "I'm just a sinner, Ronnie—nothin' but a sinner."

"That's why I wantit ye," Ronald answered in the gentlest tone. "That's the vera credential that ye need. The Saicrament's no a winnin'-post," he went on quaintly; "it's the place where sinners maks a new beginnin'. We a' begin at the Cross—an' the Saicrament's juist a wee bit pictur' o' the Cross," he concluded simply, his eyes turned in wistful love upon his friend.

"I've often wanted to," and Ephraim's voice was scarcely audible ; "for He's done a lot for me."

"Ephrim," and Ronald drew his chair a little closer, "div ye mind that Christmas Eve—the nicht we had the daein's wi' Mildred's Christmas tree? Div ye mind tellin' me yirsel' aboot the graun' fun there is in givin'?—ye said the Cross was the high-water mark. Div ye mind that, Ephraim?"

"Yes," the other answered thoughtfully, "yes, I remember."

"Weel, Ephraim, I want ye to gie yirsel'—to gie yirsel' to Him. There's nae ither gift worth speakin' o'—an' that's what ye dae at the Saicrament. Wull ye no gang wi' me, Ephraim?"

The silence was long maintained; but, just as the dying fire leaped into sudden flame, Ephraim's answer came.

"I think I'll go, Ronnie," he said in simple earnestness; "if He'll take me, I'll give myself, the same as you."

Ronald rose to his feet and took the well-loved hand in his. "Aye, He'll tak us baith, Ephraim—an' He'll never gie us back to oor ain foolish hands. He'll keep us till the mornin's here."

"He'll have to," Ephraim answered quietly; "there isn't no one else that can."

THE END.

WITH THE WORKERS

The church at Wichita, Kans., has been having additions every service since the Scoville meeting.

Charles E. Varney and wife of Paw Paw, Mich., purpose entering the evangelistic field in March.

W. H. Kindred has been in a three week meeting with the University Place church in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

The church at Jacksonville, Illinois, has received five hundred new members from the "Billy" Sunday revival held in that city.

The city of Winchester, Illinois, is now in a union meeting with the leadership of Rev. Alexander. It recently voted out the saloons.

J. A. Battenfield, who preaches regularly at Clay City, Illinois, held a meeting at St. Francesville, which resulted in thirty-five additions.

M. G. Menzies, who is on furlough from India, is speaking in some of our churches. He spoke recently in the church in Oberlin, Kansas.

The church at Clovis, California, dedicated a new house of worship recently. J. R. Perkins of Fresno assisted in the dedicatory exercises.

Evangelist M. L. Anthony, of Arkansas, has held a meeting in Pearl, Illinois. There were twenty-five additions to the church as a result of the effort.

Wm. L. E. Shane had a harvest day in his ministry recently. While preaching at Marshall, Oklahoma, he baptized seven and had three confessions on one Sunday.

The church at Bartlesville, Oklahoma, is now engaged in the erection of a new church building which when complete will be one of the best in our brotherhood in that state.

The Roanoke Boulevard church of Kansas City has extended a call to J. F. Quisenberry of Weatherford, Texas. The change of pastorate was to take place the first of December.

Evangelist John W. Marshall has closed a successful meeting at English, Indiana, which resulted in twenty-two additions. A young man has been installed as minister for half time.

Evangelist Addison Crabb and wife have been engaged recently in a meeting in Decatur, Indiana. Sixteen were added to the church. They are commended for their interest in personal work.

At Assumption, Illinois, in the work of the regular minister, eighty-four have been added to the church since May. The members are greatly encouraged over this substantial addition to their working force.

M. L. Buckley has just closed his third year with the church in Collinwood, Ohio. The past year 175 have united with the church and attendance at all the organizations has been very greatly increased.

Several of the churches in Oklahoma are now without ministers. Among these are the churches at Paul's Valley, Lindsay, Blanchard, and Lexington. Oklahoma is a great and growing field for our brotherhood.

L. L. Carpenter dedicated a new house of worship at Arapahoe, Neb., last Sunday.

Evangelist N. A. Stull recently held a series of evangelistic meetings in the church at Sterling, Kansas. There were fifteen additions.

Mrs. Mecca Marie Varney, pastor of our church at Paw Paw, Mich., has been elected as the National Superintendent of the Department of Franchise in the W. C. T. U. This recognition of merit will be a gratifying one to the Disciples.

Twenty-four have been added to the churches in Washington, D. C., recently. This city has come to be a field of successful exploitation on the part of the Disciples. Beginning with the ministry of the veteran F. D. Power as a foundation, our churches and missions there have grown apace.

Evangelist J. C. Coggins held a meeting in Jasper, Alabama, which resulted in twenty accessions to the church. He was assisted by J. D. Patton, who had charge of the singing. The church is greatly blessed by the enterprise and will continue to go forward under the ministry of L. O. Herrold.

W. W. Denham is the pastor at Carthage, Illinois. Since his coming, a number of advance moves have been made. The building has been decorated and wired for electricity. The church has assumed the obligations of Living Link work. There have been frequent additions. All departments are in good condition.

L. W. Meyers of the North Lawrence church, Kansas, has been selected by the Endeavorers of Topeka to be the Living Link evangelist of their society. This enterprise on the part of the young people shows that the prophecies of a speedy funeral for the C. E. will be slow of fulfillment.

J. Russell Gordon, who resides in Mexico City, Mexico, finds himself deluged with letters from the states with reference to a certain proposed anti-foreign mining law. This law did not pass and is not likely to be proposed again. Foreign capital is welcome in Mexico. This is not to pass judgment upon the value of Mexican mining investments, but to relieve one of our brethren of a burdensome correspondence.

One of our exchanges has considerable humor in its "Exchange" column. Many of the ministers announcing themselves open to a call consider it necessary to say that they believe the Bible. Should that journal come to insist on faith in Mahommed, would there be those who would write in and say they had it? A minister does not need to continually reiterate his faith in the teaching of the Holy Scriptures. His respect for the book is shown by knowledge of it and by his successful use of its truths.

WITH THE WORKERS

L. H. Stine has resigned at Tipton, Indiana.

E. T. Cornelius, a last year's graduate of Christian University, has accepted a call to Macon, Mo.

Rev. G. W. Zink, has accepted a call to Pleasant Plains, Illinois, and is already upon his field of labor.

Lewis P. Fisher of the Cantrall, Illinois, church, will preach at the Athens church every Friday evening.

Charles E. McVay will lead the singing in a union meeting at Palmyra, Illinois, during the month of December.

Evangelist Clutter, who is now in a meeting at Cheney, Kansas, has had eighty-six additions to date and the meeting still continues. He is open for dates in 1909.

The church at Bethany, Mo., is now in a good meeting with the pastor, Andrew P. Johnson, doing the preaching. Good results are coming as a sequence to his efforts.

Cotner University meets Christian University in their third annual debate during this month (December). Cotner will affirm the desirability of postal savings banks in the United States.

C. H. Winders, of Irvington, Ind., is in a meeting at New London, Mo., E. M. Richmond, minister. Ralls County, Mo., is Brother Winders' old home, and he is highly esteemed there.

Drake University has purchased the alumni list, present student enrollment, and apparatus of Keokuk Medical College and College of Physicians and Surgeons, and transferred the same to Des Moines.

C. E. McVay assisted the minister, Andrew P. Johnson, in a two weeks' meeting at Bethany, Mo., with seven accessions in all. The field was already well gleaned as Evangelist Lockhart held a meeting there last year with a very large ingathering.

The Sunday-school at Rockford, Ill., observed Rally Day last Sunday in connection with World's Temperance Sunday observances. It was a splendid success in spite of the rain, 265 were present and a collection of $21.50. They expect to get into their remodeled building December 20. A splendid spirit prevails in the work. W. D. Ward is the pastor.

J. Will Walters, of Niantic, Ill., has accepted a unanimous call to the church in Sullivan, Ill., and began his labor there December 1. This is the church where C. R. Scoville held a meeting two years ago with 752 additions. Mr. Walters suggests that applicants for the Niantic pulpit write N. A. Boone, clerk. One man made the good confession there last Lord's day.

C. A. Hicks, minister for the church at Mountain Grove, Mo., and also principal of the high school in the same place, passed to his final rest Monday, Nov. 23. Funeral services were conducted Wednesday by D. B. Warren of West Plains, Mo. Mr. Hicks was one of God's noblemen. A true, humble, sweet-spirited disciple, and a progressive and exemplary minister, in the pulpit and out. He will be missed among his brethren here. He was a graduate of Christian University of the class of '05.

TELEGRAMS.

East Orange, N. J., Nov. 30:—A great day in New Jersey. First and only church of the Disciples of Christ in New Jersey. A magnificent building costing $38,000 dollars, with a seating capacity of 1,200, and filled to overflow each of three services, was dedicated Nov. 29th. Gen. Z. T. Sweeney, at morning and afternoon services, made appeal and raised $19,000 instead of the $15,000 asked for. At the evening service Miner Lee Bates, President of Hiram college, a former pastor, preached the dedication sermon. At the conclusion eighteen made confession and nine letters received.

Rev. W. J. Wright, Secretary of Christian Missionary Society, one of the first to lend a helping hand when this work started in 1900, traced its history from its first meeting over the plumbers' shop then to the small chapel on to the victory of this day. New York City and Brooklyn were represented by Pastors Rev. S. T. Willis, Herbert L. Martin, J P. Litchenberger, Joseph Kevill, Walter S. Rounds and W. C. Bower from Tonawanda, N. Y. L. N. D. Wells, Pastor.

Eureka, Ill., Nov. 26, 1908:—Meeting closed. 110 added in twenty-two days. Breeden, evangelist; Saxton, singer.

A. W. Taylor.

Harriman, Tenn., Nov. 30, 1908:—Began here yesterday with W. T. Wells. Last night's audience one of the largest in the history of the church. The memoers are enthusiastic. The field is considered very difficult. Pray for us. Brooks Brothers.

Logansport, Ind., Nov. 30:—Closed short meeting Pomona California with 201 responding. Meeting really only beginning. Blessed fellowship with many Southern California preachers. Many with us several days, this is only a sample of the way they help each other in that border land. Brother Clubb a royal host. California not more difficult for our plea than other places. Starting at Logansport, Indiana, with thirty-four to date, as hard a field as I have had, but responding wonderfully. Joseph Craig a great pastor. Leroy St. John started with me today. Great men's meeting at Elks' Hall.

Herbert Yeuell.

Anderson, Ind., Nov. 30:—Dark, rainy day yesterday. Firty-four added, 200 in eight days or twenty-five per day. House packed continually. Building too small, members fill it. Overflow addressed by Brother Grafton last night. Vancamp and Rockwell singing.

Chas. Reign Scoville.

I have just closed my second meeting at Fredonia, Kansas, for this year, with forty-four additions and with 304 added in both my meetings there. Greater crowds and interest in second meeting than in first. I am at Garnett, Kans., for December and Eureka, Kans., for January, and Blackwell, Oklahoma, for February. Churches and ministers write me at my home, 160 Pierce Avenue, Chicago, Ill., any time.—Richard Martin, Evangelist.

C. S Weaver, who spent a term of service in Japan, will deliver the C. W. B. M. day address in Niantic, Illinois.

On the Sunday of Nov. 22, there were three additions at the church in Fitzgerald, Ga., where E. E. Hollingsworth preaches.

Thomas H. Piplewell has just closed a meeting at Arkansas City, Kansas, which resulted in twenty-four additions to the church.

Dr. B. B. Tyler preached at the First United Presbyterian church of Denver recently in behalf of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of that denomination.

E. C. Bragg has taken up the work at Guyton, Ga. Mr. Bragg was the last pastor of the First church at Fitzgerald, which has united with the Central church.

John Tabor dedicated a new church building recently in Checotah, Oklahoma, and is now following this with a meeting which promises a good ingathering for the church.

Jasper S. Hughes, who now lives at South Bend, Indiana, offers his lecture on "John of Patmos" to any church or society wishing it, the proceeds to go to any good cause specified.

On the afternoon of Nov. 22, the Christian congregations of Denver gathered at the Highland Christian church to rejoice with them over twenty years of independent life for that church.

There is a fine opening for a competent merchant tailor at Fitzgerald, Ga., a member of the Christian church being preferred. Address, Rev. E. E. Hollingsworth, 403 N. Main street.

F. L. Van Voorhis held a meeting with the church in Edmond, Oklahoma, recently where Mr. Rosenstein ministers. The result of the meeting was forty-seven accessions to the membership of the church.

Dr. B. B. Tyler is teaching a Bible class in the Y. M. C. A. in Denver, this winter. His activities in the International Sunday-school work, and his travel in the Bible lands, qualify him for most acceptable service in this field.

Charles H. Caton is holding his own meeting in his church at Savannah, Mo., and is having most marked success. The Sunday-school has made a seventy per cent. increase in attendance and the revival is bringing many other good results.

No year passes any more without the presence of ministers of the Disciples being in the state legislature in Illinois. Rev. W. M. Groves was elected on the Democratic ticket in his district. He makes his home in Petersburg. He had just been elected Grand Master of the Odd Fellows in Illinois.

Charles S. Elder is the appointed agent of the Christian Century in the South Broadway church in Denver. It is a commendable custom of many of our ministers to appoint official agents for desirable church papers in their congregations. Where the church paper goes, the pastor does not have to go so often.

A series of revival meetings began Nov. 5 at the Christian church in Pittsfield, Illinois. W. H. Cannon, the pastor, is doing his own preaching with the assistance of A. L. Haley, a singing evangelist. On a recent Sunday evening every Protestant church in the city dismissed their services and attended the Christian church, thus expressing their fraternal interest in the evangelistic enterprise.

W. H. Book, of Columbus, Ind., has held a meeting at Taylorville, Ill., with fifty-six additions. The pastor, Myron L. Pontius, speaks in the most appreciating way of the work of the evangelist. He commends especially the simplicity of his message, the cordial treatment of other religious bodies, and the able presentation of the biblical themes that are appropriate to evangelistic meetings. The pastor will continue the special meetings for a time.

Mrs. N. E. Atkinson, Irvington, Ind.	5.00
Miss Murphy, Irvington, Ind.	5.00

Making $466.65 received, in all, to November 20th, and then we have pledges to the amount of about one hundred and fifty dollars which would make a little over six hundred dollars. We need $3,000 to tide us over this time of loss.

I heartily thank those who have so promptly responded, but the amount so far received is only about one sixth of what I actually need to make good the loss at our Southern Christian Institute. Will not our brethren see to it that I have this $3,000. This Institution has never been adequately equipped for its great work. I ask not for any thing fancy for it, but for just a plain working equipment for the great work it has before it. This school has been a part of the work of the Church of Christ for twenty-five years. We have now come to a time in it which we might almost call the "parting of the ways," when we must either go forward and properly equip it for its great work or lose what cannot be estimated in dollars and cents. We have come to a time when this work calls for development; for a broader basis for work.

Will not our brotherhood heed this request for $3,000, now that we may recover the loss made by fire and lay the basis for a better equipped work at this school whose work is nothing less than the part in the redemption of a race and the solving of one of the grave problems of this land of ours.

Brethren send personal gifts, and churches send offerings that this Institute may go forword in its righteous work.

Send gifts to C. C. Smith, 1365 Burdette Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio.

C. C. Smith.

REMARKS ON FALL HATS.

It is time to say another word or two about the shockingly ugly and offensive hats of the supposedly well-dressed women. The fall hats are worse than ever. They have greatly increased the pains and penalties of metropolitan life, as they not only offend the vision but they interfere with "personal liberty." When the woman who wears one of the incroyable hats to the theater reluctantly removes it as the curtain is rising, she places it on her lap, but it covers also the laps of the persons on either side of her. If one of these happens to be a solitary man, and there in another woman with the same kind of hat on the other side of him, he soon feels that he might as well have been born a turtle.

Some of the hats are so large that the wearers of two of them are apt to jostle each other on the sidewalk to the peril of their millinery. They are sometimes so large that the doors of the street and subway cars are too narrow for their wearers to enter comfortably. A short woman wearing one of the biggest hats in a street car can cause enough annoyance to unoffending men to make them forget the storied dignity of manhood. Indeed, a woman who wears a fashionable hat of the autumn of 1908, in public places, renders herself liable to insult.—New York Times.

Glow of Health Speaks for Postum.

It requires no scientific training to discover whether coffee disagrees or not.

Simply stop it for a time and use Postum in place of it, then note the beneficial effects. The truth will appear.

"Six years ago I was in a very bad condition," writes a Tenn. lady, "I suffered from indigestion, nervousness and insomnia.

"I was then an inveterate coffee drinker, but it was long before I could be persuaded that it was coffee that hurt me. Finally I decided to leave it off a few days and find out the truth.

"The first morning I left off coffee I had a raging headache, so I decided I must have something to take the place of coffee." (The headache was caused by the reaction of the coffee drug—caffeine.)

"Having heard of Postum through a friend who used it, I bought a package and tried it. I did not like it at first but after I learned how to make it right, according to directions on pkg., I would not change back to coffee for anything.

"When I began to use Postum I weighed only 117 lbs. Now I weigh 170 and as I have not taken any tonic in that time I can only attribute my recovery of good health to the use of Postum in place of coffee.

"My husband says I am a living advertisement for Postum. I am glad to be the means of inducing my many friends to use Postum, too."

THE UPLIFT FORCES OF THIS CITY WORKING THROUGH EDUCATION.—MR. O. F. JORDAN TELLS OF THE GREAT UNIVERSITY, THE JOHN WORTHY SCHOOL AND OTHER CULTURAL AND REDEMPTIVE FORCES.—DISCIPLE CHURCH NEWS.

The City's Higher Life

The view of Chicago held by the provincial easterner is that it is a city of saloons and gambling hells, with no life higher than that of the stockyards. The picture which we presented last week of the forces of evil in Chicago must be contrasted with some other pictures showing the things in Chicago that minister to the higher life. While Chicago has forms of wickedness that are unmatched in America, it also has efforts toward the higher life that are entirely unrivalled upon the continent. The social experiments of the municipality, the educational facilities, the religious organizations and even the clubs of Chicago are indications of a mighty force working for righteousness. Within a generation it shall be known whether these higher forces shall be outweighed by the lower.

We wish in this article to note the efforts being made in Chicago in the field of education. No more wonderful achievement in this field is to be found in Chicago than the University of Chicago. The doors of this university were opened in 1892. Located near the Midway, it was an object of mirth to some visitors to the Columbian Exposition with its small temporary building. In the sixteen years that have elapsed since then, it has grown to be one of the great universities of the country with over five thousand students, having outstripped in attendance many of the universities in the east with centuries of history. The secret of this great university's growth is to be found in the constructive genius of its first President.

Mr. Rockefeller's Choice.

When John D. Rockefeller sought out a teacher in Yale, a young man who had never been heard of in the country at large, to plan the spending of his millions in the founding of a great university, the world wondered. The keen judgment of the oil-king was soon vindicated, however. President Harper was a man capable of doing many men's work at the same time. He had drawings at the time of his death of buildings to entirely cover the territory on the Midway from Washington to Jackson Parks. He had planned the openings of new colleges and schools to cover entirely the field of human knowledge as it is now covered by the schools. His plans were always for an institution which in the end should be the wonder of the world. He was a great raiser of funds. He always protested that his chief joy was in the field of constructive scholarship, but nevertheless no university executive in modern times has brought together in a space of ten years seventeen millions of dollars for a university. This money did not come from the fortune of John D. Rockefeller solely. There is only one building on the University campus that was built with Rockefeller's money. Some of it was given by Jews, and most of it by the great business men of Chicago. However, buildings and money would never have made a university. Pres. Harper was a great judge of men. He knew where to lay hands on the bright young men of the schools in the east and built a faculty from men who have made their mark in the field of constructive scholarship. Few men are teaching in the more important departments of the university who have not written a text-book on the subject taught. In Harper's life time there was no greater Old Testament scholar in America than himself. In the field of New Testament there is not in America a more comprehensive scholar than Prof. Burton. In the field of Egyptology, Prof. Breasted is the foremost American scholar. In Psychology the names of John Dewey and Prof. Angell carry great weight. In the field of chemistry and biology, the university has been a great factor in late years. The present management of the university is carrying out the great ideals of President Harper. As years go by, new buildings will be built, new schools opened and the wonder of the world in education will be in Chicago. It is possible now to proceed from the kindergarten to several of the professions without leaving the university. Some day that will be possible with any profession.

Municipal Education and Reclamation.

Public school education has been commanding increased equipment, but the growth of the city has been so phenomenal that the city does not yet have adequate facilities for the instruction of the young. There are 327 school buildings which have a valuation of thirty millions of dollars. The budget for the year 1903 was nearly nine millions of dollars.

One of the most interesting of the municipal education plants is the John Worthy school. In this school the boys who become delinquent in the city are detained and educated. It is not a prison, but in every sense a school. The point of view of the dicipline is shown by an incident that happened as we were visiting the place one day. We were shown a large swimming pool in the yard. "We use this to punish our boys," said the superintendent. Some of the would-be-wise in the party winked and remarked to each other that when they were boys a swimming pool was not much of a punishment. After a time the superintendent resumed, "We punish our boys by not allowing them to use this pool when they violate the rules." He told us it was a punishment that usually brought a boy back into discipline. The education in the school is largely of the manual training sort. The boys make many objects that would do credit to the most skilled workman in those fields. In the school room they were better behaved than boys are in any school-room in Chicago, probably. They sang the school songs with a spirit and seemed to enjoy their life hugely. Boys discharged from this school rarely ever return. They are permanently reclaimed to law-abiding citizenship. The improvement of this method over the medieval tortures that used to be meted out to boys in state institutions is too apparent to need comment.

Professional and Technical Schools.

In Chicago there are 700 divinity students scattered through five schools, in addition to those in training in the Moody Institute. There are about nine hundred law students in five law schools. There are nearly three thousand medical students in seven different schools. There are nearly 400 pharmacy students in three different schools. There are 641 student nurses in twenty-three different hospitals. In ten business colleges, there are nearly six thousand students. In the Armour Institute there are thirteen hundred technical students. Five hundred are studying for the teaching profession in a normal school, and 225 are preparng for kindergarten work in training schools. Not less than thirty thousand people in Chicago are students for the professions and the technical occupations.

We cannnot, of course, hope to be detailed in our statement of the educational equipment of Chicago. We might mention the numerous night schools and vacation schools in the public school buildings. We might mention the influence of such institutions as the Art Institute and the Field Museum. We might take note of the great libraries of Chicago adapted as they are for the different grade of students, from the purely popular institution known as the Chicago Public Library to the library with the reference books for careful scholars called the Newberry Library.

It is encouraging to note that with all the vice and sin in Chicago, with the dreadful poverty of the slums and the selfish commercialism of the market place, there is in the city nevertheless a great army of those who long for the coming of the Kingdom. In a city which has more divinity students and more student volunteers than in any city of the world, we have something to hope. The forces of King Emmanuel draw themselves up for battle with the forces of evil. The fate of American civilization is to be determined in New York and Chicago. We have much to hope and much to fear. The Christian church has it in her power to decide the battle.

CHURCH NOTES.

Hon O. W. Stewart spoke to the ministers on Monday. The speaker on the City Charter failed to appear, but all lingering regret was wiped out in the humor and telling hits of our inimitable temperance orator. Mr. Stewart spoke of the progress of the temperance reform. He reported that not a town on the Ohio river in Ohio, except Cincinnati and Marietta, had a saloon, and an election is pending in Marietta. The burden of the address was to refute the personal liberty and economic arguments of the saloonists.

Twenty-five ministers were present at the meeting at the Grand Pacific on Monday.

The National Church Federation will hold a meeting in Chicago Dec. 21. The Ministers' Association voted to adjourn for the day and be in attendance.

This week there is a series of union meetings of the men's clubs and brotherhoods of the city for prayer. These meetings are held at the Central Y. M. C. A.

C. G. Kindred is reported better and may be able to leave the hospital this week.

There were two additions at Harvey church last Sunday. W. D. Endres is organizing the church for an active winter's service.

There were two confessions at West Pullman church last Sunday where Guy Hoover ministers.

The quarterly meeting of the C. W. B. M. takes place this week at the Jackson Boulevard church. Mr. Sarvis of the University of Chicago will relate experiences in Africa.

The shorthand night school in the Evanston church has opened with twelve pupils and new recruits coming at every session. The class meets three nights a week. The experiment has been of sufficient interest that most of the metropolitan dailies have sent reporters to the church to secure details. The class will be conducted until June.

POMONA (CAL.) MEETING.

We have just closed the greatest meeting ever held in Pomona. I wrote to Herbert Yeuell just before the New Orleans Convention, and it so happened that he had an open date for a short meeting immediately following the convention. This gave us a very little time in which to prepare, but we set to work at once and by the time the meeting began, we were ready. Skillful, persistent advertising filled the church at the first service, Thursday night, and on Sunday night we were crowded to overflowing. We at once secured a tent seating 1,000, which was frequently taxed to its utmost capacity. There were 800 at the men's meeting, and over 900 at the women's meeting on succeeding Sunday afternoons. The large chorus choir, under the efficient direction of our own brother, G. H. Waters, was an inspiring feature of the meeting. The amount of personal work done was a revelation to us all. It demonstrated that personal work from house to house and during the progress of the invitation counts.

I am persuaded that we should do more personal work in all revival meetings. A complete religious census of the city had been taken prior to the meeting, which proved invaluable to us in our personal work. During the meeting there were about 180 responses to the invitation, some of these will unite with other churches in the city, some will not unite with any, about 140 will be added to our membership. Quite a good many heads of families are among the number, but what pleased us most was to see so many young people and boys and girls from the Sunday-school coming into the church.

Only a word need be said about the Evangelist. Brother Yeuell is truly a great leader. He understands his work thoroughly and he pushes it with inexhaustible energy and persistence. He goes a rapid gait from the time he enters the church till the meeting is over. Everybody feels the thrill of his intense earnestness. He is clear-cut in style and often dramatic in delivery. He preaches the gospel. No quarter is given to compromise, and no mercy is shown the man who would destroy faith in the old book. This is enough.

Sister Yeuell accompanied Brother Yeuell to the coast, and she proved a worthy helpmeet to her husband in his great work.

We feel stronger, and the church will go forward to still greater things.

M. D. Clubb.

BALTIMORE, MD.

For a little over seventeen years I have been the minister of one congregation and in that time have held twenty meetings with the same congregation in which I did the preaching. My twenty-first meeting closed on the 22nd inst. with 105 additions, half of them being from new homes. F. C. Huston, of Indianapolis, was my able and efficient assistant. He had charge of the singing, and in addition to his leading the chorus every evening, he also sang a solo. His music was greatly appreciated and contributed largely to the results of the meeting. Fred B. Smith, of New York, the well known Y. M. C. A. speaker, spoke one evening to men only, at which service twenty-nine men decided for Christ. The Christian Temple has been greatly blessed and we are preparing for an aggressive winter campaign.

Evangelists Taubman and Gardner began on the 22nd of November, a meeting with L. B. Haskins of 25th St. church, and already there have been several additions, and we are looking for a great increase in that work. It is a fine field. Recently H. F. Lutz, of Harrisburg, Pa., held a four weeks' meeting at Calhoun St. church, with O. B. Sears and there were forty-five who made their decision for Christ, which made an epoch in that church and gave them great encouragement. Nelson Trimble has started in a revival at the Christian Center having services three nights a week, and there have been six additions to date. B. A. Abbott has returned from Milligan College, Tenn., where he delivered a course of lectures and stopped at Bristol for a short meeting with Rev. Blake. J. N. Pickering recently had several baptisms at Randall St. church. Jesse Dehoff is preaching at the Lansdowne Church. Several weeks ago a lot was given to us for the Wilhelm Park church and the building there will be started in the spring.

This is a great city that we have hardly begun to work in. The Disciples have eight churches and missions and several small colored churches, but there is room here for two dozen churches of the primitive faith. The harvest is ripe. "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that He send forth laborers into His harvest. Peter Ainslee.

MISSIONARY NEWS.

R. A. McCorkle, Missionary of the Foreign Society at Osaka, Japan, who was forced home on account of sickness some two months ago, has made great improvement. He has gained thirty pounds in weight. He hopes to be able to return within the next two months. He is at present with friends at Akron, Ohio.

John Lord, Missionary of the Foreign Society at Vigan, P. I., reports fifty-five baptisms during the past month. Twenty-five of these were from the new school in the mountains, and one was the leader of their town. The Gospel is having a telling effect among those head-hunting people.

During the past week, the Foreign Society has received two pledges of $500.00 each, toward the new Bible College at Vigan, P. I., and also a number at $100.00 each. This matter should be pressed vigorously to make good the $25,000 which is required. Remember the proposition of R. A. Long to give $5,000 of the amount.

M. B. Madden, Missionary at Sendai, Japan, reports three baptisms. He started on an extended trip Nov. 7th, holding meetings at a number of different points.

The new Missionary, C. C. Wilson and wife, reached Honolulu, their new station, Nov. 10th, and have taken up their work in earnest. For four months previous to their arrival, A. C. McKeever of the First Church, that city, carried on much of the mission work in addition to his regular work. During that period, there were ten additions, nine by confession and one by baptism.

Miss Mamie Longon has reached Manila, her future field of work. She is supported by the church at Pittsburg, Kansas.

Once Sir Henry Irving, while playing "Macbeth" in London, was somewhat disconcerted by one of the "gallery gods." He had reached the point where Macbeth orders Banquo's ghost to leave the banquet board. "Hence, horrible shadow, unreal mockery, hence!" exclaimed Irving in his most tragic tones, and with a convulsive shudder sank to the ground, drawing his robe about his face. Just as Banquo withdrew, an agitated cockney voice from high up in the gallery piped out as if to reassure Irving: "It's all right now, 'Enery; 'e's gone!"—Everybody's Magazine.

A SPLENDID CLASS GRADUATES.

On Monday night, Nov. 23rd, the Teacher Training Class at Diamond, Mo., held their graduating exercises. Nineteen of them passed with good grades and received their diplomas. The class has been taught by the minister, Jas. M. Miller, and has done among the very best work of any class in the state, due to their strong determination and interest under the wise guidance of their splendid young pastor.

I am constantly told, in urging others to organize Teacher-Training work, that this is possible in the cities and large towns, but not in the villages and country churches. Now, Diamond is a town of less than five hundred people. Nearly all the members of that class live in farm homes from one to four miles from the church, which is located in the village. Their completion of the course in such a thorough way shows that this work can be done in the country districts and small villages just as well as in the big towns and cities; and, indeed, the people having more time for study, if they will put their minds to it, can do it better than the people living in the centers where there is so much to distract.

Geo. L. Peters, minister of the South Joplin church, came over to the graduation occasion at the request of the class, and made an address, and the writer was privileged to give an address and award the diplomas. The class will soon take up the Second Standard Course, and go on with the work. A fine audience witnessed the exercises and we believe received impressions that will be effective in advancing Christian service in that community for years to come.

FATHER AND SON.

Both Gained Health on Right Food.

A food that will build up the health of a man and that can be digested by a baby, certainly has value worth considering.

The following report from an Ohio wife and mother is to the point and interesting.

"My husband had suffered great agony from stomach troubles at times for five years. Finally, after six months in the hospital, he was operated on for appendicitis.

"From that time he grew weaker and thinner, until when we brought him home he was reduced from 145 to 108 lbs.

"Then he began to eat for breakfast, Grape-Nuts with cream and a soft boiled egg. For dinner a dish of Grape-Nuts and cream, toasted bread and a glass of warm milk. For supper same as breakfast with a baked potato, one or two poached eggs, and a glass of warm milk.

"After two months on this diet he had nearly regained his normal weight. He took out-door exercise, and got plenty of sleep. He has no more trouble with his stomach and can eat anything.

"These results induced us to try Grape-Nuts on our 6 months baby, who from birth had been puny. Nothing seemed to agree with him, although we tried the whole list of Infant Foods.

"When I began to feed him Grape-Nuts with warm milk poured on to make it soft, he weighed only 13 lbs. After six months on his new diet he has gained 7 lbs., and is healthy and happy."

SOME ANNOUNCED PLANS FOR C. W. B. M. DAY.

BY MRS. M. E. HARLAN, COR. SEC.

The correspondence coming to the Secretary's desk indicates a wide spread co-operation in the purpose to present the work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions to the churches sometime during the month of December.

The large majority will use the first Sunday. This is preferable and is to be commended.

However, very often local plans for special work makes this impossible, or a later date is desired.

Then many Auxiliaries that observe the day the first Sunday have been asked to reproduce their program in some nearby church where there is no Auxiliary.

A number of pastors will exchange pulpits in the presentation of the work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions on this annual missionary day.

All our State Officers who do field work are engaged for every Sunday in December, both morning and evening.

The National Officers have had their dates all taken for sometime.

All our State Missionaries (Organizers) are to aid in this day's services during the entire month of December.

There is a great call for missionaries as speakers. We could use one hundred like those we now have home on furlough and ready for such service.

A number of Auxiliaries and churches will use the stereopticon views. The National Executive Committee has three sets in the field, Kentucky, California, and Michigan have their own views and machines. A number of individuals and Auxiliaries have arranged for these also.

The day will be observed in all lands where there is a Christian Church and an offering will be taken for the work.

Two years ago Providence, Jamaica, sent to headquarters the first C. W. B. M. Day offering, $6.50.

Bilaspur, India, has an Auxiliary of sixty members. Each member will make an offering.

Jamaica has an Auxiliary of seventy members. The very poorest will bring a gift.

Orders for supplies show great interest. One hundred thousand C. W. B. M. Day collection envelopes have been sent out. Orders for these are still coming in. Fifty thousand C. W. B. M. Day program folders are in circulation. The second edition of Snapshots from the New Orleans Convention is exhausted.

In hundreds of churches a great gift of women is to crown the day's work.

A message just received from Des Moines says, "When the call for new members is made it is planned to have at least one hundred women ready to respond, each with a gift of at least one new name." The inspiration of such an event will sweep an audience forward to the plain of a great and a worthy effort. We used this plan last year and have been convinced of its power.

In the recent State Conventions of Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and North and South Carolina, special emphasis was placed on the observance of the day and all entered heartily into the plan.

The most of the states have set definite aims for the day as to the amount of the offering and number of new members. There is always power in a declared purpose.

Large gifts will pour into the Treasury. Many will become Life Members of the National Organization and pay $25.00. These Life Membership gifts can be paid in five annual installments, two yearly payments, or by cash.

Shares of $50.00, each, for Station Support will be taken by many. By Station Support is meant the expense account in the various missions aside from the salaries of the workers.

Auxiliaries and churches that support Living Links in the Christian Woman's Board of Missions will use the offering for this work and will seek to provide for the full amount in cash and pledges.

Annuity gifts will also be received.

There will never be a better time to make bequests.

Every Auxiliary woman will bring her offering.

The entire church will co-operate in this service of giving for it is one of the church's annual missionary days.

God will supplement by His presence and add to each gift a multitude of ministering power.

NEW LIVING LINK.

Word has just come that Mason City, Iowa, will become a Living Link. This is the largest Auxiliary in the world.

Other societies will announce Living Links later. One state hopes to find five Living Links this year.

A LARGE OFFERING.

The first report of the observance of the day comes from Hutchinson, Kansas, as follows: "Had a great C. W. B. M. Day yesterday. Raised $800.00. Rejoice with us. All happy here. Sincerely, O. L. Cook." For local reasons an advance date was chosen. Melvin Mensies is their Living Link.

A MODEL LETTER.

The following is a sample of a letter which one Auxiliary has sent to each member of the church the week preceding C. W. B. M. Day:

Dear Friend and Helper:

On Sunday, December 6th, at 10:45 o'clock in the morning, our church here will make its annual offering to the missions of our Woman's Board. This offering should be as generous as possible for at least two reasons. The first is that the work of the C. W. B. M. is various, wide-spread, ably directed and vastly effective both at home and abroad. A second reason is in the women of our own church here in ———— who belong to these Auxiliaries. They need and merit, we believe, the help and encouragement of a general and liberal offering. They are leavening the congregation with the teaching of the Bible and of Providence touching the evangelization of the world and are helping thus to prepare the church for all spiritual advancement.

You will, we know, let us say two simple, but very important things about your own gift to these missions. If you have much give much, for your utmost gift will not equal the need to which we would minister. If, however, you have little, by all means give a little. Great enterprises of the Master wait and often perish for lack of many littles, just such as, pernaps, your offering to thus cause must be.

You will find a small envelope in this for your offering. It speaks for itself as to how it is to be used. Praying that we may all know our duty to missions, and that we may be given grace to do it, we are,

Your sisters in Christ,

.....Pres. Aux. No. 1.

.....Pres. Aux. No. 2.

.....Supt. Mem. M. Band.

I heartily approve the foregoing statement and appeal.

Boils, Pimples And Blackheads

Are caused By Blood Impurity Which May Be Removed In A Few Days By Stuart's Calcium Wafers.

Trial Package Sent Free.

Why suffer boils, pimples, blackheads, tetter, eczema, rash, scabby skin and eruptions of all sorts, when you may by the simple act of letter writing bring to you proof that blood may be purified in a few days or weeks at the latest?

Stuart's Calcium Wafers contain the most powerful blood purifier known to science—Calcium Sulphide. They contain other known purifiers each having a distinct and peculiar office to perform.

Instead of a face full of pimples, or a body which is assailed with boils or eruptions, you may enjoy, if you will, a skin normally clean and clear, by the simple use of Stuart's Calcium Wafers.

They act almost like magic, so rapid is their work of purity done.

You know the blood is pumped through the lungs every breath. The air purifies it.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers help the lungs do their work by segregating the impurities so that the lungs may enrich the blood.

Then they carry off the waste poisons and decay through the bowels. There is no need for months and years of treatment. Calcium Sulphide is so powerful, yet so harmless, that the blood feels its beneficial influence immediately.

Printed words are cold praise, especially when you praise your own product and offer it for sale, but here is an opportunity of proving this praise by your own judgment without cost. Send us your name and address, no matter how serious your skin trouble may be, and we will send you a trial package of Stuart's Calcium Wafers by mail free. It is wholly a matter for your approval. Thousands of people have passed these little wafers with success, and their praise is our testimonial. Every druggist carries them in stock. Every physician knows what Calcium Sulphide will do. He will prescribe it as a blood purifier and charge for the prescription. Here is the best method of using Calcium Sulphide, and you may test it free. Go to your druggist today and buy a package of Stuart's Calcium Wafers, price 50c., or write us and we will send you a trial package free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

When the Weather was Cold.

An American and a Scotsman were discussing the cold experienced in winter in the north of Scotland.

"Why its nothing at all compared to the cold we have in the States," said the American. "I can recollect one winter when a sheep, jumping from a hillock into a field, became suddenly frozen on the way and stuck in the air like a mass of ice."

"But man," exclaimed the Scotsman, "the law of gravity wouldn't allow that."

"I know that," replied the talepitcher. But the law of gravity was frozen, too."—Ladies Home Journal.

THE MISSOURI UNION SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONVENTION.

This convention was held at Chillicothe, Nov. 17-19, in the Elm Street Episcopal, South, church. The attendance outside of Chillicothe was not large, but those who came were earnest and attentive. The people of Chillicothe turned out in large numbers filling the great building in which the convention was held, with a cultured appreciative audience. The entertainment by the citizens of Chillicothe was generous and adequate. The ladies of the church in which the convention was held, served elegant dinners and suppers at a moderate cost, and the delegates were entertained in the homes of the people for lodging and breakfast free. In addition to the ordinary features of such a convention, we were favored by the presence of two distinguished men, who appeared two or three times daily, to instruct and entertain and inspire. These were Dr. A. Sanders, President of the Washburn College, Topeka, Kans., late dean of Yale Divinity School, and a great student of the Holy Scriptures. Many of those whose eyes fall upon this report, have his books in their library and will understand how great was the treat to the Missouri Convention to hear him two or three times every day, on the Four Gospels. Our other distinguished guest was Dr. Franklin McElfresh, recently elected International Teacher-Training Secretary. Dr. McElfresh comes to this work with a ripeness of scholarship and experience which renders him one of the most effective men now before the Sunday-school public. He is not only ripe in scholarship, experience, and Christian service, but he manifests such a beautiful spirit in dealing with the people, that he captivates them at once. There was at all times in the Chillicothe Convention, a disposition to hurry through everything and clear the deck for Dr. McElfresh.

Reports from the various departments of the work in the state were interesting and instructive to those who gave attention. It was my pleasure to report the year's work in the Adult Bible Class Department, of which I am superintendent for Missouri; and one of the features of my report which was pleasing to the people of the Christian church, was the fact that out of sixty-nine Adult Bible Classes having received the Recognition Certificate in Missouri, fifty-three were classes in our own schools. I trust we are not vain of this fact, but I mention it as a matter of encouragement. The Treasurer's report showed an indebtedness on the part of the Association, of about $2,200, much of which has been dragging along for several years and impeding the progress of the work. It was determined to signalize the year upon which we are now entering, upon the part of the finance committee and management in general, with an effort to relieve the organization from debt.

I desire to acknowledge my indebtedness to Bro. S. J. White, minister of the Christian church, and his cultured wife, for my good home during the sessions of the convention, and for the many kind attentions I received at their hands. Brother White is doing a splendid work in the Christian church in Chillicothe, and his two years or more in that church are promising to tell in much larger things in the near future.

BY THEIR FRUITS.

The Centennial appeal of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions that is to be sounded forth in all the churches the first Lord's day in December is based upon the record of its work throughout the last third of our century.

In its ranks today are 55,000 women organized in over 2,000 Auxiliaries, which are banded together by states under thoroughly trained and deeply consecrated officers. Every member is definitely committed to a monthly offering for evangelism both at home and abroad. There are no Dead Heads in the C. W. B. M. Nearly every member is a regular reader of the monthly magazine, "The Missionary Tidings," which furnishes complete administrative information and tells the story of progress in all the fields.

Every issue of the Tidings, every meeting of the Auxiliary and every offering made by a member has a distinct educational value. Wise observers of the organization have declared that the C. W. B. M. would have abundantly justified its existence by what it has done for its own members if nothing had ever been accomplished for those outside. But with true womanly instinct it has been giving Christian nurture to the Junior Christian Endeavor Societies in the churches, to orphans in Porto Rico and India, to the young people of the mountain regions in Kentucky and West Virginia, to the Negro in the South and the University students in four great institutions.

As woman was the first to tell of the Savior's Resurrection, so the C. W. B. M. has borne a prominent part in preaching the Gospel all around the world. The thousands of souls that have been saved through the preaching of evangelists supported by this organization join with all the other beneficiaries of its work in urging the universal and worthy observance of the first Lord's day in December for the establishment of new Auxiliaries, the enlistment of new members and the increase of funds for the rapidly growing work. Let every observance of the day be a Centennial celebration, and let every one bring to the occasion Centennial enthusiasm and consecration.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

A firm of shady outside London brokers was prosecuted for swindling. In acquitting them, the court, with great severity said, "There is not sufficient evidence to convict you, but if any one wishes to know my opinion of you I hope that they will refer to me." Next day the firm's advertisement appeared in every available medium with the following, well displayed, "Reference as to probity, by special permission, the Lord Chief Justice of England."—Everybody's Magazine.

"Can you tell me what steam is?" asked the examiner.

"Why sure, sir," replied Patrick confidently. "Steam is—why er—it's wather thot's gone crazy wid the heat."—Everybody's Magazine.

Every employee of the Bank of England is required to sign his name in a book on his arrival in the morning, and, if late, must give the reason therefor. The chief cause of tardiness is usually fog, and the first man to arrive writes "fog" opposite his name, and those who follow write "ditto." The other day, however, the first late man gave as the reason, "wife had twins," and twenty other late men mechanically signed "ditto" underneath.—Everybody's Magazine.

A woman entered a police station in Holland and asked the officer in charge to have the canals dragged.

"My husband has been threatening, for some time, to drown himself," she explained, "and he's been missing now for two days."

"Anything peculiar about him by which he can be recognized?" asked the officer, preparing to fill out a description blank.

EVERY CHURCH SHOULD USE OUR

Individual Communion Cups

The best way to prove the merits of this cleanly method is to use a service at a communion on trial. We will send your church a complete outfit to use before purchasing, to be returned to us at our expense if not found perfectly satisfactory. To receive service give us number of communicants usually in attendance and we will send an outfit. Over 5,000 churches use our cups. We furnish bread plates and collection plates in several styles. TO DISCIPLES COMING SOUTH FOR THE WINTER.

By J. J. Haley.

One who has on four different occasions visited the Golden West, extending his line of travel so far beyond our setting sun as to hail the rising sun of another clime; who has lived in Australia, New Zealand, England; who has sojourned in a half dozen American states; who has summered in Tasmania, and sampled the climates of a number of European countries famous for that particular thing—may, I think, with becoming modesty claim to be something in the nature of a climatic expert. Assuming that my claim is allowed, I wish to express the opinion that it would be difficult, in any part of the world, to find a better all-year-round climate than that of the Californian coast, especially the strip lying on the Pacific Ocean, north of Los Angeles and South of San Francisco; and it would be still more difficult to discover a better winter climate than that of the Florida Highlands, in which Eustis is situated. I have been spending the summer in California, and have quite recently made the long journey from the Santa Clara Valley to this place. Investigation and experience convince me that the winter climate, par excellence of North America, is that of the Florida Peninsula. Surely no where in creation is the air so inexpressibly balmy, bracing, and pure—so almost divine! It caresses one like the touch of a mother; it possesses a peculiar softness and restfulness that cannot be described, or imagined. To be sure, Florida is not so good a place as California for mere money-making; but all things considered, this part of the state, at least, is a better place for a home, if one have some means. Eustis, so far as I know (and various members of my family have lived in seven different towns in the Peninsula), is the most desirable resort in the far South. While not so loud and costly as the coastal towns, it has a better climate, and is more healthful; while the facilities for a "good time" are ample. The altitude of the town above sea-level is about two hundred feet, said to be a greater elevation than that of any tourist resort of importance in the state. It is forty or more above the neighboring water. It stands on a system of four big interconnected lakes, has a fine pleasure fleet of fifty launches or more, and is about to erect a public pavilion in the lake in front of the town. Fishing and hunting are plentiful.

I have no axe to grind in telling about Eustis. I have no real estate to sell, and not even a room to rent. But I would like to see more of our people come this way. For, in addition to the climate, and the scenery, and the general advantages, we have an elegant Christian church, which was founded by W. K. Pendleton. So many of our brethren come south, and go to places that cannot compare with this section for physical conditions, and where we have no church at all; when they might come here, enjoy first class church privileges, and find a country that combines a greater number of attractions for the health and pleasure seeker than any in Florida. If this article should meet the eye of any who meditate a trip hither, I wish to assure them that they should call in and see how they like the place, in any event. As a winter home, I can give it my unqualified recommendation.

Eustis, Florida.

It lies around us like a cloud,
A world we do not see,
Yet the sweet closing of an eye
May bring us there to be.

Its gentle breezes fan our cheek,
Amid our worldly cares;
Its gentle voices whisper love,
And mingle with our prayers.

Sweet hearts around us throb and beat,
Sweet helping hands are stirred,
And palpitates the veil between
With breathings almost heard.

—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

Real Self-possession.

Not long ago a young couple entered a railway carriage at Sheffield and were immediately put down as a bridal pair. But they were remarkably self-possesed, and behaved with such sang-froid that the other passengers began to doubt if their first surmise was correct after all.

As the train moved out, however, the young man rose to remove his overcoat, and a shower of rice fell out, while the passengers smiled broadly.

But even that did not affect the youth, who also smiled and turning to his partner, remarked audibly.

By Jove, May! I've stolen the bridegroom's overcoat!"—Tatler.

The Christian Century

Vol. XXV. CHICAGO, ILL., DECEMBER 12, 1908 No. 50

God's Experiment in Christian Union

After all, God works in very much the same way that man works. By the method of experimentation he brings to pass the good things he purposes for his children. "Try, try again," is not a child's motto merely, but that of the great God. If he fails in one of his chosen vessels he chooses another.

In the reuniting of his broken and scattered church he has worked by many methods; the intractible material would not hold together by the principle of authority, nor the principle of orders, nor the principle of creedal agreement. So at the beginning of the Nineteenth century God began a long-time experiment in Christian union through the principle of liberty in opinion, unity in faith and love in all things.

He gathered a people together who made it their business to advocate union on this basis. The Christian world did not listen to their advocacy with over-much respect. Its sectarian interests blinded its eyes to the sin of division and it waived off the question with indifference. Meanwhile other factors have made the problem of Christian union no longer academic. It has become conscious to the whole church of God and is the most urgent and immediate practical question the church is today facing.

The denominations have been laying aside their creeds. They have been cultivating a spirit of fellowship and co-operation across sectarian lines. They have organized what they call a Federation of Churches—a scheme to co-operate yet further and on a larger scale. But already this Federation scheme is felt to be inadequate and temporary. Its promoters see that real union is the natural fruitage of such co-operation.

Federation is moving in the direction "comity" moved and Christian Endeavor "interdenominationalism" moved. At first the principle of comity was exploited as a solution of the competitive duplication in the mission field. Now it is only tolerated as a truce pending the vital unification of the churches. At first the leaders of the Christian Endeavor movement insisted sharply on the distinction between interdenominational and undenominational, by implication urging that our sectarian divisions were here to stay, and that we were better off with many churches than with one. Now the organ of Christian Endeavor speaks frankly for organic union and one of the chief leaders has written the most explicit and stirring call for organic unification of the sects that our literature affords.

Likewise the Federation plan is but a stage in a complete rapprochement of the bodies entering into it. The bass note underlying the harmony of the present Philadelphia Council is union, not federation.

In view of this pronounced movement toward unity, manifested at many other points which we need not here mention, how significant becomes the century of history just being completed by the Disciples of Christ! While the Spirit of God has been wooing the broken and divided church back into the spirit and temper of unity, the same Spirit has been carrying on an experiment in the method by which this unity may become organic and enduring.

We, the Disciples of Christ, are God's experiment in Christian union.

We greatly emphasize our plea, our advocacy, of union. But we are in danger of forgetting that we are not only the advocate but the illustration of union. It is ours to preach it with trumpet voice, but it is our chief duty to practice it with meekness and love, assured that the still, small voice of our example will carry further than the storm and earthquake of our advocacy.

There are many voices shouting union. From the mission field a shout goes up, "Get together!" The consolidating of business enterprise suggests vividly to the churches the advantages of getting together. Every consideration of prudence and economy in housing and manning the church argues for union. The grim necessity of self-preservation often compels churches to unite. Education is carrying thinking men away from the problems over which the church split itself in former days, and urging new problems requiring a new spirit for their solution—a spirit of inquiry and toleration. Evangelism demands unity. The sense of helplessness to cope with the vast problem of our cities makes each denomination lean back for reinforcement upon its neighbor. Sin is in league—Christ must not be divided. Rome is united under authority and never so aggressive as today. The free church of Jesus Christ must be one in its liberty or the religion of democracy shall fail.

Our voice, that of the Disciples of Christ, has been but one of many voices shouting for the union of God's scattered people. But our voice has not been heeded as have some others. As a people we have not yet been taken seriously in this our plea. Evidently we were not raised up merely to plead for union, God having provided other advocates and has reserved for us a far more delicate and important service. Our hour has not yet come.

Or has it not just now struck?

This is the purpose God has with the Disciples of Christ: that they might be an organized illustration of Christian union.

Not advocates merely, but an example—this is indispensable in consummating Christian union. Christian men admit the un-Christian and costly character of divisions; they say, "Certainly we should unite if it is possible; but how is it possible? Who will show us the way? So long as men differ are not divisions necessary? Is there any basis upon which we can unite?"

Now behold the strategy of God! While leading his people by his spirit to hate divisions and to seek union, he has been all along preparing a brotherhood which should illustrate in its temper and practice the kind of unity that he proposes for his church. So that when men ask, how can it be done? God's answer is simply to point to his experiment. If he is able to show the world an illustration of a union that has already been consummated, on a basis broad enough to embrace all Christian men of widely divergent tempers and beliefs, and actually embracing them, and enduring through a period long enough to guarantee the adequacy of its principle of unity against the shifting vicissitude of time—if God is able to exhibit such an illustration to the inquiring world, he has won his battle with sectarianism and has answered Christ's high priestly prayer.

We are God's experiment. For one hundred years he has been moulding us. Through crises searching and testing we have come. Men said the experiment will fail; you cannot keep a brotherhood together without external authority, or a fixed creed, or a common ritual. How proudly do we point to our history! What storms have we weathered! The great war, a rock of division to the denominations, how firmly held our bond of unity through that fierce and passionate strife!

And now we come to our Centennial. Our hearts feel that the experiment has proved itself. Union in Christ and liberty in Christ have gone hand in hand for a hundred years. Many types of minds have been brought into this fellowship in the hundred years. The thinking within the fellowship has changed much with the progress of knowledge. The opinions of the fathers are not our opinions. Nor are our opinions more unlike one another's than were theirs among themselves. But their faith is our faith. Various types of worship have been developed among us. Some worship by a well-ordered ritual, others by a service plain and severe, or informal and revivalistic. Recognizing the inevitable disagreements in taste and opinion we have jealously guarded the right of each individual to define for himself his creed so long as he maintained vital, personal faith in the personal Christ.

Our Centennial is not just an anniversary. It marks God's coming into his laboratory to examine his experiment for the last time, ere he offers it to his divided disciples as containing the principle of perfect unity. Are a hundred years of union long enough to justify the Master of the laboratory? Are we ready to be offered to the world as a model of union? Will we, the Disciples of Christ, stand the final test?

Will the Master of the laboratory fail in his experiment, in this the year of its crowning?

Salvation

Great truths, like human souls, are incapable of complete representation. The greatest painter of the classic age labored for many years to transfer to canvas an adequate conception of the woman he loved. She was his model and ideal. Her face looked out from every scene he wrought. Now she was a shepherdess, now a Madonna. At one time he painted her as a goddess and at another as a street singer. Yet he confessed that when his utmost efforts had been expended, and he had tried to catch every varying mood and changing tone of her rich nature, he found her still elusive and mysterious. He could paint her, love her and possess her, but could neither understand her completely nor by all the marvel of his art give her full or adequate interpretation.

It is ever so with the truths of the Christian life, of which the New Testament is the first and greatest record. Those new forces which Jesus brought into the world for the transformation and uplift of human life were so astonishing and inspiring that his followers stood in mute wonder at their results, or struggled with the weak instrument of speech to give them fitting expression. They clothed them in all forms of utterance. They exhausted language in the effort to make man understand. They approached them from this angle and that in the effort to comprehend and declare their many-sided beauty. Every figure of speech and illustrative fact was seized upon with the eagerness of those who realize that the utmost is insufficient. Every new aspect of the Gospel filled them with an exultation which made all words seem weak and little worth.

Of the least of the doctrines of grace this was true. How much more did language halt and tremble in the presence of the greatest circumstance of all, which was at the same time the most potent reality—the new life in Christ. They knew not even what to call it, and so they searched through all the Zones of Life for appropriate terms. It was a birth, they said, and here they had the warrant of the Master's word. In the glory of the new estate, they regretfully felt that they had never really lived before. From the darkness and limitation of the old life, they had emerged into the light and liberty of the sons of God. The most precious of human relationships, that of the family, was made to do service as expressing in some faint degree the marvel of spiritual life.

It was an adoption, they said, using the term which signified the transfer of a child from a poor to a richer family, a youth from an obscure to a noble one, a man from a subject to a ruling race.

It was a purchase, they said, by which the slave of a hard and cruel master was taken over to be the servant of the King, and when asked what was the price paid, they could only answer that it was the seemingly impossible price of the life of the King's son. It was an emancipation, they said, by which the slave was not merely transferred to a higher service, but was actually set free. It was a redemption, they said, wherein one who had been captured and was held in dark captivity, was ransomed back by the payment of an unspeakable reward, and set once more free. It was an acquittal, or justification, they said, in which the prisoner at the bar, charged with crimes all too capable of proof, was freed from chains and terror and given the open door to a new career of virtue. It was a resurrection, they said, in which the soul, once dead in selfishness and sin, was made alive by the power of Christ. It was a salvation, they said, in which the soul, in imminent peril of nameless and deadly dangers, was rescued by the strong arm of God stretched forth in the atonement of Jesus Christ.

All these, and many more, are the terms to which resort was made in the effort to declare the wonder of the grace of Christ, which had brought salvation within the reach of all men. Like all figures of speech, the apostles knew these expressions were inadequate to reveal the glorious truth; but they were the best instruments which the imperfect nature of language afforded them, and they took them up, one after another, hoping that through their variety and expressiveness some approach might be gained to the sublime truth of which they speak. They knew that not one of them or all combined, availed to set forth the spiritual fact of the new life in Christ. No term which denotes mechanical processes, physical activities, social relationships or political estate is competent to describe spiritual life. Yet all may have their value as approaches to the truth.

Back of all these figures lies the fact of salvation, which eludes all precise definition because it is so wonderful a reality. It is the soul's change of front. It is the bursting forth of new life within. It is the gaining of Christ's point of view. It is the coming of the kingdom in the individual. It is the realization of the divine purpose in human life. It is the fresh incarnation of God. It is the beginning of eternal life.

Similarly rich and suggestive is the effort made by the New Testament writers to set forth the means of this salvation. Here once more their vocabulary gives evidence of the difficulty they encountered. They are saved by the grace of God, they are saved by faith in Christ, they are saved by the blood of Christ, they are saved by the death of Christ, they are saved by the resurrection of Christ, and they are saved by his life. All these and more are the means of salvation of which the apostles speak. Yet they all point back to one central fact—men are saved, that is they gain the new life in Christ, by gaining a purpose and character like his own. Salvation does not lie in the belief of a doctrine—that is scholasticism; it does not consist in the performance of a rite—that is ritualism; it does not consist in membership in an organization—that is Romanism; it does not permit the substitution of Christ's sufferings for our misdeeds, nor of his virtues for our defects—that is commercialism. It is found in the actual realization of Christ's life in us, in the full measure of our capacity to give it expression. It is the spirit of God working in us the life that is also in Christ Jesus.

A Christmas Present for the Brotherhood

In all our homes and social circles the question of the hour is: What shall I give for Christmas? Among the objects of our solicitude our brotherhood should this year be given an affectionate place. With its century of history, its astonishing achievements in evangelism, in missions, in internal organization and in the production of men and women of character and leading, our pride and love for the brotherhood is obviously justified in the eyes of the world. But the deeper secret of our affection is not pride in past achievement but confidence that the plea of our fathers holds in itself the principle of the future unity of God's people.

As we approach the Christmas time our brotherhood is wrenched with internal controversy. The unity of our brethren is strained with recriminations. Unchristian epithets are being hurled at a brother by a newspaper that reaches many thousands of our preachers. Despite his many deliberate statements of faith and loyalty the paper continues to speak untruth concerning his teachings. In last week's issue of the Christian Standard another page of irresponsible protest was printed.

Is there any way in which the brotherhood can be told the truth? The Christian Evangelist of last week has broken the silence with some brave words. We print them for our readers in this issue. We will let them take the place of our pages of protest from the brethren, of which we have a basket full, and gaining with every mail.

Meanwhile the question recurs as to whether Professor Willett's own words shall be put into the hands of all the ministers of the brotherhood. The statement printed last week in the Christian Century giving to the friends of the truth an opportunity to send the Century for several weeks to all our preachers has already brought an encouraging response. Our purpose is to send to all the preachers as many issues as the money will allow, rather than to a limited number for the full six weeks. The offering already sent in is nearly sufficient to meet the expense of sending the paper to five thousand preachers for one week. It is our expectation to do this with next week's issue. How many further issues will thus be sent to our preachers will depend upon the response from the brethren in the next few days.

What better Christmas present can be made to the brotherhood than to circulate the truth concerning the present controversy to all our ministers. Christmas stands for peace among men. The peace that is worth while comes through a knowledge of the truth. Let us coöperate now to bring peace to our brotherhood by sending our ministers the truth!

Remember our offer:

$100 sent to us will send the Century for six weeks to 1,000 preachers.

$50 will send it to 500 preachers.

$25 will send it to 250 preachers.

$10 will send it to 100 preachers.

$5 will send it to 50 preachers.

$1 will send it to 10 preachers.

One pastor sent in a wedding fee yesterday. Another sent $5 and asked us to call on him for $5 more if it is needed. Our ministers will do their part. Our business men are being heard from too. The Century would gladly do this at its own expense if we could afford it. But apart from that the postal rules do not allow us to send sample copies to more than one-tenth of the number we wish to reach. Be assured that each week we are sending our share up to the limit.

No Conflict Between Religion and Science

The centuries-old question as to whether there is any really irreconciliable conflict between religion and science, or rather between the Bible and the teachings of scientific investigators, is discussed from a new angle by Rev. C. F. Aked in the December number of Appleton's magazine. Dr. Aked makes the point that the attempts to prove that the Bible does or does not controvert certain demonstrated truths of science rest upon a false viewof the greatest of books. There is no justification for treating the Bible as though it were a text-book of instruction in scientific knowledge. Its purpose is religious—to inspire the heart and soul of man and not to reveal to him the secrets of physical science.

"If the Bible is silent now as a science primer," says the Appleton article, "it speaks in clearer tones and with a more vital inspiration as the Book of Righteousness. It comes not to teach geology, but to proclaim God. The Hebrew prophets found in existence creation—story, myth and legend. They found among the legends of the Babylonians, the myths of the ancient Mesopotamian peoples, stories of Creation, of Paradise, of Serpent, and of Flood. These stories they made their own, stripped them of their offensive and superstitious heathenism, their polytheism, the childishness of the antique day in which they had first seen light, and set them to illustrate the surpassing greatness and goodness of the religion of Jehovah. Of all created things, the sea monster (the alligator or the crocodile, most likely, called a whale in the Authorized Version), is the one thing specifically named in the first chapter of Genesis until man is named. Why? Is this an accident? Is it not that while surroundng peoples might worship the crocodile, or at the least hold it to be a sacred thing, the Hebrew sought to direct attention to that great God, high over all, who 'made the great sea monsters, also?' The star adoration and nature worship of ancient Chaldea find their rebuke in the Genesis story which declares that God made 'the two great lights' and 'the stars, also.' To call the thoughts of men from the creature to the Creator, to set forth God as Supreme over All, to restrain men from worshiping that which had been made, and to fill their souls, first with wonder and then with love, as they contemplated Him who had made—this was the purpose of the Creation stories of Genesis."

As Dr. Aked explains, much of alleged conflict between science and religion comes from the confusion of religion with theology. Theology is itself a science in the proper meaning of the term since it is a systematized account of our knowledge of God. It may change and progress by reason of any new and true thought about God which any one of all the sciences may suggest, but religion is the same yesterday and today and forever, for religion is the life of God in the soul of man.

Side Lights on Serious Problems

AS SEEN FROM A BUSY PASTOR'S STUDY.

Among the letters which have come to the pastor's desk today, is one from the minister of one of our largest and best known churches. The author of this letter is a man of great powers and rare scholarly attainments. He is a man who thinks for himself, indeed he is a philosopher and is so recognized in the philosophical world. While attending one of the great universities of our country, he made a reputation for scholarship unequaled by any student previously attending the university. Moreover he is a truly great preacher. It has been the privilege and pleasure of the pastor to hear some of the great preachers of America and England, and it is his candid judgment that none are greater than the preacher concerning whom he writes.

With all his independence of thought the writer of the letter is conservative. On questions of biblical criticism he is especially conservative. He believes in the Mosiac authorship of most of the Pentatuch, in the theory of one Isaiah, that Job was an historical character, etc. He believes in the cardinal principles of our plea-liberty, union and charity—indeed so much so that he came out of one of the great denominations to us, being attracted to us by our boasted freedom, our much preached union and our professed charity.

His letter is filled with the pathos that comes from a disappointed soul—the soul that has been led away by a mirage that gave promise of being the coveted oases. He writes thus: "I feel that it is useless for me to try to preach in the Christian Church, and yet I feel I have just the message they need. They say I do not preach 'first principle' enough. I believe in 'first principles' but I also believe there are other principles just as important and perhaps more seriously needed by our churches. I would rather preach than do anything else on earth, but I shall not preach unless I can preach what I believe to be the gospel. I am going to be a FREE man and that is more than I can be in the ministry of the Christian Church."

What a tragedy in the life of any minister when he feels that the church of his heart will not receive the message which he has to give, and which message he sees with the vision of a prophet, is the very message the church needs! The church for which he ministers is so conservative—so sectarian we can say with justice—and he has been hounded so much by some of our narrow preachers—men who never went to college at all or little at most—that he feels there is no liberty of thought in our ranks. Oh, the pathos of those words "I feel that it is useless for me to try to preach in the Christian Church!"

But what a tragedy in the life of a church or religious body when it becomes so bound by the traditions of the past that it can receive no new interpretation of the truth! How tragic it is that men of brains and great powers are lost to us as a people, all because of an egotism which presumes and a dogmatism which declares that the final word hath been spoken by us, as regards all questions of interpretation, and there is no other way! May God help us to see the danger of such a course!

While we thus write a young minister has come into the study to seek help and advice from the pastor. He is a young man of promise. He has a good mind—one of those minds that seeks to know the reason for the hope that is within him and dares to think for himself. He has no place to preach and is out of money. He was preaching for a good church and was doing an excellent work. But at one of the preaching services a lady came forward who was a member of one of the denominations. She was a woman of unquestioned character and had long been a believer in Christ. The young preacher neglected to take the formal "confession," although she was straightway immersed at the close of the meeting. Because he had inadvertantly broken this custom, one of the elders wrote to a member of the editorial staff of the Christian Standard and told him what the young preacher had done and asked the editor's advice. This aged defender of the faith, replied that he regarded the young man as an unsafe teacher. Upon the strength of this high authority the young minister was forced to resign his work. And because of the brand thus placed upon him he has had difficulty in getting other churches to serve. He now is in straightened circumstances and much discouraged. He thinks of giving up the cherished desire to preach. This the pastor has discouraged with all his power and has promised to secure for him manual labor until he can find a church that desires his services. Does not this experience cause us to think soberly and earnestly?

Shall a young man of excellent character, high purposes, no mean ability and withal a devoted follower of Christ, he kept from preaching the good news all because he failed to take the confession of an already professed Christian? Are we going to lose our young men to the ministry because of the intolerance of conservatism? And what is of more importance are men going to be denied the right of thinking and the freedom wherein Christ hath made them free?

There is another letter to hand from a friend, asking the pastor whether he thinks Dr. Willett should resign. Just here we would like to ask the reader a question: In the light of the two experiences given above, what do you think the pastor ought to say in reply to his friend's question? Do you think that one of our strongest and most influential men should be virtually forced out from among us for the sole reason that he can not accept the philosophy and theological interpretation of other brethren? And just one other question, by the way, do you think the matter of subscription to a church paper, has anything to do with the present controversy?

As we enter upon our centennial year there seems to be a strange, yea, almost fateful IRONY hanging over us. If Bro. Willett does resign, then we go to the tomb of Campbell with an irony upon his great plea for liberty. If Dr. Willett does not resign and the Standard carries out its threat, then we journey to the last resting place of the fathers with an irony upon their plea for union. In the present state of affairs there is an irony on their plea for charity. In the words of Kipling we say:

God of our Fathers, known of old!
Lord of our far flung battle line!
Beneath whose awful hand we hold,
Dominion over palm and pine;
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet!
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

THE TREND OF EVENTS

The President-Elect and Speaker Cannon.

President-elect Taft is showing himself a man of conviction and mastery. His best wishers might well wish that he would be even more uncompromising in his dealings with your "Uncle Joe," for it bodes no good to progressive legislation under any kind of a compact with such an old-man-of-the-sea on the neck of government and the new president will, like Sinbad, doubtless wish he had never allowed him a safe seat astride.

Iowa's New Senator.

Notable triumphs for political uprightness are being won so often in these days that we are liable to accept them as a matter of course and allow the enemy to catch us napping in our eyries. Albert B. Cummins began his fight against the Clarkson machine in Iowa fifteen years ago. He was defeated often but never despaired until victory perched upon his banners and he was made governor of the state He used his position to coin the "Iowa Idea," which was nothing more than a courageous advocacy of tariff revision. This brought the entrenched "Stand Pat" element in politics into bitter and even calumniating opposition against him and lost him a nomination for the Vice-Presidency. But the independent voters of the state kept him in the state house and now he is to go to the U. S. senate at the psychological moment for tariff revision.

Judge Lindsay's Independent Triumph in Denver.

The most dramatic triumph for righteousness in the late election was the victory of "de kid judge," Ben Lindsey, in Denver. Elected as a straight party candidate, the politicians found him, like Folk, one of those respectable names they put on their tickets to cover iniquity who is man enough to uncover that iniquity. Lindsey became a fad among the "uplifters" and both parties found it necessary to nominate him at the next election. But his added influence made him a menace no longer to be endured and they calculated that a presidential year would anesthetize enough victims of partizanship to make an independent campaign hopeless. The judge's friends thought so also and advised him to surrender rather than to suffer overhelming defeat. But Lindsey is bigger than any defeat and too genuine to consider personal odds and advantages, so ran anyhow. He appealed directly to the people and his campaign is eloquent testimony to the interest and power of the votes of labor, the church, women (when enfranchised), and to the independent even in a great city. The boys of the city became uproarious Lindsey "rooters" and when the ballots were counted he was found to have more votes than both his opponents.

Confusion in the Ranks of English Liberals.

Interesting things are taking place in the English Parliament. Like all reform bodies the immense majority of the liberal party is made up of idealists of differing ideals and practical reformers with varying ideas. It is always difficult for these ardent souls to drop each his particular vigorous note of protest and strike a common chord of harmony. The result is that much that would be good for the common cause is lost. The large majority in the Commons is securely held together but the by-elections made necessary by deaths and resignations from time to time show how impossible it is to hold the masses together and the opposition candidates are being elected in many cases by the defection of some radical element that is disappointed with the apparent neglect of their favored reform. The lords have taken advantage of this condition to dare to reject the Licensing bill, the greatest moral reform proposed in England in a generation, and the established church takes advantage of it to obstruct the Education bill until it is now withdrawn, and entrenched aristocracy and propertied privilege in both dare the Commons to "end or mend" them—all because each reformer must have his own particular reform or none.

The Missionary Movement Among Laymen.

Boston has been enjoying a series of meetings by the Laymen's Missionary Movement. It was enthusiastically supported by the business men of the churches and it is predicted that the offerings will increase fifty per cent in churches contributory to it. The most impressive missionary undertaking of the times is this Laymen's Movement. It is enlisting both money and men and putting the whole missionary service on a high plane. It does not aim to organize local societies in the churches except as the Men's Clubs may create departments for its help, but to move on the men of the churches for enlightenment regarding the greatest cause of our day. It seeks to enlist their means in a way adequate to the greatness of the cause.

Labor Convenes in Denver.

The American Federation of Labor has closed a most notable convention at Denver. The daily papers' reports were inadequate and the real temper of the meeting was not represented in such reports as were given. It was a deliberative body of the utmost seriousness and with a spirit worthy of a missionary convention in its disinterested zeal for a great cause. Mr. Gompers was re-elected president for the twenty-sixth time. Dr. Buckly was right when he said that Samuel Gompers was one of the greatest of living men. No threat can frighten him and no emolument can deflect him. He did not "deliver" labor's vote in the late election and better he never presumed to do so. Ordinary politicians cannot comprehend a mind like that of Gompers or John Mitchell. They are advocates to be sure but so is the preacher and their cause is only less great. The probable secret of the labor vote was less Gompers' lack of influence than it was the "influence" of employers who were so un-American as to put "warnings" in the pay envelopes of their employes. No employer is to be condemned for stating his views, but any man is to be condemned for coercing by any manner the vote of any one whose position or welfare is at his disposal.

Mr. Taft a Teetotaler.

Mr. Taft is reported to have turned down his wine glass at a recent Hot Springs banquet and to have said he intended to leave it turned down forever more. He and the American people are to be congratulated. If only he will now refuse to put the glass to his neighbor's lips at the White House he will aid a cause that lies deeper than that of tariff or trusts. A band of Welsh singers recently delivered a deserved rebuke at the White House by refusing the champaign proffered them. Nothing would have better testified to Pres. Roosevelt's prescience as a moral reformer than would an act like this of his successor and a hearty advocacy of such legislation as that proposed in the Littlefield Bill. No single measure advocated by him in his extraordinary career touches the vitals of our nation's moral life like the current temperance movement. Several petitions were sent to the recent Federation of Labor convention urging a vote against temperance legislation on account of the number it throws ont of employment, and not one of them was even allowed the privilege of the floor.

Y. M. C. A. Invading Korea

The new Y. M. C. A building at Seoul, Korea, is to be formally opened this month. It is a great building covering the better part of a block of ground. The corner stone was laid by the Crown Prince who, in the midst of the ceremonies, gave five thousand dollars in cash to the building fund. The cabinet sent a like sum, and the Emperor later made a gift of thirteen thousand dollars. John Wanamaker gave a large sum for the completion of the building. Mr. Wanamaker has been tremendously impressed with the opportunity for philanthropic investments in the Orient since his visit there. Prince Ito said at the breaking of ground for this building, "All young men who obey the teachings of this society will become noble citizens." In the early days of the Japanese reformation this same statesman told the west that they wanted its science and arts, but had no need of another religion. Within the past few years he has repeatedly commended the Christian religion, and more—he has practically admitted that without its ethical code Nippon could not hope to hold what she has gained in civilization. The dedication of this splendid new institution in the capital of the land of the Morning Calm calls the attention to the progress of the Y. M. C. A. movement in the Orient, which we will notice in a later paragraph, and to the epoch-making religious renaissance which that nation is experiencing. Last year the membership of the Korean churches grew from sixty thousand to twice that number. Dr. Nevius' plan for self-support was adopted in Korea in the early days, and today eighty-five per cent of the mission churches are self-sustaining and erect their own chapels by donating the work of their hands. The mission schools are crowded and the converts, like those of the apostolic days, go everywhere preaching the Gospel. The debates in the Y. M. C. A. rooms at Seoul are described as being as exciting as a western foot-ball match. Association Men gives some of the samples of the questions: "Resolved, That sickness can be better cured by educated physicians than by sorceresses." "Resolved, That the Christian education of the youth does more to strengthen a nation than the organization of an army." "Resolved, That it is wiser to fight the drought by planting forests than by making sacrifices to the gods." All this shows how Christianity becomes the vital factor in civilizing a people.

Temperance Gains in the Late Elections

It is gratifying to find leaders of the Anti-Saloon League assured by the liquor journals that temperance legislation is in no danger in Ohio by the election of Judge Harmon to the governor's chair. The League did the very proper thing in supporting Gov. Harris for he had stood by them in all their campaigns and even became the avowed champion of county option. But it was not necessary, therefore, to think Judson Harmon became thereby the champion of the brewers. The people of Ohio voted for him for other reasons, chief of which was his sterling integrity, as set over against a corrupt ring all too prominent in state affairs, and the same counties that gave Harmon majorities are going "dry" in many cases. The same is true of Tom Marshall in Indiana. It is the fashion to talk of temperance reverses in the Hoosier state. But men who know the Governor-elect know him to be a staunch temperance man and as incorruptible as any man who will sit in a gubernatorial seat in the nation for the next four years, and also that he was known to be friendly to anti-saloon legislation before he was nominated, and that not one word otherwise escaped him during his campaign. Hadley's election in Missouri bodes well for anti-saloon legislation in that state, and while none of these newly elected governors may be favorable to state-wide prohibition laws, it is for other reasons than any love they have for the liquor business. Even ardent temperance advocates may differ as to the wisest measures to be urged at any one stated time. That the League in Illinois made a serious mistake in circularizing against Adlai Stevenson is generally recognized now, but let us be wise enough to admit that the best intentioned of men make errors of judgment. Every man who does not subscribe to our written platform does not thereby oppose our principles. This is well illustrated by the defeat of all prohibition party candidates for the legislature in this state in November. The party leaders in their zeal opposed alliances with any element of temperance workers for the sake of sending men without regard to party to the legislature, and freely boasted that they would elect twenty-five prohibition party candidates to the assembly. It seemed to them much more desirable to have twenty-five party men in the legislature than to have the necessary seventy-six votes which will procure advanced temperance legislation, including a county option law. The temperance people of the state agree with their principles, but did not fall in with their policy, and thus none of their men were elected, though it seems probable that the seventy-six might have been had they cast their weight as a balance of power. With a division of forces the case is more in doubt though seventy-two can be counted upon, and the League hopes to find the other four among those uncommitted to any platform.

Church Federal Council

Nineteen Million Communicants Officially Represented in This Gathering of Protestant Forces.

Nineteen million members of Protestant churches were represented through their delegates at a Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, held in Philadelphia, December 2-8. Thirty-four of the principal religious denominations of the country, having officially approved the plan of federation which was proposed at the Inter-Church Conference in New York three years ago, the plan became operative and the organization perfected, which interests directly between forty and fifty million people, or more than half of the population of the United States. While less than a fifth of the religious bodies of America have adapted the plan of federation, those which have done so represent nine-tenths of the membership in the Protestant churches.

The formation of this Federal Council is the outcome of no sudden impulse, but represents, as one of its leaders has said, the deep and growing conviction of American Christians. Leaders in the churches have been gradually awakening to the necessity of united action on the mission field at home and abroad.

They have also felt the need of united effort in dealing with great social and moral evils, as well as in developing institutions for good. From time to time this conviction has been registered in conferences and in conventions. Many movements have contributed to the general result. The Evangelical Alliance, Christian Associations for young men and young women, the Open and Institutional Church League, local and state federations and commissions have all had an effect, which culminated, first in the National Federation of Churches and Christian Workers, later in the Inter-Church Conference, and now in the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America as the new organization is called.

The Council opened with a session in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, which filled the auditorium, a thousand singers aiding in the welcome. The men in the choir were seated in the form of a cross, while the women, in white, were the background. William Henry Roberts, D. D., the permanent Chairman of the Inter-Church Conference, presided and outlined the purposes of the Council and the principles for which it stands. Dr. Roberts has been active in the work of the Federation and as Chairman of the Executive Committee, has aided in formulating the business of the convention in his characteristic manner: no detail has been overlooked. Two pastors of Philadelphia, Rev. George E. Rees, D. D., Baptist, and the Rev. Stephen W. Dana, D. D., Presbyterian gave a hearty welcome to the delegates, and responses were made by two New York pastors, the Rev. Wallace MacMullen, D. D., Methodist, and the Rev. A. J. Lyman, D. D., Congregational.

The business sessions have been held in the Witherspoon Building, beginning on Thursday morning, with a report from the Executive Committee read by Dr. Roberts; a record of the work accomplished during the three years presented by the Rev. E. B. Sanford, D. D., Corresponding Secretary, and a report by the Treasurer, Albert R. Kimball. While it is asserted widely, and generally believed that this movement is of the Lord, and that men do not deserve special credit for what has been accomplished, one exception must be conceded. For many years Dr. Sanford has been active in Federation work and his energy and devotion to the cause of bringing the churches into line for service has evoked many expressions of admiration. It is a great pleasure to see this venerable Secretary, whose gray hairs are indeed a crown of glory, enjoying the fruits of arduous labors, even self-sacrificing toil, runing back over many years.

Bishop E. R. Hendrix of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was elected President of the Council for the quadrennium until the next meeting. Dr. Sanford was re-elected Corresponding Secretary, the Rev. Rivington D. Lord, D. D., Recording Secretary, and Mr. Kimball, Treasurer.

The subject of the relations of the Federal Council to Interdenominational Organizations, was presented by the Rev. Ame Vennema, D. D., of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, and resolutions were adopted approving these organizations, which have prepared the way for the broader co-operative work of the Federal Council and have formed the basis for the practicability and the wisdom of Federated Christian enterprise. The Council recognizes them as an integral part of the Church, but its plan of work will probably make unnecessary any further increase in the number of these organizations. All agencies asking regular financial assistance from the churches, are requested henceforth to file with the Executive Committee an annual statement of receipts and expenditures with a brief outline of methods employed.

That foreign missionaries have led the van of interdenominational co-operation was made clear by the Rev. James L. Barton, D. D., Secretary of the American Board in his report on Co-operation in the Foreign Mission Field. A few out of many striking instances of denominational counsel and co-operation in the foreign field were recited, including interdenominational conferences and the formation of native churches in China, Japan, India and elsewhere.

Resolutions of sympathy and approval were adopted, especially one to the effect that the Council recognizes with joy the tendency to Christian unity in non-Christian lands, and hopes that it may be practicable to establish native undenominational union churches in each of such lands.

The meetings of Thursday evening, held in Witherspoon Hall and in three churches, were devoted to the same subject, and by the eloquence and large information of speakers, especially of Dr. A. S. Lloyd, Secretary of the Protestant Episcopal, and Mr. Robert E. Speer, Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, went far to convince the public mind that foreign missionaries, far from being narrowly conservative and behind the times, are leading the van of progress in this respect.

The three related subjects of "State Federations," "Organization and Development" and "Maintenance" were presented on Friday morning. Experience since 1890 in Maine and later experiences elsewhere, have proved the value of State Federation. They are, in fact, the essential arm of the Federal Union of the churches. Responsibility is the watchword, the duty of some church to be responsible for every square mile of territory, of providing that no district shall be over-churched, of bringing all forces of Christianity to bear upon local or national evils. The present movement toward prohibition, for example, could sweep the liquor traffic out of this country in less than five years, if the federated churches of America should put their strength behind it.

Co-operation in Home Missions was ably presented by the Rev. Prof. Edgar P. Hill, D. D., of McCormick Seminary, and the discussion which followed, with the unanimous adoption of the resolutions offered, showed that the mind of the church is united to do away with the waste and wrong of denominational rivalry. In a brief but eloquent speech Dr. Charles L. Thompson of the Presbyterian Home Board, showed how perfect comity has prevailed in Alaska for a quarter of a century, and prevails now in Porto Rico and the Philippines.

The subject of most commanding interest thus far presented was doubtless the report on the church and modern industry, presented on Friday afternoon by the Rev. Frank Mason North, D. D., of New York. It is a subject with which all thoughtful Christians are now concerning themselves. Dr. North's presentation of it was admirable. The discussion was highly animated. Several of the resolutions were unanimously adopted. The most constructive action taken in this matter was the proposition for a commission on the church and social service, to represent this Council, to cooperate with similar church organizations, and in general to afford by its action and utterance an expression of the purpose of the Churches of Christ in the United States to recognize the import of the present social movement and industrial service and to cooperate in all practicable ways to secure a better understanding and a more natural relationship between working men and the church.

The people of Philadelphia have risen to the occasion of entertaining the delegates with a royal hospitality. One hundred and forty-six churches have also opened their pulpits to the ministerial delegates for the Sunday services, while committees chosen from all the denominations have aided in making the visitors feel the importance of their mission here and in the decades to come.

An Editor Speaks Out Plainly

FROM THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST OF LAST WEEK.

A correspondent writes wishing to know if it is true, as it appears from the protests which he sees printed in The Christian Standard, that the Centennial committee has placed on its Centennial program an "infidel," or one who denies the divinity of Christ and the inspiration and authority of the Bible. The question is pertinent and important. Our answer is, in behalf of the Centennial committee, that it has done nothing of the kind, if it knows what it has done. We guarantee that the committee will unanimously request the resignation of any man on that program who can be shown to be an infidel or a disbeliever in the deity and Lordship of Jesus Christ, or who denies the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures. If he should refuse to resign, we guarantee that the committee will declare his place vacant, and will fill it with a believer.

What, then, is the obvious course for those brethren to pursue who charge the committee with having appointed such a man on its program? They should take steps at once to ascertain whether the man, or the men they have in view fill the description above given. Prof. Willett, who is the one usually named as denying these truths, has just made a statement through The Christian Century, answering these charges, and setting forth his real position. In all fairness the Christian Standard ought to publish at least the substance of this statement. Referring to the Four Gospels, he says:

"I accept their statements regarding the birth, youth, ministry, miracles, teachings, character and purpose of Jesus. I believe the book of Acts to be a reliable record of the origin of the Christian Society, and especially as illuminated by the epistles of Paul, an authentic narration of that apostle's ministry. * * *

"But what I wish to affirm with emphasis is my belief that the New Testament, whatever its origin and literary history, is a collection of documents with a single message—Jesus is the Son of God, the word made flesh, the revelation of the Father's life, and thus our only sufficient interpreter of the nature and purpose of God. Jesus has made to the world a disclosure of the true life of a child of God and by his sacrificial life and death has shown how men may live in relations of sonship and happiness with God. The Gospel is the 'good news' of this way of restoring men to filial estate, and the message of Christ, wherever proclaimed and tried, has proved its divine nature and power. The New Testament did not create the church, but it is its most precious possession as the record of its beginnings and of the teachings of the Master which are the norm of Christian life."

Of course, if one wishes to form his estimate of Prof. Willett's views from the garbled report of the daily papers rather than from his own deliberate explanation of his position, the foregoing extracts will be lightly dismissed as unconvincing; but fair-minded brethren, who wish to know the exact truth, will be disposed to accept the Professor's own statements at their face value, and judge him accordingly. Prof. Willett has an article defining his view of our religious movement, which would be acceptable in any of our religious conventions, and which, as a matter of fact, has been presented in substance and received with enthusiasm by such conventions. At the meeting of the Centennial committee at Pittsburg, before the vote was taken on his retention on the program, Prof. Willett declared that he "accepts not only the inspiration of the Scriptures, but their plenary inspiration; that he accepts the atonement and all the facts of our faith, including the miracles of the New Testament and the divine character of our Lord."

Now, if the brethren who are so free in making their "protests" will ask themselves, seriously, whether a committee charged with the duty of preparing a program that would represent all classes of our people, would be justified in rejecting, on account of his opinions, one who can make the foregoing declaration of faith, they will realize the situation. Would that course have been consistent with the position of the Declaration and Address, the centennial of which we are to celebrate? If those brethren would think more clearly and a little more deeply they would realize the responsibility which the committee faced, and be less free in their criticisms.

It is idle for our Cincinnati contemporary to go on publishing "protests" against placing an "infidel" on the Centennial program. If these protests are to be continued, let it be explained that they are directed against men who, while accepting the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures, and the divinity and Lordship of Jesus, with all that the New Testament says of him, hold some views of historical criticism which these protesters can not accept. If these statements of Prof. Willett do not satisfy these protesting brethren, let them nominate a court of inquiry to ascertain whether or not his religious position excludes him from our fellowship and from a right to appear on the program of our conventions. In all consistency, they cannot continue to criticize the committee's action without adopting some means of determining whether Prof. Willett is guilty as charged.

Let it be remembered that the question is not whether Prof. Willett's views of historical criticism are true or not, but whether one holding to his faith in Christ and the authority of the Scriptures as he declares he does, and maintaining a Christian character, which even Prof. Willett's critics will not deny, is entitled to our recognition as a Christian brother, and to be treated as such, even though his opinions of biblical criticism may not harmonize with ours. That question goes to the very foundation of our plea for Christian union. We can not, we must not evade it.

Reversion To Type

By F. L. Moffett.

One who studies the laws of progress should give as much attention to the principle of reversion to type as to the laws of development. If we neglect the flower of the garden it becomes a less beautiful flower. The birds and all animal life are subject to the same law of degeneration. The individual who does not guard his physical, intellectual and spiritual welfare carefully will find a process of degeneration taking place in his life. For this reason we should guard our thoughts, and ask concerning the type of thought we are thinking. This is especially true in a theological sense. Many good men seemingly, unconsciously revert to a type of thought which would have adorned the middle ages.

Liberty is a plant which has grown through many centuries. It is a result of the struggle, bloodshed and persecution of past centuries. Intolerance is especially characteristic of past centuries, and persecution was a result of intolerance. In those darker times difference of opinion on matters of religion could not be permitted under any circumstances. Superior strength, and the use of the sword resulted in apparent uniformity of belief. Freedom of thought was suppressed. Iittle progress was made. However, the spirit of liberty only waited an opportunity for expression, and that time in the providence of God came. And yet, notwithstanding the evolution of liberty of which the Disciples of Christ are the best example, we find examples of reversion to an earlier type, even among them. The spirit of intolerance, which was so characteristic of earlier ages, finds reincarnation in the twentieth century.

It rather makes one smile, even though it is a serious matter, to hear would-be leaders of a free people say that the expression of a view concerning the book of Jonah, which does not have the stamp of McGarvey upon it, would drive many of the congregation away. One could scarcely think this true of any representative congregation in the brotherhood. But suppose that such is the case, how was such a spirit of intolerance cultivated? The dogmatism which assumes that there can not possibly be any difference of opinion concerning the book of Jonah, or that to interpret it literally is infallibly correct, is certainly refreshing. The assumption that because Jesus referred to Jonah and the fish the whole thing must be taken literally might be satisfactory if all could be convinced that Jesus intended to settle all questions of science or literary criticism, but it does not appear that he dealt with question of geology, astronomy, or literary criticism. In other words there may be an honest difference of opinion concerning the purpose of the writer of this book. One may think that the writer presents what actually occurred. Another may believe that the writer had in mind the great truths of God's righteousness and the necessity of repentance. In any case I should pity the congregation which became so intolerant of the views of others though they differ from theirs that it would be thrown into hysterics on hearing something different.

Then again I imagine many in the brotherhood, who have been thinking for themselves, are beginning to wonder about some of our colleges, and the spirit with which their sons and daughters come in contact there. Are the young men and young women going to come out from our colleges to think for themselves, or are they to have everything settled in the way that some of these good men are trying to settle things now. We had always thought that our colleges, even in training for the ministry, would be true to the modern spirit, but we have seen some indications of a return to the spirit and method of the middle ages. The years spent in college are most valuable, and should result in the fuller development of the mind and life. It is no place for suppression of thought. It is certainly no place for young men to be told, "If you think you must think as I do." If men presume to approach older men in that spirit what will they do with the younger of our schools? A university center should be an atmosphere of freedom in Christ. It should be no creed-making center. One is our Master and we all are brethren.

TWO PARABLES

PARABLE OF THE TWO BUCK-DEER.

I want to make this parable so simple and plain that even the educated ones and the theologians among us may understand it.

There was a certain man who had two buck deer in his park. One buck said the grass drew rain from the clouds. The other buck said the rain drew the grass from the ground. Whereupon the two bucks pawed a little at each other, stepped back a few feet and made a run at each other, whereupon their antlers were securely locked so that neither one thereafter was able to get his head down to the grass, nor to the brook where the pure water ran. They were securely locked in each other's embrace. After a few weeks they began to lose flesh, but that did not make any odds, for they had had their buck at each other, considering it far better to have run at each other and lost than to never have run at all. Years after some nimrods found their skeletons near the spring at the head of the brook, their horns still locked.

PARABLE OF THE FOUR APOSTLES AND THE DEMON.

There were four certain apostles who met near the city of Jerusalem in convention. It was the hundredth year of their work. Says one, "Let me tell you fellows how it is done, and he who would deviate from this is a divisionist and the scripture says mark him." Hereupon the servant brought in the poor wretch out of whom the demon was to be cast. Now, continued the spokesman, this is precisely the exact way and verily there is no other. Now this apostle tried and tried and tried but out came not the demon from the wretch. Says he, "lettest me have another whack at it?" Again, once again came not out the demon. He tried what he thought to be the true way. He had seen them cast out like this before.

"Lettest thou me take a whack, brother?" spoke up the second apostle. "Thou wilt remember that I, too, have seen the mystery performed." Hereupon the second apostle took his whack a good deal along the line of the way the whacking was taught in his school, but cameth out not the demon from the wretch. "The second whack is due me," contended this apostle and by a vote of two to two he was permitted to whack again even to the third and fourth whack. The demon remaineth in and cameth not out at all whatsoever inasmuch. "The fifth whack is most certain to demonstrate that I am right and thou art wrong, my dear brother in tribulation of the Gospel and so allow me the fifth whack at her, or else thou art a divisionist and rememberest not thou the teachings of Cammelzander." Again on a vote of two to two it was unanimously decided that the whacker should whack again once more. Out, this time, again cameth not the demon.

The third apostle in the convention up spoke he at this point and contended his day had arriven and his opportunity now presented itself. A little different curl and kink was embodied in his whack, but out again once more came not the demon. The first two apostles were shouting at the top of their voices, "verily, verily I told you so, whoopee, seest thou not that we were correct and you were wrong. We will put you two divisionist out of the synagogue." On a vote of two to three this time, he was permitted to whack again at the demon. All the time the poor wretch possessed of the devil was torn and lacerated, but the apostles had a plain duty to do and that was to show how the demon should be cast out. There was a little "scull-duggery," suspicioned on account of the vote of the three on the majority side, but then anything is fair when you are fighting the battles of the Lord, seest thou not, oh ye of little understanding? "Whackest thou righteously," interjected the fourth apostle who was itching to get in on the whacking business. "Yea, but thou seest through sectarian goggles, my beloved," remarked another of the apostles and for the moment the whacking was almost discontinued, but the moment returned and the fourth apostle undertook to cast out the demon from the afflicted one. "Why failest thou, thou who knowest it all, my beloved, against whom I have nothing at all that might be construed to be spleen," spoke the first three apostles in concert as if by some preconceived and arranged plan.

The fourth apostle remembered very well how he had seen the Master cast them out, as also did all the apostles now recall, and each of them loudly contended that it should be done his way and verily no other way would be permitted. "Thou shalt not, my beloved brother, slide down any more my cellar door, neither shalt thou be permitted to holler in the rain barrels of the great mass of the brotherhood over whom the holy spirit hath made me overseer and hain't done nothing like it to you." Things warmed up a good deal as a summer day in August warmeth up in the region of Topolobampo, and verily we're getting tropical, for which the brethren were paying at the rate of $1.50 strictly in advance but with a renewal gottest thou a fountain pen.

Long and loud grew the contentions, but outest came not whatever the demon. Presently a form glided upon the scene, a face all radiant with heavenly knowledge, eyes piercing with love and wisdom, and a voice said unto them, "Ye knoweth nothing at all. This kind cometh not out but by prayer and fasting." The form then disappeared. The apostles dispersed hating each other still more.

CHRISTMAS BOOKLETS

The Angel and the Star.

A little booklet by that prince of story writers, Ralph Connor, has just been issued by Revell Company, entitled "The Angel and the Star." It is really only a paraphrase of the Bethlehem story with which most all children are familiar, but it is told in such a simple and matter-of-fact way that the real beauty and power of the Christmas story, the significance and reality of the birth of Jesus, are brought to the reader with the thrill of a fresh discovery. This little booklet, tastefully printed, with frontspiece of The Adoration of the Magi, in decorated cloth binding at 50 cents, or paper bound in an envelope at 25 cents, will be widely used as a Christmas gift.

What Does Christmas Mean?

Another booklet of unusual interest, entitled "What Does Christmas Really Mean," has just come from the press of the Unity Publishing Company. A cartoon by John T. McCutcheon in the Chicago Tribune, with the beginning of the story, is taken up by Jenkin Lloyd Jones, who completes the tale. A mother tries to tell her child what Christmas really means,—and in response to his eager questionings, under Mr. Jones' skillful and impressive leadership, she succeeds in making clear the real message of unselfishness, of ministry, of care for the unfortunate and the suffering, of a life of love and service such as Jesus himself lived. The little book is beautifully printed and bound in colors and decorations. Although it has only been on the market a few weeks the first edition is exhausted and a second now ready. (Cloth 50c postpaid.)

The Ruby of Kishmoor.

For those who enjoy stories of adventure and danger, of fighting and death, no better story can be found than that of Captain Keith Pirate and the marvelous "Ruby of Kishmore," as told by Howard Pyle. An unoffending athletic Quaker merchant seeks something of interest in Kingston, Jamaica, and all innocent of guilt—or sense finds it with a vengeance,—kills three men in self-defense, wins a maiden and a fortune, calmly declines both and goes back to his Quaker lass in Philadelphia. The book is gotten out by Harper & Bros. in a style worthy a sweeter story, and will undoubtedly meet a ready sale. (Cloth, gilt top, illustrated, $1.00).

The Chariot Race.

No one at all conversant with Christian literature needs to be reminded that the story of Ben Hur by Gen. Lew Wallace ie one of the strongest books of the kind in modern literature, as indeed it was one of the earliest atempts to introduce into fiction the story of the birth of Christian faith and the early life of the Master. All who have read Ben Hur recall the thrill, as well as the portraiture, of the chariot race. The publishers (Harpers) have recently brought out an edition of the The Chariot Race printed on heavy paper, with illustrations in color, and bound in cloth, illuminated in gold, which gives a splendid setting to this stirring tale. It will be in demand at the Christmas book stores. (Octavo, 133 p., $1.00).

H. M. S. Pinafore.

Not a few young people and older ones, too, who have heard of Sir Arthur Sullivan's famous opera, but never had the opportunity of seeing it played, will welcome a readable story of "Her Majesty's Ship Pinafore," and that not the less because its author, Sir W. S. Gilbert, frankly tells them that this story "might very well have happened but in point of fact it never did." The "Pinafore Picture Book" is an illustrated story of the wonderful experiences of the captain and crew, and of the captain's daugter, too, on the famous imaginary ship of her majesty's fleet, the Pinafore. The book is small quarto (131 p.) illustrated by Alice B. Woodward and is published by Macmillan Co. ($2.00 net.)

Lewis Rand.

No one who has felt the power of Mary Johnston in "To Have and to Hold" needs to be reminded that the authoress of Lewis Rand is a writer of remarkable power, of real genius. The hero is a self-made lawyer, a friend and trusted lieutenant of Thomas Jefferson, and hence a democrat—republican opposed to the federalists. A Napolconic character, Rand becomes a great leader and seems destined to succeed Jefferson in the White House—until by that sin through which "the angels fell" he turns from loyalty and patriotism to seek "a crown and a kingdom" in the southwest—under the leadership of Aaron Burr, whom he expected to support. With the historic setting of those exciting early years of our history, and the rich background of the old Virginia life, its courtly manners, beautiful women, and ancestral homes, Miss Johnston has depicted a thrilling drama, a moving love story, and a pathetic, touching triumph of the nobler manhood, which makes the book one of the strongest—in some ways the greatest—fiction of the year. "Lewis Rand" will remain one of the masterpieces of historical fiction, a contribution to American life. The publishers have set it in fitting guise. (8 vo. cloth, $1.50. Houghton, Mifflin Co.)

"An Old-Fashioned Mother"

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

GIST OF A RECENT SUNDAY EVENING SERMON PREACHED IN THE FIRST CHRISTIAN CHURCH, BLOOMINGTON, ILL.

I Samuel 1:18-28; 2818, 19; 25:1.

This evening we turn to the long ago that we may study the character of Hannah, that dear old-fashioned mother whose portrait some nameless artist of the Old Testament times has drawn with masterful hand. Mother love must always remain as the greatest and most unselfish of this world, but it should be the holy business of every century to evolve a higher and still higher type of motherhood.

My purpose this evening is to show you this mother of the far away times in all of her old-fashioned and genuine piety in which she is an example and a model for the mothers everywhere and of all ages. This old-fashioned mother is first presented to us as,

A Praying Mother.

Her heart was full of that sincere religious feeling that makes prayer a perfectly natural impulse. Her desires were for a son and she sought Jehovah in prayer; she communed with him concerning this high hope, this holy desire,—and when Samuel was born Hannah continued her prayer to God for his guidance, for his right upbringing. A praying mother! What a radiantly beautiful sight! A mother praying to the Great Father for strength, for wisdom sufficient to bring up her boy to a useful and honorable career. If it is true that "he prayeth best who loveth best," then a mother's prayer must be the most efficacious of earth. What could be more beautiful than the old-fashioned mother praying for her boy.

Contrariwise, what can be sadder than a prayerless, irreligious mother,—a mother who never goes to God in prayer for her sons and daughters, never prays for help to rear them into manly manhood and winsome womanhood, a mother who never attends church or never reads the Bible. A mother praying for her boy! One thinks of that dear Scotch mother in "Beside the Bonnie Briar Bush," who, as the shadows deepen, prays for the heart-broken boy at her bedside. Prays that he may become a preacher and that in his sermons he may always say "a gude word for Jesus Christ." Do mother's prayers pay? Aye, ask John Randolph of Roanoke, ask the biographer of St. Augustine, ask the thousands of mothers now living who could give a gloriously great answer to that question.

The second beautiful lesson is that of Hannah's Labor of Love. The text reads: "Moreover his mother made him a little robe and brought it to him from year to year."

What pictures! First, Hannah praying for her boy. Now, this old-fashioned mother making him every year a little coat and bringing it to him as the little fellow serves Eli in the House of God. Ah, how much love there was woven in with the stitches into that little coat.

Is There Anything Too Good For The Boy?

There are some homes where the boy seems to be only by tolerance. Poor fellow, they tease him, they make fun of his feet that seem always in the way, and his hands that he seems not to know what to do with. And they think anything will do for him. And the "boy's room" in some houses is a sight to behold. If a chair breaks down. its destination is sealed. "Put it in the boys' room." If a sofa is worn out, if its rollers come off, and it looks run down generally, get a new one and put the old horrid thing in the boys' room. Let us be thankful that all homes are not so ordered. Like this old-fashioned mother many parents feel that everything that can be done to make the boy know he is loved and appreciated is a good investment, the kind that pays big interest by and by.

An Old-Fashioned Mother's Reward.

Aye, she received it and in good measure. Samuel grew up to be a lovable and a manly man. A prophet, a seer, a statesman, standing head and shoulders above the crude, semi-barbarous peoples of his day. In the midst of bribe-takers he kept his honor inviolate. In the midst of impurity he loved a pure life. How many times he must have blessed the memory of that good mother. In the later years of his life, Samuel must have felt the gratitude expressed in that fine passage by William Cowper in his "Lines to His Mother's Picture."

"My boast is not that I deduce by birth
From loins enthroned and rulers of the earth,
But higher far my proud pretensions rise,
The son of parents passed into the skies."

And as for Hannah, what more blessed thing could have come to her than this honorable career of her son, the boy for whom she prayed and whom she "loaned unto the Lord." No higher honor can come to any woman than to be the mother of honorable children. That was a fine sentiment that the late "Golden Rule" Jones, so long mayor of Toledo, O., telegraphed his daughter when informed a son had been born to her.

"There is nothing greater than to be the mother of a man."

I like to see women in public life. We owe much to such great souls as Frances E. Willard, Susan B. Anthony and others. But when the mother of Abraham Lincoln rocked his crude cradle in the wilds of Kentucky, she did more for America and the world than if she had spoken from a thousand Chautauqua platforms.

And when Susannah Wesley with her very large brood of little children set about to train her sons, John and Charles, and thus influenced their lives for the course they afterwards took, she did more for the world than if she had written a dozen popular novels that listed every one among the "ten best sellers."

The late Henry Drummond never uttered a profounder truth, or spoke so much like one of the old-time prophets, than when he said in the course of his lecture on the Evolution of Motherhood, "All the machinery, all the preceding work of nature is to the end that she may produce a mother. Nature has never made anything higher."

Thank God for Hannah, the old-fashioned mother and for every other mother who turns to the heavenly Father for guidance in rearing her children, and for comfort when God giveth his beloved sleep.

In all ages,

"A mother is a mother still,
The holiest thing on earth."

"I Know My Sheep"

My brethren, we do not desire to do wrong, but we do not think of it, and I repeat, what breaks the heart of any one, wife or husband, or mother or child—what breaks anybody's heart, who has a heart left to break, so much as indifference?

"By indifference I mean the not thinking what Christ wants us to do with our money; the not thinking what Christ wishes us to do with those abounding resources; the not thinking why we are cleverer than other people, or have more beauty than other people, or more influence or whatever it may be; the not thinking, and therefore taking the adornments, and taking the beauty, and taking the intelligence, and taking the whole that God has given us, and lavishing it—not on sin, giving, it may be, a hundred here, and a hundred there, perhaps a thousand here, and a thousand there—but giving it irrespective of ever having realized what Christ wanted to be done with it; spending it on the world and the things of the world. Oh, think what Christ feels, when He knows what He is, when He knows what life means, when He knows what eternity involves! It would be no matter if He did not love you; it would be no matter if He had not died for you. Then it would not grieve Him. But it grieves Him because He loves you, and because He has given you all this that you may show you love Him, and gladden the heart of the crucified King. He is wounded, not by the outside world—that He expects—but wounded in the house of His friends. 'It was not an enemy that has done Me this dishonor, for then I could have borne it; but it was thou, My friend, for whom I died, to whom I did give a Christian name; and yet thou didst never think how thou couldst please Me and gladden My heart.' Oh, my brethren, there is a life-long teaching in that word, 'I know my sheep.'" From the Invisible Glory, by the late Bishop Wilkinson.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Religious Controversy.

The Correspondent: "Why do we have to be burdened and harrassed with religious controversy? I think it is worse than prize-fighting. Controversy over religion is usually irreligious. Are we never to have rest from petty party strife?"

There is controversy that is right and controversy that is wrong. Most of that which is current is wrong and exceedingly regrettable. We might well learn from our Bible some needed lessons with regard to controversy. The Lord himself is represented as a Lord of controversy. In the wonderful sixth chapter of Micah is given the following graphic picture:

"Hear ye now what the Lord saith; arise, contend thou before the mountains, and let the hills hear thy voice.

"Hear ye, O mountains, the Lord's controversy, and ye strong foundations of the earth: for the Lord hath a controversy with his people, and he will plead with Israel.

"O my people, what have I done unto thee? and wherein have I wearied thee? testify against me.

"For I brought thee up out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed thee out of the house of servants; and I sent before thee Moses, Aaron, and Miriam.

"O my people, remember now what Balak king of Moab consulted, and what Balaam the son of Beor answered him from Shittim unto Gilgal; that ye may know the righteousness of the Lord.

"Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old?

"Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?

"He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

This call is a call to duty, to unsectarian brotherhood, and to a simple worship of God.

The most of our controversies have not raged around these; but around matters of vastly less importance. Jehovah's controversy with his people was concerning their lax morality and their idolatrous worship. The latter, too, had a direct bearing on their life. Our voices should be ever raised to defend "The righteousness of the Lord." Here, too, the Lord spoke out against the easy ways that the people had created for themselves to secure his favor. They had substituted for themselves things. What an illuminating word the prophet utters: "Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my first-born for my transgressions, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" We can conclude from this that we should controvert any vicious doctrine that leads to misrepresentation of the character of God, or that tends to take away all moral restraints to high living.

Degenerate Controversy.

But our controversies are far removed from these first principles. They have to do with the complexities of authorship and dates, subjects with which the most of us are not prepared to deal, and subjects, too, that are only remotely religious. A man does not need to be a critic or a historian in order to be saved; but a critic does need to be a Christian. Because of the ignorance of us laity the controversialists have wide room for creating a great scare and much prejudice. Just here is one of the great evils of religious controversy. Our religion is so dear to us, our faith in Christ so precious that we are ready at the least suggestion to eschew any one that is suspected of undermining the truth of our Christianity. It thus happens that often he who is trying to upbuild is labelled by the careless writer as a destroyer. The people who are not experts take up the cry; and soon great injustice has been done. A soul true to Christ is regarded as a traitor. There is consolation. The martyr of one period is often the saint of a later one.

The fire that burnt Servetus was the culmination of a bitter religious controversy. This Christian age has built a monument to Servetus.

Heated Newspaper Controversies.

The newspaper controversy is the bitterest of our day. Only at rare intervals do you get heat in a book. The book is usually calm and dispassionate. It tries to be fair. Of course there are some books that are not books. Some are newspaper articles bound. Why is it that the newspaper is so much more raspy than the book? There are several reasons. I suggest only a few, but enough:

The editor of the paper is not the author of books.

The owner of the paper is usually editor.

The constituency of the paper and the book are different.

The book is for the general public, while the paper is for the denomination.

I do not say that editors are not sincere; but I have not the least hesitation in saying that they are consciously or unconsciously influenced by their position; and that not always for the peace of the kingdom.

The Editor and the Scientist.

The scientist takes amazing pains to be accurate. The scientific spirit has entered our age. It is said of Robert Louis Stevenson that he went to great expense to correct a single error in one of his books. He had written that a particular species of bird was found on a certain island. Afterwards, learning of his error, he stopped the books on the press and had the correction made. One would think the editor would take equal pains to correctly represent a brother man. But frequently an editor will not even write a letter to ascertain "the other side." He wants only one side. Our religious papers often depend on the irresponsible daily press. It is only fair to say that there are editors and editors. But most papers are partisan. They serve a narrow constituency. "Oh, that my enemy would write a book," some sage cried. I would revise that wish by making it read, "Oh, that my enemy would read a book"; I do not see how any two men could be enemies after each had read one good book. But I can well understand how they can be after having paid several years' subscriptions to their favorite religious papers.

The Task Awaits the Doer.

While controversy rages the task is not undertaken. The energy is spent on that which does not avail. It is an anaemic church that is in controversy over the minor matters of its faith. It is the strong church that gives itself to the message of its great essentials. Is it not a sin to quibble before the mighty hosts of Satan? The battle is on. What if some one has come without dusting his armor; let us forget it and plunge into the war. Materialism threatens our age. No Protestant paper stands for it. Commercialism endangers. Every paper believes in something higher. Rationalism is a menace. All papers repudiate it. Alcoholism engulfs its millions. Not a religious newspaper condones its ruinous conquests. Licentiouness is well in the forefront of our sins. No editor would for a moment offer a word of excuse for this base immorality. Sectarianism is still strong. Who will defend it today? Are there not tasks enough awaiting our united strength? Let us be done with divisions and strifes over anise and cummin and give ourselves to the weightier matters.

The Souls of Editors.

Editors have souls. They are men of like passions with ourselves. They sing and pray. They have wives that love them; and children that climb upon their knees. They have near friends who see into the depth of their souls, and, seeing there simple sincerity, love them. Their faith must be sorely tried. They see the egotism of men. The self-seeking of some ministers is ever before them. The details of their offices crowd depressingly upon them. The gossip of the church must weary them. They need to be strong men. The big sun must seem good to them when they leave their offices. They ought to live amid meadows, cows, and flowers. They need room and a far sky-line. I suppose editors sometimes have misgivings. Sometimes, doubtless, they regret their courses; but human-like, pride keeps them from outspoken repentance. Oracles, I believe, never retract. I wish the editors would be more human. I wish one might know if they were happy. It is their inner thought I care for. The word they write with a constituency before them, is not of great importance. I wonder what they think of themselves. When they write do they sometimes play a game? And when they play with their children is it then they are really serious? A. C. Benson writes: "Cecil Rhodes, it is recorded, once asked Lord Acton why Mr. Bent, the explorer, did not pronounce certain ruins to be Phoenician origin." Lord Acton replied with a smile that it was probably because he was not sure. "Ah," said Cecil Rhodes, "that is not the way empires are made." Is the certainty of a newspaper sometimes the result of a plan to win an empire?

I think our brotherhood is greatly in need of another general Centennial officer, viz.—a pastor to our editors. I would take the position. The expense would not be great, and the results would be—well, that would depend upon the editors.

SOLOMON'S LATER YEARS. *

It is evident that the prophets whose account of Solomon's age is given in the narratives we have been studying, were profoundly disappointed at the outcome of his reign. They had counted much upon the promise afforded by his apparent zeal in behalf of religion. They could not forget that he had every opportunity to follow the admirable example of piety and solicitude for religion set by his father, David. It seemed, indeed, at the beginning of his reign that the worship of Jehovah was to receive his undivided attention and that the glory of the simple worship of the one true God would be raised to unimagined heights by his efforts.

The Real Solomon.

But it soon became apparent that Solomon was not inclined to take this view of things. It was not that he changed his mind after a few years of well-spent life. Rather does it seem certain that from the very first his idea of religion was too secular and political to ever meet the approval of the prophets. He was a man of great abilities, and these he turned all to the development of his kingdom; its commerce, its military strength, its friendship with neighboring peoples, and the splendor of its architectural growth were all objects of his profound interest. Religion entered into his plans precisely as other necessary features of public need. He felt that the people needed to worship. Why not make this a means of enriching his capital? Therefore he built the Temple which became the greatest building in the history of the nation. he knew that the people loved ceremonies and processions. Therefore he made the priestly order the most picturesque feature of his great court. Nothing was omitted that could give pomp and circumstance to all the life of that luxurious time.

Danger of the Open Door.

But the prophets soon became aware that religion was dying under this regime. They saw that Solomon was interested in the worship of Jehovah scarcely more than as a picturesque detail of the court life. More than this, he was indifferent to the presence of other religions in his realm. With that type of toleration which totally fails to discern the need of a pure and single-minded attitude toward God, he admitted with hospitable spirit, the worship of other deities into his kingdom. The most obvious cause for this change in the religious atmosphere of the nation was the influence of his foreign wives. But it must be remembered that Solomon's wives were only the essential links which bound him to the neighboring nations. Every marriage cemented a new alliance. The king could not well be friendly with his neighbors on political and military terms and hostile to them in matters of religious belief. If he was to admit them as commercially equal, he must also permit them to practice their religion in his realm. The policy of the "Open Door," which was thus given the right of way by Solomon and which, in older and more firmly established nations, is the proper attitude, was fatal to the young faith of Israel. The prophets realized this with growing alarm. They saw that the nation was becoming secular like its king. Shrines to foreign deities arose on the hill-tops around Jerusalem. It is unlikely that Solomon personally abandoned the worship of Jehovah; it was still the state religion. But his attitude toward other cults was so friendly that it was difficult to believe that he had not actually apostatized.

Popular Views of Solomon.

In harmony with this general view of Solomon's reign, the prophets maintained that after an early period of wise and devoted behavior his piety degenerated rapidly into heathenism, pessimism, and despair. Later Juddism took up this interpretation of his life and accepted the view of the author of Ecclesiastes, who employs Solomon as the speaker during the first few sections of his work. According to this idea, Solomon had tried all the experiments and found nothing of value. Life was not worth living. He was an exhausted sensualist, pessimistic, morbid, and cynical. No wonder that such a view gave admirable opportunity for sermonizing upon the awful danger of evil influences upon human life.

Solomon's Real Failure.

But the actual story of Solomon's career is even more full of warnings. There is little to indicate that Solomon ever changed his disposition or his practice. From the first he was a man supremely bent upon the accomplishment of his own designs. His closing years find him in precisely the same mood. Religion was no less a picturesque feature of his life at the close than at the beginning of his reign. But it had never profoundly entered his mind that the life of a devoted servant of God is the only happy and truly successful life. His father David had learned this lesson, and in that fact lies the significance of David's profoundly interesting and inspiring character. Solomon lacked it, and that lack explains all the coldness and fruitlessness of his career. He had no great religious convictions. To him commerce and prestige were far more important than faith in God. Such a career is predestined to failure, whether it is failure of swift catastrophe or of lingering emptiness.

The Prayer-Meeting

PROF. SILAS JONES.

The Men To Whom We Owe the Greatest Debt.
Topic, Dec. 16, Philemon 19.
"Self-made Men."

"Self-made men?—Well, yes. Of course everybody likes and respects self-made men. It is a great deal better to be made in that way than not to be made at all. Are any of you old enough to remember that Irishman's house on the marsh at Cambridgeport, which house he built from drain to chimney-top with his own hands? It took him a good many years to build it, and one could see it was a little out of plumb, and a little wavy in outline, and a little queer and uncertain in general aspect. A regular hand could certainly have built a better house; but it was a very good house for a 'self-made' carpenter's house, and people praised it, and said how remarkably well the Irishman had succeeded. They never thought of praising the fine blocks of houses a little farther on."—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

A Common Debt.

Ignorant and abnormally conceited men may have no sense of obligation to others for what they are, but humble and sane men gratefully acknowledge their debt to their predecessors and associates. Public speakers study diligently the productions of the masters of oratory. In every industry men arise who fix the standard of efficiency for all the workers in that industry. Music, painting, poetry, architecture, and sculpture have reached their dignity because artists have learned one from another. Systems of public education testify to the sense of mutual dependence. Now, if we are greatly in debt to those who have interpreted for us some part of life, what do we owe to the men who see the whole of life and share with us their vision? Whether they be artists, educators, statesmen, mechanics, or unskilled laborers, if they reveal to us the meaning of experience as a whole, they are our greatest benefactors.

Paul and Philemon.

"Thou owest to me thine own self." Paul had more interest in the spiritual welfare of his converts than in the benefits which he might receive from them. He was not a Dowie, exploiting his followers. Hence when he wished Philemon to do a certain thing, he gave a reason, that is, the command of right, and not the command of personal preference. The command of love and duty is one which every free man in Christ is bound to obey. We have no information as to the manner in which Philemon received the apostle's request, but we may believe that he was zealous to do all that was asked of him. The request to do what was right came from the man to whom he owed his faith in Christ; how was it possible for him to refuse? In some of the churches established by Paul there were men who gave attention to boastful pretenders instead of Paul but the heart of the church was true to Paul. And today the church honors men who care for souls. The mountebank has his day and ceases to attract even the sensation-mongers.

Paying the Debt.

How shall we discharge the obligation which we have incurred by receiving the ministries of men of God? The first duty is to carry on the work which they unselfishly began. "I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth," wrote the aged John. The old minister should have no occasion to ask that saddest of questions, "Has my life-work been in vain?" He should have the joy of seeing the churches walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit. But more is due to some of our retired preachers and their wives. They gave of their strength freely that the gospel might be made known unto men.

We ought to thank God that we have among us servants of God who dared to entrust their old age to their brethren. When the church has no one willing to give his all for the sake of the gospel, it will be time to close its doors and announce that it is no longer entitled to the respect of the world. But that time has not come and it will never come. Therefore the church is and always will be under the necessity of providing pensions for its old ministers. Thay may say with Paul, "Not that I desire a gift; but I desire fruit that may abound to your account," but they will add, "Howbeit, ye did well that ye had fellowship with my affliction."

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

LESSON VI. THE SCHOOL: ITS IDEALS AND RELATIONSHIPS.

1. DEFINITION. In the last few lessons we have been speaking familiarly of the Sunday-school as though we knew all about it. It is now time to make sure we do know. To this end we require some sort of definition or touchstone so that we may not confound a religious mass-meeting or juvenile menagerie with a Sunday-school. The Sunday-school, then, may be defined as that agency of the church which devotes itself to the systematic nurture along educational lines of all the people in the fundamentals of Christian knowledge, experience and conduct. Five points are to be noted in this definition each of which will be elaborated later:

(1). The Sunday-school is an agency of the CHURCH, not an independent organization that is granted the privilege of using the church building for its sessions.

(2). Its nurture is SYSTEMATIC, not haphazard and occasional; it is along EDUCATIONAL not mystical or hortatory lines.

(3). It is a school for ALL THE PEOPLE, from the infant in the cradle to the octogenarian; for those at home as well as for those who attend its sessions; for the rich and the poor, members and non-members, the neighborhood and the church.

(4). The object of its nurture is threefold: TO KNOW, TO FEEL TO DO.

(5). The object is further defined as CHRISTIAN. This implies that the personal Christ is the motive power of the whole.

II. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL IDEAL. The Sunday-school is a means to an end. It must never be taken as an end in itself, as is done by those who make mere numbers or machinery the test of success. Its ideal or ultimate end is given in the above definition, namely, Christian nurture, or training for well-rounded discipleship. This, it will be remembered, was the definition of "religious education" in Lesson I.

(1). This ideal is strictly EDUCATIONAL. It stands, that is to say, for the gradual unfolding of the spiritual life in response to wise and systematic training. It seeks permanent growth rather than spasmodic outbursts of religious experience. It adapts the truth to the different mental and spiritual capacities of its pupils. Its CONTRASTS are the hortatory method of the evangelistic campaign, the homiletical method of the average sermon, and the mystical method of the "retreat" or devotional service. These latter are not wholly absent from the school, but they appear only as part of its general educational scheme.

(2). At the same time the ideal of the Sunday-school is EVANGELISTIC. There is no real antagonism between the evangelistic and educational ideals: on the contrary the truest and most permanent evangelism is always educational. As an evangelistic agency the aim of the Sunday-school is not to turn out intellectual prodigies that can give the names and dates of the kings of Israel and Judah or draw from memory a model of Herod's temple, but to bring all its scholars into TOUCH WITH JESUS CHRIST for the redeeming of their lives. If it fails in that it fails in all. EVANGELISM THROUGH EDUCATION, therefore, is the fullest expression of its aim.

III. SUBSIDIARY AIMS. In striving towards this utlimate ideal the Sunday-school sets before it certain subsidiary or auxiliary aims, which, however, must never be mistaken for ends in themselves. The following are the chief of these:

(1). A WORKING KNOWLEDGE OF THE BIBLE both as literature and revelation, and the ability to draw upon it as the great storehouse of spiritual experience;

(2). Such an acquaintance with RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL CONDITIONS as shall issue in intelligent charity.

(3). The formation by practice of THE HABITS OF CHURCH ATTENDANCE, MISSIONARY GIVING, AND SOCIAL SERVICE.

(4). Some knowledge of the CLASSIC PRAYERS AND HYMNS of the church and thus of PROPER STANDARDS OF WORSHIP.

(5). Such an acquaintance with the HISTORY AND DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH UNIVERSAL as shall issue in charity towards all sincere truth-seekers and at the same time such an acquaintance with the TENETS AND HISTORY OF THE PARTICULAR DENOMINATION to which the school belongs, as shall make its scholars intelligent members of the same.

IV. RELATION TO THE HOME. (1). On the one hand THE HOME NEEDS THE SCHOOL. The latter supplements and organizes the home training, where there is any and where there is none, it supplies the lack. It provides FACILITIES for up-to-date religious nurture that in the nature of the case the home cannot have. It has TRAINED TEACHERS to supplement the work of busy fathers and mothers. In its larger life the "SOCIAL" NOTE is struck that is necessarily lacking in the home.

(2.) On the other hand THE SCHOOL NEEDS THE HOME. Without its co-operation the best results cannot be reaped. The great problem of DISCIPLINE would be already half solved if all the children were trained at home in habits of orderliness, reverence and respect for age. HOME STUDY in the earlier years depends more on the home than on the school. The parent who studies the lesson with his children is a tower of strength to the school. But the greatest benefit of all is when THE HOME COMES TO THE SCHOOL. Then the problem of attendance is immensely simplified. Happy is the family that is represented at the same time in the kindergarten and the adult bible class! Happy is the school that has many such families! There would be fewer losses to our schools during the critical period of adolescence, if parents took this more to heart.

V. RELATION TO THE CHURCH. The school is the TEACHING ARM OF THE CHURCH. It is its one avowedly educational agency. the importance of this is evident in age when home instruction and the teaching function of the pulpit are alike falling into disuse. If the churches are to raise up a generation of instructed and intelligent disciples they must do it through the Sunday-school or it will not be done at all. The Sunday-school is also the GREATEST EVANGELISTIC AGENCY of the church. The vast majority of the valuable additions to the churches come from the school. It, far more than the evangelistic meeting, is the regular recruiting ground of the kingdom. It would be well for the healthy growth of many a church if it applied some of the money spent for the annual "protracted meeting" to the equipment of the school or the payment of some of its officers or teachers. The Sunday-school is also one of the best TRAINING SCHOOLS FOR SERVICE. In it the young people can best be taught their first lessons in church work by being made ushers, messengers, class secretaries, members of the choir or orchestra, etc. On the other hand the church owes to the school the benefits of both MATERIAL AND SPIRITUAL OVERSIGHT. The pastor of the church should be the pastor or shepherd of the school also. The church should provide the school with well lighted and ventilated rooms with modern equipment and, wherever possible, pay for its "supplies," leaving the bulk of the school funds to be applied to missionary and philanthropic objects. It should pass on all its plans, encourage it in all proper enterprises, and be the final authority for it in all matters whatever.

VI. RELATION TO THE DAY SCHOOL. The Sunday-school SUPPLEMENTS the day-school. The absence of any specific religious instruction in the common schools, throws on the Sunday-school the burden of completing the education of the child; for, religion being natural to man, no education is complete that leaves the religious nature undeveloped. The Sunday-school, therefore, is pedagogically as necessary as the day-school. Both should work hand in hand. One of the greatest defects of many Sunday-schools is that their ideals and methods are too remote from those of the day-school. The result is that the children feel a sense of BREACH BETWEEN THE SECULAR AND SACRED which is often the first germ of the dual conscience and the "seventh-day religion." Child religion is not—and adult religion should not be—a thing apart from the rest of life's activities. The child should be made to feel that the study of God's word is as natural and useful as studying grammar and history.

LITERATURE. Burton and Matthew's "Principles and Ideals for the Sunday-school"; Mead's "Modern Methods in Sunday-school Work;" Trumbull's "Yale Lectures on the Sunday-school;" Taylor's "The Church at Work in the Sunday-school;" Cope's "The Modern Sunday-school in Principle and Practice."

QUESTIONS. 1. Why is it important to have a definition of the Sunday-school? 2. Define it. 3. Point out and explain the five chief points of the definition. 4. What is the ideal of the Sunday-school? 5. Wherein does it differ from other agencies of religious education? 6. What is meant by saying that its method is "educational?" 7. In what sense is its method "evangelistic"? 8. Name some of the auxiliary aims of the Sunday-school. 9. Mention some of the ways in which the home needs the school. 10. Tell why the school needs the home. 11. Explain the relation of the church to the school and give particulars. 12. What is the relation of the Sunday-school to the day-school? 13. What danger is to be avoided in Sunday-school teaching in this regard?

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

What Makes a Christian?

The plea of the Disciples for Christian union has all along involved a very perplexing question. Christion union has to do with the union of Christians. Before the first step can be taken in a practical effort to promote union with any body of religious people, the question, "Who are Christians?", must first of all be settled.

It is a question that belongs peculiarly to the Disciples. They can not escape it, because they can not, on the basis of their historic message to the religious world, escape taking an attitude toward the whole of Christendom, whose dismembered condition it is their special mission to repair. They can not ignore the question because they can not ignore the many denominations professing to serve the Lord in sincerity and truth, that offer themselves for cooperation as Christian people. If this message of Christian union were not an inseparable part of their faith and obligation, if they owed it no consideration, then the Disciples could go on their way utterly oblivious of the existence of religious organizations professing themselves to be Christian. But they have confessed in the same breath that the reason for their being in the world is to unite the Church of God, and that God has a church, broken and scattered among the many sects of Christendom.

It is rather interesting that with all the discussion of this question, from the days of the "Lunenberg Letter," when Alexander Campbell gave his answer to the question, to the "Federation" discussion of three years ago, no answer has been given with which all Disciples agree. Because there is not unity among the Disciples in their definition of a Christian, they are not united in their program of union effort. Some are willing to join in the Federation Council now in session in Philadelphia, others are not willing to join. This division in policy grows out of the difference in conception as to what constitutes a Christian.

No progress in the settlement of this question has been made since 1837, when Campbell declared that a Christian is "one who believes in his heart that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the Son of God; repents of his sins, and obeys him in all things according to his measure of knowledge of his will."

Historic Answers.

The answer to the question, "What makes a Christian?" goes to the very heart of the Christian religion, and is determined by the view one takes of the nature of Christianity, and of the relation of the Christian soul to God. What is this relation to Christ, or God, which we call salvation or justification or forgiveness of sins?

Without classifying the answers or identifying them with any party or period in the history of the church, the answers that have been given are about as follows:

(1) The relation of the soul to God is a confessional relation. Salvation depends upon believing the doctrines of a certain creed. God is not pleased and does not forgive until one subscribes to the creed.

(2) The relation of the soul to God is a ceremonial relation. Salvation depends upon performing a certain ceremony, supposed to have magic efficacy to cleanse from sin. The soul can come to God, enter into fellowship with him only through a ceremony which he or the church has prescribed.

(3) The relation of the soul to God is an institutional relation. Salvation depends upon membership in a certain church, outside of which there can be no salvation. God has deposited the means of grace with an organized institution, through which the soul comes into relation with him.

(4) The relation of the soul to God is a legal relation. Salvation depends upon keeping the terms of a contract or covenant, which God has made with man. This contract contains certain laws to be obeyed, to which are attached certain rewards for obedience, certain punishments for disobedience.

(5) The relation of the soul to God is personal, spiritual relation. Salvation depends upon the moral condition of the heart—the motive and attitude of the spirit in conduct toward men and worship toward God.

Jesus' Answer.

According to these various means of the soul's relation to God, a Christian is one who either accepts an orthodox creed, or performs a ceremony; or joins an ecclesiastical institution, or fulfills to the letter the terms of a contract, or possesses a right spirit and lives the right life. That is, one or the other of these requirements is made a decisive test of the Christian status and fellowship. Other requirements are also made, and probably none of the conceptions omit all references to a good life. Which of these relations is the truest expression of Jesus' teaching? In the light of all his teaching there can be but one answer to the question. Jesus was infinitely concerned about the attitude of the heart; the Pharisees were as infinitely concerned about the attitude of the body. Jesus was chiefly interested in correctness of motive, the Pharisees in correctness of ceremony. Prayer, fasting, and almsgiving, had no meaning or value except as exercises of the spirit—expressions of the inner life. "God is a spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." According to Jesus it was not a law, but a life that made a man a true child of God; not an outer ceremony, but an inner nature.

All human analogies must necessarily fail to express the nature of that transcendent relation of the soul to its Maker, of the Christian to Christ. "As thou art in me, and I in thee, that they may be one in us." Who can describe, what analogy, parable, or illustration, can fitly set forth the mystery of Christ's relation to the Father? But that is the very nature of the Christian's relation to Christ. Say what we will, that relation is a spiritual relation, in which nothing counts for anything with God but the attitude of the spirit, the motive of the heart, in worship and service.

Misleading Analogies.

Two analogies or illustrations have played the leading part in darkening the popular religious mind as to what makes a Christian. These are marriage and naturalization.

If they teach anything they teach that a man is made a Christian by a ceremony and a law, both of which notions were utterly offensive to Jesus. That is the way Jesus found the Pharisees—binding ceremonies and laws upon the people as fundamental religious duties. It was against such Pharisaic externalism that Paul was contending when he declared that "he is not a Jew who is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew who is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter."

The marriage analogy runs as follows: "As a man is not a married man though he may have love before the marriage ceremony, so a man is not a Christian, though he may have faith and repentance before baptism. In both cases the decisive thing is the ceremony. The real counts for nothing until the formal is added; thus the real is put at the mercy of the formal and legal, and Christianity is reduced to a legal contract. The naturalization analogy comes to the same conclusion. A foreign-born citizen may have his adopted country, may believe in the principles and constitution of the government, may be willing to lay down his life in devotion to it, but if he has not sworn the oath of allegiance and received his papers, he is not entitled to the privileges of a citizen.

And these two analogies are made to illustrate the conditions of citizenship in the kingdom of heaven, and to describe God's attitude toward the world. Both assume what is calmly taken for granted, that the kingdom of heaven is like a political kingdom (a notion in Jewish minds that Jesus spent three years in trying to correct), and that God is like a civil ruler. Both of these premises have to be proved before either marriage or naturalization, with their legal elements, could be used to illustrate God's method of dealing with men.

Anything can be proved by an analogy, if the right analogy is chosen. The Catholic Church has been proving, to the satisfaction of millions of people, that there is no salvation outside of that church, by using the analogy of Noah's Ark. The church is "an ark." As no one was saved outside of Noah's ark, so no one will be saved outside the Catholic Church. Has not even Peter in an epistle declared that salvation in the ark is a type of salvation by baptism in the church?

A New Analogy.

As a matter of fact, an analogy proves nothing. It can be made to teach either truth or falsehood. All an illustration proves is that the person who uses it holds the idea that it sets forth. Whether the idea is true or false rests upon other kinds of proof. It seems strange that the very analogy Jesus himself used to set forth the relation of the soul to God, is never used by legalists to define the relation. With ceaseless reiteration Jesus declared that God was a Father, and that men were his children. Is the relation of sonship and fatherhood created by a ceremony or a law?

Suppose we use the analogy of membership in the human family to describe the conditions of entrance into the kingdom of God—which is just as scriptural an analogy as marriage or naturalization. Throughout the New Testament the terms of fatherhood and sonship are constantly used. In one place it is "being born again"; in another "being begotten," or "the whole family in heaven and earth," or "if children, then heirs," etc. Christians are born into the kingdom of God.

If conversion or entrance into the kingdom is a birth, then it does not depend upon a ceremony or a process of law, but upon a process of nature. A man is made a Christian, then, by nature and being, not by law or ceremony.

Suppose a manlike ape, one of the anthropoids, should present himself for membership in the human family; could the performance of any ceremony or obedience to any statute make him a human being? Try to put him through the process of naturalization into the human race; dress him up in human clothes, shave his face, and put a cane in his hand; teach him to make his mark with a pen and bring him before the court to sign his naturalization papers.

The Gospel of the Helping Hand

By Charles Reign Scoville

THIS PASSIONATE APPEAL OF THE EVANGELIST ON BEHALF OF THE GREAT HUMANE ENTERPRISE OF OUR BROTHERHOOD DREW ONE OF THE LARGEST DAYTIME AUDIENCES AT NEW ORLEANS. TO MANY IT WAS A DISCLOSURE OF A NEW BUT NOT LESS CHARACTERISTIC QUALITY OF DR. SCOVILLE'S PERSONALITY.

It may seem strange indeed to many of you that an Evangelist should be called in from the midst of the battle, from the very front of the firing line, to speak in behalf of the National Benevolent Association, to present the sacred appeal of the weak and the helpless, of the aged and the infant, before this Convention and through the Convention to our great brotherhood. But a moment's reflection will cause you to see that this is not only the very thing that the Evangelist, but every other man in our great religious battle should be called in to do. Whether pleading for college endowment, Church Extension, Home or Foreign Missions, or world wide C. W. B. M. work we should not forget this grace also—to present the highest and holiest claims of humanity, the gospel of the Helping Hand. We are not only the heirs of the past, but we are also the trustees of the future. It is not enough to simply give material expression to the generation passing, but we must also remember our tremendous responsibility to the generation just coming.

President Garfield said: "The dead do not need us, but we forever and forever, need the memories of the dead." I am inclined to think that howsoever great may be the need of the aged and the children our need of them and the Church's need of them is vastly greater. The danger is not that we shall fail to appreciate the fathers and mothers of the Church, or that we should forget the tottering steps of those near the cradle, as well as those near the grave, or rather those near the Great White Throne,—the real danger lies in this, that we are not apt to give the proper expression to our feelings. We are not apt to give the proper emphasis to this most sacred work, nor to give it the proper place in the program of our Churches each year. The shepherds found angels at the manger and the disciples found angels at the grave and He who made His angels ministering spirits said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me," and He also said: "In my Father's house are many mansions." I am not here to say that we should do less for Home or Foreign Missions, Church Extension, College Endowment, or C. W. B. M. work, but I am here to say that we should do more for this tenderest and holiest work; and that by so doing we shall practice religious economy, accelerate the work of every interest presented in this Convention, and also make our most powerful appeal to the world.

When Jesus beheld how the religious leaders of his day, the Scribes and Pharaisees, sat in Moses' seat and were so exceedingly zealous in giving "tithes of mint, anise and cummin," and noted how they "omitted the weightier matters of the law,—justice, mercy and faith," he rebuked them in words which should be indelibly written across the sky: "These things ought ye to have done, and not to have left the other undone."

The circumstances under which our movement was born, the purpose for which we came into existence, and the obstacles which we have met have from the very first shaped our plans and practically marked out our path. Our growth has been natural, our progress has been marvelous and our victories in helping shape and mould religious world sentiment have been phenomenal. The only danger of our becoming a disappearing brotherhood as I see it, is that the whole religious world shall snatch up our own shibboleth our own mottoes and our own aims and carry them on to fruition. Should that come to pass we can exultantly proclaim: "To this end were we born and for this purpose came we into this world."

When I meditate upon the great, dark, yet ripe, fruitful mission fields beyond the seas and when I practice the presence of the Master and realize the permanency of the great commission, every itom and every atom of my make-up seems to be surcharged with the word "Go." He who promised to be with us always is with us here. He stands as much in our presence, as he stood before the first disciples. He is still clothed with "all authority." With that indescribable look and with that unspeakable intonation, he hands us the Great Commission, signed and sealed with the blood of Calvary. I weigh my words carefully and speak cautiously, yet with all my soul I say I would rather be an embassador for Jesus Christ—a Christian Missionary to some dark soul, to some dark land—than to hold the greatest throne on earth. The words of Dr. Dye of Africa, the reports of Adelaide Gail Frost of India, or Bertha Clawson, of Japan, or any of their co-workers, cause our blood to boil and our hearts to tingle with rapture. Yet go to any of their fields of action and what de we behold? An orphanage, a bungalow, a hospital, or a school. If these ministers of mercy are essential in presenting the call of the Cross to the heathen world, what appeal shall we make to the unchristian civilized, or enlightened mind? Nay, rather what apology can we make for neglecting these things? Oh, my brethren, your mighty efforts in a foreign field, the carrying of the good tidings of great joy to benighted lands—"these things ought ye to have done"—but doing these same things in the home land "ye should not have left undone." The human heart is the same everywhere, and because I favor the plans and the program of our great and our blessed Foreign Society in their work abroad, I favor the heart touching work of the Benevolent Association at home.

As I travel throughout the United States and behold in every city and hamlet the marvelous opportunity of the hour for Home Missions, the fields white everywhere unto the harvest, sectarian walls crumbling, fanatical prejudice waning, sympathy broadening, coöperation spreading and love deepening, I feel that God has certainly raised us up for just such an hour as this. My whole heart turns to the Home Society and I would call upon the whole Church in every nook and corner of America to speak as one voice and say: "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." When I hear the call of the great northwest and see the open field in the sunny south and the incomparable opportunity of the eastern States, I feel surely to-day is the day of salvation. When I realize, too, that often our Home Society has gone into some of these fields with one-fourth as much money as some of the denominations and with this meagre amount has often yielded four times as many converts as the net gain of some of these other Churches, then I feel that the tithe, or the one-tenth of my income is far too small. Opportunities so amazing, so divine, demand my soul, my life, my all. I dare not only give one-tenth of my income, or one-tenth of myself, but I must give my whole self, to the Kingdom for America's sake. But from what angle, or by what means, are we to make the attack? What influence shall we exert, by what power shall we compel America to stop and listen to our plea? To all this there is but one answer: By the divine plan. "God so loved that he gave." "Christ loved us and gave himself for us." "He saved others, but himself he could not save." "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." The first emancipation proclamation for all sin and suffering was issued in Heaven.

The first Benevolent Association originated at the Throne. He came to seek and to save. He went about doing good. He did not say: "I have come to show you the way," but he identified himself with his message—"I am the way." He did not say: "I have come to teach you the truth"—but, "I am the truth;" neither did he say, "I have come to show you the way to life"—but, "I am the life."

"As long as the heart has sorrows,
As long as life has woes," this way, this truth and this life will be needed by the human family. And this only will strike the full octave of humanity and bring back heavenly harmony to the eternal soul.

If we would win the world it would be well indeed for us to take up our Cross and follow him. To remember the things which "Jesus began both to do and to teach." On the road between Jerusalem and Jericho, lies a blessed soul, stripped and robbed. Methinks I can see him now, with the dust of the street on his lips and the sand and the blood covering the wounds. The night is cold and dark. The night long he has waited and wept and hoped for a tender, helping hand. He will surely die if assistance does not come and that speedily. He hears a footfall. With pain and difficulty he lifts his head and his heart beats faster as he recognizes the dress of a priest. Relief is at hand; the servant of God is drawing near. Imagine his unutterable agony, for the priest is so anxious to conduct the worship in the great Temple, to go through stately forms and sacred ceremonies, that he passes by on the other side. The poor victim nearly faints in dispair and hope is almost dead, when he hears another sound. A Levite is also on his way to the house of God. He comes near enough to behold—perhaps to pity—but he too passes by on the other side. Let us be honest with ourselves—the priest and Levite are members of our Churches to-day. I fear some of them have been elected to the Official Board, called to be Pastors, or Evangelists, or the Secretaries of our great Societies. May the Lord forgive us; may the vision and the opportunity save us.

There is another footfall—the poor fellow, in one last effort, summons his waning strength and raises himself on his elbow, when the unlooked for and unwelcome Samaritan comes riding along. The Jews have no dealing with Samaritans—they are a despised people. He can hope for no succor from such a source. But what a marvel to hold. There is one power, there is one emotion, sufficient even to break down the middle wall of partition between the Jews and Samaritans. He alights from his beast. He came to where he was; he touched him; he bound up his wounds; he lifted him to his own saddle, and he provided for him in the inn. That Samaritan is our National Benevolent Association, and that Inn is the Old People's Home, the Orphanage, the Hospital, the Ministeries of Mercy, and that argument will win cold heads and hard hearts when every other argument on earth has failed:

"There is an unseen cord which binds,
The whole wide world together.
Through every human life it winds,
This one mysterious tether.
It links all races and all lands
Throughout their spans alloted,
And death alone unties the strands,
Which God Himself has knotted.
However humble be your lot,
Howe'er your hands are fettered,
You cannot think a single thought
But all the world is bettered.
Your unkind word, your selfish deed,
Is felt in farthest places,
There are no nooks where greed and wrong,
Can hide their faces.
There are no separate lives,
The chain too subtile for our seeing
Unites us all upon the plain
Of universal being."

"It may be but a cup of water, but a gently spoken word,
But above the gift is noted and the faintest action heard;
And the good that you do to another, comes back to you ever again;
As the moisture raised from the ocean, returns in the gentle rain.
For life is the coinage of Heaven, to be spent in the purchase of love;
Till all the realm of the earth below, is as pure as the realm above."

I would not speak lightly of "Our Plea"—nor belittle our doctrinal efforts, but I do say "These things ye ought to have done"—but not to have left the Good Samaritan Gospel of the Helping Hand undone.

(To be concluded.)

Bring, O Morn, thy music! Bring, O Night thy hushes!
Oceans, laugh the rapture to the storm winds coursing free;
Suns and stars are singing, Thou art our creator,
Who wert and art and evermore shalt be.

Life nor death can part us, O Thou love eternal,
Shepherd of the wandering star and souls that wayward flee.
Homeward draws the spirit to Thy Spirit yearning—
Who wert and art and evermore shalt be.

—William C. Gannett.

Love is a guardianship, no less than a passion. There is nothing in the world like love for breaking barriers. There is nothing in the world like love for building them. I think, then, that it is just because God loves me that He hath hedged me about, that I cannot get out.—G. H. Morrison.

(Concluded from Page 11.)

As he walks away with the papers in his hands is some blushing human maiden likely to cast loving, longing glances at him, as if he were some Romeo, and wish him for a husband? Endow him with vast estates, and invest him with titles of nobility; let congress pass a statute enrolling him among human beings, and vesting him with citizenship; let him be elected to membership in learned societies; will all this make him a human being, and give him membership in the human family? He must be born again.

No law, or statute, or decree, or ceremony, can make man of a manlike ape. It is not law or ceremony, but nature that makes a man a man.

Suppose parliament had concluded that Gladstone was not a human being, and had passed an act enrolling him among the manlike apes. Suppose his wife and children had also repudiated him as human, and had asked that he be confined in a cage along with other apes—would the people of England ever after have regarded Gladstone as a member of the family of apes? By birth, nature and being he was a member of the human family; and only by a complete change of nature could he ever become anything else. He must be born again.

The difference between the ape and Gladstone was a difference of nature, not a difference of state or territory or legal relation.

A man who has the nature of Christ is a Christian; he is made one by a change which takes place in his inner nature, and remains one so long as he retains that inner nature.

Fatherhood and sonship, birth into the human family—this is only an illustration; it proves nothing; but it illustrates my conception of what makes a Christian, and has the advantage of having been used before me by Jesus, Paul, and Peter.

The Revised Version has an exquisite touch, "Unto Him that loveth us"—not loved (Rev. 1: 5). The gracious stream did not exhaust itself at the birth. It is not spasmodic; it is unbroken; there is no abatement in its volume. The river of God is full of water.—J. H. Jowett.

I have been taught by this apprenticeship of life that there is, for me at least, nothing comparable, as a power to uplift, a power to inspire, a power to give you a cheerful countenance and renew your spirit, that gives so grand an outlook upon life and such a cheerful outlook in death, there is nothing among the whole realm of things comparable to the knowledge of the love of God manifested to us through Jesus Christ.—Jonathan Brierley.

The love that gave the well-beloved is no past love. The cross of Christ is not the high mark of a great love that once swept and surged about the world. It is the measure of the abiding love that ever holds us dear, the love that concerns itself about our every little care, and counts the common want a sacred thing to which he hath a joy in ministering, like the joy of a mother in ministering to her child.—Mark Guy Pearse.

WITH THE WORKERS

Elmore Sinclair of Watseka is helping Lewis Starbuck in a meeting at Pittwood, Ill.

C. B. Gould writes from Logansport, Ind., that he is open to engagements for January and February as song evangelist.

Evangelist Geo. L. Snively and Singing Evangelist C. H. Altheide are in a most promising meeting in Warrensburg, Mo. Geo. B. Stewart is the pastor of the church.

The Second Church at Milwaukee hopes soon to call its first pastor. The South Side Church has had two baptisms and one added by letter during November, and is happy in a newly decorated auditorium. Its new Teacher Training class numbers twenty-five.

The last three weeks twelve have been added by confession of faith at the Christian Center, Baltimore, Md., and others are expected soon. Several of the additions are the result of the institutional features of the Christian Center, conducted by Nelson H. Trimble.

F. C. Howe has just closed a meeting in Ft. Wayne, Ind., with the Chreighton Avenue Church in which forty-three were added to the membership of the church. The church was much strengthened and encouraged. H. E. Stafford is the pastor of the church.

Two were received into fellowship at Fitzgerald, Ga., Nov. 29, one by confession of faith and the other by letter.

"The Bible School Monthly" is the name of the new publication in the interests of our churches and Bible schools in Wisconsin. It is sent out under the auspices of the Bible School Department of the Wisconsin Christian Missionary Society, and edited by J. Harry Bullock, State Bible School superintendent, and pastor of the church at Footville.

Edward Oliver Tilburn has entered the evangelistic field. He writes that he endeavors to make evangelism spell education. This type of evangelism should be encouraged among the Disciples when there is so much tendency to return to the hysterical evangelism current in various denominations a generations ago. He may be addressed at 119 West Galena street, Butte, Mont.

Last Sunday the congregation of the Christian Center decided to "tithe" their membership for Christian service. Out of ninety-five members, eleven have responded and will prepare themselves for the work of the ministry or will go to the foreign field. This unique service might be duplicated elsewhere with much profit to the church. Our need now is consecrated young people to devote their lives to Christian service.

The tabernacle meeting at Salina, Kan., closed the last of November with 165 members added to the church. A member of the church writes with much gratification that instead of the "sects" having to start an opposition meeting, the work was done in such spirit that members of all churches could come and ask God's blessing on the enterprise. The evangelists were Wilhite and Gates. The enthusiastic business man sending the report expresses the wish that the Century might be in the hands of every preacher and says to continue the contention for liberty of the church.

Frank M. Otsuka, who was formerly a student of Bethany College and later of the University of Chicago, where he prepared for missionary work, is now in Japan, his native country, and is giving lessons in the Japanese language and preaching as opportunity permits. He has also a training class one hour a week. He could be greatly helped in his independent missionary work by gifts of old books, magazines, or religious papers, as well as gifts of money. He receives no salary and has to depend entirely upon what he earns by teaching either English or Japanese. He will be glad to acknowledge receipt of money and other help received through the Christian Century. His address is Frank N. Otsuka, cr. Koshikawa Postoffice, Tokio, Japan.

WITH THE WORKERS

H. W. Thompson has settled with the church at Rib Lake, Wisconsin.

H. F. Barstow has accepted a call to a church at Hickory, Wisconsin. His post-office address will be at Suring, Wis.

The church at Ladysmith, Wis., was out of a pastor at the last report. This church is located in the northern part of the state.

Charles E. McVay will sing for the church at Mason City, Iowa, in February. For later dates address him at his new home in Ruskin, Neb.

Dr. Albert Buxton, pastor of the Central Christian Church of Salt Lake City, preached the union Thanksgiving sermon in the Methodist Church. All five of the daily papers printed the sermon in full.

Edward Clutter has just closed a meeting at Cheney, Kansas, with 100 added to the church. He goes to Osborne, Kansas, for the next meeting. Churches desiring an evangelist may address him there.

A successful pastor of a good city church is contemplating a change. He has a record of successful work and large achievements behind him. Any church in need of a pastor may address the Christian Century for particulars and be put in communication with this pastor.

The First church at Bloomington, Ill., is in a prosperous state. Those who think that the mid-week prayer-meeting is dead will be surprised to learn that the average prayer-meeting attendance at this church for two months was 168. Edgar D. Jones, the minister, has a great hold on the hearts of his people.

The Columbia Avenue Church in Rochester, New York, is making some improvements in their building in the way of stained glass windows, a new organ, and decorations. A Junior Christian Endeavor was recently organized with fifteen members. There were two additions to the church recently by letter. J. Frank Green is the pastor.

We are the grateful recipients of a de luxe edition of the Declaration and Address put out by the Centennial committee. The edition is limited to one thousand copies and the possession of one of these books will in days to come be a matter of pride. We are informed that these books may now be secured through the Centennial committee for two dollars. Orders may be sent to W. R. Warren, 203 Bissell Block, Pittsburg, Pa.

The following note from the Transylvania University Bulletin (Lexington, Ky.) will be of interest to our readers:

"Justice John M. Harlan, of the United States Supreme Court, in company with Governor Willson, were the guests of Transylvania University Monday, Nov. 23. Justice Harlan is the most distinguished living alumnus of Transylvania. His reception by the faculty, curators and students was a triumph of enthusiasm, Morrison Chapel being crowded to its capacity. Justice Harlan was introduced in an appropriate manner by President Crossfield and delivered an address filled with expressions of appreciation for the training he received in the Law School of Transylvania, from which he was graduated in 1853. Governor Willson was also presented to the audience and made a brief but effective address. The occasion was a red letter day in the recent history of the institution.

"Justice Harlan, after seeing the character of the student body and the high grade of work being done, remarked that he wondered why we did not enlist the interest of some man of wealth in increasing the endowment."

TELEGRAMS.

Anderson, Ind., Dec. 6, 1908.

The Christian Century: We gave C. W. B. M. address this morning. Offering for society $167. Living link auxiliary of 180 members. Celebrated fiftieth anniversary of this church today. Joseph Franklin first pastor, T. W. Grafton last pastor, and five charter and thirteen other members for forty years sat on platform. Most excellent history read by Charley Cravens. We then spoke from Acts 2:41. Most impressive religious service I've ever attended. Poured rain at all three services today. Twenty-five converts, 303 in thirteen days.

Charles Reign Scoville.

Warrensburg, Mo., Dec. 6, 1908.

Snively and Altheide in great meeting here. Twenty-five additions today. Prospects are very bright.

George B. Stewart, Pastor.

J. N. Harker has gone from Eureka College to take charge of the new church in Montgomery, Ala. He will be supported by the Alabama State Society and the American Home Society. He has a good outlook and will give courage to the little band of workers in the undertaking.

Alva W. Taylor is holding a short meeting for the Mt. Zion Church near Eureka, Ill. Prof. Radford, who has preached for this church much of the time during the past thirty years ordained their newly elected elders last Sunday morning. This is one of the few country churches that has kept up its services and remained to bless its community.

The trustees, alumni, old students and friends of Hiram College are uniting in a thirty-day campaign for $30,000 new endowment. Success means the claiming of $70,000 previously pledged toward a total of $100,000. Since part of the amount pledged is conditional on securing pledges for the whole amount by Jan. 1, 1909, the need of prompt united action is imperative. Already $73,000 has been pledged. The friends of Hiram are rallying nobly and well-deserved success is assured if coöperation continues as now. This fine old college where President Garfield once presided, should be taken care of in a way to make the whole church proud.

The Young Women's Missionary Society of the First Church of Springfield, Ill., has undertaken to secure a list of fifty new subscribers to the Christian Century. They are allowed a percentage from the company and their profits from the undertaking will be used in their work. They are urging the people of their church to subscribe on account of the merits of the paper as well as because of the profit that is accruing to them. Other societies through the country who wish to have a way of earning money while performing a useful service to the local church would do well to write to the Christian Century for their proposition.

An item of interest not reported in connection with the 105th Anniversary celebration at the Central Church at Warren, O., where J. E. Lynn ministers, is the action of the church in the celebration in adding $300 to the salary of the minister and of the Men's club in sending him as a delegate to the Chicago Congress. The Christian Monitor published by the church states that there never was a feeling of greater enthusiasm in the church than at present. It augurs well for the meeting which Mr. Lynn will hold in the church beginning Jan. 10. Miss Edith Anderson of Springfield, Ill., will be the soloist for the meeting.

W. F. Turner of Joplin, Mo., has accepted a call to the Central Church of Peoria, Ill., and will begin work there about Jan. 1. He follows such worthy predecessors as Geo. B. Van Arsdale and Harry F. Burns and has a large field of usefulness before him and we predict success for him.

J. Harry Bullock is the new State Superintendent of Bible Schools in Wisconsin and shows his enterprise by issuing a little paper to help the work. The great North and Northwest needs more energetic men like Bro. Bullock for the harvest is ripe there and the laborers are few.

The good news comes from the Southern Christian Institute that the students and teachers out of their little gave over $100 for education in a recent offering and that notwithstanding their recent loss of one of the best halls by fire they have the largest attendance in their history.

The Volunteer Missionary Band of Eureka College is giving Sunday evenings to rallies in the nearby churches and interesting the people by the use of the stereopticon slides furnished by the Foreign Missionary Society at Cincinnati. They are planning also to spend the Christmas vacation in this manner. They now number nineteen and are of the very best students in the college.

The church in Richmond, Va., of which Henry Pearce Atkins is pastor has recently erected a $22,000 building, $10,000 of which has already been provided. The church will be dedicated soon at which time the plan had been made to raise $2,000 and secure a loan of $10,000. An offer has been made to the congregation to provide $8,000 in a loan at four per cent if the indebtedness is reduced to that amount on dedication day. Friends of the church and pastor are invited to send in offerings to be used on dedication day to secure the necessary $4,000.

H. James Crockett took charge of the work at Bartlesville, Oklahoma, last January. During the eleven months since then there have been forty-one additions, mostly by letter. The net gain is thirty-five. They have started a $30,000 building and have the basement complete. The congregation will occupy the basement Dec. 13 and proceed with the building further in the spring. The pastor has been called to remain indefinitely. Bartlesville is now a city of 12,000 inhabitants and is growing very rapidly. The future of the cause there is very bright.

From the Christian Commonwealth (London) we learn that a recent advertisement inserted in its columns by Rev. Leslie W. Morgan, general secretary of the Christian Association, asking for correspondence from churches and individuals interested in a movement to effect Christian union "on the basis of a return to New Testament Christianity," has called forth a large and general response. So large and general, indeed as to suggest that the time is ripe "for the formation of a 'Christian Union League' for the furtherance of union on right and practicable lines among all denominations."

The Church of Christ at Table Grove, Ill., has just closed a meeting of four weeks with Brooks Bros. leading, with an addition of forty-six to the church membership and a thorough religious awakening of our church and community. Rev. F. S. Nichols, the pastor is organizing a teachers' training class of fifty or sixty members to include many of the new and old membership. This is the second class organized here, the first having graduated thirteen members. Two elders and three deacons have been added to the official board, making a total of eleven. The work for the new year gives great promise.

THANKSGIVING ECHOES FROM KENTUCKY MISSION FIELDS.

H. H. Thompson reports 15 baptisms and ten reclaimed in Pike county.

W. J. Cocke was in the field 22 days of November, added 13 and collected for Kentucky missions $208.50. His meetings were at Pembroke and Rays Branch, having begun at the former place in October. His work was paid for and a creditable offering made for Kentucky missions, aside from his compensation.

J. W. Masters added eight and is now working in Harlan county to effect arrangements for Bro. Robertson to give his time to that field. He will begin operations at Hyden, the county seat of Leslie county, on the second Sunday in December with the purpose of organizing a congregation and building a house of worship.

During 25 days of the month W. J. Hudspoth preached 38 sermons and added 14, 13 by confession and baptism. He was in meeting at Sebree, Webster county, at time of report.

Robert Kirby added one during the eight days that he was able to be away from his home and his sick wife.

Latonia has been enjoying the help of A. M. Harvout in a meeting. A number of additions before he was compelled to leave—others later during preaching of the minister, Harlan C. Runyon. Some of the members added give strength to the situation.

Louis A. Kohler reports the work as doing very well at Bromley and it is felt that if the board can help them a while longer the work will be able to care for itself.

Raymond G. Sherrer and the Jellico church continue to work happily and hopefully together. He is supplying at Red Ash Sunday afternoons until a resident preacher can be secured.

C. M. Summers has closed his work at Jackson and expects to leave the state. We regret to have him leave Kentucky. He has sought to meet the needs of the difficult situation at Jackson and with some degree of success.

Twenty-eight baptisms and twenty-two added otherwise tell a part of the story of the results of the twenty-eight days' work of D. G. Combs. He was at Bowen, Powell county, with six confessions in two days, when last heard from.

J. B. Flinchman was patiently pushing the building enterprise at a point in Breathitt county, during the past month.

H. W. Elliott was busy all the month at home and abroad. $987.76 tells the story of receipts. Only one of the "living link" churches has remitted and that in October—and the church at Harrisburg. A goodly number of the congregations remitting have made decided advance and the indications generally are favorable for a general advance. Two district conventions were attended in Western Kentucky. We urge a prompt remittance of all offerings.

A trip was made to Brandenburg Station, Meade county, in the interest of the house of worship, advertised to be sold Dec. 7, for a debt resting on it.

Enough money was secured by him to stay the proceedings and to get an extension of time for payment of remainder.

Kentucky is Behind the U. S.

An appeal published in our papers a week ago brought responses from Mississippi, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas and Pennsylvania. Only one remittance by a citizen of Kentucky. Brother P. T. Cook, of Brookville, sent $5.00 and he is so far the only one in Kentucky who seems to want to save this house to the little band of twenty-two poor people at this Meade county village. The debt is not paid—we have just succeeded in getting more time—having paid part of the debt.

Are there not many other friends who will help to save this church property now. Will not many Kentuckians send in from $1.00 to $5.00—or even $10.00 each?

H. W. Elliott, Sec. and Treas.

ATTENDANCE OF DISCIPLES AT THE CONGRESS.

The representation of Disciples at the recent Congress of Baptists and Disciples was exceedingly gratifying. The following list is a practically complete registration of Disciples: Ministers—A. B. Philputt. Indianapolis, Ind.; P. J. Rice, Minneapolis, Minn.; W. L. Hayden, Indianapolis, Ind.; V. W. Blair, Greensburg, Ind.; W. D. Ward, Rockford, Ill.; Wm. Oeschger, Vincennes, Ind.; Albert Schwartz, Clinton, Ill.; C. L. Waite, Milwaukee, Wis.; H. C. Holmes, Fairbury, Neb.; Geo. T. Smith, Champaign, Ill.; F. D. Smith, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; W. B. Craig, Denver, Col.; G. B. Van Arsdale, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Bruce Brown, Valparaiso Ind.; S. S. Jones, Danville, Ill.; J. E. Lynn, Warren, Ohio; J. M. Philputt, St. Louis, Mo.; I. J. Spencer, Lexington, Ky.; J. T. Holton, Elgin, Ill.; F. W. Burnham, Springfield, Ill.; B. A. Jenkins, Kansas City, Mo.; C. C. Rowlison, Iowa City, Iowa; A. W. Fortune, Cincinnati, Ohio; F. W. Norton, Hiram, Ohio; S. E. Buckner, Aurora, Ill., Vernon Stauffer, Angola, Ind.

The colleges were well represented by the following: Pres. M. L. Bates, Hiram, Ohio; Pres. R. H. Crossfield, Lexington, Ky.; Pres. R. E. Heironymus, Eureka, Ill.; Pres. T. C. Howe, Indianapolis, Ind.; Dean W. J. Llhamon, Columbia, Mo.

The following missionary secretaries were present at one or more sessions: A. McLean, Cincinnati, Ohio; W. J. Wright, Cincinnati. Ohio.

J. H. Garrison and Paul Moore represented the Christian Evangelist, St. Louis Mo.

The following laymen were in attendance: C. H. Trout, Milwaukee, Wis.; S. G. Boyd, Covington, Ky.; F. H. Kaupkee, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; A. E. Jennings, Detroit Mich.; A. J. Elliott, Peoria, Ill.

Besides these who were present from out of the city, the local Chicago ministers were all in attendance at most of the sessions.

"Hubby," said the observant wife, "the janitor of these flats is a bachelor."

"What of it?"

"I really think he is becoming interested in our oldest daughter."

"There you go again with your pipe dreams! Last week it was a duke."

The Plot.

"Suppose," hissed the villian, "suppose our plot should leak out?"

"That's all right," said his accomplice, consolingly. "It can't. Don't you remember telling me five minutes ago that it had thickened?"—"Tit-Bits."

Too True.

Maid (demurely)—"No; merely local option."—Puck.

KEEPING FAITH SECRET.

One of my hardest trials in life has been to have to keep the secrets of so many people. As a doctor in missionary life one finds out so many skeletons in cupboards. It is hard not to tell news. It is harder still not to tell good news. It makes you feel, as I once saw a boy after a Christmas dinner, as "if you must burst." But it is worse again when you have a truth that you know to be a truth, a truth of infinite practical daily value forever to those you love best, and yet you cannot tell it. You can say it. You can quartet it. You can monotone it. You can say it in a black coat, in vestments, at matins, at evensong, at the solemn feasts, at the new moons. But still you have not conveyed your truth to your dearest friend, the man who shares your rooms, and studied and competed with you, who played on the team with you, and who trusted you with a pass five yards from the enemy's goal line. Yet he won't take it from your lips that faith in Jesus Christ is worth a red cent—won't accept it. However, the heathen, the stranger, who knows not your inner life, is more likely to listen. Where is the fault? Is the faith in Christ really not of value? Or is it that your use of the faith fails to commend it? If you are really eager to give that inestimable gift to your friend, your husband, your darling boy, and fail, is there something wrong in your use of it, your method of commending it? Does it not make a man's heart cry out, "My God! is my conventional use of faith the cause of preventing others from accepting it?"

FEARED BEING GRABBED.

Woman's Nervousness from Coffee Drinking.

The brain acts through the nerves.

When the nerves are irritated by coffee drinking the mind often imagines things which have no real existence—such as approaching danger, unfriendly criticism, etc.

A Mich. woman suffered in this way but found how to overcome it. She writes:

"For twenty years, I drank coffee thinking it would give me strength when tired and nervous.

"The more coffee I drank, the more tired and nervous I became until I broke down entirely. Then I changed my work from sewing to house-work. This gave me more exercise and was beneficial, but I kept on drinking coffee—thought I could not do without it.

"I was so nervous at times that if left alone I would not go from one room to another for fear some one would grab me, and my little children had to go around on tiptoe and speak in whispers.

"Finally an attack of the grip weakened me so my nerves rebelled and the smell even of coffee was nauseating. Then my husband prepared some Postum for me, believing the long use of coffee had caused my breakdown, so that my head and hands shook like the palsy.

"At first I did not like Postum, but I kept on drinking it and as we learned how to make it right according to directions on pkg., I liked it as well as coffee.

"Occasionally I make coffee when we have guests and give it to the children too, but as soon as they taste it they return their cups for Postum. Now I go anywhere in the house day or night and never think of anyone grabbing me and the children can romp as healthy children should—my nerves are all right." "There's a Reason."

CHICAGO

THE JEWISH QUARTER OF THE CITY. ITS MARKETS, STREETS, CHILDREN, SYNAGOGUE AND WAYS OF THOUGHT. O. F. JORDAN MAKES A TRIP TO THE JERUSALEM THAT IS AT OUR DOORS.

A foreign trip to study the customs of other peoples is not necessary these days. We have in Chicago all the leading peoples of earth and here they reproduce the customs and institutions which characterize them in other lands. One may go over on Halsted street and he in Athens. Here will he Greek speaking restaurants and saloons, Greek speaking stores and not far away the office of the Greek daily paper. In other sections we find the Russians or the Hungarians or the Finns.

The other day we decided to go down into the Ghetto and have a first hand acquaintance with the Jews in their own section. Boarding a car we went to the section between Halsted street and the river south of Fourteenth street. It was on a Friday and the morrow was to be the Sahhath of the orthodox Jew. The housewives were out with haskets on their arms to do the shopping for the day of rest. On inquiry we learned that Maxwell street was the best market street and thither we proceeded to go.

The Jews' Market Place.

We were amazed at the sight that met our eyes on arriving at that street. We had often heard descriptions of the oriental bazaar but here it was right in our very midst. Everything that was for sale was brought out of the stores and placed on counters on the sidewalk. Here was the clothing merchant with his wares, dust covered, right out in the street. And near by was the vegetable woman with her supply of onions and potatoes for the odorous stew that could he detected in the very air of the ghetto. And not far away was the hutcher shop with the live chickens on the outside. We stepped in a moment and found a comely young woman cutting a steak at the hlock. She would have been made handsome with soap and a clean wrapper. The odor of the shop, however, was not to our taste and we heat a rather hasty retreat. The germ theory is an empty imagination of the scientists for we spent three minutes in that shop and still live. The chickens are butchered under the supervision of the customer and the orthodox allow no doubt to intervene as to the correct ritual and procedure being carried through in the slaughter of their meat. At the stockyards, the rabbi places the mystic symbol on the juicy hindquarter of a beef and the faithful know they may eat it. In the fish market, the matter is made even surer. Here out on the street we found shallow tanks of water in which flopped large carp that were indignant at their captivity. They were sold at ridiculously low figures owing to the disdain of the Gentile world for so mean a fish. These carp were butchered at the direction of the customer and in the prescribed form.

The Century and the Chicago American!

On this visit to the Ghetto we had not forgotten our camera. This instrument was the subject of much curiosity on the part of the inhabitants. They asked why we carried such an instrument and soon the rumor spread without our responsibility that we had come down from the Chicago American to take pictures of the wretched, muddy streets and to attack the city council for its neglect. This fortunate rumor quite outran our rapid movements and we were everywhere importuned to take pictures and were shown things that ought to be complained about. Our popularity was a tribute to the journal that has acquired such a hold in that section. We fear the write-up in the Christian Century will be in their minds but a poor substitute for what they desired but we make at least this effort to give their grievances a public expression.

In truth their streets were in abominable condition. The mud out in the street resemhles that in a country town in central Illinois in the spring of the year. If there was any pavement, it had long since heen buried in the filth and debris that had accumulated through the years. On the street corners paths had been shoveled or worn through. We shall not blame these fellow citizens of ours if they cast a solid vote for some candidate that promises something for their ward. Their votes have long been delivered by the politicians at so much per. One of these days the clever Jew will have his own candidate and elect him.

Religious Prejudices Strong.

In the Ghetto the religious prejudice presents itself forcihly and is a factor in business. We saw every kind of business but saw no photograph gallery. On inquiry we learned that even the orthodox Jews have their conservatives and radicals. We found one old Shylock face that we much desired to photograph. He abandoned his stock of clothing and fled into a dark stairway. When he reappeared we undertook to bribe him. He refused a whole dollar for the privilege of taking his picture. We could not understand such uncommercial prejudice but on inquiry from the amused bystanders learned that the good old man had remembered the words of the law that forbid the making of any image of anything above the earth, under the earth, or on the earth. Religious prejudice has ruined the business of the photographer in this section, though the younger generation were ungodly enough to even solicit the supposed Chicago American reporter for a photograph.

In the Ghetto we were reminded of the promise to Abraham that his seed should be as the sand of the seashore for multitude. The children in the Ghetto are sufficiently numerous to give most marked fulfilment to this ancient promise. They literally swarm the streets, dirty, unkempt but healthy. The Jewish race is a virile one. In New York City there are a million Jews, so that the ancient Jewish faith has more adherents than does the Protestant religion under whose protecting care the city was founded. Jews are not so numerous in Chicago hut the increase by immigration and by birth will some time make the Ghetto a far more important factor in the city's life than it now is.

Religiously, today the Jews are divided into two classes, the orthodox and the liheral. These divisions correspond somewhat loosely with the division of Christians into Catholics and Protestants. The well-known rabbis of the city all belong to the liberal division of the Jewish church. Rabbi Stolz and Rabbi Hirsch are the most conspicuous figures in the Jewish ministry in this city. It may well be doubted whether there are many Jews in the world with finer mentality than that of Rabbi Hirsch. These liberal rabbis claim Jesus as one of their prophets. and look upon Christianity as a sort of corrupt and mongrel Judaism. They would reject the miraculous in the life of Jesus and reject the claim that he was either Messiah or the Son of God. They would perhaps characterize the whole Messianic hope of their people as one born out of political oppression and a passing incident rather than a fundamental tenet of Judaism. They would apply the same critical process to the Old Testament, accepting its religious hopes to some extent and its moral precepts, but rejecting any

The orthodox Jews practice all the rites and customs that are the accretion of the centuries. Perhaps the Jews of Jesus' day would not recognize many of their customs as, in spite of their conservatism, they have slowly added new observances to fit the condition of their lives. New Year's day is a great day with them now, though in Jesus' day it certainly did not occupy anything like the central place which it now occupies. They hate everything Christian and even censorize books from the public library, allowing nothing to come into the home that in any way refers to Jesus. A library attendant was surprised not long since to have a Jewish child return with a hook. On inquiring what the trouble was, the attendant was shown a picture of a cross in the book, which was sufficient reason for its not entering a Jewish home.

The Jerusalem of Illinois.

More important even than these religious tendencies from the Christian's point of view, is the irreligious tendency among the Jews. The second and third generation in America are hreaking away from the synagogue. Even the great Rabbi Hirsch uttered a plaintive comment on this the other day. He said it was a mistake to helieve that the Jews were a religious people. He urged that the Jews were less religious than their Gentile neighbors and pointed to his empty pews for proof. The free-thinkers' movement has made havoc of faith among the Jews as it has never done among the Christians. There are those that would hesitate in making the effort to win people away from the ancient faith of Judaism but surely none could hesitate about winning the men from the blank and dark atheism into the light and hope of the Christian religion. With this open door at our very hand, we are informed that none of the great denominations are at work in the Ghetto, that it is practically virgin soil for the missionary.

The Disciples sent their first missionary to Jerusalem. That was indeed an idealistic enterprise. What will they do, now that they realize that there are more Jews in Chicago than there were in Jerusalem in Jesus' day? Will the Jew in Chicago with his filth and poverty and ignorance make the same appeal as the ideal Jew across the water? Will the "old Jerusalem gospel," of which we hear so much, work when taken back to Jerusalem—the Jerusalem of Illinois?

CHURCH NOTES.

Dr. H. O. Breeden preached at Irving Park last Sunday and visited the minister's meeting Monday afternoon. He is on his way to California.

The church of Maywood has remembered their pastor, V. F. Johnson with a Christmas purse of twenty-five dollars.

The Men's Club of the Harvey church have a banquet December 15th. One of the attorneys of the Illinois Central road will make the address of the evening.

C. G. Kindred continues to improve. A host of friends will rejoice in this report.

The ministers' meeting was addressed last Monday by Will F. Shaw. He expounded the teachings of Alexander Campbell. The paper was laid over to be discussed next week. Dr. Gates will lead in the discussion.

Last Sunday was a day of rejoicing in the Harvey church. There were six additions, five of them on confession of faith.

Most of the churches observed C. W. B. M. day last Sunday. The few tardy ones will observe it next Sunday.

A husband and wife united with the West Pullman church last Sunday, the former on confession of faith.

BREEDEN AND SAXTON AT EUREKA.

We have just closed a remarkable meeting at Eureka. The field was so well gleaned that many thought it a waste of time and money to attempt a meeting. There were not over a dozen in the Bible school over twelve years of age out of the church and there were but half that number in the college not Christians. There were but three Disciple families in the community not in the fellowship and with a church of over six hundred resident members in a town of but two thousand, it looked like a useless task to many. But having faith in the power of the Gospel unto the uttermost we engaged the evangelists six months ago and began to prepare for the effort. The success of the effort was due to two causes.

In the first place the church worked. Dr. Breeden said he had never had more enthusiastic workers nor a greater number of them. With such support in a large community he would have had hundreds of accessions.

In the second place it was the power of great preaching that brought people to a decision. H. O. Breeden is a great preacher. He is eloquent, logical, and mighty in the Scriptures. He quotes the Bible much, and he does more, he applies it correctly. He is no legalist. He finds the spirit of the Word and enforces it with a wealth of illustration. He knows men, and he is no sensationalist. There was never a moment of excitement during the meetings. When the audience filled the house to overflowing and the exhortation was most telling, no one was moved without deliberation. The preacher had appealed to the mind and the heart in the sermon and the exhortation appealed to the will. Learning what to do, men were moved to do it. The result was that the accessions were largely adult and an extraordinarily large number of them men. No impossible task is left to the church and pastor in caring for the flock. He inspired the workers, because he asked men to work with men in a manly way, and led them in the task. He is a tireless personal worker and a master in a face to face talk with men. There were 110 accessions.

Prof. Saxton is a splendid leader of song. He gets the audience to sing, and his solos are both artistic and moving, and the whole tone of his work is in keeping with that of the evangelist.

TEXAS NEWS.

In spite of the rain, the Cisco district convention is to be ranked a success in point of results. Arrangements were set on foot for the employment of a district evangelist, a a Christian Endeavor Society was organized, encouragement was given to the local C. W. B. M. and Circle work. Good, earnest speeches were made by such men as J. C. Mason, P. C. Scitern, J. S. Zeran, J. F. Montgomery, J. W. Boynton, A. G. D'Spain, G. H. Morrison, M. L. Dickey and Colby Hall. There was not a show speech during the entire convention.

J. F. Montgomery has moved to Stephensville, but will continue to preach also at Hico.

J. S. Zeran will soon take up the work in the growing little city of Stamford.

Hamlin, Knox City and Rule will have regular service conducted by our good young Brother Wright, from Quanah.

Albany has services on alternate Tuesday nights conducted by M. L. Dickey, who is loaned from Cisco.

Stamford will entertain the district convention the second week in December.

J. N. Wooten has been recalled to Longview where he formerly ministered.

The Hillsboro district very reluctantly accepted the resignation of A. D. Rogers, who has so finely organized their work. They have called A. K. Scott to fill his place.

Bro. Ware, who came to Sabinal from Arkansas is entering into the work there with fine zeal.

J. C. Mason reports a doubled number of churches sharing in state missions so far.

Waco will entertain the district convention between the lectureship and the institute.

F. L. Jewett of the Texas Bible Chair, has spoken in a number of churches of late concerning his work. The splendid new building given this work by Mrs. M. M. Blanks of Lockhart, is nearing completion. The work done through this Bible Chair is destined to help every town and village in Texas.

Graves Fish from Kentucky, has entered upon work at Alvarado.

Tyler has just adopted a Juliette Fowler Home boy. They intend to give him a college training and help him to prepare for the ministry.

SANTA BARBARA, CAL., NOTES.

Our meeting of three weeks came to a close last Sunday with twenty-four added; all confessions of Christ but four. I think as many more have been willing to accept Christ and unite with the church if parents had not been opposed or indifferent. In twenty-five years ministry I never saw before so many children and young people hindered by parents. It was indeed disheartening. The hearing was fine throughout the meeting, so was the spirit of coöperation on the part of the churches. Prof. Stout's singing charmed and helped all. He greatly endeared himself to the people of Santa Barbara.

Our teacher-training class taught by Prof. H. D. Williams numbers about sixty-five enrolled.

Our intermediate C. E. is planning to raise a fund to meet the expense of a mission among the 3,000 or 4,000 Spanish in this city. Such a work was started about a year ago and permitted to lapse for lack of support. It is greatly needed.

There is an effective organization here among Christian people to evangelize and cheer and help the sailors who touch at this port.

Santa Maria, in this county, is about to call a minister to serve the church. Lompoc has a church building, some members, but no preacher.

Just about fifty new members added here since I came, Aug. 15.

Sumner T. Martin, Minister.

Closed a short meeting at Roy with an organization of twenty-four members. Four from U. B. and two by confession and baptism. Preached for Bro. M. E. Dutt as Las Vegas the last Sunday in November. He is doing a splendid work there.

Frederick F. Grim, Cor. Sec.
E. Las Vegas, N. M.

ILLINOIS NOTES.

The church at Lawrenceville and Harry C. Holmes, the minister, are enjoying the new and beautiful parsonage.

Our mission at Moline and R. E. Henry, the minister, have broken ground for the new building. It makes us happy to see our children grow into big folks.

Gilbert Jones, Marshall, assisted Bro. Layton in a meeting at Ash Grove with thirty-six additions. Bro. Jones has many victories of that kind.

Champ Clark Buckner is the minister at Aurora and we wish him and the church great success.

C. M. Smistson, eighth district evangelist, held a meeting at Grayville, assisting E. U. Smith with twenty-eight additions.

The new building at Robinson is dedicated and the church and Bro. McGaughey, the minister, are entitled to be very happy.

The field secretary, J. Fred Jones, is to dedicate the new $10,000 house at Bowen, W. A. Taylor minister.

Knox P. Taylor, this city, held a week's institute with the Third Church, Danville, to the delight of all. He is great in his work and should be kept at it.

G. A. Campbell, Chicago, assisted Andrew Scott, Second Church, Danville, in a meeting recently.

H. J. Hostetler, Virden, held meetings at Harvel and Boston Chapel.

Brethren, kindly remember the society with an offering if you have not done so. Just one offering from each church annually is all the society asks for.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.
Good Digestion Follows Right Food.

Indigestion and the attendant discomforts of mind and body are certain to follow continued use of improper food.

Those who are still young and robust are likely to overlook the fact that, as dropping water will wear a stone away at last, so will the use of heavy, greasy, rich food, finally cause loss of appetite and indigestion.

Fortunately many are thoughtful enough to study themselves and note the principle of Cause and Effect in their daily food. A N. Y. young woman writes her experience thus:

"Sometime ago I had a lot of trouble from indigestion, caused by too rich food. I got so I was unable to digest scarcely anything, and medicines seemed useless.

"A friend advised me to try Grape-Nuts food, praising it highly, and as a last resort, I tried it. I am thankful to say that Grape-Nuts not only relieved me of my trouble, but built me up and strengthened my digestive organs so that I can now eat anything I desire. But I stick to Grape-Nuts."

BONJOLONGO

The Ex-Cannibal Soldier now a Soldier of The Prince of Peace.

BY ROYAL J. DYE, M. D.

In the early days of our mission at Bolenge, Injolo was a village to which our people of the river side dared not go, so wild and grosely cannibal was its reputation.

As the little church grew in numbers and its zeal carried it to still farther sections evangelizing, two of Bolenge's intrepid evangelists went to the big village of Injolo preaching. They trusted in that Lord they had learned to love and who said to them "Go," that He would fulfill the promise that goes with the faithful obedience of the command, of "Lo, I am with you always."

They preached up and down the populous streets of Injolo for many months. Some pooh-poohed, others openly cursed them while others violently persecuted them. Of the first class was big strapping Bonjolongo. He was the head of his proud family and was only recently returned from a period of several years service as a State soldier, the dreaded "Bula Matadi." He had gone on many a Government punitive expedition to the far distant back villages and in one instance in particular had raided a small village of possibly a thousand people and not only had many been killed in the blood contest, but some had been carried off captive and the grewsome cannibal feast had been celebrated at the close of the raid. Bonjolongo took a prominent part in this affair and was recognized by the villagers of Isaka as a native of Injolo their feudal foes.

Christianity Not a Secret Society.

The Evangelists preached up and down the streets of Injolo the plain old Jerusalem Gospel story and Bonjolongo scoffed at it and them. "You couldn't stuff him with any such hoax as that." But finally he came to the Mission at Bolenge more out of curiosity than anything else and laughed at this and that. He tried to tempt the various members of the young native church so recently removed from the very life he revelled in. Neither men nor women could he get to join in the old practices. Failing in these ways he came to the Missionary requesting some of that 'medicine' we gave these others to make them refuse the old life. He was laughingly told that if there was any such 'medicine,' he should certainly have all there was, but there was no medicine. "Oh. yes, he said, you would not give it to me. But if you will let me into the secret of this Society, I will go back to my big village and bring you up a great crowd. It will pay you to accept me into your Society." He was told there was nothing in it and that there were no secrets, that there was but one way to get in and that was the "way of the Cross." He came more constantly to the meetings and finally it dawned on his soul and the Gospel transformed his life. He was baptized together with his wife, who had been a faithful seeker, and another Injolo native. He went back to his village not as a political propagandist but as an Evangelist, burning with the zeal for souls. He preached up and down his own village streets and what counted for more he lived the remarkably transformed life of a Christian. In the transformation of this life he had given up all of his wealth of wives and slaves. He redeemed his own little daughter less than six years old, whom he had sold off as a wife to a lecherous old chief, a great honor in the old regime. He brought her up to the Mission and asked the Mission Mother if she would not take her and teach her as she had taught all of the orphan children.

Bonjolongo had the great joy of bringing his own gray haired mother to the Savior. Several others of his family followed and he built up in that wild village of bloody cruelty and bestiality, a little Christian community. When one of the Missionaries went back there to establish them in the faith, he helped them erect their own chapel for prayer and praise to the Father they were learning to love. Bonjolongo came back to Bolenge on one of his regular visits with the desire in his heart to go to Isaka, the village he had raided in the old days, but we said to him, "They will kill you." He replied, "That may be, but I must go." We prayed with him over this desire and his resolve remaining firm, we prepared him for the trip.

A Wonderful Transformation.

How different from that other trip! A wild cannibal soldier thirsting for the blood of his fellows and the old feudal enmity burning in his heart. He goes back now, a man, washed, dressed, the quiet humble soldier of King Jesus, with no weapon save "the sword of the Spirit" and his "feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace." His water bottle slung over one shoulder, a parcel of food on his back, his walking staff in his hand, he strode into the village of Isaka, every inch a man. The first one from Injolo since that awful raid. Long had they thirsted for vengeance, but no chance had given little Isaka such an opportunity as this. They gathered about him, a wild jibbering crowd, besmirched with their ochres and armed with their spears and deadly poisoned arrows, with sheath knives strapped across their breasts. He unarmed and unafraid. Bonjolongo! A wonderous transformation!

"Why, you are Bonjolongo, aren't you?" "Sure, I'm Bonjolongo." "Why, you are from Injolo, aren't you?" "Yes, I'm from Injolo." "An, they cried, we'll kill you." And they meant it all too truly. It was no idle threat. They had not had a chance at "blood-vengeance" for what they had suffered at the hands of Injolo. Here stands this big fellow, unarmed, what a fine pot-roast he would make! So that threat had a sinister meaning in it.

Faithful to Christ.

Bonjolongo stood there unwavering. He said, "Do you think me a fool to come here unarmed, what a fine pot-roast he would whole village of Injolo at may back and we could have wiped you out of existence. It was true. "No," he said, "I did not come as before, but to tell you of God's love for us all and this God whom you call in ignorance 'Nazakomba' will protect me. Why! you could not hurt me if you wished." This was a stunner, and he followed up his advantage, by preaching "Jesus unto them. They were not to be cheated into losing their man and the bolder dare-devils went off to the far end of the village to hold a council of war and smooked the wild hashesh hemp, cannibis indica, until they became crazy delirious with hallucinations of their own invulnerability and irresistability. They came to the place where he was staying and demanded him to be given up and upon refusal demanded entrance into the hut where he was staying, but his host remained firm in his refusal. All night long with brandishing fire brands they kept watch lest he escape. All night long Bonjolongo kept vigil in prayer. Morning dawn and he strode out of the house and faced them with a greeting of "Loecwa" (are you awake) involuntarily they responded with a deep simultaneous "O, La we O" (yes, and are you?), the friendly greetings. "Listen," he said, "while I give you my parting message, for I am going home." "Eh! you are going home are ye?" with a leer and a sneer, "Yes, I am going home." "Well, when you go, which path are you going to take?" they scoffingly asked him. "Oh, I am going to take the right hand path," he answered. "Eh! you are going to take the right hand path, are you?" they snarled at him for they had made up their minds that he should never get away alive.

No heathen would think of being so simple as to give the truth for an answer to any question. They always lie and expect you to be clever enough to catch them. When you wish to compliment any one out there call them a "liar." Of course Bonjolongo was lying to them. They knew well enough that he would take the left hand path so they filtered down through the forest down behind their huts and ambushed the left hand path. They were going to be just as clever as Bonjolongo. He preached a parting message to those who stayed and bade them good-by and started down the road, accompanied by one who had been delegated to do so. They came to the parting of the ways and Bonjolongo started down the right hand path with an "Ocikala" (you are staying?) The other native called out at the top of his voice "Nsonsolo inyo lofofomba" (indeed you don't lie.) He was not praising Bonjolongo for being truthful but was signalling to the ambuscade that Bonjolongo had gone the right hand path. Bonjolongo knew when to couple up faith with works. He took to his heels and saved his life that time. But he returned again and again to Isaka preaching the wonderous message of redeeming love. He had the joy of seeing Bomponge, now one of the best of Bolenge's Evangelists, Osongonwa and others accept that same Lord and Saviour he loved.

This is the power of the Gospel and these are the type of men who are carrying the "Light of the World" to the depths of the farthest villages of "darkest Africa" and who will make it some day aglow with the glory of the Son of God. Brethren, these are the people who are calling to us for teachers, and for whom we need a training school for their better preparation as the messengers of that Gospel they so heroically proclaim.

A Man May Eat Any Meal

And Digest It Easily If He Will But Try.

FREE DIGESTIVE TABLETS.

Don't be afraid of your meals. The reason you have dyspepsia is because something is lacking in your digestive apparatus necessary to the stomach's work.

A perfect stomach loves to work. Perfect digestion is not afraid of any meal and benefits by its consumption of food the whole machine of man.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets make easy the work of digestion, because they combine active fruit and vegetable essences which are needed by the stomach.

These essences are so powerful they digest food without aid from the stomach. They have done this with a meal encased in a glass tube.

We will send a trial package to any one free for his name and address.

Eat what you will or when you will, then take a Stuart Dyspepsia Tablet and see how you will digest that meal. In a short time your stomach will have a natural supply of gastric juices and your whole system will be able to take care of digestion easily.

Ask any druggist about Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. His answer will tell more than we can say. Ask him how they sell. If you want to buy them give him 50c. But if you want to test them write us and you will receive a trial package by mail without cost. Address F. A. Stuart Co. 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall Mich.

MISSIONARY NOTES.

C. L. Pickett reports twenty-two baptisms in and about Laoag, Philippine Islands. An epidemic of cholera is sweeping through that section.

Last week the Foreign Society received two gifts of $500 each; one from a friend in Iowa, and one from a friend in Kentucky. These two gifts are to help make good the $5,000 R. A. Long proposes to give, contingent upon raising $20,000 additional by Aug. 1st, 1909 for Vigan P. I. school. A pledge also of $500 is received for this school.

Lazarus Ehman, who made the first gift to the Foreign Society on the Annuity Plan in 1897, and who has given, all told, nearly $7,000 in this way, expects to make another gift this year of $500.

The Foreign Mission rallies, conducted by A. McLean and Stephen J. Corey, are more largely attended this year than in previous years. The moving picture feature of these rallies is very attractive and very instructive. There are a number of calls for these rallies that cannot be met for want of time.

It will be remembered that the first Sunday in February is Christian Endeavor day for foreign missions among all the Christian Endeavor Societies of the world. The Societies among our people have done themselves great credit in the observance of the day. They began in 1903 with only 100 societies enlisted. Last year 800 societies observed the day.

Justin N. Green, who has had many years of experience in working among young people, has prepared an attractive exercise. The title of it is "Our Damoh Boys." The office of the Foreign Society will furnish this free of charge. In 1902, the Endeavor Societies gave $5,072. Last year they gave $13,171. The Centennial watch-word for Christian Endeavorers for Foreign Missions is $20,000. Since the organization of the Endeavor movement, our Endeavor Societies have contributed to the work of the Foreign Society nearly $105,000.

MORAL ISSUES IN CONGRESS.

Corresponding Secretary International Reform Bureau.

By Albert Sidney Gregg.

With the opening of Congress on Monday of this week national reform activities manifested new energy, and Congressional mail is correspondingly burdened with letters from "home" urging the passage of various belated reform measures. The people are learning the potency of the mail box as a means of getting what they want, and the "potentates" in Washington have about learned that the man behind the petition rules the nation.

There was a time when petitions and the like went into the waste paper basket, but that time is passing. Congressmen are realizing that the petitions from home show which way the wind is blowing, and they are learning to adjust themselves accordingly. It is said that twenty telegrams will "chase" one congressman. If twenty telegrams will "chase" one congressman into doing right, how many telegrams will it take to chase all the congressmen.

The targets this year are Speaker Canon, the Bacon bill, the Tirrell bill, the Johnson bill, the Burkett bill, etc., all which needs to be translated. Mr. Canon, or Uncle Joe as he is called by his many loving friends, is "speaker" of the House of Representatives. He does not make all the speeches. He would like to do all the talking, but congressional courtesy forbids. He therefore takes it out in regulating the speeches and conduct of his fellow congressmen. Uncle Joe determines what laws shall be made, and how long each congressman shall be allowed to talk in making them. It is said he needs a new gavel each week. This is a great deal of power for one man to wield. It is more power than Emperor William, King Edward, or even Theodore Roosevelt can exercise directly, and that is saying a great deal. That may be overstated, but it is the way a good many people are feeling about it, and the way people feel determines whether a king shall continue to wear his head or not. Senator Lodge says that sentiment rules the country and I guess he is about right. And sentiment finds expression in letters and petitions. Once in a while a speaker finds out that the people are sovereign. When he becomes infatuated with the idea that he is "It" the people rise up and smite him, and he takes a few needed lessons in meekness.

The trouble with Uncle Joe is that he has been preventing the passage of sundry immerce and provides that intoxicating liquors shall not be shipped into prohibition states. That means that Maine, Kansas, Georgia, and all the other states that have chased the saloon devil out would not be tormented by "blind tigers" for the "blind tiger" could not live in a prohibition state if the Federal government should say that intoxicants could not be shipped into a prohibition state. This is some of the moral legislation that the Speaker is trying to prevent. He has been so ugly about the matter that the only way to get him to be good is to elect somebody else speaker. The reason so many people are writing their congressmen is that they want him to take Uncle Joe's job away from him and give it to a better man—one who doesn't think he is "It".

The outlook at present is that Taft and Temperance will have a great deal to do with the future of Uncle Joe. Taft and Temperance are heavy bodies, and if Mr. Cannon gets caught between the two there will be little left of Mr. Speaker.

The other moral reform bills will be affected somewhat by the fate of the Bacon bill. The Tirrell bill prohibits the sale of intoxicants in all ships, and buildings used by the United States government. It would protect the army and navy from the use of intoxicants more effectively. At present the men of the navy are protected only by an order of the secretary of the navy which can be revoked at any time by the secretary. Congress has abolished the canteen at army posts, but an organized effort is being made to restore it.

Mr. Johnson's bill provides for a Sunday rest law for the District of Columbia. It is a curious arrangement, but nevertheless true, that the residents of the District must take their laws from the greatest lawmaking body on earth, and at the same time have no voice in electing anybody to congress, unless they go "nome" on election day.

Senator Burkett's bill is designed to destroy pool rooms by prohibiting interstate telegraphing of race gambling news. The precedent for this is the acts of government forbidding the carrying of lottery tickets by the U. S. Mails, and by express companies. A bill prohibiting interstate traffic in cigarettes is also under consideration.

Besides the measures indicated the Reform Bureau will bring forward bills prohibiting liquor selling in Hawaii and the importation of opium into the United States.

EVERY CHURCH SHOULD USE OUR

Individual Communion Cups

The best way to prove the merits of this cleanly method is to use a service at a communion on trial. We will send your church a complete outfit to use before purchasing, to be returned to us at our expense if not found perfectly satisfactory. To receive service give us number of communicants usually in attendance and we will send an outfit. Over 5,000 churches use our cups. We furnish bread plates and collection plates in several styles. BIBLE TEACHING IN OUR HARDA SCHOOLS.

Harda, C. P., Nov. 6, 1908.

The one aim of the missionary is to cause the non-christian to know Christ. First he must know him intellectually, and second, spiritually or experimentally. To present Christ to the student as one would present the life and character of Gladstone, is not difficult, but to lead the student to where he is willing to accept Christ as Saviour, and be ruled by His spirit and teaching, is another matter.

According to the Hindu's faith, he is saved by conforming to formal ritualism. To teach that salvation is attained through a spiritual contact with Christ which is expressed in a life of experience, is to appeal to a foreign element in the Hindu's nature. One of the meanest, most untruthful and deceptive men I have known, told me the other day, that if he ever sinned, he was not conscious of that fact. He is a high caste Brahman true to his religious ceremonies and a good Hindu.

Our plan of Bible teaching is as follows: when a boy enters the Primary school for the first time, being unable to read, he is taught in story form, the simple story of Christ's life. He also commits to memory the ten commandments, the First and Twenty-third Psalms, and the Lord's Prayer.

No student is admitted into any department of our schools who will not listen to thirty minutes of Bible instruction daily. The second year he reads the Gospel of Luke, the third year—Mark, and the fourth —Matthew. All work done in the primary department is in Hindi.

When the student enters the middle school, a four years' course, practically the same ground is gone over, though in English. We are obliged to cover the same ground because so many students enter from other schools, where the Bible is never taught. The high school course is three years. Here, too, many boys enter who have never heard any Bible before. So here we give Luke the first year, Acts the second, and portions of certain epistles the third.

Bible teachers, a few years ago it seemed almost impossible to get sufficient Christian teachers, and more so, to secure efficient ones. However, Jubbulpore Bible College is solving this problem, and will continue to do it more effectively as students take the high school course preparatory to their entering the Bible College. This latter policy has only been adopted this last year, and we have at present, three boys in high school, preparing for Bible College. A last year's graduate from our Bible School is at present teaching the Word in the main Primary School. Bro. Shoh, our regular pastor, is teaching in the middle school, and I do the Bible work of the high school.

Effect of our Bible teaching.—The greatest effect is the silent, unostentatious transformation of thought in regard to religion, attitude towards Christians and their tolerance in general to the message that we bring. The high school boys will argue against child marriage, and many are in favor of female education. I believe that they accept ninety per cent of our Bible teaching. You ask if they believe so much, why don't they accept it openly? First, because it is foreign. "India for the Indians," and "Against the Government" is the spirit of the day. This morning I found "Hill the English" written in large letters on the high school walls. The political agitator is abroad in the land, and they have a tremendous influence on these high caste students.

Again to, become a Christian means to be despised, rejected, persecuted, and banished from all friends. This test is too severe for most Hindus. However, the Bible teaching in the schools is creating a tolerent spirit, and this harsh test is gradually being modified.

To say that conditions here represent a cloud with a silver lining, is to put it too mildly. Back of this cloud is the great beaming, burning sun of Righteousness, rifting the cloud at many, many places, and bringing a new light to the whole situation. There is absolutely no doubt about the final issue of this work. Its difficulty does not indicate in any form its impossibility. God is back of this proposition, and where God is, there is Victory.

D. O. Cunningham.

JESUS UNTO MARY.

On The Tenth Christmas.

By Chester Firkins in December Lippincott's.

"Why came the angels, Mother dear,
  Upon the night when I was born?"
"Perchance sweet Heaven was forlorn, Thou being here."

"And were they beautiful to see?
  Say o'er the tale the shepherds told."
"Ay, they were robed in shining gold;
They sang of thee."

"And was not that a wondrous thing—
  That holy choirs cried my birth?"
"Nay; to all mothers of the Earth Bright angels sing."

"But yet thou sayest, from the skies
  Strange fires wreathed my brow with gold."
"Yea, miracles are manifold
To mother-eyes."

"When I within a manger lay,
  Why came great kings from distant lands?"
"They did but kiss thy baby hands,
Upon their way."

"Didst thou not tell me that a star Shone on their path with wondrous light?"
"Oh, little son, 'tis late;—good night—Dreams bear thee far."

"Oh, Mother, there is in my heart
  A dream I may not understand."
"Sleep; thou shalt roam in Samarcand,
And Sidon's mart."

"Nay, I shall hear the Heavens call:
  'O Son of God! Go forth! Redeem!'"
"My son, that is indeed a dream
Most strange of all."

"They call me, Mother, when I sleep,
  Or when I wake, or when I play."
("God, give me but another day
My boy to keep.")

"What say'st thou, Mother? Must I fare Alone into the darkness? I?"
("He is so little, God,—I cry!—
Earth's woe to bear!")

"Yet, I must follow; even now
  The angel voices speak my name."
"Again, I see, the holy flame Doth gird his brow!")

"Yet, Mother, I am sore afraid;
  Oh, let me bide a little while."
"Whom God hath called for earthly trial,
His course is laid."

"Mother, I see an angry throng;
  The face of Death upon me stares."
"I give thee to the God who cares
For weak and strong."

"I go,—and yet, within my heart,
  The wholly human hunger cries."
"Sweet, those who meet in Paradise Shall never part."

THE LITTLE BOY'S BABY PRAYER.

By S. M. Talbot.

Dear God I need you awful bad
  I don't know what to do;
My papa's cross, my mamma's sick;
  I hain't no fren' but You.
Them keerless angels went and brung,
  'Stid of the boy I ast,
A weenchy, teenchy baby girl.
  I don't see how they dast!

Say, God, I wish't You'd take her back.
  She's jest as good as new;
Won't no one know she's secon'-hand,
  But 'ceptin' me and You;
An' pick a boy, dear God, Yourself,
  The nicest in Yer fold;
But please don't choose him quite so young.
  I'd like him five years old.

A Worthy Desire.

An ambitious young Chicagoan recently called upon a publisher of novels in that city, to whom he imparted confidently the information that he had decided to "write a book," and that he would be pleased to afford the publisher the chance to bring it out.

"May I venture to inquire as to the nature of the book you propose to write?" asked the publisher, very politely.

Oh," came in an offhand way from the aspirant for fame, "I think of doing something on the line of 'Les Miserables,' only livelier, you know!"—Lippincott's.

Those Dear Friends.

Stella (at the piano)—"Now that you have heard me sing, what would you advise me to do with my voice?"

Mabel—"Well, I wouldn't do anything with it just now. Wait till the man comes around and have it tuned."

Later Returns.

Mildred—"So you are engaged to young Willson eh? I thought you said your love for him was purely platonic?"

Helen—"And it was before he inherited half a million and asked me to marry him."

An Earnest Wish.

"What do you think!" exclaimed the theatrical star, proudly. "They are going to name a new cigar after me."

"Well," rejoined the manager. "here's hoping it will draw better than you do."

Conscientious.

An enterprising commercial traveller attempted to bribe a country merchant in Scotland with a box of cigars.

"Na, na," said the merchant, shaking his head gravely, "I canna tak' 'em; I naer dae business tha way."

"Nonsense," said the drummer, "but if you have any conscientious scruples you may pay me a shilling for the box."

"Weel, wee., said the honest shopkeeper, "I'll take two boxes."—New York Globe.

Dangerous.

"If I exposed my throat and lungs the way you do," complained the father of the beautiful maiden, "I'd be a dead man inside of three days."

"Of course you would," she sweetly replied, "although really I don't believe lynching ought ever to be resorted to for anything."

PUBLISHERS' COLUMN.

Those who are interested in our welfare will be glad to learn that new capital has been enlisted and an aggressive business management arranged for.

One of the things which strikes the new man is the large number of subscriptions which seem to be in arrears; if these were brought up to date, our large plans for turning out a good paper, "better than ever," could easily be carried out. Will you not respond promptly and save us the expense and labor of sending bills? In addition to accepting our invitation "to pay up" will you not show your interest still further by sending in at least one new subscription with your own? This can be done with very little effort on your part (some have sent 6 or more) and will easily double our list.

Gladden our Christmas and New Year by keeping us busy taking in the money and putting names on our list.

We shall be glad to furnish sample copies for distribution, and can allow a small cash commission where a church is thoroughly canvassed.

This issue of the paper is going to many ministers who are not regular readers. We want your name on our subscription list; you need our paper "in your business." To enable us to "get together" we make the following special offers (to ministers only):

1. Send us 25 cents, and we will send you The Christian Century for 3 months, or
2. Send us $1.00, and we will send you The Christian Century for a year, or
3. Send us $1.50 and we will send you The Christian Century for a year and a copy of the Centennial book, "Historical Documents," bound in cloth.

Now is the time to subscribe. Note our new address, The Christian Century, 235 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

My Confession of Faith: A Resume

Not the least significant fact in the religious life of our time is the impulse to express one's faith in some sort of statement, formal or casual. This is not only the case with doctrinaires like Tolstoy and Frederick Harrison, who have formulated their beliefs in doctrinal volumes, but it is also true of men whose primary interests are not supposed to fall in the religious field, but who are of the professional and literary class. Mr. Benson and Mr. Chesterton are telling us what they regard as the essentials of religious conviction. Mr. Wells is attempting to spell out what he believes will be the creed of the future, and even Mr. Jerome K. Jerome pauses in the midst of his humor to publish to interested audiences his new articles of faith.

The surprising thing about this renaissance of doctrinal utterance on the part of the laity is its coincidence with the almost total discrediting of dogma. If there is one tendency more marked than another in the spiritual life of the age it is the weariness and distaste with which theological propositions are received. Of creeds and confessions of faith as tests of orthodoxy the generation has had enough and quite enough. Yet perhaps no time has ever, in its deeper soul, been more sensitive to the verities which belong to the life of the spirit. It is not an age of skepticism. Perhaps it is too much to call it an age of faith. Rather may one say with confidence that it is a time of inquiry, of examination, of testing the facts. Such moments are of immense significance. They are not the death hours of religion, but the times in which a new and larger faith is born.

I have been deeply interested in this phase of our present problem of religious belief by the results that have issued from the publication of my "Confession of Faith," which has appeared in recent numbers of the Christian Century. In that series of utterances I undertook a very simple and definite task. After twenty years of experience as a teacher and minister among the Disciples of Christ I found myself charged in a certain quarter with heresy, even with infidelity. The source and the motives from which such charges came were quite obvious, and like similar assaults upon other men among us they might have been left to take care of themselves and fall of their own weight.

But it seemed an opportune moment to ask certain questions suggested by these charges, and to attempt, if possible, to ascertain from the responses, the direction in which this brotherhood of the Disciples is moving in this, the hundredth year of its history. In order to make the issue entirely clear I have been at pains to point out the fundamental elements of my own religious faith. In this statement it was manifestly impossible to be exhaustive. But I considered the three fields in which the interests of the Disciples have from the first been most profound. These are the Old Testament, the New Testament, and the Program of the Fathers of this movement to promote Christian Unity.

To make the issue quite clear once more, I shall specify the items which I have enumerated among the beliefs held by me with confidence and emphasis:

I believe in the divine origin and purpose of the Old Testament, in its inspiration, and its value as the record of the lives and utterances of holy men of old who were the prophetic teachers of Israel.

I believe in the divine origin, inspiration and permanent value of the New Testament, as the record of the lives and utterances of our Lord and his Apostles, and as the authoritative source of knowledge regarding the beginnings and nature of the Christian religion.

I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, the son of God, the Savior of men; his life and death of sacrificial and redemptive service, his miracles, his teachings, his victory over death and his gospel of pardon and righteousness sent forth to all men.

I believe that the fathers of this reformation perceived in the divided state of the Church the greatest hindrance to the triumph of the Gospel, and that in their advocacy of Christian union they voiced the most urgent need of the Church in their day and in our own. I believe that the plan they proposed for the accomplishment of this end—the abandonment of divisive human formulations and methods as tests of religious soundness, and the acceptance of the primal ideals of the church as to faith, spirit and service—is as practicable today as in their own time, and that it is the only practicable solution of the problem.

It is scarcely necessary to repeat that what I here set down is the briefest summary of my faith, and not intended as an inclusive statement. Naturally the items of any Christian's confession of faith would extend to indefinite limits if expressed in complete form. Probably, also, there would be not a few points at which he would differ in his view from every other believer. The futility of attempting an authoritative conformity to a fixed and detailed standard of belief has been proved throughout Christian history. No other single attempt has been so fruitful of division as this.

It is the peculiar glory of the Disciples that they avoided all efforts at mere uniformity, and insisted that loyalty to Christ as the Savior of men and the Lord of life was sufficient as a test of brotherhood in the church. In this view they repeated the convictions of the greatest spirits in the church since the Master was here, and in this view they have been joined by the great body of believers in our day.

Accepting, therefore, these fundamental truths of the faith, I have labored as teacher and preacher for this score and more of years to interpret them to students in the class-room, to congregations on the Lord's Day, and to audiences from the lecture platform. This work I expect to continue as long as I live. Convinced that the Bible has received new aids in our day from the critical researches of the most eminent scholars in the field of historical and literary inquiry, that it has nothing to fear but much to gain from such labors, it has been one of the satisfying features of my work to utilize the results of these investigations as broadening the field of biblical truth and furnishing, as never before, the means of awakening and confirming Christian faith. Of this I have had abundant evidence in my work both with students and others. It is my growing conviction that nothing has so much tended to satisfy the minds of reverent inquirers after truth, to remove doubt regarding the Bible and the Christian religion and to set the feet of our generation upon the impregnable rock of God's Word as the frank investigation of revelation in the light of literary and scientific research.

But in what I have written I have kept in mind one inquiry, and have frequently called the attention of my readers to one question and one alone. That question is not, "Do you agree with my views as stated in these affirmations" That inquiry is not without interest at the proper time, for every man who thinks at all is glad to compare his opinions and beliefs with those of other men; and rarely is such comparison without profit to both parties. But in these papers my purpose has been different. I have been concerned to ask rather, "Does the position which I have defined in these statements consist with loyalty to the Word of God as understood by the fathers, and with the plan of the fathers themselves in their plea for a united church?" In other words, "Were the fathers right when they insisted that wholehearted acceptance of our Lord as Savior and Teacher was all that could be required of any man who offered himself as a follower and subject of Christ?" Having proclaimed this as our central contention for a century, must we now confess that we have been mistaken all the time, and that what we really insist upon is this apostolic confession plus certain definitions of inspiration, certain views of biblical literature, or certain theories regarding the church? If so, what do we more than others? Has it not been our charge that the denominations around us made their cardinal mistake in the fact that, not satisfied with this central and all-sufficient creed of the apostolic church, they went about to add to it some personal or denominational dogma or ritual or organization? Shall we now say that they are right and we have been wrong? That after all the primitive confession is insufficient? I contend that no inquiry is more profoundly timely than this. Upon the answer must depend the validity of our separate existence for these five score years. If we have been wrong in this, no excuse can atone for the sin we have committed in maintaining a distinct existence which we now thus confess to have been aimless and mistaken.

I am not prepared so to interpret our plea and our history, nor do I regard it as loyal either to the gospel or the spirit of the fathers to retreat under cover of a creed, written or unwritten, at the approach of a new truth. Such was not the custom of the fathers themselves. They were the children of their age, to be sure, and accepted many of the current views which have since lost their force through the growth of knowledge. But they were men who had freed themselves from the shackles of tradition and church authority, and went boldly to the Word of God to find for themselves its meaning. In this they defied the entire theological world of their day. Men stood speechless and indignant at their audacity. They were accused of irreverence, perversion of Scripture, and deadly heresy; and all because they preferred the lordship of Christ to the authority of human opinions. They set at naught the orthodoxies of their day because they had a larger vision of the gospel than the men who condemned them. And time has proved that they were right. Are we prepared to deny both our own heritage as their children and the verdict of the years? In such denial I wish to have no part.

I have been deeply interested in the responses that have come to me from the men and women who have been reading these statements of mine. Some have thought my position too conservative. They are of the opinion that the acceptance of historical criticism and the established scientific views of modern times, with their central principle of evolution, would rule out parts of my confession, such as any belief in Old Testament miracles, or the value of such books as Esther or Ecclesiastes, or the virgin birth or the nature-miracles of Jesus. Others thought me too radical, insisting that for themselves they could not dissent from a single satement of Scripture without involving themselves in perplexities which they dared not invite, preferring a faith that declined to question in the face of even rather obvious difficulties, to the effort to explore ways that might lead to worse confusion.

Between these rather widely-separated groups I have had almost every shade of opinion expressed. But two things have furnished me with abundant material for reflection and deep satisfaction. The first is that in no case, even where the divergence from my expressed views was the greatest, has there been any doubt uttered as to the right of a teacher and minister among the Disciples to hold and proclaim these convictions. Many have said in substance, "We believe you are in error in this or that view. We think your conclusions are too radical, or too hesitant, as the case may be. But we believe also that there is nothing in such divergence of opinions from those we hold to debar you from fellowship with us, nor deprive you of that "liberty of prophesying" which is the right of any man who remains loyal to Chirst.

The second cause of satisfaction is the large number of testimonies that have come to me regarding the help derived from a study of these statements of mine. I need hardly say that such words have not come from students of mine, for in the nature of the case those who belong to this class need no present instruction regarding the interpretations I have given to the Bible and to religious history during the years of my work as a teacher. Those who have worked with me in the class-room are fully aware that my interest in the Bible has ever been the result of a profound conviction that this Word, rightly understood and appropriated, is the most potent force for the making of Christian character. And they know as well that I have never had one method of interpretation for the class-room and another for the public assembly. Least of all have they been disturbed when sensational reports have reached them as to alleged destructive and revolutionary utterances of mine regarding the Bible. They are too well informed regarding my actual positions, and the capacity of the press, not only the secular but even some religious journals, to publish sensational and unsubstantiated reports of the teachings of men connected with institutions of learning. So it is not to the letters received from my students, numerous as these have been, that I now refer.

It is rather to those words of gratitude from men and women, teachers unknown to me, who assure me that my recent statements have helped them to a clearer view of the Bible and our history, and have enabled them to resolve some difficulties which they had formerly labored unavailingly to remove. Some of these friends tell us that by comparison of their understanding of Scripture with what I have written they have come to a deeper faith and a more confident assurance of the truth. It is ever a teacher's highest and most prized reward that he is able thus to be of service in clearing away the difficulties from the path of any seeker after God.

Let us once more make clear the fact that I have taken no pains to argue any point in my statements. The proofs, which are not wanting for those who desire them, are appropriate rather to the class-room, or the library where one who wishes to know the facts sits down with the volumes which contain the evidence, or even to such a department of the Christian Century as that of "Biblical Problems," where I shall be glad to consider any suitable question. But my purpose in these papers has been merely to indicate my own convictions upon the most important themes of our holy faith, leaving as a purely subordinate matter the question of assent to these convictions on the part of others. At the first thought of preparing such statements it was open to question whether they would be of any value or interest. Only with the hope of making clear one of the most important issues of this our Centennial year did I gain my own consent to obtrude the comparatively unimportant sentiments of one person upon the attention of a brotherhood like our own, quite capable of reaching its own conclusions without assistance. However, I am led to believe that the circumstances justified the pronouncement, and the appreciative words of every one of the many who have spoken in acknowledgment of help received, would be more than ample reward.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The Real Issue Not Theological But Moral

It is cause for regret among men of our brotherhood who accept the modern conception of religion that the current controversy has of late weeks taken a new turn. In the beginning it was a question of liberty; now it is a question of simple honesty, of veracity.

In the beginning it was assumed that Professor Willett held to certain views that differed strikingly from the conventional view which most people accept. The issue was joined on the question as to whether our brotherhood had room for a man holding to such views. The correspondence we have been printing in the past four issues treats of this question. The brethren who have been writing in to us declare that our brotherhood is made for just such men as Dr. Willett, that his is a typical case which our platform was fashioned to satisfy. The one unique thing that we have for a century been striving to do is nothing other than the building up of a fellowship so large and broad as to make room in it for any man who adopted or discovered new truth, so long as he maintained his loyalty to Christ the Lord.

If our platform means any thing it must be usable in a concrete case. It is not simply a fiction to preach about. Where would a man of Professor Willett's belief go if he should be cast out of our brotherhood? Who that reads his own words would say that he has no place among us? His very divergence from the popular view is a glory to our people, disclosing as it does the fact that the essential principle of unity is strongly grounded underneath all speculative differences.

This is our interpretation of the correspondence which continues to pour into our office. The Disciples of Christ insist that their plea for unity in faith and liberty in opinion shall not be taken as a mere academic theory but as a vital principle of their actual procedure.

But just now the issue has changed. The question of liberty has yielded its pre-eminence to the question of common honesty. This is most unfortunate. The Willett controversy is an ideal one in which to test the soundness of our contention that faith, not opinion, is the basis of our unity. Not a free spirited man among us, but hailed with satisfaction the opportunity to fight the battle of liberty to a finish. But the question is not now, "Shall the theory of miracles which Professor Willett holds or his critical views of the Scriptures be made a bar to his rendering a service among the Disciples?"

The question in the foreground now is, "Will the Christian Standard tell the truth about this man?" It is a simple case of honesty. It is not a deep, dark theological question now. It is such a question as the man in the street might discuss as well as our college professors. The Christian Standard has called Dr. Willett an infidel, a false teacher, a traitor to the principles of our brotherhood. It has charged that he disbelieves the holy scriptures and the divinity of Jesus. Its pages for weeks have teemed with misrepresentations of his position on miracles. And even when he declares categorically that he believes in the Virgin birth of Jesus it makes no correction or apology.

We do not refer to these several points because we hold them to be of equal importance. We are not making the argument that Professor Willett should be given room among the Disciples because he believes in the Virgin birth. We would prefer to stand with Evangelist James Small and declare that a man's inability to accept the Virgin birth is no bar to his fellowship and ministry among us. Our point now is that the Christian Standard has sinned and is sinning each week against common truth.

The question our brotherhood is facing now is whether we shall submit to the tyrannous demands of a publisher and his editors who not only refuse to retract their untruths, but who wantonly continue to give them circulation. In the earlier issue of the present controversy our theological position was tested. In this, the later phase of it, our moral sensitiveness and responsibility are being tested.

OUR NEW DEPARTMENT.

A new department appeared last week in our pages—"Events Current and Undercurrent." Rev. Alva W. Taylor will conduct this department from week to week. Mr. Taylor brings an admirable equipment to this task. He is a specialist in the field of sociology, hence will approach the happenings of the world with a true interpretative feeling. His residence of several years in England, supplemented by oft-journeyings on the Continent, gives him the point of view of the traveler who knows the scenes of which he writes. Besides, Mr. Taylor's ministry is a most practical one. He has interested himself in actual life and has succeeded in bringing to his people the interpretation of the actual world's current events.

An Introduction

This copy of the Christian Century is being sent to all the preachers of the brotherhood. Into the hands of some it is coming for perhaps the first time.

We wish to make clear why it is being sent. Of course we are interested as is every newspaper in adding to our circulation. But these extra copies are not being sent at our expense. We are not allowed by the postal rules to send so many as "sample copies."

You have received this paper as a gift from a number of your brethren, ministers and laymen, who believe a grave injustice is being done a brother and through him the whole brotherhood.

At this Christmas time our brotherhood finds itself in the throes of a grievous controversy. This controversy draws its life from the mischievous misrepresentation of a widely-read newspaper. We have striven in every way open to us to lay the truth before our readers.

Professor Willett, one of the editors of the Christian Century, has written and published a statement of his beliefs touching certain matters brought into this controversy. Of this statement, extending through five weeks, he makes a summary in the present issue.

The publication of this "Confession of Faith" has met with the heartiest approval of our readers who have taken occasion to express in emphatic words their sense of outrage at the shameless perversion of Professor Willett's teaching by the Christian Standard.

Many of these brethren in writing to us expressed the wish that every preacher of the brotherhood might see the pages of our paper in this critical time. They felt that the brotherhood did not have the facts. They saw that the Christian Century was giving the facts in a candid way and they wished all the brethren in our ministry might be put in possession of them.

We agreed to send the Century to all our preachers if our present readers would bear the expense. The response to our offer enables us to send this paper to you this week. The gifts to this fund are still coming in. We have received already a sufficient sum to meet the expense of this extra issue and a small surplus on another issue. We are hoping the sum will grow large enough to warrant our sending the paper three weeks at least to all our preachers.

We do not apologize for accepting gifts to spread the truth. It is an unconventional thing for a newspaper to do, we know. But the heartiness with which some have responded confirms us in our belief that we are giving them a chance to do the most important piece of missionary work they could find.

An Amazing Apostasy

The Christian Century recently took occasion to formulate six points of Professor Willett's belief, not as an exhaustive statement of his convictions in any sense, but as showing his mind toward certain matters which have been brought into the current controversy.

We named the following:

1. Professor Willett believes in one living and true God.
2. He believes in Jesus Christ as the Son of God, his Saviour and Lord.
3. He believes in the Holy Scriptures as the word of God, able to make men wise unto salvation.
4. He believes that Jesus was born of a virgin.
5. He believes that Jesus worked miracles.
6. He believes that Jesus rose from the dead and is a living, regnant Christ today.

The Christian Standard of December 12 in reluctant response to the demands of its readers that it print Professor Willett's "Confession of Faith" which ran for five weeks in the columns of the Century, quotes the above formulation and makes the following amazing comment:

"We regard the foregoing statement as very inadequate as affording a title to a representative teacher among us."

What could better disclose the utter perversion of the fathers' plea as it is conceived by the Christian Standard than this comment? That the Standard had fallen so far from the lofty position of Thomas and Alexander Campbell, not even the most predjudiced would have suspected. We thought our statement of six items in Professor Willett's belief was giving good measure, heaped-up and running over when only one item was demanded by our fathers. But now that the editor of The Standard asserts that even this is inadequate, will he be so good as to write down and publish for the brotherhood a statement of belief that is adequate? For a number of years we have been trying to get at the creed on the basis of which The Standard has been excommunicating certain brethren. We have hopes now of discovering it. Meanwhile many of our ministers and teachers who acknowledged Christ's lordship and divinity as the sole prerequisite to admission to his church will be anxious lest their fellowship has been obtained by the brotherhood under false pretenses.

The First Council of the Churches

The events of the first week in December will ever remain memorable in the annals of American Christianity, for there was then gathered in Philadelphia the first convocation of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Thirty-five religious bodies were represented. Some five hundred delegates were present. The host of Christians represented in this assembly runs to many millions.

When the first conference was held in New York four years ago it was a question as to whether the churches wished to unite in the work of the Kingdom. That great meeting set itself to ask and answer the question, "Is it worth while to make the effort to unite in the common tasks of the church?" The answer was instant and enthusiastic. The men there gathered believed that at heart all Christians are now one. It is the machinery of the churches that keeps them apart. But it is possible so far to unite, in spite of this fact, that while the walls of denominationalism are not openly attacked, they may be gradually undermined by that growing sense of brotherhood which is thus fostered.

With hearty assent to the general plan of Church Federation as a step toward still closer unity, the New York gathering brought its work to a close. Then it was the next order of the day to secure the assent of the different religious bodies to the plan. Most of them took early and happy action in approval of the movement. This was easy for those who had the right spirit toward union, and some representative body to give it expression. It will ever remain one of the anomalies of religious history that the Disciples of Christ, whose plea for a century has been Christian union, was one of the last of religious bodies to take action, and even this was not accomplished without strenuous opposition. But the action taken at the Norfolk Convention removed at last the reproach of lukewarmness and indifference, for which, as it seemed to casual observers of our history, there could be no excuse.

As the result of the plan thus adopted, thirty delegates were chosen to represent the Disciples at the Philadelphia gathering. It is a remarkable fact that of these, nearly all were present. No delegation showed a larger percentage of attendance. Those present were Ainslie, Bates, Batman, Carpenter, Crambiet Garrison, Lichtenberger, Hopkins, Miller, Kershner, Montgomery, Moore, Phillips, Power, Richardson, Remagen, Rutledge, Warren and Willett. Nor were they without voice in the council. Dr. Power of Washington presented the report of the important committee on Sunday observance. Levi G. Batman of Philadelphia was chairman of the nominating committee, and others had part at various times.

From the very start it was apparent that the council was not there merely to discuss the question of unity. That theme, indeed, received constant emphasis and evoked unbounded enthusiasm. But the unity of the churches was rather affirmed than discussed. The question was not, "Shall we unite?" but rather "Since we are united, what is our common task?" The themes which the assembly considered were the most vital interests of the church today. They included Religious Education, Foreign Missions, The Immigrant, Modern Industry, Home Missions, Temperance, Sunday Observance, Family Life, and International Affairs. These topics were not discussed as abstract or academic questions, but as the work of the united churches. The note of unity was evermore struck with insistence and power. Never have the demands of these various causes been made so imperious and compelling as in this gathering. Very notable were the pronouncements on Foreign Missions, Temperance and the Church and Industry. In the last named cause two great mass meetings were held on the Sunday afternoon, in which thousands of workmen were addressed regarding the mission of a united church in behalf of labor.

As a side issue, a very delightful gathering of the Disciples present at the council was held on Friday evening, the occasion being a banquet given by the Philadelphia brethren to their guests. Among the speakers, Dr. Garrison and Dr. Moore were heard with great interest. The former spoke of the Pentateuch of our history as a brotherhood, our Genesis, our Exodus from Sectarianism, our Levitical period of insistence upon the laws of the kingdom, our later passion for Numbers, and our final and happier estate of reaffirming, Deuteronomy-like, our allegiance to the fundamental ideals of our history. It was a pleasing comparison, though one felt that somebody had slipped into this Pentateuch of ours, in recent days, an unauthorized copy of the "Book of the Wars of the Lord."

One of the most interesting episodes of the week was a fellowship meeting of Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples, held at the assembly room of the Baptist Publication Society. It was presided over by Dr. Wayland Hoyt, one of the best known and beloved Baptist ministers. It was an hour of close fellowship. Every voice was urgent that the three peoples ought to be one. One of the Baptist brethren said, "If our Baptist name keeps us from uniting, we ought to abandon it, or anything else that stands in the way of union." It was the continuation of the close and loving fellowship of the recent Chicago Congress of the three bodies.

The council held one great public session in the Academy of Music. All the other sessions had been in the Witherspoon Hall. But on Monday evening the Academy was filled to listen to Dr. Aked of New York, Dr. Dunning of Boston and Bishop Hendrix of Kansas City, the President of the Council. At the close a reception was held, which gave a delightful social touch to the series of busy sessions.

The Council is now an accomplished fact in the life of the churches. The men who attended this first gathering may well treasure the experience. It will be one of the great dates in the history of American Christianity. Its influence will widen and deepen with the years and with the recurring convocations which shall register the advance of the churches in this great federation.

The Affrontery of the Christian Standard

The past few weeks disclose a change in the policy of the Christian Standard. It continues to print a page of irresponsible correspondence concerning Professor Willett each week. But its editorial tread is weak and hesitant.

In its earlier and characteristic policy it attacked its chosen victim with a frenzy of zeal. The victim was caricatured, his teachings perverted, the mind of the brotherhood sown with seeds of prejudice and fear. He was made of ill-repute among many of his brethren.

The earlier policy of the Standard was overt, brutal, relentless.

Its present policy is cowardly and shameless.

Its editorial page of last week says:

"The Standard has never presumed to inquire into the belief of Professor Willett, much less to make it the object of protest. We have had nothing to do with his belief nor do we desire to have. The objection is to his reputation as a scriptural teacher."

How different this sounds from the editorial of two months or so ago in which the Standard declared it would not be enough for the brotherhood to ignore Willett, "We must repudiate him." Then they appeared to be concerned about his beliefs and teachings; now they demand his withdrawal from the Centennial program only because of his bad reputation!

The Standard retires now to the cowardly position that it is not a question of justice, but one of expedieney that confronts us. Professor Willett is suspected by some brethren of being unsound, of being an infidel, of being disloyal to our cause and to Christ. Therefore, no matter what his real views are he ought, in the interests of peace, to withdraw from the Centennial program. This is the Standard's present position.

The brazenness of its present attitude is obvious to every one. Who gave Professor Willett his bad reputation? The Christian Standard.

How did the Christian Standard create a strong feeling against Professor Willett in many quarters? By carieaturing and wantonly perverting his teachings, and by printing bald untruths concerning him.

Is Professor Willett in bad repute in his home city? No, he was the president of the Chicago Ministerial Association last year.

Is Professor Willett in bad repute in his home state? No, he was president of the Illinois State Convention last year.

Is Professor Willett unacceptable on the convention programs of our brotherhood? No, he has spoken on the programs of more state conventions than any man among us in the last fifteen years, excepting our secretaries.

The point to bear in mind when the Standard argues that we face a eondition not a theory, is that the Standard itself is responsible for the eondition.

Professor Willett is not the cause of it. The Standard took occasion of certain daily newspaper headlines to create the condition.

When Russell Errett goes "down upon his knees" to pray that Professor Willett may resign it is important for every other worshipper to order his prayer by the fact that Mr. Errett has it in his power not only to solve the expediencies of the situation, but to distribute justice and a reign of good-will throughout the brotherhood.

And Mr. Errett can do this by simply publishing the truth about Professor Willett's teachings.

The Christian Century would guarantee peace if Russell Errett would do this.

If peace did not come our forfeit would be the withdrawal of our objections to Professor Willett's resignation.

"To Our Knees"

The President of our Centennial convention has called our brotherhood to its knees. It is such a message as we would expect from our good brother, C. S. Medbury. Prayer, he thinks, is the way to peace. We commend the spirit of his message. Useless controversy is to be deplored. We wish to do our part to emphasize the deeper religious life. But prayer is vain where there is determined and persistent unfairness. Brotherly treatment is a New Testament prerequisite for the Fatherly blessing.

Dr. Adam Clark, who was an early riser, was once asked by a young preacher if he rose early by means of prayer. "No." said Dr. Clark, "I get up."

The present difficulty in our brotherhood has been caused by "The Christian Standard" giving some earnest Christian men who have sacrificingly devoted their all to Christ and His cause the reputation among its readers of "infidels" and atheists; and now it objects to them because they have bad reputations. It refuses to say whether they believe well or ill, enough that their reputations are gone with a certain number. Who made their reputations? Undoubtedly this same Christian Standard. It painted the pot black and then reviled it for its color. Repentance of the old-fashioned sort is what we need today. The man who stole the horse must return it to its owner. No namby-pamby words about reputation will do for this hour. We are not scheming partisans, wishing above all things to elect our candidate. We are, or should be, Christians. A Christian regards not reputation; but the inner character. A Christian ought to make any sacrifice to set right a brother who has been wronged. Prayer is not acceptable while there is hatred in the heart. The worst thing that could happen us just now would be to have our iniquities covered over by mere semblance of piety. The knife must cut out the root of the disease. If money had been taken, every true evangelist would say, "It must be returned." If the reputations of souls have been taken, they must be returned. There should be manly confession. We must see clearly after the smoke of the present battle—and it is a battle—has cleared away, the enormity of the sin of defaming a brother's religious name. The way is clear. Let "The Christian Standard" be manly and make the rightful confessions and our brotherhood will have the peace of Zion once more.

A. McLean's New Book

We have just received a copy of A. McLean's new book on Alexander Campbell as a preacher. We laid aside every task and read it at once.

Did you ever sit watching a very skillful chalk-talker, One after another his quick strokes leave their lines upon the blackboard. It is just a network of lines to you until suddenly a simple stroke brings all the lines into a unity and a picture bursts upon your eyes. Well, A. McLean's writings affect us that way. His strokes are short and rapid. There is not a long sentence in this little book. It is a picture book in its effect upon our mind. We could almost hear Alexander Campbell preach. We could see him leaning on his cane and unfolding in his quiet and masterful way the Word of life.

It is almost startling how our type of preaching has changed since our fathers' day. Campbell contrasted with most great preachers in his thoughtful and poised delivery. He reasoned with his hearers. He eschewed all tricks of eloquence. The essential purpose of his sermon was instruction in the truth, the truth which, if it is once perceived, will be its own moving power. Nowadays we try to move men by hypnotism and by manipulating their emotions. Mr. McLean shows how free from all such trickery was this great preacher.

The book tells us what others thought of Campbell's preaching. It is a little store-house of encomiums passed upon him by his contemporaries.

Every preacher of our brotherhood will want to have the book. Fleming H. Revell publishes it. The Christian Century will be glad to circulate it. We will add it to our list of Christmas gifts with a year's regular subscription (new) to the Century! To preachers not now on our list we will send the book postpaid and the Christian Century one year upon receipt of $1.20. This offer to ministers will not hold good beyond Jan. 2.

Another Editor Speaks Brave Words

Last week we printed Dr. J. H. Garrison's emphatic statement made in the Christian Evangelist. The following letter from G. A. Faris, Editor of the Christian Courier, is one of the most vigorous and illuminating statements we have received.

My Dear Brother Willett:—For several weeks it has been my purpose to write you and assure you of my unshaken confidence in you personally and in your faith in my God and yours, but I am a very busy man, and the much serving which falls to my lot so completely occupies my time that only the necessary things receive attention. Then perhaps, I have inherited from some of my Celtic ancestors the weakness of procrastination. Indeed I could not say but I am a lineal descendant of Felix and am continually looking for the more convenient season. At any rate, in this matter especially, "what I would I do not."

The turmoil over trifles, the much ado about nothing, with which the reading part of the Disciples have been afflicted in the recent months—shall I not say years—has been both humiliating and painful to me. It is humiliating to know that men who occupy positions of prominence among us—whether by accident of birth, or by meritorious service, or even as a convenient vehicle for the furthering of designs, I do not pretend now to say—but that men in a prominent position should either be so ignorant of, or indifferent to, the plea our fathers made for a right to investigate the holy writings free from traditionalism and party bias, and for the one purpose to ascertain what they teach, without fear of the inquisitorial board, is indeed a most humiliating reflection. That a man who claims to be a disciple of the Meek and Lowly, in whose speech was never guile, should indulge in such characterizations, not to say caricatures, when referring to a brother, as has been most conspicuous from off the banks of the Ohio, causes me deep and genuine sorrow. I am persuaded that the influence of such a cause on the minds of the young, can be nothing less than to weaken their faith in men, which is next to the weakening of their faith in God.

I want to join the host of noble, brave and true men who are protesting against your resignation from the Pittsburg program. My protest does not arise from the fact that my friend and brother, H. L. Willett has been asked to retire in favor of another, but it is from the fact that the struggle of the Protestant world to free itself from the tyranny of a merciless and dominating hierarchy, has been too long and too hard, and has cost too great a price for the disciples to lead in the retreat. It is little short of a travesty for the Disciples, with all their boasted liberty from the yoke of bondage, to be the first to yield to this hybred of commercialism and an unholy ambition for power. They, of all others, should never yield to a self-elected master.

I cannot persuade myself that the missionary cause would suffer any appreciable loss because of the fight against you, simply because you are given a place on the program. This fight is not a new one, only a change in the maneuvers. Some four or five years ago it was hot, and the only evidence of shrewdness shown by the attacking party was to wait until there would not be time to get the facts before the people. They succeeded, in a measure, in lessening the receipts that year. This gave them courage, and last year they waged a hot warfare on McLean. They began early. There were many who felt that the cause of missions would suffer material loss. The results were both surprising and gratifying to the friends of missions. The same will be the result in this instance. We would have a good convention even if you should not attend, and we will have a good program even if you are not on it, but can we hope for continuous and permanent progress if we begin to cower before the self-heralded Lords, or fall at the feet of those who proclaim themselves great. Stand fast in your liberty, it is blood-bought and Christ-given. There are more than 7,000 who will not bow to Moloch. I believe in you, and I am one of a very large company. Stay on the program, go to Pittsburg and shame your tormentors. Your brother,

Dallas, Texas. G. A. Faris.

The Voice of the Brotherhood

We have had to forego our plans to present a Christmas number of the Christian Century to our readers this week. We had prepared some fine articles on the Christmas sentiment which it cost us no little grief to lay in the pigeon hole of our desk. It seems best, however, to continue the battle for peace through the truth than to sing the songs of peace while truth goes to the scaffold.

What a splendid offering for the deeper peace of our brotherhood is this splendid correspondence we here present! Not a few men here have made sacrifices to write thus. They feel the tyrrany of the Christian Standard. They know its power to poison the minds of their own elders or trustees against their trustworthiness as teachers and preachers. Yet they allow their names to be joined with others in a chorus of protest against the present injustice.

Next week we will print an analysis and interpretation of the policy of the Christian Standard for the past ten years. We believe its influence has been a blight on our free brotherhood. The exposure of its owner's and editor's insincerity made by A. McLean in 1907 was hushed by a pious appeal to prudence on account of the near approach of the Norfolk convention, just as certain of the brethren (including the Standard itself!), now counsel compromise on account of our Centennial celebration. Some goodly souls affect to think that all we need is to get on our knees and pray in a vague way for peace.

We do not honor God by using prayer as a substitute for clear thinking and brave conduct.

For ten years the brotherhood has closed its eyes to the grave moral menace of a newspaper tyrrany. Whether our not seeing is due to our being in the attitude of prayer or to our burly good-nature or to sheer moral obtuseness is not a pertinent matter now. The injury to our cause is the same no matter what the explanation.

The voice of the brotherhood has come to us in such a great chorus that any conceit of courage we might have indulged ourselves at the opening of the controversy has now no warrant at all. We feel that the best intelligence and heart of the brotherhood is back of us. Our pages will not hold a half of the correspondence we have already put in type. If we should add the protests of the brethren who ask us to keep their communications confidential, we could fill our paper for weeks.

The Christian Standard seems to me to have lost the capacity of blushing for shame. This persecution of Prof. Willett—and this is just what it is—only makes for him a larger place in the sympathies and affections of the brotherhood.

Shall Prof. Willett resign? No. A thousand times NO. If this battle has to be fought, let it be fought now, and fought to a finish.

Liberty, Mo. A. B. Jones.

The effort to cripple our missionary work by cutting off contributions to the missionary societies unless they knife Dr. Willett is utterly ignoble. It may certainly make it hard for our missionary secretaries who desire to make this our greatest year but they would betray the cause they are working to support if they yielded in a matter so clearly involving our liberty in Christ. We had better go to Pittsburg with a depleted treasury than with a treasury swollen by the barter and sale of our birthright.

Denver, Col. Wm. Bayard Craig.

His withdrawal would not bring peace. Some other pretext for continuing the war would speedily be found. The contention is not a personal one. A great principle is at stake. Prof. Willett represents the strong virile element in our brotherhood who believe in freedom. This dearly-bought privilege for which our fathers suffered we must now maintain even at the cost of peace. Let the decision be final. Do not open the question again. Unalterable firmness will now bring a swifter and more lasting peace than any sort of a compromise.

St. Louis, Mo. James M. Philputt.

Christian Century, Chicago, Ill.—Why should the Disciples of Christ in their Centennial celebration refuse a place to the man who stands preëminent in the brotherhood as a great scholar, a gifted and artistic orator, a cultured, Christian gentleman in one splendid personality, because forsooth some are displeased with his critical teaching?

In his own Confession of Faith he avows his fidelity and loyalty to the Plea in language as strong as was ever used by the Fathers. Without endorsing his critical views we can accept his allegiance to the Christ, his unflinching loyalty to the essentials of the Faith and the eternal verities.

Let us have our greatest men to represent us at Pittsburg and surely none will deny Prof. Willett a first place in the shining galaxy of stars in our firmament.

H. O. Breeden.

Editors of Christian Century: I firmly believe that the forcing of Dr. Willett off of our Centennial program because of any theological views he may or may not hold, would be little short of calamity and the saddest commentary that could be written on the plea of the Disciples for Christian unity.

Bloomington, Ill. Edgar D. Jones.

The Voice of the Brotherhood

For me (I do not say that it would be so for others), to in any way injure the cause of missions because some person was placed on the Centennial program with whom I was not in accord on theological quesctions, would be a sin against the Holy Spirit of Christian conquest for which I could not forgive myself in this world nor in the one to come. To me it would be an unpardonable sin.

Vincennes, Ind. William Oeschger.

I am anxious for but one thing. It is the feeling that you may become too sensitive over what may appear to some to be a self-seeking desire on your own part. I am sorry you consented for one moment to withdraw, even for so worthy a purpose as the shielding of our material interests. Of what value are they to a people who have lost their liberties, their vision, their prophetic purpose? If I may say it, the committee must be saved from itself.

Emporia, Kan. Willis A. Parker.

So far as you are concerned, I believe in you. I believe in your honor, your integrity, your ability and your Christian character. It hurts me to have you described as an infidel. I am an infidel too, concerning lots of things about which good men and able men differ.

Akron, Ohio. F. M. Green.

My Dear Brother Willett: These are times that move one to serious thought for our people and our cause. I have kept silent so far, but I must register my earnest protest against your resignation from the place assigned you on the Centennial program. The vital principle of our cause is at stake.

Carthage, Mo. D. W. Moore.

On this ground then, although perhaps we cannot as individuals indorse some of the philosophy of the gifted professor, we unhesitatingly demand his representative presence at Pittsburg.

Muir, Mich. G. N. Stevenson.

My Dear Dr. Willett: I desire to enter my solemn protest against your withdrawal from the Centennial program. Whether you will or no, the force of circumstances has made you the representative of the great body of our people who are opposed to the degeneration of our movement into a narrow, bigoted, reactionary sect.

University of Missouri (Columbia.) J. W. Putnam.

It may be personal sacrifice to your feelings to remain, but I believe, with many others, I hope, that you must recognize the responsibility of leadership which has come to you unasked because of your abilities and liberal attitude. There are no material interests in our brotherhood that out-weigh the importance of freedom in thought and speech concerning advancing truth.

Philadelphia. Arthur Holmes.

I received a circular letter from the Standard last week asking me to name what I considered to be the best things that had been said by our brethren in the past century. I replied as follows: "My Confession of Faith," Prof. Willett; "Shall Prof. Willett Resign?"; "The Simplest Way to Lasting Peace;" "A Silent Convention," by G. A. Campbell; and "Shall Prof. Willett Resign, by A. B. Jones; all of which are found in the Christian Century. I did it because I thought they were timely articles and the Standard ought to know what I thought of them.

Minier, Ill. W Harry Walston.

I desire to enter my protest against your resigning a place on the Centennial program. The committee acted wisely in voting to retain you. It is absurd that you should be asked to resign. The spirit that makes such a request possible is deplorable.

Selma, Ala. Ernest W. Elliott.

Dear Brethren: I have just laid down the Century of Nov. 21, and want to add my voice in protest against Dr. Willett's resignation. It will do no good. The same forces would only feel strengthened to similar persecutions. The man or church that would refuse to take a missionary offering, as one Oklahoma brother did, because of Dr. Willett's place on the program, cares little for the cause of missions and probably would do little in any event.

North Waco, Texas. Elsworth Faris.

The issue is: Shall we be a free people? It was not necessary for the committee to choose Prof. Willett. But since they have done so, and because of the motive and spirit of the opposition it is now necessary to retain him or surrender our claims of being free, and promoters of Christian union.

Sioux City, Ia. J. K. Ballou.

My Dear Brother Willett: For some time I have thought of addressing to you a word of encouragement and good will.

Have just been reading for the second or third time your "views."

I am unalterably opposed to reading any man out of the church of living God or out of that part of it known as the "Christian Church" for any opinions he may hold, although differing from my own, and I deprecate the efforts from certain ones looking in that direction or even tending in that direction.

Blackwell, Okla. H. W. Robertson.

It will be a grievous day for the brotherhood when the committee submits to the voice of any one paper or any one man on this matter.

Davenport, Ia. S. M. Perkins.

Dear Brother Willett: I want you to know that I consider it an honor to sit at your feet and be taught the divine word from the Books of Books, and you have my prayers and sympathy in your persecution. The Lord chasteneth those He loves, and let us remember and be patient and everything will come out gloriously and triumphantly in the end. In Christian love, I beg to remain,

C. C. Richmond, Ind. Samuel W. Traum.

To the Editor of the Christian Century: I wish to add my protest to the effort that is being made in one way and another to secure the resignation of Professor Willett from the Centennial program.

Pullman, Wash. L. P. Schooling.

I protest against Brother Willett's resignation in the name of the Kingdom, which always suffers from pharisaical devotions, in the name of our imperial position, in the name of Brother Lord as much as Brother Willett, neither of whom do I believe the Almighty has yet damned, and why should we? Last of all I protest in the interest of myself. For, if this proposition should prevail, I have lost the liberty wherein I was born.

St. Paul, Minn. A. D. Harmon.

Dr. Willett may be a heretic according to the Christian Standard, but he has given back to me a faith that was fast slipping away; he has made Christ nearer and dearer to me, and God the Father a reality.

PRESIDENT McLEAN'S NEW BOOK FREE.

To any new (yearly) subscriber to the Christian Century we will send a copy of A. McLean's "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher," free upon receipt of $1.50. This offer will not hold beyond January 2. See editorial page for special offer to ministers.

If this question must be settled, it may as well be now as later on. I am unalterably opposed to the surrender of our Christian liberty, even if such surrender will buy us the insincere friendship of the Standard for a year. I think I will feel ashamed to go to the Centennial, if the proposed truce is entered into.

The one man among us most coveted by other religious bodies is H. L. Willett.

An now this prophet in Israel is to be silenced by a Philistine who promises to then be good for a whole year.

The Voice of the Brotherhood

A church that excludes any type of mind, or that assumes an attitude of inhospitality toward any, or that creates an atmosphere in which only one type can thrive and others perish or are driven out, is not catholic, and ipso facto not Christian in the broad sense of the word—for Christ and the true church of Christ are catholic.

Manchester, N. H. E. M. Todd.

I am delighted with the paper as it now appears and also with the good work it is doing.

Kansas City, Kan. Wm. M. Mayfield.

I do not agree with Brother Willett in everything he has said. I think it quite likely that he would not agree in everything I might say. And so, there you are. I would be glad if the whole brotherhood could read all that he has said about the Old Testament and the New; all that he has said concerning miracles, the Messiahship and Deity of our Lord. I have enjoyed recent issues of the Century very much, and wish you success in its continued publication.

Very truly yours,

St. Joseph, Mo. M. M. Goode.

The New Christian Century Co., Dear Brethren: I received today a copy of your paper, dated Nov. 28, and have quite carefully looked it over. I am certainly pleased with Brother Willett's "Confession of Faith," and noble defense. I am more than ashamed of the illiberal and uncharitable and one-man ideas sent abroad in some other papers. "An enemy hath done this."

Rochester, N. Y. E. F. Sergisson.

Dear Brother Willett: I enclose to you check for $5.00 to give publicity to your position. It must be sent to all the ministers of our brotherhood. If more is needed from me let me know. I sincerely sympathize with you in the position in which you have been placed, without fault upon your part. I know that your personal preference would suggest to you a withdrawal.

Fayetteville, Ark. B. R. Davidson.

Editor Christian Century: I wish to add my earnest protest against the withdrawal of Dr. Willett from our Centennial program. Those who would make his appearing on that program a pretext to the withdrawing help from our missionary boards are surely not very strong friends of these boards. Some of us who have watched the course of certain papers in their unjust—not to say unchristian—attacks on Dr. Willett, are pretty thoroughly convinced that these papers are not full of the spirit of the Christ.

Thorp Spring, Texas. Addison Clark.

Dear Bro. Morrison:—I notice in C. S. that Bro. John L. Hill, of Cincinnati, Ohio, proposes that Bro. Chas. Medbury act as the pope of the Christian church and make appointments on Centennial committee to suit Russell Errett. Urge your patrons to write Bro. Hill and let him know what we think of the proposition, also Bro. Willett and yourself write him and by that way we can get the hot shot into the readers of the C. S. so that they can see the other side. I wrote Bro. Hill today.

Yours truly,

Salina, Kansas. J. C. McArthur.

Dear Bro. Willett:—Permit me to say that, while I do not find myself in accord with your conclusions as to many biblical and theological questions, I do believe you are a Christian man, and I do esteem you as my brother in Christ, and entitled both by faith and works to an honored place in the brotherhood.

Personally, I could have wished for men of your advanced views but little recognition on the Centennial Program. But, since the issue has been joined as it has, I am unreservedly with you in your battle for Christian liberty. Let no man dare to judge a brother or cast out a brother because of his opinions, while he is loyal to Christ both in faith and life. Stand pat.

Faithfully yours,

Santa Barbara, Calif. Sumner T. Martin.

Dear Brother Willett: I feel that you are under moral obligation to remain on that Centennial program. I feel furthermore, that you are in some degree blameworthy for having given for a moment your consent to any "agreement" that would give the appearance of peace if in reality there is no peace. What a piece of hypocrisy, what a travesty on the cause so near to the heart of Christ it would be to go up to Pittsburg and celebrate in Centennial convention, that cause as espoused by the Disciples of Christ, when that celebration was made possible by an armistice or "agreement" between the warring factions to suspend hostilities for a season! If your remaining on the program will endanger the success of our Centennial it is certainly pertinent to ask, are we at all ready for any such celebration? Better quit right now and have no celebration at all than to publish in Centennial convention a profession to which in reality there is no corresponding practice.

On the other hand I have no fear that that cause of which our brotherhood is the chiefest exponent, will be seriously imperilled because some of the brethren on that program do not believe as I do. A spiritual union, an organic unity, any identity if you will, that submerges individuality, that neither recognizes part nor admits of difference is worthy of the attention of J. P. Morgan or of some other curio collector. I rejoice to think that our people are broad enough to admit so great difference in matters of opinion while at the same time they are truly one in their common faith in the "Lordship of Jesus."

New York City. Herbert Martin.

Dear Bro. Willett: I want to see your Confession of Faith put into small book form that it may circulate among the people.

Anaconda, Montana. James Egbert.

If I live I am going to Pittsburg to hear that man Willett.

Greencastle, Ind. J. M. Rudy.

I never felt so strongly the importance of your going up to Pittsburg with a great message. I sincerely trust you will by no means resign.

Lawrence. Kan. Wallace C. Payne.

My dear Bro. Willett: I have had in mind for a long time to write you about the work here and to give some account of my stewardship, but have been waiting developments and so let time pass.

I wish to say now as regards the "issue of today in 'Discipledom'"—Don't resign from Centennial Program. This will never be settled till its setled right. I am aware that you desire to dispose of the matter and have peace—personally I love peace and cannot stand the strife; but we would better abandon a Centennial for another hundred years than to compromise the position of freedom and be bound hand and foot. It seems to me it's about time for some one to stand up and do the Patrick Henry act—talk bravely about liberty or death, etc.

I feel that if you are pushed aside on this, I go to; not because of a personal attachment, which I assure you is very great, but because of a principle of freedom and liberty.

Newberry, Mich. Baxter Waters.

Dear Dr. Willett: First I want to congratulate you and "The Christian Century" on the stand taken in our present unpleasantness in the church. I hope that "The Christian Century" will gain rapidly in its circulation, because it is now the paper that has the right kind of backbone. I think one can have the Christian spirit and at the same time stand firmly for the right.

I feel sure that all the right thinking men and women in our church would regret very much to see you resign from the Centennial Program. I want to enter my protest against your doing it. I can appreciate the situation in which you are placed and realize that you would now much prefer to resign. But then there is in this a principle of greatest importance involved. Of course you understand this much better than I do, but I wanted to let you know that we are with you even in the Panhandle of Texas.

Hereford, Texas. Elster M. Haile, President Hereford College.

Our church is a free church. We cannot consistently go to Pittsburg to celebrate the Centennial of this free church with the right of free speech curtailed.

Chicago. Parker Stockdale.

I wish it were possible to place the Century in all the homes of our brotherhood. I am pretty well acquainted with our Texas preachers and I want to assure you that Brother Willett is not without staunch and able friends in this state. I was talking about a week ago with the pastor of one of our strongest churches and he agrees with me that it would be a shame under the circumstances for Bro. Willett not to fill his place on the centennial program.

State Evangelist of Texas. W. O. Stephens.

I do not know where that other dollar went but here's another. Anyway I would willingly pay two dollars for such a paper as you are giving us.

Liberty, Mo. Graham Frank.

Dear Bro. Morrison:—Too long have we waited for the brave and honest word to be spoken. It cheers one immensely to have it come in the clean cut, straightforward manner, without bluff or buncombe as it does in the New Christian Century. I take very great pleasure in sending you Ten Dollars for the most important missionary work that has come before the Brotherhood in many a day.

Yours very truly,

Chicago. W. R. Faddis.

The Christian Century: Shall Dr. Willett's gracious resignation relative to the Centennial Program be accepted? By no means, unless we are willing to do a flagrant wrong and to perpetuate rank injustice toward the whole brotherhood, Dr. Willett specially included. The principle back of this situation is fundamentally wrong and un-Christian. Suppose this principle were carried to its logical conclusion. It would find its way to Cincinnati and beat loudly upon the doors of the Standard office. Admitted, it would demand that none of the men prominent in the editorial or business affairs of the Christian Standard should be allowed to appear on the Centennial Program. Why? Because before the high tribunal of most of the brotherhood they have been shown up as holding unsound and un-Christian doctrines and views. More than this there have been revelations of very questionable actions and attitudes toward our dearest interests, such as our missionary propaganda. By the same principle of the much self-heralded publication, the Christian Standard, must be excluded from the display rooms of the Convention, excluded absolutely for it is not representative of the brotherhood. If the above wish is not acceded to by the committee, then we will bring into action the coward's resort and exercise the boycott. We will cut our offerings to all missionary enterprises. Such would be the exact working of the principle. Will we do it? No! Emphatically no! If the Centennial Committee see fit to ask some of the inhabitants of the Standard offices to address the Convention we will abide by their good judgment and listen with patience and respect. If the owner of the Standard publications desires space to show his wares he is entitled to it. Such were the broad principles of Christian Charity for which our fathers stood and if we would do them honor now we cannot stand for less.

Cleveland, O. F. D. Butchart.

The Voice of the Brotherhood

THE CENTENNIAL BANQUET.

Why Some Guests Would Not Attend, and Why They Finally Changed Their Minds.

Once upon a time a fine old patriarch reached the age of one hundred years, and because he had always lived a virtuous and Christian life, he was still healthy and vigorous. So his children and grandchildren, even unto the third and fourth generation, thought they would celebrate the event by giving their friends, and themselves, a big dinner. It was to be the biggest ever, even in a hundred years.

So they sent out many invitations, and in each enclosed a copy of the menu card for the occasion.

Soon they began to receive replies and one said:

"I see you have 'Willett Consomme' on your menu. I do not think this is healthful. It is a modern mixture. It is not in accordance with our old Standard Cook book and I cannot approve of it. Kindly excuse me."

Another wrote:

"I observe on your card, 'Lake Trout, Garrison Sauce.' I do not like 'Garrison Sauce.' I know it is very mild. It does not, however, agree with my stomach, and I shall have to be excused."

And still another wrote:

"I have received your kind invitation to your Centennial Banquet, but I regret to note that you intend serving 'Lord-Standard Fillet of Beef with McGarvey Gravy.' This is too tough for me. I have tried this brand and cannot digest it. It gives me a pain. Kindly excuse me from your banquet."

And there were others. The old patriarch and his children, even unto the third and fourth generation, were greatly grieved.

Then the elder son had an inspiration. So he sat himself down and wrote a note to each one of the objectors, saying:

"This is to be a congratulatory banquet, and you will observe that the principal dish on the menu is 'Turkey with Harmony Dressing Seasoned with Love.' Therefore, come, and if you don't like some things on the menu pass up your plates for more Turkey."

And they all passed up their plates.

Denver, Colorado. A. E. Pierce.

The Christian Century:—Dr. Willett must remain on the program. He must not let the personal considerations weigh. Great principles are involved in this attack. Thousands of us stand for religious liberty. Thousands of us refuse to bow down before any self-constituted human authority. Thousands of us admire Dr. Willett for his true life, his broad culture, his ripe scholarship, his brave, generous and disciplined spirit.

These thousands of independent thinkers, men who dare to call their souls their own, who do not fear for their jobs, to whom reasonable liberty is a most precious possession, who value character above orthodoxy, who find social service more inviting than heresy-hunting, these men, who love our Saviour Jesus with a constant and undying devotion, who stand committed to His program, having found in Dr. Willett a representative of their convictions, now gather round him, and, lifting their swords to heaven, swear to defend him and to openly champion his cause, come what may. Sincerely,

First Church, Youngstown, Ohio. John Ray Ewers.

Dear Bro. Willett: Circumstances in the home have so claimed my attention as to preclude my giving much time to outside interests. But for this fact, you should have had a word from me sooner regarding the Centennial Program.

May I first express my admiration for the spirit which prompted you to make a concession to the opposition, in the interest of unity and missionary work. Such a spirit is to be envied, and will not be without its fruits, and were it a personal matter surely this communication would probably be unwarranted. But it is no longer personal. It is only one of a hundred other attempts on the part of the Standard to either whip into line with its conceptions of religion, or to silence, every Disciple who insists on his inherited liberty. While I probably do not share all the utterances you have made on critical questions, I wish to urge that you abide by the decision of the committee. A great principle is at stake, and hundreds of other ministers, like myself, are unwilling that any man or combination of men shall fetter the progress and freedom of the brotherhood of which we are a part. Not only is this true of the ministry, but I discover among some of the best business men in our Cleveland churches that there is a growing intolerance for the spirit of the Standard.

Heretofore, I have questioned the advisability of an open protest against the program of the Cincinnati paper, but I am not so sure that silence is longer a virtue. I have been much pleased with the several issues of the Century and believe it to be a move in the right direction. If the dignified and clean Christian spirit with which it is now permeated and dominated can be perpetuated, the result can only be wholesome and redemptive.

Cleveland, Ohio. W. F. Rothenburger.

Professor Willett is no farther from the great body of this brotherhood in his progressive views regarding the Old Testament than his critics are in their radically conservative views; therefore he is quite as representative of the brotherhood doctrinally. Spiritually he is quite as representative for he has called no names, challenged no man's integrity, endured the unjust representations of many of his critics with singular Christian patience and withal shown himself a Christlike man through these years of attack upon and misrepresentations of his teachings.

Eureka, Ill. Alva W. Taylor.

A. CORRECTION.

To the Christian Century:—In my article concerning Dr. Willett's resignation, published in the last issue, my first reason is given as follows: If Dr. Willett has convictions not in harmony with some, then is he entitled to a place on any platform of the Brotherhood," etc.

I wrote or intended to write "If Dr. Willett is in good standing in his home church, then is he entitled to a place on any platform of the brotherhod to which he may be called." Very truly,

Kansas City. T. P. Haley.

Dear Brother Willett: When I read the first short announcement in the Century stating that the paper had made safe financial harbor, and promising us good things and more of them for the future, my heart gave a bound of delight. I was, and am, more grateful than I can tell. The editorial and Sunday-school work have given me a double pleasure in that it not only fed me, but that I knew others were entering what must be to many newly opened doors leading into a truer understanding of the Word and far wider vision of things spiritual. I am reverently thankful that the faith and thought expressed through the Century goes forth to thousands of Disciples to the upbuilding of Christian character and consequent joy in life, and nobody is hung for it—yet. The vicious clamor at Cincinnati seems to me a "much ado about nothing," wholly inconsistent with the unity we profess to seek.

At the risk of being lengthy I must express my very high appreciation of Bro. Campbell's Department. His work reveals a rare nature. I truly sympathized with him during the storm period of his difficulties at Austin, when he must have experienced some heavy going days.

I like the tone and the trend of the Century. I am thankful there is a voice strong enough to speak the word that should be spoken, even though some dear old notion may now and then be overturned. I know that your editorial force appreciate the responsibility of speaking to the people, and I pray that all may have the spirit of the Master, a clear vision of truth, and steadfastness in the high vocation of teaching it.

If you do not appear on our Centennial Program there will be a deeper and more significant discontent than your appearance would cause. I am thinking, I am looking for a peaceful outcome, however. Surely after a hundred years, we shall not fail.

Sincerely yours,

Eureka Springs, Ark. Persis L. Christian.

My Dear Bro. Morrison:—It is well that our leading brethren are at last speaking out. The un-Christian and cruel domination of the "Christian Standard" is coming to the beginning of the end. The sad fall of its owner and editor was among the saddest events of my life, especially the fall of the former in whom I had as much confidence as I had in any man living. His heredity, his cultivated mind, his consecration to Christ, his polished pen; all gave him a prominent place in my mind and heart. In all my knowledge of journalism, I had not become acquainted with anything so reckless and audacious, and yet so successful in deception, as has been the course of the Standard for about ten years past.

We all can easily understand the anxiety of our missionary leaders for success in finance during the present year; also the burden of responsibility felt by the excellent chairman of the program committee, and indeed the entire committee. But why should these good brethren hire the Standard to do its duty.

Let Bro. Willett do as he pleases about resigning; I give him no advice. If he decides to accept, I shall feel proud of him; if he resigns, his future greatness is assured.

Brethren, "God is in the midst of His people; He will help us, and that right early."

Madison, Ind. J. W. Lanham.

I most earnestly protest against the withdrawal of Professor Willett from the Centennial program. This is no longer a personal matter but one in which the principle of religious liberty is involved.

The Voice of the Brotherhood

My Dear Bro. Willett:—I am glad you have published your "Confession of Faith." I have read the articles very carefully. Last July I discussed with a brother at Winona Lake, Ind., the question of protest against you being on the Centennial program. He felt the protest should be made. I felt it some, but not enough to write a protest or encourage any one else to do so. Now, however, I think the protestants in the wrong. The principle championed by them means an awful misfortune to our brotherhood. To insist that all ministers must submit to classification on theological views is wrong. I do not agree with many of your views. But I believe you to be one of Christ's men and I know you have a message of profit to our brotherhood. And so I hope you will be heard at Pittsburg. The Christian Standard poses as the guardian of the letter and tradition of the elders; the Christian Century champions the spirit of the fathers and reaches out eagerly for all new material by which to enforce and illustrate it.

South Bend, Indiana. Geo. W. Hemry.

Editor Christian Century:—All things work together for good to them that love the Lord. Doctor Willett will hold the largest audience ever assembled in Pittsburg at the Centennial, on or off the regular program. The more his persecution, the larger his hearing and the greater will be his ovation, let the ungodly pursue their course.

I want to call upon all Disciples of Christ to come at once to the support of the Christain Century in the different ways I shall suggest. We positively must have a paper like the New Century is starting out to be. The Christian Evangelist can not do the work necessary among the Disciples. Bro. Garrison is held back by somebody in his camp—like Russell Errett in The Standard drives Lord to his bidding. Let every Disciple who believes in the vigorous Christian spirit of the New Century at once make up lists of subscribers. I herewith enclose my check for three dollars for two years in advance and let hundreds do likewise. The Century needs to get out Sunday-school and other supplies and get into circulation where it can plant peace, love and mercy where the Standard has been sowing poison.

Brethren, let us go to work at once. Chicago should be the great central distributing point to the west. We can afford to help the Century in this way and they will be able to pay you back every dollar you help them with. Let every reader of this article send for the Century Nov. 28th and read it.

Kenton, Ohio. Henry Price.

Editor Christian Century:—Self-faithfulness requires that I record my earnest protest against Dr. Willett's withdrawal from the Centennial program.

Perhaps his opposers are as self-faithful as were the Jews who said to Jesus, according to our law you ought to die; adding "let his blood be upon us."

The dethronement of Christian liberty would be an appalling calamity to our brotherhood; and relatively to mankind.

The confession of Dr. Willett recorded in the Christian Century must satisfy all who know and love our plea.

Do we require anything but faith in Christ and a life conformed to his life? Would that we may escape from suicide in our first century. Slavery of intellect and will is the outrage of rational affection; and the suicide of positive Christian possibilities.

We cannot live Dr. Willett's life for him, but we can take away from the brow of our brotherhood a worse that useless crown of thorns. My heart instinctively corroborates every utterance of T. P. Haley and A. B. Jones, recorded in the Century of last week.

May the Father of all save us from the stupid sacrifice of rational self-responsible Christian liberty.

Bergman, Arkansas. S. R. Reese.

Editor Christian Century:—I want to congratulate you on the splendid fight you are making for the liberty which is vastly more to be desired than the peace and prosperity of which it has been proposed to make it the purchase price. We can afford to pay a large price for these things at this time, but never at any time could we afford to procure them at such a price as that. Better come up to Pittsburg suffering from all the hurt that can be inflicted by all the enemies of Christian liberty than to make a truce with treachery to the cause of Christ.

Any member of the Christian Church has a right to lift his voice in protest against any measure that seems to him to be inexpedient or wrong, but no man but one who is at heart an enemy to the cause he professes to love, ever deliberately backs such a protest with a threat to injure that cause if his protest is not heeded. The man who is ready to ruin if he cannot rule has ever been a prominent and familiar figure among us. His presence and his destructive work have been treated with so much toleration in the past that his office has come to be looked upon by many, as of divine appointment. If the present incident shall serve to open our eyes to the real spiritual status of such men, it will not have happened in vain. If it shall serve to teach us that the man who says: "If the objectionable tare is not uprooted I will turn the foxes with firebrands attached to them, loose in wheat fields to destroy them." cares more for his own opinions than he does for the cause of Christ, it will be in the nature of a most valuable centennial end that was not aimed at. Can any one imagine George Washington entering into an agreement with Benedict Arnold to allow him to dictate to the colonies on the condition that he would not betray them? The man who will, for any cause whatever, deliberately threaten the peace and prosperity of the cause of Christ is not a friend to that cause, and should either repent, or follow the example of Arnold and align himself with those who are openly antagonistic to it. The question is not whether Dr. Willett shall retain his place on the program, but whether the voice that threatens to ruin if it cannot rule, shall be heard on any question that involves the welfare of the kingdom of Christ.

Missoula, Montana. W. H. Bagby.

Read carefully our great premium offer in the advertising pages. Now is certainly the time to subscribe to the Christian Century. The books offered are in some cases worth the price paid for both paper and book. Besides, you can depend on it the Christian Century will be the most interesting paper published in our brotherhood during this our Centennial year.

Dear Brother Morrison:—The Century continues to improve. It is the right kind of journalism. I have long thought that we were wrong in standing wholly on the defensive, and that the thing to do was to carry the war into the enemy's camp. You are doing that bravely and well. Especially do I congratulate you on your mild rebuke to Willett for consenting to withdraw from the program. All interest is now taken out of the Pittsburgh convention for me. I shall go under protest.

Richmond, Va. H. D. C. Maclachlan.

Dear Brother Willett:—I assure you that I read the Century with increasing interest. It is on the right track and I hope it will be the means of leading us out into the larger liberty which God unquestionably has in store for us. As to your resigning from the Centennial program, I want to utter my strongest protest.

Stay where you are, and let the spirit that animated the Fathers be yours and in love and confidence go forward. Do not be content to simply repell the attacks but carry the battle to the gates, storm the citadel, and let it be demolished, that we may have no more of this "rending-of-heretics" for the sake of "filthy-lucre."

Much good has been done by your lectures in this great educational center. May God's blessing be upon you and though you may not enjoy this, I pray you endure it that the church you love may have the blessing. Give my love to all the brethren in Chicago.

Fayetteville, Ark. W. S. Lockhart.

Dear Bro. Willett:—I am sending you this little note to express my appreciation of your splendid service through the Christian Century. Pardon the criticism, but you have kept silent too long. You stand not only on the platform of "the Fathers," but on the side of Christian liberty and loyalty; and I believe that you will conduct the campaign in the spirit of Christian love.

I have not been a subscriber for the Century during the last year, but I have been a reader of it. I am just now ordering it.

I enclose a basis of Christian union upon which we Christians of various creeds are working in this newest part of California. I should be glad to see a review of it in Dr. Gates' column in the Century.

May the Good Spirit guide you and all who plead for liberty in Christ during this time of crisis. Sincerely,

El Centro, Calif. Geo. A. Ragan.

With others, I wish to express my sincere pleasure with the aggressive policy of the new Christian Century, though I am filled with pain that our Centennial year has the present controversy as its most conspicuous exhibition. All who believe that liberty and truth are the crowning acquirements of the race, and that truth is acquired through liberty quite as much as liberty is attained through truth, can but congratulate you upon your plain speech and noble contention. We may shout "Peace, peace," but there will be no peace until right prevails.

Professor Willett may no longer decide whether he remain on the Centennial program. It is a question now whether he and the committee will deny our plea for the unity of faith, the liberty of the gospel and the charity of the sons of God. The contention is no longer about a man, if it ever has been, but it is about a principle. There are plenty of us who, in our way, protest against the theology of some of our college men. But were it now a question whether or not Professor McGarvey or Professor Dungan should be allowed to appear upon the Centennial program, we should cry out just as we do now.

Professor Willett is a devout Christian gentleman and scholar, who is standing fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has set us free, and in so standing he represents the genius of the Disciples of Christ, just as he must do to save us from being a mockery to our plea. The firm stand of himself and the Centennial Committee is now one of the all-too-few exhibitions of the genuineness of our movement.

Iowa City, Iowa. C. C. Rowlison.

Dear Bro. Willett:—Permit me to add my protest against your withdrawal from the Centennial program. I am one who has been helped to a clearer and stronger faith from the reading of your books and editorials. I do not agree with you on all things in opinion, but I have long since been led to realize that after all it is the Christ himself, and not the miracles He performed, that attracts men and wins their loyal allegiance. Be that as it may, this discussion brings us again face to face with the charge of others that we are a denomination. And if the Standard is victorious in its present iniquitous campaign, then who can successfully disprove the charge of denominationalism when applied to us? In the interest of truth and liberty in the Gospel, I trust you will stand firm and make no compromise. Sincerely,

Fitzgerald, Ga. E. Everett Hollingworth.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Books.

As several recent books have come to my table for review, I give this page over this week to brief notices of a few of them. I am tempted to occupy the allotted space with an essay on Books. But Christian-like, I will make the sacrifice, and give but two quotations. The first is to answer the criticism, that books are only for the aristocracy of professional people. It is from "The Scrubbing Song."

"She sang a sweet song as she scrubb'd the floor,
The dear little maid with the dimpled face,
And eyes of the tenderest blue, and hair
That curl'd o'er her head with a childish grace.
The day it was raining, and dull, and dark,
Sweet Annie ne'er heeded, but sang away,
With the careless rapture of Shelley's lark,
That ravish'd the poet's soul with his lay.

For her thoughts were far from the dripping rain,
Away in a region of wild romance;
And still as she scrubb'd with her hands, her brain
Was teeming with visions of tilt and dance!

* * * * * * * *

Oh poets! romancers! your words illume
Our set grey lives with a radiance fair!
How oft and how sweetly you chase our gloom
With the magic spell of your visions rare!
For ever our souls through your fadeless bow'rs
May rove, though our fingers with toil be sore."

The second quotation, words by the late Lord Chief Colleridge, is in answer to the oft heard assertion, "I have no time to read books."

"I wish that men who talk this stuff could know what nonsense, and what shallow and foolish nonsense, too, they seem to talk to many not leisurable and idle, but plunged to the very throat in the business of the world, who yet seize, or make, opportunities for literary cultivation which are to them, indeed, golden moments in themselves, and in their results moments the most precious, the most delightful, and the most valuable of their lives. These men often do their work better because they come to it with minds refreshed and strengthened, and they move under the heavy load of the world's affairs with an admirable ease and grace and dignity, because they hear melodies that other ears are deaf to, and see upon all things a light to which untaught eyes are blind."

God and Me.

This is a little book of a half-hundred pages by Peter Ainslie, It consists of paragraphs on various subjects such as Fruit-Bearing, Bible Study, Prayer, Talking, Amusements, Companions, Finances, Death, etc. The book opens with a morning prayer and closes with an evening prayer. Both are sensitive to the finer spiritual movements of the soul. There is a liberal sprinkling of practical quotations throughout the book. I like this little book. I feel a real soul is speaking through it. There is no hard or narrow sentence in it. The author appreciates the universal. In the paragraph on "Books" is this wholesome affirmation, "If I can afford to buy furniture for my rooms or clothes for my body, I can afford to buy good books for the furnishing of my mental apartments, which shall still bear its decorations after this earthly tabernacle has crumbled." The emancipating power of good books is known to the author. The spiritual note of the book is simple, delicate and strong.

The Home Builder.

The Home Builder, by Lyman Abbott, has more of his heart life in it than any of his other writings that I have read. It is a beautiful, tender tribute to woman, to the woman who made a home a heaven on earth. "The Home Builder" is not a message to one class of theologians, but a message to the universal heart, to every lover of a home. The style is clear and restrained. There is deep emotion, so deep that it is subdued by the mystery of life. In these hundred and thirty pages one feels the benediction of a wise wifely and motherly presence. The reader is made to feel the power of a quiet, devoted and home-loving woman. Purity is felt to be a creative force. In it, as in "The Hanging of the Crane," are the silent marches of time. The daughter becomes the bride, and the bride matures into The Wife, The Mother, The Saint, and The Grandmother. And then comes the last chapter, "Alone." The Home Builder has gone to a higher home. Almost any paragraph in this book is worth quoting, but we refrain. It is a good book for husbands and wives to read together.

The Wider Life.

J. R. Miller has been long before us as a devotional writer. We are often suspicious of the so-called devotional writers. Not, as some have said, because they have too much emotion. All true emotion is worthy a place in literature. Life is emotion. Every experience quivers with it. The fault to be found with these books is that they are not true to life. They strain to be pious. The pen moves in a cloud. It does not record the reality of dust and smoke. Devotion must not be severed from reality. Piety and ruggedness must not be separated.

But J. R. Miller's "The Wider Life" does not distort life. It is balanced. He quotes from George McDonald; and any devotional writer who does this intelligently can be trusted not to "slop over."

The "Author's Word" is the plea of the book;— "We do not realize half our possibilities. We do not more than begin to possess our inheritance. Our hills are full of gold and we only scratch the sand and the shallow soil on the surface. We live in little bungalows in the valley when there are splendid palaces waiting for use on the hilltops. Shall we not push out our tent pins and get more room to live in?"

The Character of Jesus.

The author, Charles E. Jefferson, says in the introduction, "By 'character,' is meant the sum of the qualities by which Jesus is distinguished from other men. His character is the sum total of His characteristics, his moral traits, the features of his mind and heart and soul." Dr. Jefferson undertakes his task fully realizing what has already been done in the field. He writes, "The amount of labor bestowed upon the New Testament within the last seventy years," since the 'Life of Jesus' by Strauss, "has been amazing." In the chapter entiled "Reasons For Our Study," the author contends that the very thing our age needs to calm it and strengthen it is the message of Jesus. It needs his view of life. He says:—"Here, then, we find the supreme mission of the Christian clergyman; it is to help men to fall in love with the character of Jesus. The Bible is an invaluable book, chiefly because it contains a portrait of Jesus. The New Testament is unmeasurably superior to the old because in the New Testament we have the face of Jesus. The holy of holies of the New Testament is the Gospels, because it is here we look directly into the eyes of Jesus. We often speak of the Gospel; what is it? Jesus."

Dr. Jefferson is a preacher who connects vitally his study with his pulpit. The discourses contained in the book were first preached in his own church as Sunday-evening sermons. The chapters have such titles as "Jesus' Strength," "His Reasonableness," "His Poise," "His Gladness," "His Greatness," "His Optimism," and some dozen more. In first looking over the book I turned to the chapter on "His Narrowness." This, I thought, a rather daring title. But the chapter is safe. The author finds that the place of Jesus' ministry was a very limited one, that he confined himself to a definite message and that he refused to be prodigal of his approbations. Mr. Jefferson is a helpful writer and a stimulating preacher.

Counsels By The Way.

Separate essays by Henry Van Dyke have been collected in a single volume with the above title. These essays are: "Ships and Havens," "The Poetry of the Psalms," "Joy and Power," "The Battle of Life," and "The Good Old Way." A service has thus been rendered to the very wide-reading constituency of Dr. Van Dyke. These separate essays were noticed by The Christian Century at the time of their publication. Sufficient now to say that they are by the charming essayist, Henry Van Dyke. He has a delicate touch, a broad human sympathy and always a heartening word.

IMMORTALITY.

By Bertie K. Shipley.

I feel within the future life, the beating untried wing,
And voice the prelude to the song in ages I shall sing.
I build the future in the work now open to my eyes,
And lay the plans by which my soul shall in the end arise.

I feel the quivering of the flesh, the human house decay,
But glimpse the dawn that lies beyond life's twilight dim and grey.
I know that when this earthly house turns back to kindred sod
My life and work must merge into a greater work of God.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Breadth of the Union Problem

The wedding into one Earth's alienated Children of God, is a task as big as ever a human being set for himself. The unification of a nation or an empire is big enough to command the comprehensive genius and unselfish devotion of a Garibaldi or a Bismarck. If the unity of the Kingdom of Italy, or the Kingdom of Germany, is a task at which kings, patriots, emperors, and statesmen have need to work, for whose services must the vaster enterprise of the unity of the Kingdom of God call.

The unity of the church is an imperial problem; it calls for imperial genius, imperial knowledge, imperial courage, and an imperial spirit. It goes without saying that a man whose compass the interest and breadth of mind are just large enough to be deeply concerned as to whether a preacher should be called "minister" or "pastor," or the word disciple written with a big or a little d, has no business to be playing with the union problem. Stars and planets were not made for children to play with; and it does not make very much difference to the astronomical world what they think about them.

The Call for Big Men.

There are men who think that the biggest thing at stake in this union problem, and the most important issue, is a philosophy of baptism—whether baptism is unto the remission of sins, or into the remission of sins, for the remission of sins, or because of the remission of sins. And the settlement of this question of Greek grammar and lexicography is of infinitely more importance, and must stand in the way of confederation among Christians. How diminutive must be the plans and specifications after which such a mind is built! Think of Bismarck or Garibaldi suspending the unity of an empire upon such an issue as that. Men must have minds strangely enamored of trifles, who think of Christian union in terms of Greek particles. If such men were engineers on the railroad they would stop their engines to take flies off the track.

What Unity Means.

The unity of Christendom—how good and great the undertaking! How beneficent the issue! What are the items in the Count? "That the world may believe"—that Africa may cease to sit in darkness and the shadow of death; that starving India may be fed and be given a cup of cold water, and her prison doors of caste be broken down; that China may lose her ignorance and fear and may be delivered from the worship of demons and dragons; that the islands of the sea may be homes of peace and plenty, instead of habitations of cruelty; that the sword of Russia and the spear of Japan may no more be turned against each other; that the spirit of peace and good will may be sown in the hearts of all men, of capitalist and laborer, of black man and white man, of poor and rich, of high and low, of Protestant and Catholic, of Baptist and Pedobaptist; that the kingdoms of this world may become the kingdoms of the Lord and his Christ.

Church's First Business.

Such a problem as this can not be solved off-hand; it is more than a question for high school debate, or newspaper wrangling; it is a question for prolonged prayer and meditation, and age-long study. The Disciples have been working at it one hundred years, and there is much yet to do, before God's children shall be ready to sit down together about one table in the Kingdom of God. But it is worth working at for the sake of Africa, India and China; for the sake of the saloon-cursed streets and homes of America; and for the sake of the least of these His brothers, His sisters, and His little children, who go hungry and naked. For so long as the church of God is divided, and each sect goes its selfish way to build churches that are not needed, so long will little children, to whom belong the kingdom of heaven, cry for food because of hunger, and for clothing because of cold.

The first business of the church is to go about doing good; but it will have no time, strength or money to do good so long as it must spend all of its time and energy building up its separate ecclesiastical systems, and protecting them against sectarian inroads. The churches are too busy saving their own lives, to save the life of the world. The unity of Christendom means life to the world. Physical life, moral life, intellectual life, spiritual life—and all these in greater abundance. When will the church free her hands from her sectarian tasks, that she may set herself single-heartedly to the business her Master appointed her, both by his words and his deeds.

Foreign Missions and Union.

It can be truly said of the problem of Christian union, what an ancient Roman said of himself: "Nothing human is foreign to me." No event in the history of the church, past or present, can happen, that may not have some bearing upon the unity of the church. The modern missionary movement in foreign lands is showing that it has a contribution to make to the problem of union. Right now Christian union is farther advanced on the foreign field than at home. No student of the problem is acquainted with the latest literature on the subject, who is not reading reports from foreign countries. It raises an inquiry at once, Why is union further along there than here? Is the difference due to difference of race, difference of doctrine, or difference of conditions? Are the missionaries less Christian or more Christian than the Christians at home? The foreign mission movement has very much to do with the problem of union, and it may be that its ultimate solution will come by way of the foreign field.

Church History and Union.

If one is ever able to learn from the experience of the past, it is certainly true of the student of Christian union. The whole history of the church, in one of its most important aspects, is a contribution to the subject. We can not ignore what men have thought and tried in the quest for unity in the past history of the church. Every generation had its conception of unity, and made its effort to preserve or to secure unity. It is a grievous mistake to suppose that the Christian world never thought of unity until the nineteenth century. Every conception of unity and every plan of union, in principle and practice, was thought of and tried before the Reformation. All union efforts since the Reformation have been reversions to earlier historic types. It might save union leaders waste of time and effort if they would inquire how their plans and principles worked when they were tried in earlier times.

Prof. Briggs and Union.

The profoundest student of the history of union in America is Prof. Briggs, of Union Theological Seminary, and it is his ripe opinion that the most important lesson the history of the church has to teach relates to the unification of Christendom. He conceives the meaning of that history to lie in what it can teach concerning the consensus and dissensus, the agreement and disagreement of Christians. The march of events is guided by this one star of hope and purpose—that Christ's people may be one, as he and the Father were one.

Through all the history of the church's past, Christians seem to be doing but two things—agreeing or disagreeing, dividing and uniting. That is the meaning of the heresies, the controversies, the councils, the creeds—just expressions of Christions' agreement and disagreement.

Historic Longing of Church.

Everything that caused disagreement and disunion and every thing that promoted agreement and union, should be studied to ascertain lessons for guidance today. And there seemed to be no ideal so high, no longing of the church so passionate, during the first fifteen hundred years, as her longing for unity. It was longing for unity that wrote the Nicene Creed, that built up the hierarchy and papacy, that put Huss and Savonarola to death. The most ancient confession of the church—"I believe in the Holy Catholic Church"—was a confession of her unity.

If the church has been working at the problem of unity for nineteen hundred years—for her history is summed up in two periods, the period of union to the Reformation, and the period of division, since the Reformation—need we be surprised if the task seems difficult, and the consummation long-delayed? She does not lose the vision of her ideal unity in her Lord, and her heart does not fail her; for,

> "Mid toil and tribulation,
> And tumult of her war,
> She waits the consummation
> Of peace forevermore;
> Till with the vision glorious
> Her longing eyes are blest,
> And the great church victorious
> Shall be the church at rest.'

RELIGION—A SONNET.

By Arthur William Amass.

By every sect I'm called a different name—
Some tread through winter's snows with naked feet;
Some starve their bodies thin, refuse to eat;
But by what title called I'm e'er the same,
I court not fickle fortune nor proud fame,
I mourn to think of man's bewailed retreat
And how at death and doom his God he'll meet;
But then with out stretched hand his soul I'll claim.
I am the saint's belief, the sinner's hope;
I am the end of earthly pains and strife;
I am the thought that fills the mind of pope;
I am the prayer that marks the faithful wife;
I am the guide to those who blindly grope;
I am the resurrection and the life.

Sunday School Lesson

REVIEW.

The Sunday-school lesson for December 27 is Review. Professor Willett will continue the weekly exposition of the lessons for 1909 on this page. The series is on the New Testament Church—a study of the Book of Acts. No more valuable materials on the Sunday-school lessons are published than the Christian Century Exposition. Our readers have recently spoken in the heartiest way of the help they find on this page in preparing their lesson. Professor Willett strives to make the exposition especially valuable to the Sunday-school teacher, although any earnest reader enjoys his message each week.

The Prayer-Meeting

PROF. SILAS JONES.

How Would Jesus Keep Christmas?

Topic, Dec. 23, Isa. 54:7-14; Matt. 5:38-48; 26:6-13.

I suppose the question proposed for our consideration this week really means, "How would Jesus have us keep Christmas?" Taken in this sense, it leads to practical results. Here we are, with certain gifts and in a world abounding in opportunities for doing good. What are we going to do in order to show to the world that we are disciples of Jesus?

Good Will Among Neighbors.

The mischief maker is abroad in every neighborhood. He is lacking either in common sense or in good will. The most serious discord is that which comes from the lack of good will. It is hard to be genuinely benevolent. We speak of malice toward none and charity toward all when venomous envy is consuming us and making us destroyers of peace. The benevolence preached and exemplified by our Lord is so comprehensive and so deeply rooted in God that we poor mortals have but a slight appreciation of what it is. The lies that circulate freely in periods of political, religious, or personal controversy, the frauds of business and social life, the crushing out of human life for the sake of money, the disposition to classify people according to their wealth and not according to their moral and spiritual worth, all testify that the gospel of peace and charity is yet a strange message even in professedly Christian communities. Would not the Lord, if he were to come to us as he came to Martha of Bethany, ask us to lay aside anxiety for the mint and anise and cummin of the Christmas season and to pray that we might understand the spiritual values to which Christmas should direct attention? Not petty rules, not the formalities of giving and receiving, but Christ in us will create harmony among neighbors. "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, * * * * for we are brethren."

Good Will Among Nations.

"He made of one every nation of men to dwell on all faces of the earth." "I say," says Isidore of Pelusium, one of the church fathers, "although the slaughter of enemies in war may seem legitimate, although the columns to the victors are erected, telling of their illustrious crimes, yet if account be taken of the undeniable and supreme brotherhood of man, not even these are free from evil." Jeremy Bentham says: "Nothing can be worse than the general feeling on the subject of war. The Church, the State, the ruling few, the subject man, all seem in this case to have combined to patronize vice and crime in their widest sphere of evil. Dress a man in particular garments, call him by a particular name, and he shall have authority, on divers occasions, to commit every species of offence—to pillage, murder, to destroy human felicity; and for so doing he shall be rewarded." We have inherited the spirit of war from our savage ancestors. From Christ we are learning that the man of another race has a claim on our sympathy. We have no right to say to him, "Get out of the way and let us enjoy the earth, for God has given us power to take it and therefore it belongs to us." Christ bids us say, "Come and let us work together for a common good. Let us strive together to create conditions in which there shall be fit opportunity for every one to give and to receive benefits." The Christmas bells ring out the gospel of peace on earth if they ring in harmony with the will of Christ.

Good Will to the Outcast.

We have no reason to put Mary of Bethany in a class with the sinful woman whose annointing of Jesus, Luke records, but we believe that Mary loved the Lord because he was Saviour of sinners. Punishment is due to men for their sins. The law defines certain sins as crimes and men guilty of them are treated as enemies of social order. The public conscience puts its brand upon evil doers. The despair and suicide of defaulters and others guilty of betraying confidence bear witness to the power of the common conscience. But there is a wrong way to condemn the sin of another. The Pharisees chose the wrong way. They shut the door in the face of the outcast, locked it and threw away the key. The Christian must leave the door open for the return of the wayward one. He must so condemn sin as to awaken in the sinner the desire for repentance and restoration to favor. The Christmas season is not a time to forget the destructiveness of sin, but it is a time to show the love of Christ to sinful men. The message of Christmas is one of reconciliation. "Be ye reconciled to God."

Teacher Training Course

LESSON VI. SUNDAY SCHOOL ORGANIZATION.

PART II.—SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY.

1. NEED OF ORGANIZATION. The first step in the making of a Sunday-school is a proper plan of organization. This is as necessary for the school as for the business house or national government. If men conducted their businesses on the haphazard plan of many Sunday-schools they would soon end in the bankruptcy court. The Sunday-school is not a mass meeting for the counting of noses and listening to inspirational harangues. The real school is a compact, systematised body of men, women and children, marshalled, generalled and disciplined with a specific end in view. IT IS AN ARMY NOT A MOB. The following description, which will be recognized by many, expresses all that a Sunday-school should not be: "Attendance is voluntary and . . . irregular. Pupils come without the slightest preparation for the lesson, for nothing is required and nothing is at stake. . . . This fortuitous concourse of pupils is coralled in some dimly lighted vestry, sub-divided along the lines of least resistance into groups of a dozen and taught (?) after the Oriental manner in a perfect hubbub. Moreover the newsboy with his papers, the train librarian with his books stacked from finger-tips to chin, the census-taker and the tax-collector are given carte blanche and confusion is perfect."

II. ESSENTIALS OF ORGANIZATION. In organizing a new school or reorganizing an old one, certain general principles need to be kept in view:

(1.) PLAN. The plan of every organization should be subordinated to the end in view. The plan of a department store will be different from that of a railroad corporation, because one has to do with selling goods and the other with transporting them. In like manner the plan of the Sunday-school is determined by its educational end, and is that "OF A TEACHING INSTITUTION ARRANGED ABOUT A TEACHING FORCE." (Cope.) Whatever aids the work of teaching should have a place in the organization; whatever hinders it should be rigidly excluded.

(2.) THOROUGHNESS. The organization should be thorough. Every department of the work should be systematized; every officer, teacher, usher, messenger-boy should have definite duties and responsibilities. In the routine work nothing should be left indefinite. "ONE PERSON, ONE DUTY AND ONLY ONE" should be the ruling motto. Do not be afraid of the cry of "RED TAPE." All government is "red tape" to the anarchist. The "spirit" of the school will not be killed, but deepened, by system. "God is not a God of confusion, but of order."

(3.) ELASTICITY. While the organization should be thorough, it should not be so rigid and mechanical as to kill out individuality. RULES ARE SERVANTS NOT MASTERS. New conditions will constantly arise which need to be met either with new rules or modifications of the old. Especially is this true of the conduct of the opening and closing exercises and the actual work of teaching, in both of which anything STEREOTYPED or FORMAL is a hindrance to the object in view, the free development of the soul in contact with other souls. Care should, however, be taken not to suspend any of the regulations through FAVORITISM. If there are scholars who will not submit to rules, better sacrifice them than undermine the discipline of the school.

III. SEAT OF AUTHORITY. In organizing a school the first essential is to determine the seat of authority. An organization with conflicting or ill-defined authorities is to that extent ineffective. The rule for the Sunday-school is this: THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE CHURCH OR CONGREGATION IS THE SUPREME AUTHORITY IN THE SCHOOL. The constitution and powers of the governing body will, of course, vary with denominational practice, but the rule itself is absolute, except in those rare cases where the school has been organized independently of any church. The common practice of looking upon the school as an institution separate from the other work of the church and owing allegiance only to itself is hurtful to the best interests of both church and school.

IV. NATURE OF THE AUTHORITY. While in theory the authority of the church is absolute, it is the part of wisdom to make it CONSTITUTIONAL. The plan of organization should, if possible be drawn up in the form of a Constitution and By-laws, similar to those of other business bodies, in which the duties and responsibilities of the governing body are defined. These should be of the broadest kind, care being taken not to hamper the regular management of the school with unnecessary restrictions in matters of detail. At the same time the authority should be ACTUAL. The church authority should directly appoint all the leading officers of the school, select the course of study for the main school, pass on all large matters or policy and discipline, and in general exercise final supervsion over the work.

V. DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY. Where, as too often happens, the governing body of the church is as a whole out of immediate touch with modern Sunday-school work, it is advisable to delegate the powers above mentioned to a COMMITTEE or SUNDAY-SCHOOL BOARD on which the best Sunday-school talent in the church is represented. This Committee should meet at stated intervals, report regularly to the body from which it holds its powers, and for all practical purposes, act as the executive committee of the school. For the actual management of the school from week to week the powers of this Committee are delegated to THE SUPERINTENDENT. He is the captain of the ship, responsible only to its owner and God. While he will keep in touch with the wishes of the school on all points he will avoid the method of popular vote on any questions of school policy or discipline. A successful school cannot be a democracy. Next to the Superintendent and under his direction are the GENERAL OFFICERS (Secretary, Treasurer, Librarian, etc.), and DIVISIONAL SUPERINTENDENTS. Subordinate to the latter are the DEPARTMENTAL SECRETARIES and TEACHERS. The STANDING COMMITTEES exercise the authority of the governing body in regard to special matters such as missions, temperance, etc. The ideal Sunday-school organization thus constitutes a regular chain of delegated authority by which the powers, duties and responsibilities of the church are distributed through every part of the work.

QUESTIONS. 1. What is the first step in establishing a Sunday-organized? 4. Name three essentials of good organization. 5. How organized? 4. Name three essentials of good organization. 4. How should the plan of an organization be determined? 6. What is the plan of the Sunday-school? 7. Explain the justify "thoroughness" of organization. 8. Explain and justify "elasticity." 9. What should be the "seat of authority in the Sunday-school? 10. Explain what is meant by making the authority constitutional?" 11. What things should the church authority do directly? 12. To what bodies or individuals is the authority of the church delegated?

The Preaching for Men of Today

By Arthur Holmes

"Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursel's as ithers see us,
It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
And foolish notion."

Whether Burns received his inspiration for those lines in church or not, they seem to have a peculiar fitness when applied to the preacher in the pulpit. How refreshing is the naivete of the offender! How blithely does he lay about him amongst his men of straw-party-names, denominational interests, forgotten tenets, theological controversies—making the dust fly at every lick to the delight of the initiated, but to the utter bewilderment of the masses! Some church members with acquired appetites for such discourses may enjoy it, but what must be the hopelessness of ever touching the 50,000,000 unchurched by such means.

If, however, the amusement was merely harmless it would not matter so much. The fact is that the average preaching is not only out of touch with human interests, but its theology is positively repugnant to the average man.

Business men feel the laxity of emphasis upon real righteousness How much legalistic views of the atonement and easy escape from the consequences of sin are responsible for the lowering of business standards might make them an interesting study. Certain it is that the outstanding examples of indefensible finance and orthodox churchliness combined in the same individuals indicate no incompatibility between the two.

Patent results of such methods, however, are working a conversion in the hearts of business men. They would greet right heartily a ringing call from the pulpit for conduct worthy of Sunday professions, for lives commensurate with the ideals of Christ. They condemn theological dodging, the making of the religion of the only man who ever lived his own teachings, an empty shell out of which the kernel has been scooped by theologies.

To the workingman this is especially true. His constant feeling is one of unjust oppression. Something is wrong somewhere in the system which compels an innocent class to bear the burdens of prosperity and endure all the sufferings of adversity. He is willing to toil and to suffer if only he can gain a livelihood. The economic machine, which he has had no part in making, denies him the privilege.

He has heard of the church, perhaps, as the champion of the innocent and the oppressed. If he goes there and listens long enough, he will be astounded to find that its chief doctrine is no other than the one which rules his own world. The God of theology is pictured as permitting the suffering of the innocent for the guilty. A righteous man—a workingman, as usual—is put to death in the most fearful manner for the escape of sinners. This escape is to be obtained through a mere verbal acceptance of certain dogmas. In many cases no radical change of conduct is demanded; no restoration is mentioned. Past sins are blotted out; their material benefits remain with accrued interest. Such sinners, saved by grace, he sees sitting in the pews, who, in his opinion, every working day in the week are guilty of monstrous wrongs and whose dividends at that moment may be swelling by the Sabbath labor of many men. They make arbitrary rules, force down wages, neglect sanitary measures, dodge legal enactments, under-cut their competitors, use political influence. Some of them are under indictment in law-courts; others have been convicted and are out on bail; still others have pleaded the statute of limitations. Some have floated stock-companies and failed to their own enrichment. Yet they all sit in the house of God without writhing. Complacency is their chief characteristic. Whatever volley of words is being fired from the pulpit certainly does not touch them.

This day, is the day of face values, of essential worths, of impatience with shams.

The cry of men today is for justice. They want it in business, in industrial relations and in theology. The God whom they will honor must be a God of justice. The theory of atonement which they will accept is that one which hails every recreant sin to the bar of justice on his own merits. There must be no escape for saint or sinner. As inevitable as the law of nature must be the law of retribution. Justice first, mercy afterwards, for high and low, will receive a response from the moral sense of the world of men.

This is because men know their own weakness. They know they are prone to follow any theological doctrine, however false and hollow they may know it to be, which evades a clean cut and straightforward demand for real righteousness, for actual fulfillment of moral laws, as the strait and narrow way to eternal life. Therefore they need strong reiteration of the truth that virtue brings happiness. They are willing to follow any man who holds up ideals, practicable and vigorous, which demand from them the most heroic conduct. A brave message and a strong message is their expectation from the church of the living God.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

I have seen the following definition of miracle in a recent article on the subject:

"A miracle is an event produced by a special act of the divine will, but without the use of natural means, and is thus distinguishable from a providential event. Both emanate from special divine agency, and are, therefore, equally supernatural. But they differ in that co-operation with the forces of nature is involved in the latter case and not in the former. And it is clear that the definition of the miraculous, as here given, is comprehensive enough to embrace all miracles: such, for example, as the act of creation, which, so far from involving the use of natural means, was the divine act by which the whole machinery of nature was brought into existence."

Would you be good enough to say whether you would regard this as satisfactory?

St. Louis, Mo. Reader.

Professor Willett's answer to the above question is in type but we do not have space this week to print it. It will appear in the next issue. This page of problems conducted each week is eliciting the greatest interest from our readers.

EVENTS CURRENT AND SOME UNDERCURRENTS

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Is all the world that labors to be retired on a pension? Even this Land of Golden Opportunity is multiplying its pensioners by the thousands. England passes an old age pension act. Agriculture affords little occupation in that land where five-sixths of all that is eaten is imported and while the small shop keeper still holds his own better than here, yet the masses of Englishmen work for others than themselves and the major part of the industry in that factory plot of the world is in the hands of large corporations and syndicates. That the English laborer must be thrifty to the point of poverty to escape the "workhouse," the poorhouse of England, is proof that the laborer does not get his legitimate hire. The wealth of England is in the hands of a small percentage of the people and the workingman is to be doled out a "compensation" for the needs of his declining years. He labors and the capitalist receives the profits of his toil; the income tax collects a great sum from the capitalists for the government; the government pays the laborer five shillings per week to keep body and soul together if fortune has been kind enough to grant him the three-score-and-ten. This is very good for an emergency, but to right the thing means must be devised to give the laborer an equitable share from the wealth he creates and that is not so much a problem of law as of a social economy. Germany takes a portion of each pay envelope and draws upon the employer for a like sum and thus insures all wage earners. Our cities have adopted something like it quite generally for the school teachers. And now the great "trusts" are paternalistically adopting pension systems. The International Harvester Co., is the latest and greatest to begin this feudalistic benevolence. Several of the railroad systems do the same. There is much urging that Uncle Sam do it for all his employes as he does it for those of the army and navy service. Mr. Carnegie has given some $20,000,000 for pensions, chiefly to educators, and thereby hangs another tale—the fear that he will destroy the denominational, and with it the specifically religious, college. Again we say: It is good for emergency, it is the last chapter in a poor system.

THE BILLBOARD PUT TO MORAL USES

This is the age of the eye. We are in a great hurry and the times are fallen upon much learning. The bill board is omnipresent and a general nuisance because it is such a Munchausen and no respecter of the æsthetic. The popular journal and magazine appeal to the glance and tell graphic stories to him who runs while he reads. The latest use of the picture method of instruction as at the hands of philanthropy. On the country highways of England one sees great posters giving warnings and instructions regarding the diseases of animals. In France on both highway and street he finds the same salutary lessons applied to the diseases and temptations of men, especially those of alcohol. Germany, strange to find, outdoes her more spectacular neighbor and puts posters in prominent places that would vie with "Ten Nights in the Bar Room" bill boards. And she not only wars thus on King Alcohol, but educates the common people of her realm in the benefits to be derived from State Insurance against sickness, accident, and death, in the same pictorial manner. The Hoosier state has been endeavoring to obtain a State Housing Law, and its friends campaigned effectively with a poster picturing a tenement with a skeleton stretching its bony arm over the habitants while beneath the legend ran, "Death keeps watch over this house." The most striking use of this striking method was its use last month by the New York City Charity Organization's Committee for the Prevention of Tuberculosis, on the occasion of the moving of the International Tuberculosis Exhibit from Washington to that city. They had proved its power in a smaller way by giving away pictures of Venice in the Italian quarter and surrounding the artistic chromo, calendar like, with sententious instructions on the prevention and cure of the Great White Plague. They first put cards in the street cars with a flaming red double cross upon them with the inscription, "Watch For The Double Red Cross." After a sufficient time had elapsed to arouse the interest of the passengers, full announcements of the exhibit were substituted on the same kind of cards. Large theatrical posters were put on all elevated stations, hangers in railroad cars, and bill board advertisements were freely used. The result is the education of the city in the dread disease that is, as one of their many cards sets forth, "Contagious, Preventable, and Curable." Another characteristic inscription was, "We must care for the consumptive in the right way, at the right time, in the right place until he is cured; instead of as now, in the wrong way, at the wrong place, and at the wrong time until he is dead." Ten thousand visited the exhibit in one day. The death rate from this dread scourge among children in the metropolis has been reduced 55% in the past 23 years, and that among all classes 40% in the same time. But there are yet 400,000 sunless and airless rooms in that city.

EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS IN CHINA

The annual reports of the Commissioner of Education at Washington are interesting documents. Vol. 1 of the 1907 reports is at hand. It gives a very interesting review of the educational status and progress in all lands, the most interesting being that from China, in which the schools of Foochow are described as indicative of the whole educational movement in the Celestial Empire. It is pleasing to have it said that some day monuments will be erected to the mission schools which have not only blazed the way, but are setting the types for efficiency. Schools are springing up everywhere. Some are supported entirely by the government, others by a government grant to philanthropic institutions, and others are purely philanthropic. Great merit is to be obtained by endowing a school, and many of the rich are seeking it in these days. All these schools are founded on western models, though of course, in their haste many can be as yet but weak imitations. But in all history, geography, and mathematics are taught and the higher branches and science are given to the full extent of opportunities or knowledge at hand. Such live topics as high school fraternities and teacher's pensions, etc., are also treated in the volume.

MR. ROCKEFELLER AS A GETTER AND A GIVER

The last installment of Jno. D. Rockefeller's "Autobiography," which is running serially in Worlds Work, deals with the problem of giving. Whatever one thinks of Mr. Rockefeller's getting he must find his manner of giving commendable. If it be not well to take his money because of the "taint," it will do no harm to take his advice for the giving of the untainted. He argues for efficiency in giving and the giving that helps and does not undo. He also pays tribute to the generosity of the poor which he says is the greatest there is to be found and the most to be commended because to the small gift it adds a wealth of personal sympathy and helpfulness. It is gratifying to those of us who are condemned to comforts few and luxuries none, to hear him confess that there is no pleasure in the possession of great wealth nor in the things it may buy, but that both pall on their recipients and add to joylessness, and the only real happiness found by the rich is when they learn how to see their money do good.

IMPARTIAL STATISTICS ON TEMPERANCE

Dr. Henry Smith Williams is writing a very thorogoing series of articles for McClure's on the Temperance Problem. That in the December number is entitled, "Alcohol and the Community." The most conservative of scientifically found statistics makes the case look bad for alcohol, and the cold figures can at the best but show the minimum of fact in such a case. They tell us that one-third of all pauperism is directly traceable to drinking, but say nothing of the untold poverty; that one-fourth of all insane commitments are due to it, but the mental debilities and diseases are uncataloged; that two-fifths of the abandoned children are for liquor's sake, but who knows how many are neglected for the intoxicating cup; that four-fifths of the inmates of jails and workhouses are devotees of Bacchus and the tale of moral delinquency besides cannot be told. These figures, we repeat, are the most conservative to be found from unprejudiced reports and the author agrees with the Chief Justice of England, that if it could all be gauged, four-fifths of human crime and suffering would be found attributable to the cup that inebriates. A striking fact presented in Dr. Wilson's article is that the figures are uniform for the lands of whisky and those of beer and light wines. There is no temperate intemperance.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE CONGO SITUATION

The Congo Question will not down. Leopold has usurped the title of Abdul the Damned as the Great Assassin. Books were written, missionaries were poo-hooed, travelers "conducted" that their stories might be favorable, but "murder will out," and now that a Belgian Commission has substantiated the worst, the hesitant powers arouse themselves. Secretary Root discovers in the Brussels Act what he could not before discover, and remands his decision that we could have nothing to do with the situation, the King hands the government of the Congo Free State over to Belgium, and all looks roseate on the surface. But an analysis of the Treaty of Annexation shows that little has actually been done; that the chief evils have not been undone at all; that the only help to be expected is from the spirit of the new regime and little can be expected from that for it is especially provided that the old officiary shall not be disturbed; that the property grants to the concessionaries are not to be interfered with and that a great sum of money must be paid the king for his personal disbursement. The Act of Berlin provided that the new government should have all vacant lands, and Leopold took everything that was not occupied by villages and the small garden plots of the natives. It is as if our government took all the Indian lands except that their tepees were on and the little the squaws raised corn on. This land is not to be restored. The forced collection of the "rubber tax" which our own consul says requires as much as 265 days a year of work in the upper country is not changed. The fact is, Belgian senators are men of means and they are deeply interested in Congo concessions and they will not interfere with the richest treasure house in the world until forced to do so. Let us hope that Secretary Root and Earl Grey will see things righted.

CHICAGO

THE STOCK SHOW AT THE STOCK YARDS—WHAT THE CHICAGO SECRETARY SAW WHEN HE WENT WITH OUR COUNTRY VISITORS TO THE ANNUAL EXPOSITION.

The past week the live stock exhibition has been held in Chicago and thousands of out-of-town visitors have been in the city. Not only have the visitors from the rural districts been interested in the stock yards, but the residents of Chicago as well. There is no industry in the city of Chicago that employs as many men as does the meat packing industry. There is no city in the world that packs as much meat as Chicago. Therefore a visit to the stock yards and to the great packing houses is a matter of deep industrial interest.

Not only do the stock yards present a great and wonderful example of the specialization of modern industry, but they present some of our deepest social problems. The employes of the stock yards are for the most part foreigners. They come from Russia, Hungary and Poland. There are many factors in their social problem that are new to them and to us.

Acres of Pens.

As we enter the stock yards we see acres and acres of pens. In these are the cattle, hogs, sheep and horses that have been unloaded from the trains and are placed here for inspection. The pens are rented by the shipper from the stock yards company. The agents of the great packing houses go from pen to pen and buy the more likely stock when the prices favor them. The cattle are then rounded into the pens of the great packers.

On the inside, the killing of the animals has a scientific as well as a gruesome interest. The hogs are run into the killer's pen. A great iron wheel, with chains bearing hooks on the ends, lifts the hogs successively in the air where they dangle head down from a great iron track. A man with a long knife seizes these one by one, and knows how with a single well-directed stroke to prepare the poor hog for the dipping vat. The wheel is a symbol of the Fates. One by one the hogs are raised in the air to wait for the fatal stroke. This is much like human life. Perhaps the hog does not know what is coming, and neither does the poor human whose life will run out on the tragic switch some day, where the microbe executioner will do his deadly work.

We are more interested in the man with the knife, than we are in the fate of the hogs. What will be the moral effect of standing for ten hours each day with the long knife and plunging it into the warm quivering flesh? Some of these men are said to go insane. It was very clear that these executioners were all young men. No man grows old in such gruesome service. Shall a man brutalize himself and finally go insane that the rest of us shall eat meat? Here is but another example of the vicarious sacrifice that goes on continually in our highly organized form of society.

The Process Described.

As we go on down the line we see the hog, that was but a little while before hanging from a chain, dipped into the scalding water. Then it is scraped, different men being specialists on scraping certain parts, which is their sole labor. There are men who have stood for years in the hot steam and scraped a hog's neck. This is one particular job they know how to do better than does any one else in the factory. Should they for any reason lose their positions, however, they are more helpless than the ordinary man in turning to something else. The monotony of the task has destroyed the versatility that characterizes the ordinary man.

Near the stock yards is the long row of saloons on Ashland avenue. For two squares there is hardly a building that is not used as a saloon. We went along the street counting the saloons when we were accosted by a small boy who asked us what number we were looking for. We replied that we were not looking for a number but were counting saloons. He asked, "Ain't you tired?" We had to confess to a measure of fatigue before the task was finished. These fifty saloons cannot pay the high license fee in Chicago without doing some business. If there are more saloons in this neighborhood than in other neighborhoods in Chicago, there is more drinking as well. As the men leave the packing houses in the evening they crowd into the grog shops and it is soon seen that there are no more saloons than are needed for the accommodation of the community. The little urchins are on the street carrying beer to the home where the whole family partake of the alcoholic beverage which commends itself to the poor man by reason of its cheapness.

Conditions of Living Near the Stock Yards.

The conditions of living in this district are unspeakable. The policeman on the beat told us that as many as twenty people had been known to sleep in a single room. Every shanty and tenement building was literally swarming with people. We asked the policeman if it was not embarrassing to make a toilet in the morning in a room full of people of all ages and sexes. He replied that he thought not, for the people in these crowded quarters save bed clothes by sleeping in the clothes worn by day.

Many of the men of the stock yards have left families behind them in the fatherland. In the new country they are unknown and unrestrained. Moral conditions in this section are unspeakable. Wives are bought and sold like cattle in certain instances, if we may credit the statements of the policemen who patrol the district. Children grow up without the faintest glimmer of that modesty which is the shield and armor of every child born in our normal American society.

Relatively Little Church Life.

The church of the fatherland loses its hold in this section. If the newcomer finds the church in his language at all, he soon ceases to go. There is not the social compulsion here that there was in the fatherland. There are not the same reasons for going. He is soon subjected to the materialistic philosophy of the ranting anarchist or of the socialist with theory of a speedily coming Utopia. Perhaps he finds more real human fellowship in the saloon than anywhere else. It is here that a life spent in monotonous toil finds a brief respite, and, under the stimulus of drink and the warming influences of good fellowship, finds the poor joys that make life in the least tolerable.

Protestant missions are doing practically nothing for these people. Even where efforts are made, they are often the cheap and unworthy efforts that give the newly arrived foreigner a sense that the whole Protestant movement is weak and incompetent.

Shall we ask a man who has all his life worshipped in a cathedral with the most glorious music and the most awe-inspiring ritual, to worship in a dingy grocery store with rag-time Sunday-school music, no ritual at all, and only a poor subsitute of a sermon that deals with a doctrinal discussion of the right way to name a church, or the right turn to give to a pet dogma? Protestant missions have failed here because they have deserved to fail. They have often been cheap, patronizing and unworthy. We will have to sit at the feet of the old Mother church to learn how to deal with these people. Recently a new Catholic parish was opened on the west side. Before any people were gathered together to form the parish, a thirty thousand dollar church was erected and a competent priest installed. There was no question about that church lasting. There it was with its fine property and with its educated priest. It furnished every religious privilege that the other churches of the city offered. It had no invitation to a dingy grocery but had a finely decorated building adorned with works of art. If its forms of worship were meaningless, at least the feeding of the poor of the parish was intelligible. If its Latin had no message, its great hospital on that side of town told of Christ's spirit.

Settlement Work.

It is in the stock yards district that the greatest and most successful of the social settlements are located. It is here that we find a municipal bath house in a neighborhood that had no bath tub in a considerable area. It is here that the municipal playground for the children has been established and where it has brought its most abundant fruitage.

These men and women of the stock yards must be Americanized and Christianized. The final consummation of this task will be by a people who shall combine the great elements of power in all the movements now in operation. The people who shall reach the hearts of the men in the stock yards must have the deep mystical piety of the Catholic, they must have the rationalism and moral fervor of the Protestant, and to this must be added the practical and kindly service of the settlement worker. We have all these types there today, but they are not co-ordinated. As a bird cannot fly with one wing, so religion cannot progress with a single truth. As an orchestra reduced to one piece ceases to be an orchestra, so religion with a single program, is powerless for its task. More difficult than the task of foreign missions will be the task of invading the foul atmosphere of the stock yards and winning these brothers of ours from the slavery to sin.

The minister of the Disciples who undertakes this task will not be without serious handicaps. His freedom from tradition, his open-mindedness to new facts, his hearty sense of brotherhood and his simple religious message will be assets. It will be our glory, perhaps, to be used of the Great Father of all nations to open the way to the solution of the stock yards problem.

Living Issues.

"Fellow citizens," thundered the fiery, untamed orator, "what is the great question now before the American people?"

"What's the score!" yelled the audience as one man.—Chicago Tribune.

Where Diplomacy Failed.

"Young man, I was told today that you were the worst boy in the neighborhood." "Gee; if I was a man and any one talked that way about my little boy, some one would get licked." "Some one is going to get licked now; take off your coat."—Houston Post.

WITH THE WORKERS

There were two additions at the Salt Lake City Church the first Sunday in December. Dr. Albert Buxton is the minister.

The church at DuQuoin, Illinois, where Geo. W. Wise preaches, had five additions during the month of November. The C. W. B. M. day service brought eight new members into the Auxiliary and a good collection.

C. L. DePew will visit the Sunday-school at Timewell, Illinois, in January for an institute. G. O. Johnson is the superintendent of this Sunday-school which has en enrolment ten per cent greater than the church.

J. A. Barnett, of Galesburg, Ill., has recently held a meeting with his own church lasting for five and a half weeks. He was assisted by Wm. Leigh of Akron, Ohio, as singing evangelist. The meeting resulted in 66 additions. Of this number 37 came on confession of faith. All but seven of the number were adults. The outlook for the work is very good.

The Third Church in Ft. Wayne, Indiana, has been having a harvest time in their work. L. C. Howe of New Castle, Indiana, has held a short meeting with them which has resulted in 43 additions. The meeting was continued a few evenings with several more additions. The minister, H. E. Stafford, speaks in the most appreciative way of the evangelist, mentioning especially his knowledge of the Bible and of human nature.

Nearly every Protestant church in the city of Spokane is uniting in a union meeting to be held by W. A. Sunday to begin Dec. 20. A Tabernacle seating 8,000 people has been erected and a chorus of 1,000 voices is being organized. Union prayer-meetings are being held in all parts of the city and the interest and enthusiasm is marked. The preachers of the city are all working together in the greatest harmony and effectiveness.

P. C. Macfarlane has resigned at Alameda, California, where he has ministered so acceptably. A call has been issued to H. J. Loken, of Colusa, who will accept. He is a graduate of the University of California where he took high honors, and also a graduate of the Berkeley seminary. In addition to this he took a year of post graduate work in Harvard, winning a prize in oratory. He is a consecrated man and the church looks forward to a successful ministry.

The smallest attendance in nine weeks at the mid-week prayer-meeting of the First Church of Bloomington, where Edgar D. Jones ministers, has been a hundred. The average attendance had been a hundred and sixty-two. A religious canvass of the city recently conducted revealed over four hundred people expressing preference for the First Church not now members. Mr. Jones will hold his own meeting in January, and Mr. Wharton, the assistant pastor, will lead the singing. The future of this church is big with promise.

The ministers' meeting at Des Moines last week had the following reports from the churches. Central Church, Finis Idleman, pastor, two confessions, two by letter; Christian Tabernacle, Mr. Brown pastor, four confessions, nine by letter; Grant Park Church, Mr. Horne pastor, 21 confessions, 20 by statement; University Church, Mr. Medbury pastor, 5 by letter, one confession; Capitol Hill Church, Mr. Van Horn pastor, one by letter. This report would indicate that our churches were virile and useful in the city of Des Moines.

TELEGRAMS.

Harriman, Tenn., December 14, 1908.—Intense interest in our meeting prevails throughout the town. Our centennial aim for every meeting is as follows: Church membership doubled, current expense pledges doubled, Sunday-school enrollment doubled, ladies, missionary society doubled, and a religious paper in every home, some have been fulfilled in Harriman and others seem probable. May the spirit of evangelism dominate our great brotherhood. On to Pittsburg united in service. W. T. Brooks.

Anderson, Ind., December 14, 1908.—Meeting moves on in great tide. 426 added in twenty days, sixty yesterday, 1,267 at Sunday-school; great women's meeting in the afternoon. Noonday meetings held in factories, and afternoon meetings in country schoolhouses are awakening wide-spread interest. Scoville and helpers are at their best. T. W. Grafton.

Logansport, Ind., December 13-14, 1908.—Conducted rally for new members at Frankfort, Ind., last Monday. Nearly all the 835 converts of our meeting last April were present. Such a greeting! Words cannot express the sight; fully half were men. They are sober and in their right minds and faithful to the Lord. Brother and Sister Sias are popular with the whole town, and are stirring things right along. Sias is a great speaker, and pastor. Brother Clubb writes from Pomona that growing out of our recent meeting there nearly thirty thousand dollars is in sight for a new church, and church enthusiastic. Wonderful victory here at Logansport. Start with Abberley at Rushville after Christmas.

Herbert Yeuell.

Warrensburg, Mo., December 13-14.—Evangelist George Snively of Greenville, Ill., and Charles Altheide here in great meeting. Twenty-five additions today. Great men's meeting in the afternoon, most were adults. Church in brightest era of its history.

Geo. B. Stewart, Pastor.

Logansport, Ind., December 13-14, 1908.—Scores turned away tonight. Great men's meeting. Herbert Yeuell solving a very difficult problem for us here. For two weeks it seemed impossible in any way to win the confidence of either town or church for a large evangelistic effort. Sunday-school gained thoroughly; less than two years ago. Three other churches with special evangelists utterly failed to secure even passing attention. Yeuell is preaching to the best element among business and professional men, a thing no other evangelist has ever done here. Newspapers send special reporters nightly. Preachers from far and near attending; converts to date 114, twenty-four today. Unanimous refusal to close. St. John doing fine work with large chorus.

Joseph H. Craig, Pastor.

Garnett, Kas., December 10-11, 1908.—My second meeting this year at Fredonia, Kansas, closed with forty-two more added, making three hundred and two additions in both meetings, including most prominent business men and educators. Church and opera house, even greater crowds in second meeting than first. Now at Garnett, Kansas.

Richard Martin, Evangelist.

PRESIDENT McLEAN'S NEW BOOK FREE.

To any new subscriber to the Christian Century we will send a copy of A. McLean's "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher," free upon receipt of $1.50. This offer will not hold beyond January 2.

The church at Cato, New York, is without a minister.

L. L. Carpenter dedicates the new house of worship at Payne, Ohio, on January 3. J. Evard Smith is the minister.

Evangelist C. M. Smithson has just closed a good meeting at Johnston City, Ill., with twenty-three additions to the church.

Evangelist Crabb has held a meeting at Success, Ill., with fifteen additions. Mrs. Crabb sang at every service and lead the chorus.

Sumner T. Martin has brought his meeting in his own church at Santa Barbara, Cal., to a close. There were twenty-six additions in all.

John T. Stivers has finished a meeting with the Budlong Avenue Church, in Oxnard, Cal., which has resulted in thirty-nine additions to the church. Pastor Maddux is commended as an untiring worker in the service of the church.

A. L. Ferguson working under the direction of the state missionary force of Colorado, has just organized a new church at Limon of that state. He is now at work at Burlington and hopes to organize a church there.

W. P. Crouch has just closed a meeting with his own church with thirty-one added. This is his fourth meeting with this church and in some respects the best. At many services of the meeting the seating capacity of the church was taxed to the utmost.

E. E. Davidson has just closed a fine meeting with the Antioch Church in Davies County, Ind. There were 32 additions to the church during the meeting. Twenty six of these were by baptism. The church was greatly strengthened through the meeting.

Graham Frank is holding a union meeting for the Baptist and Christian churches of Excelsior Springs, Mo. This is the first instance in Missouri in which such a meeting has been held. They are having splendid audiences and a fine spirit, and will have a great meeting.

The Hyde Park Christian Church, of Kansas City, has just closed a revival effort which brought enghty-one accessions to the church. Louis S. Cupp is the pastor. He has had 145 additions to the church during the year 1908. The evangelists in the recent meeting were Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Thomas.

Mrs. Effie Cunningham, State President of the C. W. B. M. of Indiana, delivered the C. W. B. M. day address at Vincenn s on Sunday Dec. 6th. The church there greatly appreciated her fine address. The C. W. B. M. Auxiliary of the Vincennes Church is very strong. It supports S. G. Inman as its living link missionary in Mexico.

Evangelist Joseph Gaylor has just closed a four weeks' meeting at Blairstown, Mo., with thirty-six added to the church. The pastor, W. S. Mood, conducted the revival at its beginning, with twenty accessions. F. M. O'Neal lead the singing to the delight of all.

In less than six weeks, $14,000 has been raised by Pres. Zollars for the Oklahoma Christian University. This money was given by only sixteen churches. There is a tentative announcement to the effect that a hospital with twenty-five beds is to be affiliated with the institution. This will afford a training school for nurses and will provide the nucleus for the organization of a medical school in the work of the university.

WITH THE WORKERS

J. M. Lowe is in his second meeting at Agra, Kansas. He had about a hundred additions in his first meeting there.

Evangelist J. W. Camp has reld a meeting with the Antioch church in Morgan County which lasted eighteen days. There were 38 additions, 32 by confession of faith.

The pastor of the church at Tampico, Indiana, has held a meeting recently at Honeytown which resulted in 22 additions to the church, 18 by confession of faith.

J. A. Cornelius has had 32 additions since taking the work at Liberal, Kansas. In a meeting just before the election ten were added.

W. F. Turner, who has been laboring at Fulton, Missouri, has accepted a call to Peoria, Illinois, and will enter his new field about the first of the year.

The church at Boston, Mass., is prospering under the leadership of D. L. Martin. The church conducts a Chinese Sunday-school. At the Chinese Thanksgiving dinner there were 89 present.

Leon V. Stiles has undertaken to revive the work at Cherryvale, Kansas. The church has been without a preacher for some months with the usual result when pastoral care is not present.

Richard Martin is in his second meeting at Fredonia, Kansas. Last year he had 260 additions there. He held a meeting at Piedmont which resulted in the organization of a new church.

Gilbert Park is pastor at Howard, Kansas, but preaches at Lima in the afternoon. He held a meeting at Lima recently which resulted in 41 additions. 33 of these were on confession of faith.

Dr. Royal J. Dye was recently called away from his itinerary in southern Illinois by the serious illness of Mrs. Dye. A heat stroke on the Congo has produced a condition that occasions some anxiety. Dr. Dye expects to meet his engagements from Charleston.

The church at Thorntown, Boone County, Indiana, has lost one of its oldest and most loyal supperters. James Perrin was a worker in the shoe business at which he achieved great success. He has been for many years identified with the Disciples of Christ.

S. Boyd White has resigned at Bellevue, Kentucky, and has accepted a call to the church at Moberly, Mo. In his two years' ministry at Bellevue, he has had a hundred additions and has seen improvements made on the church property costing five thousand dollars.

The state of Wisconsin is to have a new paper devoted to the interests of the Disciples. It is edited and published by J. Harry Bullock, who is the state Bible-school superintendent. The various church interests of the state will co-operate in the publication of the paper.

The church at Lawrence, Kansas, dedicated a new church building last Sunday. This is the seat of the state university, and two hundred of our young people attend this university every year. The church at Lawrence is one of the younger churches of the state. The building cost $35,000, and the dedicatory exercises were in charge of F. M. Rains. The building will seat a thousand people and is finished inside with weathered oak. It is modern in every respect and will be an object of pride to our people in that state.

H. J. Otto has resigned the work at Princeton, Ind. He will close his work the first of the year. The Princeton Church has many splendid people in it.

J. M. Bailey, of Monroe City, Mo., is in a meeting at Hoger's Grove Church, Shelby County, Mo. F. W. Leonard of Canton filled the Monroe pulpit Dec. 6.

The church at Youngstown, Illinois, has held a meeting with home forces which added 14 to the membership of the church. The pastor is George F. Chandler.

The church at Twin Falls, Idaho, has just had the greatest meeting ever held in the state. The enterprise was led by the Clark family and resulted in 137 additions. Ray Beaucamp is the pastor.

C. P. Cauble began a protracted meeting with the Second Christian Church in Vincennes, Ind., on the last Sunday in Nov. There were four additions the first week. Mr. Cauble is the pastor of this church.

The church at Warren, Ohio, of which J. E. Lynn is pastor, is arranging to hold a meeting with home forces in January. Miss Edith Anderson of Springfield, Illinois, who completed her musical education in the school of music at Evanston, will lead the singing.

Stephen J. Corey of the Foreign Missionary Society, has prepared a statement with regard to the expenses of his society which will be mailed to any one requesting it. It is an admirable answer to the anti-missionary criticism that has been going the rounds recently.

Bruce Brown has undertaken a larger work in connection with his ministry at Valparaiso, Indiana. This is the location of the large normal school which has an attendance only excelled by Harvard. He is teaching a class that is preparing for Christian service in the ministry and on the foreign field.

The Lyon Street Church of Grand Rapids, Michigan, has just closed a four week meeting in which fifty were added to the church. The preaching was done by E. B. Barnes, the pastor. During his five months' pastorate, eighty new members have been added to the church. The Sunday-school has doubled in this time, and the Christian Endeavor society has experienced a similar growth. The singing was led for part of the time by Prof. Sturgis and later by Prof. William Leigh.

From the Bowen, Ill., dedication, Secretary J. Fred Jones made a visit to Christian University and made two addresses before the students. He is always a welcome visitor, and he claims that the trips pay, as they have about put an end to the raising of offerings in Illinois churches, by C. U. students, for Missouri missions. The students at Canton believe that Mr. Jones' address, "Mission Studies in the Book of Jonah," should be given a place on the Centennial program.

Gipsy Smith, the famous English evangelist, will hold a meeting in St. Louis beginning some time in January. He had the largest auditorium in Chicago packed to the limit with men at the noon hour when here and without doubt will leave a deep impress on the life of our sister town. The meetings in St. Louis will be held in the new Coliseum building which has recently been erected. Gipsy Smith is perhaps the sanest, most human, most modern great evangelist in the field.

W. E. Williams has left the church at Hamilton, Ohio, and has gone to Winona, Minnesota.

T. J. Legg, the state secretary of Indiana, has held a meeting at Delphi which resulted in 17 added to the church. The meeting closed prematurely on account of a scarlet fever epidemic.

One of the Centennial aims of the Rolls County (Mo.) Co-operation of Christian Churches, is that each of the seventeen congregations shall be represented at Pittsburg by at least one delegate.

Dr. Royal J. Dye is to speak at Vincennes on Friday evening Dec. 18. The meeting will be under the auspicious of the men of the church. The pastor Wm. Oeschger, is planning to make it a great meeting.

Evangelist J. W. Camp has held a meeting meeting with the church at Drakeville, Iowa, which has resulted in 32 additions, 26 by confession of faith. The church is ministered to regularly by Mrs. A. M. Sea.

The Violett-Charlton meeting at Canton, Mo., continues with good interest. Seventy-one have been added to date, about twenty of these being conversions. Their next meeting is at Shelbyville, Tenn., Mr. Violett's old home.

A number of churches of Chicago are uniting in preparing for a great song service on New Year's Eve in the Coliseum. It is expected to have a choir of 2,000 voices, and an attendance of 12,000. Dr. A C. Dixon is leading the movement.

Clay Trusty, the minister in the Seventh Christian Church of Indianapolis, has just closed a meeting with his own church which lasted two weeks. In this meeting 108 were added, 71 by confession of faith. There have been 190 additions during the year. E. A. Blackman led the singing during the meeting. This year's work is certainly a great credit to church and minister.

The First Church, Quincy, Ill., will graduate a class of seven in Teachers' Training Dec. 17. An attractive invitation is at our hand announcing the event. Various pastors of the city will take part, and the address will be given by Rev. O. W. Lawrence of Decatur. Clyde Darsie is the pastor, and G. L. Carley superintendent of the Sunday-school.

Mrs. Mina Greist, District Manager of the C. W. B. M. in the 12th District of Indiana, recently delivered an address at Vincennes before the C. W. B. M. Auxiliary. Mrs. Greist is one of the coming leaders in the women's work. Her address was greatly enjoyed by the large audience that heard her.

Canton, Mo., December 12, 1908.—A new church was dedicated at Bowen, Ill., Dec. 6, costing in round numbers $14,000, a pressed brick veneer, with stone trimming. J. Fred Jones conducted the dedicatory services, assisted by local and neighboring ministers, and, as may be known, it was a success. $4,200 was the amount needed to cover all liabilities, and it was exceeded by $200. To W. A. Taylor, the minister, belongs, perhaps, greater credit for the work than to any other, as he not only led and inspired the congregation in the undertaking, but allowed none to exceed him in financial willingness, giving himself $500 on dedication day, besides former contributions. The cause in Bowen has suffered much in the past from obscurity, but the prospect seems bright. Spicer and Douthit begin a meeting the first of the year.

WITH THE WORKERS

Children's Day for Home Missions was observed in the First Church, El Paso, Texas, with an offering of $30. H. B. Robison is the pastor.

Harvey Hazel of Imperial, California, has accepted a call to Boyle Heights' Church, Los Angeles, succeeding W. L. Martin. He is to begin January 1.

C. L. McKim closed a meeting December 7 at Oelwein, Iowa, with 33 accessions and some others yet to be baptized.. Noah Garwick of Waterloo assisted Mr. McKim. Several new families were enlisted.

A. A. Doak, Colfax, Washington, began at St. John, Monday, Nov. 30. He is gratefully regarded for leading the campaign in which the town voted "dry" last year. Prospects are good in this meeting. House crowded each evening, with nine accessions in first four days. Miss Ettie Gillen of Latah, singer, and a choir of forty help emphasize the Gospel call.

A very successful three weeks' meeting has just closed at Colfax, Ill., with sixty-six additions. T. A. Fleming of the Miles Avenue Christian Church, Cleveland, Ohio, assisted the pastor, Norman H. Robertson, during the meetings. He is a strong preacher and presents the Gospel in a clear cut and convincing manner. The church has been greatly strengthened and will push on to greater achievements in the Master's work.

Prof. A. C. Gray of Eureka College was granted the degree of M. A. by the Regents of the University of Michigan, October 21. Prof. Gray came to Eureka the first of the present school year from Ann Arbor, where he had spent two years as pastor of the Christian Church and student in the university. His work in Eureka College is meeting with great success. He is popular with the students and is a recognized leader in the affairs of the school. He has also supplied several of the leading pulpits of central Illinois since coming to Eureka, and the churches are pleased with his work.

Dr. Wm. Bayard Craig has been preaching recently in the Central Church of Denver, on the timely topic of "Mental Healing." Some years ago the false report was circulated that Dr. Craig had become a Christian Scientist. Happily the day has come when the truth involved in Christian Science may be extracted and defended without adopting the impossible concepts with which that creed works. In Dr. Craig's leaflet for a recent Sunday the following note is found:

"The pastor has no desire to give undue prominence to that phase of Christian truth that relates to the health of the body. Health is so closely related to happiness, however, that the one cannot be studied without considering the other. The desire is to help the people, not to awaken unprofitable discussion."

Baxter Waters is pastor of a union church in Newberry, Mich., the only Protestant church in the town. It is composed of Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, "and just Christians, that is, the ordinary unbranded men who believe in the spirit and teaching of Christianity." There is thorough harmony, we are told, among them, and a very precious fellowship. A long time without preaching prior to Mr. Waters' going there, their need is urgent and vital. A good Sunday-school has been built up, the general machinery set in motion, clubs and classes organized. Congregations are good and results in the life of the community are encouraging. The work appears to be perfectly practicable and Mr. Waters believes it as a contribution to the Home Mission as well as the Union problem.

William Oeschger preached at Bicknell, Ind., on Sunday evening Dec. 6th. The Bicknell Church has as yet not chosen a successor to Mr. Hughes who recently gave up the church to go to Jeffersonville, Ind. Mr. Oeschger was called in to counsel with the church to discuss the matter of selecting a pastor.

Read carefully our great premium offer in the advertising pages. Now is certainly the time to subscribe to the Christian Century. The books offered are in some cases worth the price paid for both paper and book. Besides, you can depend on it the Christian Century will be the most interesting paper published in our brotherhood during this our Centennial year.

O. E. Tomes, who recently left the Englewood church at Indianapolis to take the pastorate of the church at Ann Arbor, Mich., writes very encouragingly of his new work. There have been six additions, three by baptism—students from the university representing six different states, as follows: Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, Utah, California, Georgia. Two of this number are brothers of our preachers.

The fall campaign in the new building at Nelsonville, Ohio, starts off auspiciously. W. S. Cook, the minister, is in his third year and is preaching to the best audiences of his pastorate. The Bible school still grows and is the largest that it has ever been at this season of the year, averaging for November over 400. The rally day brought out 506 and a collection of about $150 was gathered. On Nov. 29, there were 407 in Sunday-school and seven were added to the membership of the congregation. The church is planning for a meeting in January with W. H. Boden of Athens doing the preaching and Ida May Hanna the singing.

The Redlands, Cal., Church gave a reception for F. W. Emerson and family Wednesday evening Dec. 2. Mr. C. A. Barker, an elder in the congregation, welcomed the new pastor and family on behalf of the congregation. Dr. Williams, pastor of the First Congregational Church, and president of the ministerial union, made the welcoming address on behalf of that body. Secretary Hollabaugh of the Y. M. C. A., spoke for the association and after a response by Mr. Emerson an adjournment was taken to the dining-room where the ladies of the church served refreshments. The work at Redlands opens auspiciously. There were thirteen additions to the membership the first two Sundays of Mr. Emerson's ministry.

The Alameda, Cal., Church on Sunday extended a unanimous call to H. J. Loken of Colusa, and he has signified his intention of accepting and will be on the ground about January 15. Mr. Loken is one of the best educated men upon the coast and a practical and consecrated worker. He is a graduate of the University of California, making in his closing examination the Phi Beta Kappa society, admission to which rests solely on the basis of distinguished scholarship. In addition to this he did a year's post graduate work at Harvard, winning the Billings prize in oratory and sermonizing. His work at Richmond and Colusa, his two previous pastorates, has been of the best.

The Alameda church is thoroughly equipped for work, and while its burdens are heavy, it is united and confident and prepared to render loyal service under Mr. Loken's leadership.

January 17 will be Mr. Macfarlane's last day with the Alameda congregation, and he goes to Kansas City about 3rd of February, ready to take up his new duties as secretary of the Men's Brotherhood.

A FINE MISSIONARY RALLY.

On December 2nd, A. McLean, Dr. James Butchart, and Herbert P. Shaw, assisted by a goodly number of neighboring pastors, held a Missionary Rally in the First Church in Vincennes. The sessions were held in the afternoon and in the evening. The afternoon session was devoted to short talks by the visiting pastors and the missionaries. In the evening our work on the foreign field was presented by the aid of the stereopticon. Moving pictures showing in a most realistic way conditions as they actually exist in the heathen lands were a great help in making the evening session very interesting and helpful. No rally ever held in the church ever succeeded in reaching so many people with the great facts of missions as did the evening session of this one. To all those pastors who are to have rallies held by these brethren in their churches this year, I want to say this, push the evening service for a great crowd. Your people will enjoy it. It will yield good returns. The prayers of our church go with these servants of God in their great ministry of arousing the churches to a keen sense of duty to the Lord's last great command. God bless them. Their stay is a benediction to the church in which they hold a rally. William Oeschger.

New York, Dec. 7, 1908.

Editor Christian Century. Dear Brother—The First Church of Disciples of Christ, West 56th Street, this city, has extended a unanimous call to Brother William L. Fisher, recently returned from Oxford, England. Brother Fisher has accepted, and will begin work January 1, 1909.

W. W. Burks of Nevada, Mo., who had accepted a call from this church in October last, asked to be released by the church, on account of the opposition of his family to coming east. His request was granted, and Brother Fisher called.

Editor Christian Century. Dear Sir and Brother—The Ministers' Alliance of Kansas City and vicinity desire to express their approval of the resolutions entitled "An Overture for Peace" which were adopted by the Ministers' Association of Indianapolis, Ind., Nov. 23, 1908, and presented for publication to the Christian Evangelist, Christian Standard, and New Christian Century.

J. H. Hardin, Chairman pro tem.

The above report was approved by 14 of the 18 members of the alliance present at the time of voting, Dec. 4, 1908, and a request made that the above named papers print this approval as soon as possible.

A certain prominent lawyer of Toronto is in the habit of lecturing his office staff from the junior partner down, and Tommy, the office boy, comes in for his full share of the admonition. That his words were appreciated was made evident to the lawyer by a conversation between Tommy and another office boy on the same floor which he recently overheard.

"Wotcher wages?" asked the other boy.

"Ten thousand a year," replied Tommy.

"Aw, g'wan!"

"Sure," insisted Tommy, unabashed. "Four dollars a week in cash, an' de rest in legal advice."—Everybody's Magazine.

PHILADELPHIA LETTER.

The supper at the Central Y. M. C. A. on December 4, marked a unique incident in the annals of our movement in Philadelphia.

The company numbered fifty-six, thirty of whom were ministers. Its uniqueness did not consist in the notableness of those present, though many of our leading spirits graced the occasion with their presence. The patriarchs were represented by that ever-young and facile-minded father of them all, Dr. W. T. Moore; the editorial staff was heard from in the simple, unity-breathing talks of Brothers Garrison and Lord; our colleges sent presidents Cramblet and Bates; the Home Mission Board sent Brother Wright; and the ministry proper was evident in a score of our leading divines.

But after all, the uniqueness remained in mere numbers; in the fact that never before in the history of Philadelphia Disciples had that number of our ministers been gathered here at one time. The fact is not due to the novelty of our plea nor to the brevity of our career. More than three quarters of a century ago the work was begun. It is a pioneer field. The fathers spoke here. Their sons and daughters are in our First Church which celebrated recently its 75th anniversary.

That we have so few churches as to make such an event noteworthy is not due to the difficulty of the field. The strong churches in Washington, D. C., the new Tabernacle Church at Baltimore, the splendid structure at East Orange, N. J., not to speak of the Western Pennsylvania District with its numerous powerful organizations and its great revivals,—all these facts have long ago exploded the theory that our plea and the east have in them anything inherently contrary or adversive.

The delegates at the Federal Council will testify to the wonderful receptiveness of Philadelphia for the plea of union. A little closer acquaintance would reveal as ready an acceptance of the simple Gospel teaching. Nowhere do formulated creeds count for less. Nowhere does the personal Christ reign so surely. Quaker influence has bred that spirit.

In our own church-history sporadic successes have further emphasized the fertility and fecundity of Philadelphia as a field for us. One example will prove edifying for both success and failure. Fifteen years ago a western minister took a small Philadelphia congregation and added more than one hundred net each year for five years, making it one of the largest and most promising Disciple churches then in the east. Yet, for the succeeding ten years, that same church, after drifting back to a nominal membership of 300, has beat time and today is one of our frontier outposts, advertising the current reformation by standing still,—but still standing. This incident is but typical of our churches in this city—success for a time, here or there; some permanent advance; stagnation and often complete annihilation; so that, though we have a Sixth Church, we have only four congregations.

The chief, if not the only reason for this condition has been the lack of persistent and systematic union of efforts. Each congregation has been so busy with its own affairs that no time nor energy was left for planting and caring for new centers.

One such union effort was made at establishing a mission, in a locality declared by Secretary W. J. Wright to be a more promising field than any other in America, save one, but after a fruitless year, supervision lapsed and the mission passed into quiescent history.

Such unified effort as is needed here is obtainable only through the large-hearted and broad-minded efforts of some one layman or minister. This is abundantly proved by recent events. That we have four churches today and not three or two, is directly due to the presence of a man large enough to see beyond his own threshold. Brother Batman, pastor of the First Church, has not only succeeded in coping with the problems of his own difficult field, but his influence is felt in all of our churches, and beyond our churches. To him directly is due the saving of our Sixth Church recently involved through an absconding pastor. He advised, visited, held meetings, preached, and collected money, and finally put the church on its feet with Rev. Lawrence Fenninger at its head.

The Kensington church, too, owes the presence of its promising yong minister, Rev. L. Higgins, and its present prosperity to the energy and wisdom of this bishop of our people.

His prominent place in the recent Federal Council showed that other denominations are ready to give us large recognition in committees when we have men energetic and capable enough to accept responsibility and willing to co-operate.

Due then to the presence of this one leader, and to the body of faithful and willing brethren—as fine a body as exists anywhere—our cause in Philadelphia presents as strong and hopeful a front as it ever did. Such a condition will maintain as long as Brother Batman consents to stand by the work cheerfully, courageously, and persistently do the work of a pastor of a congregation and a bishop of the churches.

WABASH AVE, AKRON, O.

The revival conducted by C. D. Mitchell and his singer, E. E. Bilby, in the Wabash Avenue Church, Akron, O., was a great success for the place. In many ways the meeting was better than any ever held there before. The audiences were larger, additions more numerous, and the co-operation of the other churches in city more consistent than ever before. Clarence D. Mitchell of Lima, O., did the preaching. He received only words of praise from the church and from the visitors. He was greeted by a large crowd. They were glad to come again to hear him. He makes a great appeal. There were sixty-seven who heeded it. Prof. E. E. Bilby is not only a good singer but an exceptionally fine cartoonist. His sketches of Christ in the various experiences of his life are fine. He was assisted by a chorus of forty voices.

My resignation as pastor of the church had been accepted by the church officers before the meeting began. Having accepted a call to Steubenville, O., I requested that it be not made public until after the meeting had closed. I never compelled myself to do a harder thing than I am now doing when I leave this church. However it is in fine condition for the next man the church may call.

A. F. Stahl, Minister.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

Again the Week of Prayer draws near. Beginning with Sunday, January 3, the followers of Christ the land over are summoned to come together nightly for prayer and study. The great practical enterprises of the church furnish the themes.

Sunday, January 3—"The Law of the Harvest."

Monday, January 4—"The Bible—The Word of God."

Tuesday, January 5—"God's Faithfulness--Man's Responsibility."

Wednesday, January 6—"Missions, Home and Foreign."

Thursday, January 7—Intemperance and Gambling."

Friday, January 8—"The Family and the School."

Saturday, January 9—"The Signs of the Times."

Sunday, January 10—"Christ, the Giver of Life."

We encourage the holding of union meetings in towns and neighborhoods so far as practicable. These topics are the great nonsectarian themes of the Kingdom of God. To consider them in united services should be an aid in the promotion of fellowship and unity.

Charcoal Purifies Any Breath

And In Its Purest Form Has Long Been Known As the Greatest Gas Absorber.

Pure willow charcoal will oxidize almost any odor and render it sweet and pure. A panful in a foul cellar will absorb deadly fumes, for charcoal absorbs one hundred times its volume in gas.

The ancients knew the value of charcoal and administered it in cases of illness, especially pertaining to the stomach. In England today charcoal poultices are used for ulcers, boils, etc., while some physicians in Europe claim to cure many skin diseases by covering the afflicted skin with- charcoal powder.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges go into the mouth and transfer foul odors at once into oxygen, absorb noxious gases and acids and when swallowed mix with the digestive juices and stop gas making, fermentation and decay.

By their gentle qualities they control beneficially bowel action and stop diarrhoea and constipation.

Bad breath simply cannot exist when charcoal is used. There are no ifs or ands about this statement. Don't take our word for it, but look into the matter yourself. Ask your druggist or physician, or better still, look up charcoal in your encyclopedia. The beauty of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges is that the highest pharmaceutical expert knowledge obtainable has been used to prepare a lozenge that will give to man the best form of charcoal for use.

Pure willow and honey is the result. Two or three after meals and at bed-time sweeten the breath, stop decay of teeth, aid the digestive apparatus and promote perfect bowel action. They enrich the supply of oxygen to the system and thereby revivify the blood and nerves.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are sold everywhere in vast quantities, thus they must have merit. Every druggist carries them, price, twenty-five cents per box, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail, free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

THE ARIZONA CONVENTION.

Last August the Long Beach Convention authorized the Secretary, in conjunction with a committee of Arizona brethren to call a Convention and secure the co-operation of all our churches in the work of evangelizing that great territory. This movement has met with most hearty response on the part of the brethren interested. The Convention was called for Thanksgiving time on account of the special railroad rates then prevailing, and at Tucson because that city is central to the churches already organized. From the beginning and before, W. H. Salyer, of Temple, has been the soul of this movement. He came to Long Beach and pleaded for it; he was made Secretary to "boost" the enterprise; his mind formulated much of the program and wrote the hundreds of letters, which created the interest; brought the delegates, and made the assembly a pronounced success.

The three days program was carried out as planned and with an enthusiasm worthy of the cause. Delegates were present from every church, except the infant congregation recently organized at McCabe. W. E. Spicer and son came from the great mining camp at Bisbee; A. B. Carpenter and wife represented the Smelter City of Douglas; from Tempe traveled W. H. Salyer and W. S. Austin; while Lawrence Williams headed a delegation of six from Phoenix, the capital City, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Avis, Miss May Frazier, Mrs. Fred Warren and Mrs. Warren. Besides these there came Mrs. Reba B. Smith, C. W. B. M. President, E. W. Thornton, Sunday-school specialist, and Grant K. Lewis, Secretary, all of Southern California. Each one of these delegates traveled hundreds of miles, and all night long, was present at the first session and remained to the very last, and knowing that this was no "hot air" affair but that "Business for My King" was at hand, each church sent pledges to support the work, the total of which reached $512.50. Every great interest of the Brotherhood was represented on the program. The convention felt that Arizona should remain under the wing of the California Board, and decided that their part was to "get under" an evangelist to enter new fields, organizing churches, remaining in each case until a pastor is located and his support raised. To do this an Executive Committee, with an Advisory Board representing each church, was appointed.

Mrs. Reba B. Smith, fresh from the New Orleans Convention, and visits to the Mission Fields, gave a fine stereopticon address on "Missionary Work in Many Lands." E. W. Thornton, returning to the coast from a three months' study of the leading men and methods of the Sunday-school World, stopped off and fixed attention on Bible Study; Grant K. Lewis had a sympathetic hearing as he spoke on "The Christian Conquest of America." W. H. Salyer opened our eyes to the great opportunities as he spoke on "The Field and the Harvest." The Thanksgiving sermon by Lawrence Williams made all hearts overflow with gratitude. The address of A. B. Carpenter on "Christian Union" inspired all with the feeling that the thing most essential in "Our Plea" is to make it in the Spirit of Christ. And the Convention sermon by W. E. Spicer brought a gracious benediction to the Convention

The local effect of this truly great Convention is beyond estimate. A little church struggling for life in a wicked city was made to feel the strength of comradship as it grasped the hand of sympathy and fellowship.

Thus in every way the first Convention of Christian Churches in Arizona was a marked success, and deserves this passing attention of the chronicler, both for its sake and that of posterity's interest.

Grant K. Lewis, Secretary.

EVERY CHURCH SHOULD USE OUR

Individual Communion Cups

The best way to prove the merits of this cleanly method is to use a service at a communion on trial. We will send your church a complete outfit to use before purchasing, to be returned to us at our expense if not found perfectly satisfactory. To receive service give us number of communicants usually in attendance and we will send an outfit. Over 5,000 churches use our cups. We furnish bread plates and collection plates in several styles. THE NEED OF A BOOK AND TRACT FUND.

The Disciples so far have failed to meet a great responsibility. They certainly have no reason to be ashamed of the plea they are making; but they have, perhaps, depended too much upon its inherent strength to work its way to the public conscience. Success in any great enterprise is achieved only through wise and efficient means. Now it must be evident to every thoughtful disciple of Christ that thousands of the more intelligent people can be reached only through good books. This is the day of the library. But what are we, as a people, doing to supply these libraries with such books as will disseminate the the great principles for which we contend? Furthermore, are we using the only means by which many thoughtful people can possibly be influenced by sending books to them to read?

What we need, just now, more than anything else is a fund that will enable us to select the best books and tracts that have been written by our brethren and send these to such persons as may likely be influenced to accept the principles of the plea we are making. If a selection could be made from some of the best books that have been issued, and these could be sent to every minister in the United States, the result would be incalculable for good. It is scarcely probable that a fund can be supplied that will reach this end at once, and yet something can immediately be done in this direction.

I propose that we begin the accumulation of a fund, the interest of which shall be used for the purchase and distribution of our best books and tracts. Even if $10,000 can be secured, this sum would be a beginning, and if it should never be larger, it would accomplish a great deal. I hope, therefore, there will be no delay about this matter. Let us raise that amount at once, and let it be placed under the control of a wise board of managers, to be selected by the donors, the details of which may be arranged just as soon as the fund is secured.

I propose, therefore, to contribute myself $100.00 to this fund and may give even $500.00, if the matter is taken up cheerfully by others. No one shall be bound to pay the promised subscription until at least $10,000 has been assured in pledges. Who will answer this call? Send your pledge either to the editor of the paper in which you see this notice, or to me, and your pledge will be announced from time to time so as to encourage others to do likewise.

In my judgment this is the most encouraging opportunity to do good that now offers itself to our brotherhood. I hope that the amount I have indicated, as necessary to secure the pledges made, will be more than quadrupled in a very short time. Speak out, brethren, at once on this all-important subject.

Columbia, Mo. W. T. Moore.

OUR EXCHANGE.

W. A. Moore, First Christian Church, Tacoma, Washington, wants to correspond with a vocalist who will direct the church music and in return have use of studio in church building and receive the co-operation of 1,000 people interested in the work of the congregation. A similar proposition will be made to a violinist and a pianist, an excellent chance for persons of extraordinary ability.

Levi S. Ridnour wishes to make evanvelistic dates to work after January 1, 1909. His terms are expenses and free will offerings. A good singing evangelist could find permanent work with Mr. Ridnour for some time. Address Osawatomie, Kansas.

ABOLISH CHILD LABOR!

The National Child Labor Committee has designated Sunday, January 24, or Saturday, January 23, 1909, as Child Labor Day, and through the medium of the religious press is appealing to the clergymen throughout the country to devote some part of that day to the interest of the defenseless child workers in factories, mines, mills and sweatshops. The committee invites clergymen to speak on the subject of child labor at a regular service or to have it considered in Sabbath-school or young people's society. The call is endorsed by a large number of representative New York ministers in a letter addressed to the clergy.

The Federal Church Council meeting in Philadelphia this month, representing thirty-three churches and nearly eighteen million communicants, unanimously adopted a resolution declaring that "the churches stand for the abolition of child labor."

Of the two million working children in this country, many thousands are in forms of labor not only injurious to the body and preventive of education, but which also offer the maximum menace to the moral life. This is sufficient warrant to call upon the churches to devote one day to these of whom Jesus said "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish."

The National Child Labor Committee in its four years of work has witnessed improvements in the child labor laws in thirty-four states and is making a special effort at this session of Congress to secure the authorization of a Federal Children's Bureau. In a pamphlet recently issued by the committee, the purpose and scope of this bureau

"Such a bureau should investigate and report upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life and would especially investigate questions of infant mortality, the birth rate, physical degeneracy, orphanage, juvenile delinquency and juvenile courts, desertion and illegitimacy, employment, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children of the industrial classes, legislation affecting children in the several states and territories, and such other facts as have a bearing upon the health, efficiency, character and training of children."

Literature describing this bureau; addresses by the leading experts of the country discussing the relation of child labor to health, education, citizenship, morals and the family life; suggested topics for sermons and selections for use in platform or conference meetings, or in Sabbath-schools, will be cheerfully furnished without charge on application to National Child Labor Committee, Owen R. Lovejoy, General Secretary, 105 East 22d Street, New York City.

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS HAS BEEN TOO LONG MADE A COVER FOR PUBLIC CRIME. LIBERTY OF THE PRESS IS NOWISE DIFFERENT FROM ANY OTHER LIBERTY. A MAN IS FREE TO USE HIS CANE, HIS HANDS, AND HIS FEET; BUT IF HE USES HIS CANE TO BREAK IN A JEWELER'S WINDOW, HIS HANDS TO STEAL THE JEWELS, AND HIS FEET TO RUN AWAY, HE IS ARRESTED AND PUT IN PRISON. HE IS FREE TO USE HIS PRINTING-PRESS; BUT IF HE USES IT TO ROB AN HONORABLE MAN OF A WELL-EARNED REPUTATION, AND TO MYSTIFY AND MISLEAD THE PUBLIC ON PUBLIC QUESTIONS, HE OUGHT TO BE PUT INTO THE SAME PRISON ALONGSIDE THE OTHER THIEF. TO STEAL A REPUTATION IS AS TRULY A CRIME AS TO STEAL A PURSE, AND IT IS HIGH TIME THAT AMERICA RECOGNIZED THIS SIMPLE AND SELF-EVIDENT TRUTH.

PUBLISHERS' COLUMN.

Those who are interested in our welfare will be glad to learn that new capital has been enlisted and an aggressive business management arranged for.

One of the things which strikes the new man is the large number of subscriptions which seem to be in arrears; if these were brought up to date, our large plans for turning out a good paper, "better than ever," could easily be carried out. Will you not respond promptly and save us the expense and labor of sending bills? In addition to accepting our invitation "to pay up" will you not show your interest still further by sending in at least one new subscription with your own? This can be done with very little effort on your part (some have sent 6 or more) and will easily double our list.

Gladden our New Year by keeping us busy taking in the money and putting names on our list.

We shall be glad to furnish sample copies for distribution, and can allow a small cash commission where a church is thoroughly canvassed.

This issue of the paper is going to many ministers who are not regular readers. We want your name on our subscription list; you need our paper "in your business." To enable us to "get together" we make the following special offers (to ministers only):

1. Send us 25 cents, and we will send you The Christian Century for 3 months, or
2. Send us $1.00, and we will send you The Christian Century for a year, or
3. Send us $1.50 and we will send you The Christian Century for a year and a copy of the Centennial book, "Historical Documents," bound in cloth.

Now is the time to subscribe. Note our new address, The Christian Century, 235 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

Who Will Lead the Prayer Meeting?

The ugly thing about the Christian Standard's policy of the last decade is the fact that while it meddles unconcionably in the affairs of the missionary societies, colleges, churches and conventions, its owner and the dictator of its policies is himself complacently indifferent to the concrete problems of the church in his home community.

In A. McLean's exhibition of the character of Mr. Russell Errett a year ago he said:

"The chief man in the Standard Publishing Company has only a nominal connection with the church. Russell Errett does not go to church much oftener than David Harum. David said he made it a rule to go to church on Thanksgiving Day, and that out of four Thanksgivings he had missed only three. If the Standard's manager can show that he attended the Richmond Street Church ten times in the last ten years he had his membership there, he will make a better showing than some of the good people in Cincinnati think he can. The communion bores him; the sermon bores him still worse. He is not in his element in church; he is like a fish out of water. I am told he gives some money; but money is the least service a Christian man renders the church. People on the outside believe he is the leader of the Lord's host in Cincinnati; that he bears the oriflamme. The truth is, that in Cincinnati, as a religious force, he is a nonentity. He and his chief lieutenant will have no share in any local church enterprise unless they can control it in their own interests. * * * * I said he (Mr. Errett), did not attend the Richmond Street Church ten times in ten years; he admits he did not attend once. The fact is, that for nearly twenty years he has seldom attended public worship."

This, we say, is the ugliest feature of our sorry controversy. It degrades the opposition of the Standard to the level of impudence. That a man whose connection with the church is so purely a fiction should presume to dictate who should not be on our great Centennial program is such an affront to the brotherhood as to justify the extremest utterances that our correspondents have sent us in the past few weeks.

How can a man be trusted to guide the church of God who habitually ignores the fellowship of the brethren in worship? Here is where character is made. Here is where kindliness and vision are cultivated. Here is where the soul grows. Little wonder is it that Mr. Errett has apostatized from the teachings of his father, the founder of the Standard.

It seems to us that this is the point of view from which to interpret the policy of the Standard for the past ten years. Its policy has not been one of counsel and appeal but of dictation and menace. Its temper has not shown the sweetening and enriching influences of the services of worship. Born in an atmosphere of religion and afterward forsaking the house of prayer and the communion table, it is only natural that Mr. Errett should give his paper just the dictatorial and censorious and dogmatic character we discover in it.

We submit that the last man to diagnose a case of theological heresy is one who is a moral heretic himself. The utter insincerity of the course of the Standard is its most evident feature. How can a man be concerned about the purity of the church's doctrine when he shows no concern for the church itself? What moral grounds can a man have for meddling with a great convention of churches when he notoriously disregards the services of the church in which his membership lies?

In our discussion of the issue we have felt under restraint constantly on account of Dr. Willett's relation with this paper. We have studiously avoided any reference to this personal aspect of the sin that has been committed. We have made no point of the sufferings of his own soul or those of his family due to this persecution. We have preferred to keep to the impersonal aspect of the whole issue, using Dr. Willett's name as a mere symbol.

But it must not be forgotten that a "heretic"is not a mere symbol, but a living person, with feelings and purposes and interests and faith. The Christian Standard has never shown any personal consideration for its "victims."

Of the "heretics" the Standard has persecuted we do not recall one who was not blameless in character, sweet in faith and spirit, earnest in practical service for Christ, a power in his own neighborhood for righteousness. On what principle of Christ's teaching can Mr. Errett's vicious attacks on these men be tolerated by our brotherhood?

To us the serious part of it is its personal, human injustice.

And Mr. Errett, if he had been going to a Church of Christ these past twenty years would have heard something there and found something there to make him kindly and gracious and fair.

Now this same publisher sends out a call to the brotherhood to fall on its knees in prayer to God for a settlement of the embroglio in which his paper has involved us. That for which he is alone responsible and which he alone can mend he wishes to lay on the shoulders of the Almighty. The "Call to Prayer" is not his own composition, but that of President Medbury. It is given space in the editorial pages of the Standard implying that, for the moment, Mr. Medbury is one of his editorial writers.

No informed person among us can fail to discern the disingenuousness of the Standard's call to prayer. That the sincere and passionate utterance of the President of the Centennial convention should be blandly adopted as an editorial expression of Mr. Errett and the editor in his employ is adding affront to impudence.

Does anybody believe that Mr. Errett will go to the prayer-meeting if it is held? Can we expect a man whose disregard for the Lord's house and the Lord's table is notorious in Cincinnati to become, on a sudden, so pious as to go to prayer meeting? There is something lying in the background of the Standard's mind that does not show itself in this "Call to Prayer." We want the prayer-meeting. We will attend it. It is a good thing to do on general principles. And it is good for this specific case.

But we wonder if the subtle irony of Mr. Medbury's contribution has escaped the intelligence of the Standard office. Mr. Medbury did not send his article to the Christian Century nor, presumably, to the Christian Evangelist. At first we were slightly sensitive about that, for it was a good article and breathed a fine spirit. But we soon saw the point: Mr. Medbury wants the owner of the Standard, his editors and protestors, to furnish leaders for the prayer-meeting. They are the disturbers of the peace of the brotherhood. It is they who have wantonly accused and misrepresented a princely brother. It is they who have trampled on the liberty wherewith Christ made us free. It is they who threatened the unity of our holy fellowship. It is they who have lifted angry hands to menace our sacred missionary enterprise.

President Medbury did well to write as he did. His plan is, indeed, "the way out." Let the Standard fall "on its knees." Let Russell Errett lead a prayer-meeting and the brotherhood will go and join in fervent petition that he may be prompted from above to save us from our grievous plight.

Professor McGarvey wrote laconically to Mr. Errett after the Rockefeller gift controversy of a year ago,

"Be good, and go to church."

We cannot do better than to repeat that advice just now.

Nevertheless certain lines keep urging themselves upon our thoughts,

"The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be,
The devil got well, a devil of a monk was he."

EVENTS CURRENT AND SOME UNDERCURRENTS

By Alva W. Taylor

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR LABOR LEGISLATION

The second annual meeting of the American Association for Labor Legislation will be held at Atlantic City Dec. 29 and 30. The Economic Association and The Sociological Society will meet during the same week. The first of these grouped meetings was held at Madison, Wis., last winter and was of rare interest. The Labor Legislation meeting will discuss such topics as "Employer's Liability," "The Canadian Industrial Disputes Act," and various phases of co-operation between associations for progressive legislation in this field.

LETTERS TO SANTA CLAUS

Last year Uncle Sam ordered all letters addressed to Santa Claus sent to the various charity societies in the cities where collected, instead of to the dead letter office and the government furnace. It struck a responsive sentiment among all but expert charity workers. The pathetic appeal aroused many women's clubs and church committees, but the charity organizations found but from ten to twenty per cent of the cases such as to need help, and the larger number of these on their lists already. They are hoping no such order will be issued this year. If it is they predict the names of their own children will often be found on the lists.

HOW WE VOTED

The popular vote of the late national election has been compiled and while not exact officially, is practically so. It shows that Mr. Taft secured a million and a quarter more votes than did Mr. Bryan, and nearly a half million majority over all candidates. He polled a little over one half the entire vote, while Mr. Roosevelt in 1904 received 56% of it. Mr. Bryan's gain over Judge Parker was nearly one and one-half millions. Mr. Taft's gain over President Roosevelt about 55,000, hardly the normal increase. While Parker ran far behind the normal democratic vote, Bryan seems to have run ahead of it. Mr. Hearst's man, Hisgen, procured less than 83,000 votes. He was nominated to give vent to the yellow editor's spleen against the man who was too honest to trade with him in the high office of president, and we would that the 83,000 represented Mr. Hearst's influence in the nation, but it is doubtful. The prohibition candidate ran ten thousand behind the 1904 vote, while Debs ran thirty thousand ahead. It is significant in both cases. The great temperance victories of the past four years gave the national party no increase of vote. The socialists make a small increase in the actual count, while in 1904 their vote was abnormal owing to the fact that a great number of radical democrats voted their ticket in their disappointment over Parker's nomination. Mr. Bryan received both the largest electoral and the largest popular vote yet given him.

DESPOT OR EMANCIPATOR

President Castro of Venezuela is in Berlin and his country is the scene of discord. The little Dutch Queen's war boats are patroling his coasts and his people are despoiling his statues. The doughty little dictator claims he is in Europe for medical attention and that all is serene at home, while some are cruel enough to suggest that he saw the cloud no larger than a man's hand and fled the approaching storm. The world has been taught to look upon him as a tyrant and a looter of his land. His partizans hail him as the emancipator of a much wronged people and as patriot set to show the South American republics the way to resist encroachments from foreign syndicates and powers and to reduce a factional and mediaeval republic to peace and prosperity. They proclaim him the Diaz of Venezuela. Our impressions are no doubt much colored by interests that are not altogether without prejudice, such as asphalt. It will be recalled that the asphalt trust appealed to this government to protect it against despoliation and there was a great hue and cry. Castro offered to submit the cause to impartial tribunal and contended that a corporation doing business in his country should be subject only to the courts of that nation. The investigation proved that the trust had aided a rebellion, and we heard nothing further of the matter. The principle that a syndicate doing business under a franchise from another government must be willing to submit its just cause to the recognized courts of that government was at least given a hearing before the tribunal of American public opinion. Other Venezuelan matters are called to mind in this connection that hint toward the revealing arbiter of time as the tardy but sure judge in right. Minister Bowen was summarily dismissed as minister at Caracas, but many look upon all succeeding events as a vindication of his case. South America does need peace within and is fast coming to it. She also needs protection from the despoiling greed of the foreign syndicate and the asphalt case has enhanced it. We need more knowledge of our first cousins down there and we are getting it.

THE HUMAN WOLF IN RUSSIA

Maxim Gorky has written a terribly realistic tale entitled "The Spy." He depicts that Russian condition which makes the power of Russian despotism a mystery to the world. His revelation is brutal to the literary critic, but he claims it is the brutal truth that needs to be known. The wolf is not less dangerous because depicted with the features of a sheep. He shows the brutal selfishness born and bred by centuries of misrule and industrial hardship. The people are ignorant and the maintenance of life is so near to the starvation line much of the time that men are but animals when hard pressed. The primitive man is near the animal line. With the masses in Russia the struggle is not corporate, it is personal. They cling together in the communes for a common good, but each will prey upon other for an independent good. Thus spies are made possible and by spies to inform and the organized heartlessness of a Cossack police to fall with terrible relentlessness upon a folk too ignorant and intent each upon living himself to make organized resistance, despotism is maintained. Gorky's theory is that undernourishment, reducing the masses to the constant danger line, and due to both political and industrial overlordship, is the cause. Give the people an industrial chance and freedom will come.

TEMPERANCE IN "SAVAGE EUROPE"

A striking characterization of the Balkan states was made by a recent writer when he called them "Savage Europe." They exist like the water in a great eddy—slow of movement amidst a fast-flowing stream of civilization. Yet the phrase must not be overworked in our judgment upon these states for they are beginning to be caught in the current. In the December number of the Nineteenth Century Alfred Stead describes what he calls "Sane Temperance Legislation in Roumania." In England the Lords defeat the temperance measure because they claim the license is a vested right, while in Roumania the law makes the fact of license a reason for absolute powers of regulation, and at one stroke abolishes 4,000 of the 13,000 saloons and provides for the arbitrary withdrawal of license for the slightest infraction of the law, while such a thing as a transfer value in a license is impossible. The whole law is designed to discourage the sale of alcoholic drinks and to encourage that of vinous (and malt) liquors. It is enacted both to promote temperate indulgence and aid the rural districts in grape and grain raising. It encourages temperance societies to hold the licenses, and makes daily drinking of wine and beer easy and weekly debauches with stronger drink difficult. It is a decided step forward for a population like that of Roumania.

THE POSTOFFICE POLITICIAN

No reform has been inaugurated by President Roosevelt that can be made more easily effective and more salutary to better public service of the needed kind than his order beginning the application of civil service examinations and rules to the forth class postmasters. He begins with the fifteen thousand offices north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi. It is rumored that this order will be extended to include all postmasters with salaries of $1,000 and under. The president's critics ask why an ardent civil-service reformer could not have begun this good work six or seven years ago and thus administered it to a success against all odds. They also point to the activity of this class of office-holders in the south in securing delegates for Mr. Taft to the Chicago convention. But then Mr. Roosevelt is not the first president who has withheld sweeping civil-service orders until the closing days of his administration. Mr. Cleveland did something like it and Mr. McKinley revoked it quickly that political debts might be paid. Mr. Taft has made his campaign manager Hitchcock Postmaster-General in his cabinet-to-be and there lie the principal spoils of office. No one is so guileless as to think Mr. Cortelyou's appointment after a successfully managed campaign, nor Mr. Hitchcock's now, nor Daniel Manning's in 1884, was without reference to service rendered to the party. Gov. Hughes seems to be the pioneer in the declaration that service to the party is not to be reckoned an asset for office if successful in gaining party power. Mr. Taft is a hearty advocate of civil-service reform and it is to be hoped he will carry this latest order to an early and successful consummation. Mr. Roosevelt has been a hearty opportunist in political maneuvering for his reforms. It has led him into some bad appointments, but it is something to get some things done, and just how far one ought to be opportune is a matter for individual judgment and conscience. It certainly must draw the line at a bad appointment if known to be bad. By the way, why should not all clerical offices be under civil-service? Why elect city and county clerks and auditors, etc., at all? Why, except to keep the party strong through spoils of office? Business does not proceed thus, why should the people's business do worse?

OHIO'S LOCAL OPTION PROGRESS

Ohio marches triumphantly on before the "water wagon." Out of fifty-eight counties that have voted under the Rose law, fifty have gone "dry." The end is not yet, and the Supreme Court upholds the law. Indiana will soon be vieing with her. Illinois will join the procession next year—if the legislature permits.

LABOR AT THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

A little noted but very significant action of the recent Federal Council of Churches at Philadelphia was that relating to the church and labor as set forth in the enthusiastically received report of the Committee on the Church and Modern Industry. It declares for a living wage, protection of women and children against sweat-shops, and pledges the church to assert the law of right for all who toil, and to preach the gospel of social righteousness and industrial justice. It sends greetings to all "those who by organized effort are seeking to reduce the hardships and uphold the dignity of labor." The report may be secured from the secretary of the Council, Dr. E. B. Sanford, Bible House, New York. It is a notable document and sounds the tocsin for a sentiment that together with the missionary movement will be much more productive of church unity than entente cordials over the creeds, and arguments pro and con over their merits and demerits, or than even any specific organic effort for union that can be immediately put forth. Give us enthusiasm for Christianity's greatest causes and we will battle together for them.

INTOXICATED WITH SUCCESS?

President Roosevelt has striking virtues and like most virile characters is possessed of striking faults. He breaks all precedents and with like iconoclasm ignores all restraints that his official position ought to put upon him. Since the great satisfaction of seeing his personally chosen candidate chosen likewise by the people as his successor has come to him even more than ever before he throws off the dignities of his office and resents criticism or the presumption thereof. He rushes to congress with messages that are sizzling with personal denunciation, adds other innocent men to his famed Annanias club, threatens to use the powers of government for the prosecution of his detractors, and does other things that befit the moods that could dictate the phrase "my people." Roosevelt is a great president, but that does not mean he is "the government." His is only "the administration," just as was Jackson's and Garfield's. Our people are great adulators and the president's excellent qualities have made him a national fad. Excellent men like ex-Senator Chandler and Delavan Smith suffer unrequited wrongs through the mistakes of his over-rugged zeal in moments of danger.

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT GAINING

England has to face a serious question of what to do with its House of Lords. It is Tory, and Tory it will be, for aristocracy represents property and property is always Tory. The result is that a liberal government has always to submit to an irresponsible veto power, while a Conservative government has no veto held over it. In the present administration Liberalism's great majority is not a mandate to the Lords of what the people desire. Their arrogance is really the expression of Mr. Balfour's political maneuvering to break up the ministry. It will prove their undoing for Englishmen dearly love their right of self-government paradoxical as is their love of the old form of things that preserves a titular monarchy and a non-elective assembly. In Germany the Kaiser is suffering the beginning of the movement that will make the Fatherland a modern constitutional monarchy truly, by making the ministry responsible to the parliament instead of the emperor. Francis Joseph finds it necessary to withdraw regent's powers from the heir-apparent because he inclines to exercise them in royal disdain of public opinion. England agitates for "one man, one vote"; Prussia moves toward abolition of class-voting by which property allows plural votes; Austria has adopted the universal franchise. Representative government gains everywhere.

FREEDOM BORN AGAIN

After the birth pangs of a generation Turkey is rejoicing over the arrival of the heir of the ages, a parliament of free representatives. True it is not a representative parliament after the western ideal entirely, for the Sultan will appoint the senate. Yet the people can be regnant if only they submit to wise leadership and look to real lovers of their kind for it. Doubtless there will be many troubles before freedom is full-grown in Turkey. Craft and graft are deep in Turkish official custom and the whole people cannot be changed in a day. The Sultan is a master at playing one party against another, an art he has learned in diplomatic dealings with the powers, and will utilize his skill in dealing with the factions and parties that must arise. But Turkey is caught with Russia, China, and Persia in the world movement of which Japan is the forerunnner, and can never return long to the old regime. The new parliament convened amid great rejoicing on the 17th inst. and after a bloodless revolution it is to be hoped men of discretion, who do not expect to remake the world in a day, will prevail in her councils and teach the rest of the mid-oriental world the way to self-government. Persia is in a struggle that means much bloodshed. Russia makes little apparent headway, and the reform parties are proving their own enemies because each is more intent on its distinguishing idea than on the common ideas of all reformers. China takes her first steps in peace and with great hope for an evolution rather than a revolution, while in India the clouds lower angrily and the British colonial office has need of the best statesmanship civilization affords for the next decade or two. With all it is not progress that sheds the blood and tears, but that which resists progress, and upon the head of reaction the guilt must lie. The early years of the present century are epochal in the eastern world's history, and they are ringing with the Macedonian cry to Christendom. Every great cause has its periods of exceptional opportunity, and this is the day for Christianity to enter in.

The Student and the Bible

By Herbert L. Willett

From time to time during the past few years there have appeared statements in reference to the lack of biblical knowledge on the part of the young people who are passing through our institutions of learning. Many examples of the limited knowledge of the scriptures possessed by the average young person of the present generation have been given in this manner. But perhaps any addition to this discussion will be valuable as material for the plea Christian teachers are always making in behalf of a larger place for the Bible in education. There is given below an experience with a class of twenty-two young men and women in the undergraduate department of a leading university. These young people come from average homes. In their descriptions of themselves, given without signature and therefore unembarrassed, they tell something of their previous training. One is a Baptist whose father is not a church member, but well versed in the Bible. One comes with the training of a Methodist Sunday-school. One is a Roman Catholic; three belong to the Christian Church; two were brough up in the Universalist Church, attended Sunday-school when children, but had little Bible study in the home. Two are Congregationalists; one a Unitarian, but without Sunday-school privileges, except occasionally in a Congregational Church. One confesses to no religious training, except in a few literary courses in school. One was trained in the Methodist Sunday-school with Unitarian influence at home; and others did not report their experiences on this point.

The experiment was made of giving such a class an unexpected examination in biblical facts. It is a very simple test, consisting of four divisions. In the first the location and incidents connected with Jerico, Shunem, Hebron, Carmel, Beersheba, and Gaza were requested. In the second they were asked to state what they knew concerning Aaron, Dorcas, Nathaniel, Gideon, Melchizedek, Ruth, Naaman, Elihu, and Barak. In the third a few Bible sentences were given with a request for their origin and explanation, such as "Behold, this dreamer cometh"; "Thou art weighed in the balance and art found wanting"; "Where are the nine?" "I will make you fishers of men"; and "No man knoweth his sepulchre unto this day." In the fourth a few literary allusions to scriptural names and incidents were given, such as the following:

"Aramathaean Joseph."
Tennyson.

"The harp the minstrel monarch swept."
Byron.

"Thou whose spell can raise the dead
Bid the prophet's form appear."
Byron.

"In St. Luke's Gospel we are told
How Peter, in the days of old,
Was sifted."
Longfellow.

"Three wise men out of the East were they."
Longfellow.

"How will the change strike me and you
In the house not made with hands."
Shelley.

"Jehovah's vessels hold the godless heathen's wine."
Byron.

"For I have flung thee pearls and find thee swine."
Tennyson.

The results of the test were not unexpected, and yet they furnish food for reflection on the part of one who believes that knowledge of the Bible is not only the foundation of character but an essential element in ordinary culture. The Bible is not only the greatest of religious books, but it is, as well, the rock on which the republic rests, the foundation of ethical and educational enthusiasm, and the source from which the generations must derive their higher inspirations. We should more willingly permit any other line of instruction to be neglected than this.

It is easily understood that certain names and references in the Bible are commonplaces of ordinary information. One who did not know something about Ruth, or the story of the three wise men, or Jesus' reference to the disciples as "fishers of men," would surely lack the most ordinary knowledge of familiar facts. But when one ventures beyond the mere frontiers of Bible references he encounters a surprising lack of knowledge on the part of the young people who, like those in the examination referred to, would be expected to know their literature and history, science and mathematics with a fair degree of competence. Yet nine of the class could tell nothing definite in reference to Shunem; five had apparently not heard of Hebron. Several members of the class were hesitant as to whether Carmel was a mountain or a city. Beersheba was unknown territory to seven, and Gaza eluded five. Even a larger percentage of ignorance was emphasized in connection with the names of biblical persons. Eight could give no reasonable information regarding Aaron; to six Dorcas was an unfamiliar name. Eight had apparently not heard of Nathaniel, and to the same number Gideon was a stranger. Ten were laid low by the reference to Melchizedek and even a greater number were embarrassed by the allusion to Naaman. Barak perplexed nine, and not a single member of the class responded correctly regarding Elihu.

The explanation of biblical sentences was no more satisfactory. Seven could give no hint regarding the dreamer, Joseph. Twelve did not understand Daniel's reference to Belshazzer as "weighed in the balance and found wanting." Seven were not able to identify Jesus' words, "Where are the nine?"; and only three of the class could explain the reference to the tomb of Moses.

Perhaps it is not without interest to discover what ideas these young people actually have in reference to biblical facts and names. Below are given some of their explanations. Of Jericho we read:

"It was besieged by the Israelites under the command of King Saul."

"A city located in the hill country of Palestine."

In reference to Shunem:

"A town in the country of the Shunammite tribe."

"A district near Israel. It was the Shunammite woman whom Jesus met at the well."

Regarding Hebron the following was given:

"There was a battle of Hebron in the Old Testament."

"One of the highest mountains in Palestine."

"Capital of the united kingdom under Saul."

Of Carmel it was said:

"It was on this mountain that Moses gave the laws to the people."

"One of Jesus' journeys was made to the town of Carmel."

"It was on this mountain that Deborah assembled the Israelites to war against Sisera."

Speaking of Beersheba, one young lady gives this astonishing information:

"A queen who was one of Solomon's wives."

In regard to Aaron:

"One of the first prophets of Israel."

"His rod possessed miraculous power so that when he struck the rock in the wilderness, water gushed forth."

"Smote the rock with his rod."

Regarding Dorcas the following interesting facts were elicited from various members of the class:

"An early prophetess of Israel."

"She led the children of Israel in one battle and they were victorious."

"The grandmother of Timothy who, with his mother, educated him."

"Dorcas was a widow whose son died and was brought back to life again."

"A woman in the Old Testament who did a great deal of good."

Of Nathaniel we are told:

"He was the first man who went to Jesus at night to question him."

"Nathaniel was a prophet."

"A minor prophet."

Of Gideon it is said:

"Gideon is a town in Palestine."

"One of the tribes of Israel."

"Persuaded by Deborah to throw off the yoke of the Canaanites."

"A mountain in central Palestine. The battles connected with Deborah took place here."

Concerning Ruth:

"A Shunammite woman; I believe she was related to Saul."

Regarding Naaman we are informed that:

"He was a prophet of early Israel."

"The counsellor of Artaxerxes who plotted against Esther."

"There is a story connected with Nathaniel and his sheep."

"Husband of Esther."

"The man in the New Testament parable who went away, leaving his servants in charge of his estates."

"Was King of Damascus at the time of Esther. He was made to ride about the city in some ridiculous costume which he had himself suggested as fit punishment for a man who had committed such a deed."

In regard to Barak:

"Barak was a man who led the forces against Deborah and was killed by her."

"One of the earlier Philistine kings."

"Priest of Baal under Jezebel."

"An enemy who oppressed Israel at the time of the Judges."

Regarding the biblical tests, some interesting comments were made. The first one was the words of Joseph's brothers, "Behold, this dreamer cometh."

The following are comments:

"Written when some people saw Jesus coming into the town and did not believe that he was the Christ. They thought that he was merely a dreamer."

"Said of Christ."

"Said in reference to Christ."

"References to some one who has religious ideas or convictions not in harmony with those of the author."

Upon the words of Daniel, "Thou are weighed in the balance and art found wanting," the following reflections, among others, were given:

"Words spoken by the apostle Paul in one of his letters to the early churches."

"Said by Christ."

Of the question of Jesus, "Where are the nine?" the following explanations were given:

"Said by Jesus in reference to the sheep; ninety came safely home, but nine went astray."

"Means the nine that were lost as contrasted with the ninety that were saved."

"Asked by Christ, referring to the disciples."

"Those who should have come have failed to appear."

Regarding the description of Moses' tomb and the words, "No man knoweth his sepulchre unto this day," we have these:

"Spoken of Jesus after his resurrection to prove that he had really risen."

"Refers to Christ's sepulchre and was said by John."

"The reference is, of course, to the death of Christ."

"It means that no one knows the future, what shall come hereafter."

The literary allusions and their explanations constituted the last section of the examination. None of them was difficult. They might have been extended indefinitely. The comments of these well-informed young people will give a fair idea of the meaning of literary allusions to the Bible in the mind of the average young person. Of the phrase, "Aramathaean Joseph," (Tennyson), it was said:

"Joseph, the father of Jesus, if he had one."

"The term means crowned or distinguished, and refers to Joseph as the father of Jesus."

"The husband of Mary, mother of Christ."

"Joseph of Aramathea was one of the men who set forth in search of the Holy Grail."

Byron's allusion to the witch of Endor,

"Thou whose spell can raise the dead,
Bid the prophet's form appear,"

was thus illuminated by one, most of the class merely passing it:

"This reference is, of course, to Jesus and his miraculous power."

On Longfellow's reference to the "sifting,"

"In St. Luke's Gospel we are told
How Peter, in the days of old,
Was sifted."

we have the following comments,

"In reference to the three denials of Christ by Peter at the trial."

"Reference is to Peter in connection with circumcision."

Byron's line on Belshazzar's feast, "Jehovah's vessels hold the godless heathen wine," drew out this comment:

"The temple of Solomon was sacked by the Philistines, and the silver and gold vessels stolen and probably used by them."

"At the time that the ark was in heathen hands in Philistia."

The material afforded by this test is interesting as showing what limited notions of the Bible are held by many young people of otherwise competent training. The examination was significant not only for the misinformation given, but as well for the large number of cases in which the student totally failed to respond to the particular question.

Perhaps, considering the small amount of biblical instruction which the Sunday-school is prepared to furnish in the brief periods of time assigned to teaching in its classes, considering the almost total lack of attention on the part of parents to the supreme need of teaching their children the word of God, and considering the strong secular and Roman Catholic influences exerted to exclude the Bible from the public schools and state universities, it is surprising that a group of students should exhibit even as much knowledge of the Bible as did these young people; and it is a satisfaction to record the fact that some of the papers were of high excellence. None the less, a similar lack of acqaintance with American or English history or with the usual matters of literary knowledge would greatly depreciate the student's credit in the mind of an instructor. Is there not in this record material for reflection and inspiration for reform in the direction of larger attention to the teaching of the Bible?

Did Joshua Stay the Sun and the Moon?

By Clark Braden

There was a poetic book "The Book of Jasher": "The Book of the Upright." As the writer of Judges appends to his account of the battle of Megiddo, The Song of Deborah and Barak, so the writer of Joshua appends to his account of the Battle of Bethhoron, a quotation from "The Book of the Upright." All know that there was no punctuation in ancient Hebrew MSS. Quotations were in no way distinguished from the language of the author. In the constant and frequent copying of MSS., the only way in which books were multiplied and preserved, quotations might be confused, mixed with the language of the author. This has occurred in Joshua X:11:12:13:14:15. Let us endeavor to separate and arrange the original and the quotations. Last clause of verse 11: "those who died by the hailstones were more than those whom the Children of Israel slew with the sword. And Joshua returned, and all of the Children of Israel with him to Gilgal. Is not this written in "The Book of the Upright?"

Then spake Joshua to Jehovah,

In the day when Jehovah delivered up the Amorites—
Before the Children of Israel
And he said before Israel:
"Sun: stand then still upon Gibeon;
And thon, Moon, in the valley of Aijalon."

And the Sun stood still, and the Moon stayed,
Until the nation had avenged themselves upon their enemies
The Sun stayed in the midst of the heaven,
And hastened not to go down, about an entire day.
There was not day like that, before or after it,
That Jehovah harkened to the voice of a man;
For Jehovah fought for Israel."

The poet in the Book of the Upright represents Joshua as appealing to Jehovah, as David represents himself as appealing to Jehovah, Psalm XVIII. The poet represents Jehovah as hearing and doing what Joshua craved, as David represents Jehovah as doing and hearing what he craved; controlling nature, the universe, in answering the petitions in each case. The poetic language quoted in Joshua is an embellishment of the battle, similar to the language of Deborah and Barak, Judges V:20:21.

From heaven fought the stars,
From their courses they fought against Sisera,
The river Kishon swept them away
That ancient river, the river Kishon.

These three poetic descriptions should be regarded as poetic hyperbole. Neither should be regarded as historic narration.

The Story of Dilly

By Richard W. Gentry

His name was Smith. But we called him Dilly—just why nobody seemed to know, the genesis of the cognomen being forgotten. A tall, stooping, but powerful frame, great hands which stretched out like the wings of a bat, watery blue eyes, as lustreless as the life their owner led, all the superfluous meat on him used by the struggle for existence—such was Dilly as he went through the routine of his daily labor along with the machines in the shop near by. At the same time that the wheels and belts began their monotonous journey, the arms of Dilly, upon the belching bur-r-r of the hoarse whistle which would have stunned us all were we not so "used to it," began to swing a great hammer or crowbar upon the "wrecking track" outside.

It was a strange chance that had thrown Dilly and me together that day. I was there because I parted my hair in the middle, and the little lemon-faced old Dane, Charley Scow, had picked the hardest place in order to get rid of me by night. For I had gotten the "place" through a "pull." Dilly was there, no doubt, after weary and disheartening days of waiting, because not far away was a mud-colored little old shack with a tired woman and five children inside, two of them sick. Grocery bills and medicine bills were already overdue. His day's wages would tide things over. Mine would go to the tailor before college opened next fall.

As we closed our first day's labor about all in common between us was that we had both made twelve and one-half cents an hour. But when we closed our period of work together we were—brothers. And it is out of that same brotherhood that some suggestions are offered herein for the church's activity in the protection of adults in railway employ.

The term "protection," since we approach it from the view-point of the church, is interpreted in its broadest sense, not alone protection of life and limb, but protection of the whole man, physical, social and moral. We ask ourselves then point-blank the question: "What can the church do to ameliorate the present physical, social, and moral evils which are embedded in railway labor.

I. Physical. It was significant that more cars came to our wrecking track, popularly called "the penitentiary" by the other departments, than to the "rip track" (repair track) near by. What did this mean? Why, it meant that they came not for repair, but for reconstruction, their roofs leaky and rotten, their couplers worn, battered, and loosened, and out of date; their under-rods in bad condition, their "handholts" hanging sometimes by the last few threads of the screw. As Dilly stood with wrench in hand and surveyed one of these derelicts, he spat out an expressive, elongated stream of tobacco juice and said: "'Taint no wonder there be wrecks, is it?"

It was plain that the whole thought of this railway was money, not men, and it was taking full refuge behind the fact that "a corporation has no body to be kicked and no soul to be damned." The rolling stock was allowed to "roll" about as long as it would. A wreck now and then seemed less expensive than the constant drain caused by thorough repairs. No doubt the road-bed was in little better shape.

If then, the church is interested in the welfare of railway employes, she must consider the following two questions: (a) The prevention of accidents. (b) The care of the disabled. Let us notice that the mere existence of the church has been a great factor. Railways have felt the impelling power of the teachings of Jesus along with almost every other force in the world. In the care of the disabled this is more clearly seen. When badly injured in the employ of the Santa Fe Railway in the wilds of Oklahoma, an employe was put on train and rushed to their splendid hospital at Topeka, Kas., where with perfect care he was soon discharged sound and well, at no expense. Recovery in a private home might have been doubtful.

But "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." Ministers should interest themselves and the people of their churches in the physical protection of railway employes. How many ministers ever go through a railway shop? What things they would see—and hear, if they did! The people of the church could be interested, in little side talks; a prayer meeting might be taken for such subjects now and then. Parties might make a visit to the shops. Who knows what a great power could be thus aroused for the passage of protective laws. The church has a great duty to perform. An immense mass of men are daily endangered in railway work. Let the church interest itself in the conditions responsible and join in a great popular demand upon the railways of our country to consider less the almighty dollar and more the infinite value of a human soul.

2. Social evils. The life of the average railway employe is a stern one. For many the work day begins at six and a hasty hour comes at noon. The work is often of such a nature that the worker is separated from his fellows. Thus there is created a real social lack in railway employ. One of the chief remedies is shorter hours. The man who labors hard physically for eight hours has had enough. Let him leave his work for some social recreation or intellectual improvement. Our railway towns should see that their Carnegie libraries contain reading matter applicable to railway life and men, to be enjoyed in their homes. Committees on church lecture courses should consider the people of the shops. Here the church has also a great work to do. Let her join in the reasonable and intelligent agitation for shorter hours. Let her consider railway employes in her social plans and life. Let the railways be urged to supply social pleasure for employes, places of rest and reading and pleasure, as well as roundhouses and smokestacks. Let the Y. M. C. A. be encouraged in its erection of buildings in connection with railway works.

3. Moral and religious evils. Railway work is rough. And many of the workers are rough. As I carried in debris to be consumed in the boiler-room the fireman took keen delight in telling me stories that made me wince. Many a young fellow receives his first lessons in immorality and drink as he enters railway employ.

The church must get at railway men with the thought that they are God's children. The plane of their lives must be lifted up. (a)—By lifting up the planes of their employers. The hard, bitter, un-Christian attitude of large masses of workers, the atheism often found in labor councils, is but a reflection of the "grinding of the masters." So many men have been to them as so many spikes or rails. Let the church help through agitation and education to put in railway office chairs men of Christian spirit, and it will do more good than the passing of any laws. (b)—Lastly, let the church in her religious teaching embrace as actively as possible the railway men. Under 1 and 2 she will already have done great things. For she will have lived out the story of the good Samaritan. And is not one of the surest ways of calling out the highest and best in a man simply to show him that you love him and want to help him?

When such an attitude as this in the church is strong and warm toward railway men, they will come unbidden within her doors, and in her various meetings will learn and take into their lives the things that be of God.

The Voice of the Brotherhood

It is not our purpose to prolong this popular protest in our columns any farther than is necessary to give the brotherhood a good taste of the correspondence coming into the Christian Century office. We can by no means print all the letters we receive, and we can afford space only to small fragments or extracts of those letters we do print. Manifestly, two deep convictions are held by the Disciples of Christ: first, concerning liberty of opinion among us, and, secondly, concerning the sacredness of our missionary enterprises. It passes comprehension how a publisher, born in the Disciple cradle, identified in a public way with all our activities for two score years, could have lapsed even momentarily into the delusion that our brotherhood would tolerate such a policy as the Christian Standard set itself to execute.

Our fathers left sectarianism because they could not endure its bondage. They made provision in the fellowship they established for progressive, even adventurous, thinking. They discerned that personal attachment and allegiance to Christ was the ground of unity, while the life in Christ was greatly enriched by diversity in opinion. What an anomaly would it be if we, their sons, living too in a time much more congenial to freedom of thought, should be found retreating into the bondage from which they revolted!

Moreover, our missionary interests have become most dear to our hearts. In the earlier days the champions of the missionary enterprise found us unresponsive to the plain command of Christ and manifest precedent of the apostolic church. What vast output of energy from McLean and Loos and Isaac Errett to bring us to see that missions were simply our business here, that we had no other business! But today the heart of our plea is the missionary idea, and the conscience of the brotherhood is sensitive to any slightest finger-touch upon it.

We do not know a more brazen affront to the conscience of the brotherhood than the threat of the Christian Standard to injure our missionary organizations unless a great representative committee truckled to its will! But we could not conceive a more strategic blunder in church statesmanship than that paper has made. Our brotherhood will endure much trifling with its liberty which it has come to take more or less for granted, but its birth-pains for the missionary enterprise are too recent and vivid to allow any false hand to be laid upon it.

The present controversy has many regrettable features. The revelations of the moral heresy of a paper that once was the symbol of kindliness, fairness and progress breaks the hearts of hundreds of our brethren. The suffering inflicted on a princely soul whose life purpose has ever been to serve the brotherhood in which he was born cannot be characterized here even if it were becoming so to do. Injustice has been done. Some one is guilty of it. The greatest sin of all is not that against our unity in faith, nor against our liberty in opinion, but against our charity in all things. These sins must be faced in the Day of Judgment.

But the good Father has a wondrous way of making the wrath of man to praise him. This controversy will do more to make clear just what is in our plea than any crisis of our history. Many have been shouting the slogans without knowing their meanings. Many, unacquainted with the history of our early days, have had no vision of the breadth and grandeur of our plea. Our Centennial will be a peaceful and a joyous Centennial. Its celebrations will take on a consciousness, a vivid sense of value, which they could not have had without a discussion such as we have passed through.

So as we enter the New Year and gird ourselves for the March offering, the first-fruits of the Centennial harvest, we may thankfully say, "Hitherto hath God led us!"

You are giving us a great and needed paper. I may not endorse everything Prof. Willett says but I love him for his fine Christian spirit. Enclosed find my check to send "Christmas present" to ten of our preachers.

Union City, Ind. T. L. Lowe.

I have perused with much interest Brother Willett's recent articles and trust there will be no recanting step taken by its editor. I feel sure there are many, many, in the east where the battle for religious freedom has been an arduous one who feel the same.

Glen Ridge, N. J. A. A. Farrington.

Enclosed, find $10.00 which you may use to send the paper to preachers or others where it will do good, and especially to vindicate the Christian standing of Prof. Willett, whom I admire very much.

Chicago. Henry C. Johnson.

With hundreds of others, I am rejoicing in Dr. Willett's "Confession of Faith."

Wheeling, W. Va. Rufus A. Finnell.

Dear Brother Willett.—I confess that prior to the time I went to Chicago to attend the Congress, I was somewhat prejudiced against you, but after reading the Century of November 7, I was thoroughly satisfied and subscribed for the paper. I Wish you every success in this controversy and hope under no circumstances you will resign from the Centennial program.

Detroit, Mich. A. E. Jennings.

You have done well to hold the controversy now being waged in our brotherhood to a single issue. The only statement of belief that should be taken into account it that which Bro. Willett makes over his own signature. The question which he presents therein for the contemplation of the brotherhood should not be confused with any other.

A recent experience of the writer is in point. A typhoid fever epidemic was raging in West Pullman. The local pastors were urged by the City Board of Health to co-operate with them in their efforts to stay the ravages of the fever and to speak of it from their pulpits. The writer did so. The next day one of the leading dailies gave a report of the sermon, with a stickful of type in quotation marks. While the report did him no dishonor, he vows absolutely that he never uttered a single word attributed to him in the quotation. Prof. Willett has said that the newspaper reports not only misrepresent what he said, but also the spirit of his utterances. No one can, therefore, honorably persist in making capital of such reports. This great Christian Union movement of ours if it is to preserve itself intact, must grasp the fact that whle we must agree to agree in a few things, we must also be tolerant of belief with regard to a great many things.

Chicago. G. I. Hoover.

C. C. Morrison. Dear Brother:—Moving and opening my work in a new field has made me a little tardy, perhaps; but still I want to put in my protest against the resignation of Prof. Willett from the Centennial program. For a century we have been emphasizing the "one faith" and the New Testament terms of fellowship. To force Prof. Willett from the Centennial program, or to hurl at him the epithet, "infidel," would be to repudiate our own position. A few days ago a prominent Congregational minister said to me, "Are you people going to follow the lead of the Standard and sit down on Prof. Willett and such men? If you do, it seems to me you will have to be classed among the "creed-bound denominations." We will not do it; we will be free.

Kalamazoo, Mich. H. D. Williams.

The writer of the following is one of the best known leaders of the Brotherhood.

My dear Professor: Did it ever occur to you to test the question of your orthodoxy in the U. S. Courts? If I were in your place I think I would give some men a chance to prove the truth of what they say. Perhaps you have thought the matter all over and have deemed it wise to keep away from Caesar's Courts. I fear I have not grace enough to do so.

Hoping that you may be able to prove triumphant against the senility, the juvenile obtuseness and the assininity arrayed against you from bitter jealousy, and that you do not fail to appear on our centennial program, I beg to remain, very truly yours,

Salem, Indiana. W. C. Cauble, M. D.

I am glad you are staying right in the position where the Commettee on Program for our Centennial placed you. I presume this thing has to be fought out, and I assure you that a great host of us disciples are thoroughly tired of the dictatorship that has hung over our brotherhood for the several years past.. Stay at your post. Victory for the right is in sight and the humiliation that it causes you now is only binding you closer to the real heart of the brotherhood. John P. Sala.

Elyria, Ohio.

I have felt, Brother Willett, that you made a mistake in being so patient and kind and Christian the past ten years with the thought that you would finally win thereby. With true Christian men and women you have won but such splendid graces as you possess, and have shown during the days of the un-Christian warfare on you—your teaching, character, etc.—avails nothing with the un-Christly gang trying to ruin you and our freedom in Jesus.
Port Arthur, Ontario. O. D. Maple.

I am not a preacher, not an educated man, only a plain, blunt blacksmith, but I have seen you and heard you speak, have felt the clasp of your hand and sat at dinner at the same table with you. And I want to hear you in Pittsburg this fall, and I hope you will receive such inspiration from God's Holy Spirit that you will be enabled to break down all opposition to you as a teacher.
Stanton E. Hoover, Supt. Sunday-School.
Croton, Ohio.

Your "My Confession" Series! You have acted wisely in thus defending your views over your own signature. These articles, along with the responses and discussion evoked, ought to go a long way toward clarifying the atmosphere. It seems to me they should be put into pamphlet form (after the plan of A. McLean's "Barred from the Standard" leaflet of last year) and forwarded to every leading thinker and writer among us. W. P. Keeler.
Chicago.

Dear Brother Morrison:—God bless you in your grand and important work of the hour. Enclose find check for $1.50 to send Christian Century to fifteen of our preachers. You can use my name if you see best for I am not afraid of the "Standard" and God pity the man that is. But therein is our danger for it can abuse a man and ruin his life and work and we have no recourse. Never did I give $1.50 with more good will and joy than I do this offering. Now do your best and see that every preacher in the church receives the Christian Century for the next six weeks.
Salina, Kansas. J. C. McArthur.

Please find enclosed $10 to send the Century to one hundred preachers. You are certainly getting up a valuable paper. All the fair-minded will appreciate the truth you are publishing, and we insist on your staying on that program at Pittsburg. You have a message that all the brethren who are loyal to Christ want to hear.
Covington, Ky. S. G. Boyd.

I am constrained to think the great body of our brotherhood will want you to fill your place on the Centennial program. I don't think the voice of this great people has been spoken, on this subject, in the columns of the Christian Standard.
Salem, Ohio. J. W. Reynolds.

Dear Brother Willett: I am deeply grieved, I am amazed that the Missionary Secretaries should ask you to resign.
The great body of Disciples who love and trust you do not for a moment imagine you are coveting a place on the program, but believing you to be the prophet of a better day soon to dawn they want you on that program.
North Vernon, Ind. J. P. Rowlison.

If Dr. Willett is forced to retire from his place on our Centennial platform, then alas for our boast of liberty in Christ. Alas! for our boasted love of learning and freedom.
Kansas City, Mo. T. P. Haley.

Dr. Willett resign? What for? He's a Christian; he's a Disciple; he's competent; he's without a peer upon the platform, and his character is beyond reproach. Why, then? Why? For the sake of peace? But there is no peace. For more than ten years to my personal knowledge, the Christian Standard has been attacking some good man or cause and will probably continue to do so until an economic danger is scented.
Harvey, Ill. W. D. Endres.

I do not consider this a question of expediency; expdiency has absolutely no place where freedom is involved. Personally I do not believe that one dollar of missionary contributions will be sacrificed by a firm stand in this matter. But I would rather see every dollar sacrificed than to see our entire position as a brotherhood jeopardized, subverted, annihilated. In my mind this is a time to die in the last ditch, if that were necessary. The language is a trifle heroic, I know, because no one is going to kill us in the last ditch; no one is going to turn us out of the brotherhood; they can't. But if they were, it seems to me right here is the ground on which we should give our last gasp as free citizens in the Kingdom of God.
Kansas City, Mo. Burris A. Jenkins.

I am unalterably opposed to the resignation of Professor Willett from the program of the Centennial Convention. I believe in and crave peace, but not at the price of liberty. The only peace and success worthy of our great plea must come through the exercise of Christian love and charity by all, toward all, believing in the Sonship of Jesus.
Philadelphia, Pa. Levi G. Batman.

Dear Brother Willett: It does our hearts good to feel our faith in you unshaken. We are glad you are to speak in Pittsburg.
Royal J. Dye, M. D.
Missionary to Africa.

The practical question now is whether our great missionary interests are to be knifed by men whose opinions differ from the opinions of the Centennial committee.
Valparaiso, Ind. Bruce Brown.

The attack on Willett is a direct attack on our missionary work and should not be allowed to go unrebuked by a great brotherhood. The idea of not supporting our missionaries because this or that man appears on a convention program is absurd. The man who makes such an excuse is searching for an opportunity to follow the desire of his heart.
Decatur, Ill. O. W. Lawrence.

May God's blessing rest upon you in your stand for the truth. Let your courage fail not.
Cleveland, Okla. H. F. Reed.

Permit me to register my protest against the withdrawal of Professor Willett from the Centennial program. The question at issue is not whether we endorse his views in matters of biblical criticism, but whether we shall abandon our time honored motto: "In faith, unity; in opinion, liberty." The principle of Christian liberty is at stake. Whatever they may think of his critical opinions, all who know Professor Willett are convinced of his loyalty to Christ. He ought to stay on the program.
Columbia, Missouri. J. W. Putnam.

Is not the demand that Professor Willett resign because he does not hold a certain philosophy of miracles a return in principle to the very thing against which our movement is a protest? The question at issue is not whether his philosophy of miracles is true or false, but what have his views upon that subject to do with his representing the brotherhood? Must we as a Christian brotherhood agree upon a philosophy of miracles before we celebrate our Centennial? If so I fear we will have to set a later date than October, 1909, for the celebration.
Cedar Rapids, Iowa. G. B. Van Arsdall.

If we are to insist upon a dead and monotonous uniformity and strangle that spirit that permits variety and unity to go hand in hand, we are a mistake. If our plea is not large enough for all who love the Lord in sincerity, it is not a union plea, but a sectarian plea.
Woodland, Kan. J. M. Lowe.

I want to register my protest against your resigning from the Centennial program. Do not do it. We need men now. It will not help matters in the least for you to resign. It may conciliate some few conservatives but the rank and file will resent it. Our missionary societies will suffer worse in resigning than in remaining firm in the right.
North Bend, Neb. J. E. Chase.

I heartily endorse the action of the Centennial committee in refusing to request Professor Willett's withdrawal from the program.
Greenfield, Ind. V. W. Blair.

Editor Christian Century: I am not in sympathy with some of the views of Prof. Willett, but the opposition to his appearing on the Centennial program I regard as not only very discreditable, but also as out of all harmony with the spirit of our movement. We have all along stood for Christian liberty and we cannot surrender any of that liberty now.
Danville, Ill. S. S. Jones.

In answer to the question, "Should Professor Willett Resign?" I say no. I believe that a worse thing could not befall our people and the cause of Christian union at this time than to take Brother Willett's name from the Centennial program at the dictation of the Christian Standard.
Blue Mound, Ill. E. T. Clements.

Having just read the article in the Christian Century of November 14, headed "Shall Professor Willett Resign?" having in view the coming Centennial program in which he has a place, I wish from a personal standpoint to register an emphatic no! My fellow ministers of this section whom I have met recently are of the same very decided opinion.
Very sincerely yours,
Hoopeston, Ill. Lewis R. Hotaling.

To the Century: I would be pleased to have the Disciples come up to their Centennial in perfect harmony. I would be pleased to have the missionary societies make the best reports in their history. Bue there is something more important than peace and finances, and that is the liberty of which we have boasted for a hundred years. Hence I protest against Professor Willett withdrawing his name from the Centennial program.
Cincinnati, Ohio. A. W. Fortune.

Editors Christian Century: Basing an opinion on the magnificent address which Dr. Willett delivered at the Presbyterian Church in this city during the convention, I would consider it a great misfortune not to have the privilege of hearing him again, in Pittsburg.
New Orleans, La. W. M. Taylor.

The Voice of the Brotherhood

I am unable to see what particular phase of our work we can fitly celebrate at Pittsburg if we go up thither with this blot upon the 'scutcheon of our religious heredity. I sincerely hope that you upon your part will stand firm, contending earnestly for the goodly inheritance which has ever been ours.

Columbia, Mo. Charles M. Sharpe.

The question as to whether they or I agree with Willett's interpretations is not before us. He holds to the fundamental verities of the Christian religion as firmly as any. The whole question is one of freedom in Christ. It will be a dark day for the Disciples of Christ when we must submit to such standards as are now being erected before we can speak in public.

Springfield, Mo. F. L. Moffet.

I am rejoiced to see that you have drawn the sword and thrown away the scabbard, and now "lay on MacDuff and d—be he who first cries, hold! enough!" The insolence of The Standard has become unbearable. I hope it isn't true that you are declining to appear on the Centennial program. A nice lot of people we would be going up to our Centennial wearing a dog's collar on our necks. Above all let us be free, Centennial or no Centennial.

Spokane, Wash. J. W. Allen.

To the Christian Century: I pause for a moment in the midst of a great revival to enter my most earnest protest against Brother Willett resigning from the Centennial program. If the time has come when one man can browbeat a million freemen in Christ Jesus we ought to know it. If anyone is to resign let him resign whose hands are red by the life blood of our missionary societies, who has put Christ to shame oftener, who has caused more grief and bitterness, who has stirred up more strife for six or eight years than any other man or set of men in our brotherhood. God cannot hold this man guiltless. Let him resign. Let us exalt Christ.

Salina, Kan. David H. Shields.

This Cincinnati apostasy must be arrested in its downward and destructive tendencies. It is the mightiest force for the ruin of our cause that has ever appeared in our history. As Peter said of certain of the sect of the Pharisees, so say we: "Now, therefore, why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we are able to bear."

Indianapolis, Ind. W. L. Hayden.

Dear Brother Willett: I wish to express my approval of the course you are pursuing in the Centennial program controversy. I well understand that you care nothing for the mere fact of being on the program, but there is a great principle involved in the attitude of our brotherhood toward those who differ in matters of opinion from the traditional views of things.

Boise. Idaho. A. L. Chapman.

If you withdraw, the fight is hopeless. In view of that for which you have always stood, in view of the cause of liberty of conscience, I hope you will not withdraw out of any personal feelings of modesty. Yours sincerely,

New York. J. P. Lichtenberger.

I have never felt it my duty to declare myself before over the many controversies which have been going pro and con but I could not resist the impulse to assure you of our belief in you and to urge a firm stand for principles which you believe to be true.

Table Grove, Ill. W. L. Hipsley.

You have the truth, you have the favor of God, and it seems to me that the Century has struggled along for just such a time as this.

Cincinnati, Ohio. J. H. Fillmore.

I want to protest against your resigning from the Centennial program. I recognize the unpleasant position in which this controversy has placed you. I know that you never sought the place, nor coveted it as a personal matter. But I also know that the Centennial will be ruined for multitudes if you are not on the program.

Troy, N. Y. Cecil J. Armstrong.

Editors of Christian Century: Your center shots at the would-be archbishop, Russell Errett, are grand. Continue the war! If you give up now, go to Pittsburg and elect Errett and Lord dictators of the Christian, then come home and wait for your orders. In the name of heaven stand by the Eight (8) on the Centennial program who said, "no man shall dictate who shall speak at Pittsburg."

Salina, Kan. J. C. McArthur.

I see no reason why H. L. Willett should not give an address at Pittsburg. I expect to go to the Centennial and shall hope to hear him.

Grand Rapids, Mich. H. F. Barstow.

C. C. Morrison, Editor Christian Century: Now is the time to stand by the guns. Professor Willett is right. The far larger part of the better brains and hearts of the Disciples know that he is right in this controversy. Is so great a people with such a heritage of heroism, to now fear such a paper as the Standard

Denver, Col. Jesse B. Haston.

My Dear Dr. Willett: Having carefully read your "Confession of Faith," as published in successive issues of The Christian Century. I wish to say that I think you "stand on the platform which the fathers of this reformation declared to be sufficient for the people of God."

May I also express the hope that you will not resign the place assigned you on the Centennial program. This I do both as an act of simple justice to a fellow Christian and fidelity to the spirit of liberty which has always characterized the Disciples of Christ. Wishing you every blessing, I remain in all Christian affection, Your friend,

Springfield, Mo. N. M. Ragland.

Editors Christian Century: It has been with a pained heart that I have followed the attack on Professor Willett by some of our brethren. It would be a severe blow to our plea for liberty if he were removed from the program.

Augusta, Ga. Howard T. Cree.

It is not strange that the Brotherhood is everywhere stirred to action over the threatened loss of a principle that has been dear to the Disciples of Christ from the beginning. We do well to make a most determined stand in defense of their great boon of liberty in Christ. The New Christian Century has "come to the kingdom for such a time as this." But it seems to me that there is involved in the present situation a peril much more grave than even the loss of liberty; namely,—the possibility that we shall allow ourselves to be dominated by a spirit of unbrotherliness. That this is a very mild term to apply to the wholly unwarranted and unjust attack upon Dr. Willett, must be evident to every fair-minded person. To acquiesce in the request of his traducers is practically to involve the whole Brotherhood in the approval of this un-Christlike spirit.

Some day we shall learn that there is but one supreme test of the Christian life before which all others pale into insignificance. That test is plainly taught in the following passages, which might be multiplied manyfold. "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one for another." "Beloved let us love one another, for love is of God, and every one that loveth is begotten of God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love.

"Now, abideth faith, hope, love, these three, but the greatest of these is love."

Could we come up to Pittsburg with the spirit of these verses enthroned in our hearts, and exemplified in our lives, I think the great Master of us all would excuse every other lack, and it is very certain that the world would open its eyes and ears, and give earnest heed to the message which such a church would bring. Those who exalt the letter above the spirit are convinced that the world's supreme need is a church whose outward form is patterned after the apostolic model, but to all others it becomes increasingly apparent that what the world most needs is a church that has caught the Master's spirit of love and good-will, and spends itself in passionate service in the interest of the higher life. Given a membership whose transformed lives find expression in their very faces, and we shall have little need of startling schemes to attract the people. They will of their own accord come, asking to know the secret of such a change. For such a church the world is waiting, and only such a church has a mission to this age.

In our one hundred years of history we have borne a great message, and laid the foundation deep and strong. Now it is time to rear the super-structure. First Principles are all right in their place, but to live forever in their atmosphere is certainly to crystalize and lose all vitality. The age of dogma has passed, and the era of life has come. If we claim a superior truth, there is but one way to prove it to this age, and that is by a superior life. May the great Master of us all help us to rise to a new sense of our responsibilities, and to a new faith in our possibilities. "Forgetting the things that are behind and reaching forth unto those that are before let us press on toward the goal."

AN ENTIRE OFFICIAL BOARD SIGNS A PROTEST.

Whereas, an unfortunate controversy, which threatens the peace and spirituality, the freedom of thought and speech, and the missionary activities of our brotherhood has arisen; and

Whereas, The Third Christian Church, which has always felt an interest in and contributed to the various branches of our organized work, has proudly proclaimed our "unity of faith, liberty of opinion and charity in all things" to the people that have waited upon its ministry—be it, therefore,

Resolved:—That we, the officers of the Third Christian Church, deeply deplore the bitter controversy, now going on in our brotherhood journals, and likewise the secretarian tendencies that have called it forth.

2. That, while H. L. Willett and the Centennial Committee have been made the objects of attack, we feel that a great, fundamental principle of Our Plea is being jeopardized and that every loyal Disciple of Christ should rally to its protection.

3. That we have perfect confidence in H. L. Willett's loyalty to Our Plea, and his ability to stand as one of the Brotherhood's representatives upon our Centennial platform; that his resignation or enforced retirement would result in a future crisis, similar to or worse than the one through which we are now passing; that we urge him to remain upon the program of the Centennial Convention; and that we also urge the Committee to refrain from either retiring him or dissolving itself.

4. That neither H. L. Willett nor any other person or outside influence has, in any way, inspired this action upon our part.

5. That these resolutions be spread upon the official minutes of The Third Christian Church, and that a copy be sent to the Christian Evangelist, The Christian Standard and to the New Christian Century. ,

Signed,
George P. Rutledge, Minister.

Mr. C. C. Morrison, Editor of the Christian Century:—I am sorry to have to write this letter, but upon reading the Christian Standard this week and taking into consideration the names of some of the men who have come to help defend the stand taken by Bros. Errett and Lord. In the first place this is a most deplorable demand made by two brethren to make an attack on one of our brothers who has the ability to defend the Gospel of Christ and has always given to us who want to be fair and honest the same right to think and reason as he has claimed for himself. Shall Brother Willett resign on the program? No—ten thousand times, No. I have been preaching the simple gospel for thirty-three years and have baptized 2,845 people into the Church of Christ and was in the field for victory in his name through the truth when some of these men who are making such a large stir were boys and small boys at that, and I have read with care the most of the articles on which the two brothers above named have based their demands for the resignation of Brother Willett and I say frankly that I fail to see anything that would shake the faith of the weakest Christian.

Muncie, Indiana. J. D. Lawrence.

The war on Prof. Willett is entirely out of harmony with the program of unity set out by the Declaration and Address which the centennial is proposed to celebrate. "A manifest attachment to our Lord Jesus Christ in faith, holiness, and charity, was the original criterion of Christian character—the distinguishing badge of our holy profession—the foundation and cement of Christian unity." * * * "But that all the members should have the same identical views of all divinely revealed truths; or that there should be no difference of opinion among them, appears to us morally impossible, all things considered." Such are some of the words of that memorable document, which should be better understood at this time. The plea for union and principles of the same need to be emphasized by their application to the present situation. Instead of persecuting Prof. Willett and seeking to have him removed from the program of the centennial we should rejoice that he, along with others of diverse views but of unquestioned Christian character, can appear on the same platform as an exemplification of the Christian unity for which we have been pleading this hundred years.

But it is said that Willett does not agree with the great majority of the brotherhood and therefore should not be allowed to represent them on the program. Who, then, can be on the program to represent the rest of us? For there is no teacher but what will teach some things that others will criticise.

It may be true that some of the views of Prof. Willett are different from what the rest of us have held in the past. This may mean that he is in error, and it might mean that the rest of us have not yet learned all that is to be known of God's universe of truth. Let Willett stay on the program and speak his message and let the rest of us hear him with patience and reject what we cannot accept.

Chattanooga, Tenn. E. C. Wilson.

SHALL WE HAVE A RELIGIOUS BOSS?

I am satisfied that the department of "Biblical Criticism," as conducted by J. W. McGarvey, in the Christian Standard, does an injustice to the Christian Church for the following reasons:

First. He persists in making tests of fellowship of things that are neither commanded nor prohibited by Jesus or any of the New Testament writers.

Second. He makes a test of fellowship of things that no man knows or can know in this life. As an illustration, the chronological order of the books of the Old Testament is a thing that neither McGarvey nor any other man knows. Nor is it essential that any one should know.

Third. He makes a test of fellowship of the mysterious relationship of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, a thing that he knows no more about than ordinary mortals, a thing that each and every man must settle for himself.

In regard to this question every man must form his own conception if he ever reaches a conclusion at all. This question has been threshed all the way from the Nicene Council in the Fourth Century, down to Lexington, in the Twentieth Century. And you may gather all that has been said on the subject and you will not find sense enough to make one little batch of nonsense! Thousands of good men and women have lost their lives because they could not give a satisfactory explanation or definition of this relationship. Phillip, the Evangelist, was satisfied when the Eunuch said, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." He did not ask him to explain any thing. No man should be expected to explain anything that is a matter of faith. Matters of knowledge may be explained, but so long as anything is a matter of faith, it can not be explained. I believe that Jesus Christ was telling the truth when he said he is "the Son of God." But I do not claim or pretend to know all that is contemplated by these words, "Son of God." But one thing I do claim and that is the right to put my own construction upon these words, and I also affirm that no religious boss shall be permitted to construe these words for me. And if I get them wrong I shall blame nobody but myself; but I expect to settle all my business with the Lord myself. Therefore, no heresy-hunter, theological detective or religious boss need apply.

Fourth. He makes of inspiration a test of fellowship, a thing that is nowhere taught as a matter of faith. Inspiration simply is spoken of in the Bible as God's method of giving truth to the world. But theologians have always been more concerned about the method than they have been about the thing revealed.

Fifth. The Campbells, Scott and Stone bade adieu to sectarianism a century ago in order that they might find some place big enough to allow a man to think and express his thoughts. Finding no such place within the bounds of any religious bodies, they began this restoration movement. And it seems that J. W. McGarvey, J. A. Lord and others want a respectable portion of the workers in this movement to go to the one hundredth anniversary of this movement, bound in chains! This would be in fine taste for a people whose aim was to get clear of sectarian bigotry. If the program committee want to put Willett on the program at that meeting, I say let them do it. Willett has not hurt our cause half so much as those who are making the fight against him. Suppose the friends of Willett were little enough to say, "We will do nothing for the Foreign Missionary work, or our colleges, and will not attend the meeting unless Willett is given a place on the program."

I think the time has come to make J. W. McGarvey and The Christian Standard know their places. I think it time they were given to understand that there are other teachers and colleges beside McGarvey and Lexington, and other papers besides The Christian Standard. I think it high time that they be given to understand that there is no room in this movement for theological bosses or detectives or religious censors.

So far as I am concerned I believe in the pre-existence and the miraculous conception of the Christ, but I have seen men who were as good and smart as I who did not believe it. These men are willing to accept Christ for all he is to them, and that is all any man can do. It is not at all hard for me to believe this doctrine. For it seems reasonable to me that if God could produce the first man and woman without any parentage at all, he could certainly produce the Christ with a half parentage. This is all the argument I want on the subject. I have taken men into the church who did not and could not see this proposition; I now recall three men who did not claim to believe this proposition as it is usually believed. They were all good men and one of them, I think, was as good and as devoted Christian as I ever knew. But I would not have you think that I did this without the authority of Christ. In the goodness of God and the mercy of Christ this question is thoroughly covered by the Son of God in his teaching. Please turn to John 14:11 and read his words: "Believe me that I am in the Father and the Father in me; or else believe me for the very work's sake." That is, if you can not understand the exact relation that exists between me and my Father you can understand the works that I do, for the works that I do bear witness of me. This scripture, to my mind, thoroughly covers the whole ground and is, to me, perfectly satisfactory.

And I give it as my candid belief that unless the brotherhood calls a halt on J. W. McGarvey and the Christian Standard, there will be an open rupture in the Christian Church before ten years. The people of this movement will bear some things all the time, and all things some of the time, but they will not bear all things all the time.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Creeds

The Correspondent: "In your personal creed I missed a statement of your belief in the resurrection. I wish you had included it."

I certainly intended to do so. I said "I believe in Jesus the eternal" and "I believe in Jesus the victorious." I now add "I believe in Jesus the resurrection." I was not attempting to write a full theological creed. My intention was similar to that of Ian MacLaren when he wrote: "I believe in the Fatherhood of God. I believe in the words of Jesus. I believe in a clean heart. I believe in the service of love. I believe in the unworldly life. I believe in the beatitudes. I promise to trust God and follow Christ; to forgive my enemies, and to seek after the righteousness of God."

Many true doctrines are not included in this brief statement; but it expressed a working determination of Dr. Watson's inner soul.

The Christmas Period

The Correspondent:—"It is the gladdest season of the year. It is the children's time. The Spirit of heaven and childish glee is upon us all. A blessed impulse to give fills all hearts. Parents and children draw close together in the story of its mystery. Friendship has a warmer grasp. Even enmity leaves the souls under the spell of this Christmas spirit. It brings the message of love, the real message of this season. Is it not the only message?"

THE CHRISTMAS ANTIPHONAL.

No, it is not the only message, but is has an important place.

There is a great "divide" in history, not many "divides," just one. From it the millenniums stretch backward into darkness. From it they stretch forward into light. At the top of the "divide" is the cry of a babe.

The cry of this little babe in Bethlehem's manger rings out the old age and rings in the new. The cry of this babe marks the change of all the calendars of the world. But it does vastly more, it marks the bursting upon the world of the full-orbed sun after a long, long twilight.

In the millenniums before the cry of the babe, men tried to see clearly but there was not sufficient light. Partial darkness covered the face of the earth. The populations looked up into the heavens, but they saw not the sun in its fullness. Throughout all the Old Testament there is but twilight, and other nations did not have even the light of the Jews.

Loneliness—God Made Flesh.

The cry of earth was "Why standest thou afar off, O, Jehovah?" God was distant. Darkness was round about his throne. His voice could be but feebly heard and but partially understood. Doubtfulness possessed humanity's heart with regard to his concern and providence. In despair, souls cried out, "Oh, that I knew where I might find Him!" "Why standest thou afar off?"

And then there was the cry of a babe. A poor weak little fragile life had come into this world. Poor and unknown to earth's great. It seemed insignificant, except to the mother that gave it birth. But it was heaven's answer to the complaint that God was cold, distant, and unconcerned.

This babe was Immanuel, God with us. Men had seen God in his event of creation; they had seen Him in his starry heavens, his mysterious seas, and immense land expanses. They had seen Him in the movements of history—and had called Him Lord of Hosts, and God of battles. They had heard his thunderings and had seen the flashes of his anger.

But they longed for a tenderer message from Him, they desired to see his heart more plainly. They were children hungering for affection. In their darkness they wanted light; in their guesses they sought for certainty; in their loneliness they hungered for a companion and a near friend.

Then there was the cry of the babe—God with us.

Thus did God humble himself. Thus did God draw near to men. Thus did the Creator nestle very near the hearts of our doubting race.

The cry of earth on that first Christmas morn was that of despondency, the gloom of twilight. It was the cry of lost children seeking for their father.

Then came the cry of heaven, the cry of Mary's babe, from the manger of Bethlehem—and thus was formed the antiphony of Christmas. The discords of earth were answered by heaven's voice, the cry of the babe, Immanuel, God with us. God had become flesh and dwelt among us. Since then seeing God in Jesus he has been near to us. His heart has been revealed, darkness has been dissipated. Earth's discordant noises have been stilled by heaven's glad song.

Enmity—Peace.

There are other parts of our antiphonal Christmas song.

There was enmity in men's hearts.

Before the cry of the babe in Bethlehem's manger hatred and war were the law of life. Everywhere there were clashings of the children of men. Even the sweet songs of David are marred by their imprecations. A life for a life was Old Testament law. Ruthlessly did the Hebrews moving in the twilight of God's revelation massacre their neighbors. War and rumors of war were the order of the old dispensation. Tribe fought against tribe, nation against nation.

The clash of arms, the groans of the oppressed, the agonizing cry of the weak were earth's contribution to the antiphony. Then heaven responded with "Peace on earth, good will to men." This was a glorious response. How sweet the message sounded above all the din of human strife. We had hints from Old Testament prophets that the heavenly choirs were practising for some such antiphonal response.

"He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth: and the isles shall wait for his law.

"To open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house.

"I am the Lord: that is my name: and my glory will I not give to another, neither my praise to graven images.

"Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare: before they spring forth I tell you of them.

"Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise from the end of the earth, ye that go down to the sea, and all that is therein; the isles, and the inhabitants thereof."

The new song was "Peace on earth, good will to men."

He would expand the spirit of Christmas to all time. He would have a brotherhood of love. He would cast out all hatred and war: and make love to fill full every heart.

There is still the noise of hatred on earth. There is still the selfishness that oppresses and robs. There is still the poverty that makes bad. There is still the wealth that makes bad. There is still the caloused human heart, and there are still the little children who have no chance to learn of the Babe of Bethlehem.

But "Peace on earth, good will to men" is still a sweet and transforming song.

It sings from the skies. It sings out of the life of every page of our New Testament. It sings from our literature.

"A man's a man for a' that" and "a' that" is our tribute to the universal man. The wise man who lingered to give succor and cheer and thus missed his Lord did not displease him. "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto me."

Every poet since the beginning of our era has breathed upon more of Christ's spirit, the spirit of love. In "The Search" Lowell finds Christ not in nature or in temple. But in these concluding stanzas he tells us where.

"So from my feet the dust
Of the proud world I shook;
Then came dear Love and shared with me his crust,
And half my sorrow's burden took.
After the World's soft bed,
Its rich and dainty fare,
Like down seemed Love's coarse pillow to my head
His cheap food seemed as manna rare;
Fresh-trodden prints of bare and bleeding feet,
Turned to the heedless city whence I came
Hard by I saw, and springs of worship sweet
Gushed from my cleft heart smitten by the same;
Love looked me in the face and spoke no word,
But straight I knew those footprints were the Lord's.
I followed where he led, and in a hovel rude,
With naught to fence the weather from his head,
The King I sought for meekly stood;
A naked, hungry child
Clung 'round his gracious knee,
And a poor hunted slave looked up and smiled
To bless the smile that set him free;
New miracles I saw his presence do—
No more I knew the hovel bare and poor,
The gathered chips into a woodpile grew,
The broken morsel swelled to goodly store;
I knelt and wept: my Christ no more I seek,
His throne is with the outcast and the meek."

Heaven's response "Peace on earth, good will to men" is being sung into an increasing number of the men of today. Many have heard and heeded this cry of human emancipation. Everywhere there is the determination to uplift the weak.

All have felt the tyranny of sin.

To these, to all, Jesus becomes an example, an inspiration, a Redeemer.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Dr. Errett Gates' Analogy

In a recent number of the Christian Century Dr. Errett Gates, in an article on "What Makes a Christian?" says that analogies are misleading. He then proceeds to use one that amply illustrates the fact that some analogies are certainly misleading. Pardon me if I speak plainly and say that he misses the mark almost as far as another writer in the same issue (Dec. 12, 1908), Mr. B. W. Rice, when he calls a "Fable of Two Buck Deer" a parable. There is certainly a wide difference between a fable and a parable. So there is a wide difference between the analogy used by Mr. Gates and the analogies usually employed to illustrate conversion.

There is certainly a difference as wide as the poles between transformation of character and the transformation of one kind of being into another. The transformation of a foreigner into a citizen is certainly different from the transformation of a human being into a man-like ape. The transformation of flour into bread would certainly be different from the transformation of flour into stones. Can Mr. Gates logically place his analogy of the transformation of a man-like ape into the human family in the same category with that of the process of naturalization or of marriage?

I do not know how this article will sound in print if read aloud, or if read at all, or if it ever finds its way into print. But I think I do know my own heart in this matter. I am a sincere seeker after truth. I preach for one of our most progressive churches in the west, a large and growing church, whose chief business is the making of Christians, and I feel that I cannot be anything else than a sincere seeker after larger truth, come from whatever source it may. I have read after Prof. H. L. Willett for years and have revised my ideas very largely because of his influence upon my life. I am more eager for larger truth today than ever before in my life. The congregation I am ministering to has enlarged in numbers very greatly and I feel that I owe these new Christians especially a large debt. I must pay it.

1. But am I a mere legalist when I use the illustrations of marriage and naturalization and that of the Fatherhood of God in illustrating conversion to Christ? Am I a mere legalist when I perform a marriage ceremony? Is the judge a mere legalist when he takes the oath of a foreigner? Is the foster parent a mere legalist when he adopts a child, according to the process required by law? Do not these require a different process altogether than would the changing of an animal into a man, if that were possible? In the one it is a process by which a human being is transformed into a different state, condition or relationship, whereas in the other it would be the transformation of one kind of being into a different being. His analogy in my thought (and I say it respectfully) is no analogy at all. I am more than anxious, however, to know the whole truth in this matter, and am willing to read unprejudicedly any further light that may be given on this subject.

Yours Respectfully,

Davenport, Ia. S. M. Perkins.

REPLY.

I thank Brother Perkins for the strictures he has made upon my treatment of the subject, "What Makes a Christian?" And I avail myself most eagerly of an opportunity to state more fully what I conceive the nature of the Christian to be.

My conception of a Christian is that it is nature, not law or relation, that makes him one. A Christian is a Christian by virtue of what he is in himself by nature, morally and spiritually. It is not law or ceremony or even obedience to law that makes a Christian. If the obedience is due to fear or prudence or self-interest, and not to the law of the right, it is not Christian obedience. Righteousness alone constitutes the Christian nature, according to the teaching of Jesus; and that righteousness is not merely right action, but right motive. Such seems to be the thought of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount. A Christian is not one who does as Jesus did, but one who does as he did from his motive. "Take heed that ye do not your righteousness before men, to be seen of them."

Love, the True Motive.

There is righteousness and righteousness. What could be more religious than prayer, almsgiving, and fasting; yet Jesus warned his disciples against them as they were practiced by the scribes and Pharisees. He called it hypocrisy—mere acting. They did those things to be seen of men. Is it any better motive to do those things to escape from punishment?

Paul goes so far as to say that one may have the miraculous gifts of prophesy, of tongues and of knowledge, but if he have not love, he is as sounding brass and a clanging cymbal. One may bestow all his goods to feed the poor, and give his body to be burned, but if he have not love, it profits nothing.

It is the love that forgets self—the love that gives and expects nothing in return—not honor, or praise of men, or even future blessedness. Such was the love of Paul for his countrymen when he declared that he could wish himself accursed from Christ for his brethren's sake, for his kinsmen according to the flesh.

Can a man have such a love by conforming to law or ceremony? It is a movement of the inner nature, an impulse of the heart, an affection of the soul, toward the good, the beautiful, and the true. A man may express it, symbolize it, through a law or ceremony; but he must have it, or the obedience and ceremony are deception and hypocrisy. And if he have it, the law and ceremony can not make it more so or less so. It is the obedience from the heart—action out of a good heart—that constitutes the Christian character. It is ethical, in contrast with "etiquettical" conduct, that is "righteousness" according to the Sermon on the Mount.

I will reply in this paper to paragraph number 1.

All of us Legalists.

1. Brother Perkins asks: "Am I a mere legalist when I perform a marriage ceremony?" Most certainly, why not? As members of a political commonwealth, we are all legalists. My objection is to making the Kingdom of God a political kingdom. As members of a political kingdom we are citizens, and stand in a legal relation to each other and to the sovereign; as members of the Kingdom of heaven, we are brethren, and stand in a spiritual relation to each other and to God.

When Brother Perkins performs a marriage ceremony is he doing it because he loves it, longs for it, and would be unhappy without it? Why do the bride and groom insist on a marriage ceremony? Because they are fond of it; or because the state requires it? How many brides, but that wish deeply in their hearts they could escape from it! They make no secret of their aversion to the ceremony. They contemplate it with fear and trembling. They go through with it because the law commands it, not because their conscience commands it. It is not from an inner impulse but from an outer compulsion that they do it.

This is the best illustration I ever saw for showing what the Christian life is not. The marriage ceremony makes the marriage legal, but not real. But any ceremony, or no ceremony, would serve the same purpose if the state should so decree. The marriage ceremony has no natural, or necessary connection with the real bond of love that unites a man and woman. It is a matter between them alone, and they would go to living together without any ceremony, if that was the custom of society.

There is, of course, difference of disposition among men and women. There are some who take delight in the public ceremony. They are proud of their fine clothes, or their "good catch," and want to be seen of men. To such persons the ceremony in public is very gratifying; the more numerous the public the more gratifying. But no man and woman, who truly love each other, however vain, ever looked upon the ceremony as essential to the happiness or well-being of their relationship to each other, only as organized society made it so by laws and statutes. The thing that is essential to their relation as husband and wife belongs to their natures and not to the laws or ceremonies they conform to.

And so with respect to the other questions asked by Brother Perkins. The "foster parent is a mere legalist when he adopts a child, according to the process required by law." He is then attending to a legal requirement which is laid upon him by the state; he would not do it if he were not compelled to; but he does not adopt the child because the state requires it, but because he loves it; and he would love it and do for it just as much if he never went through the legal process of adoption. The process or adoption does not change the inner relation of the man to the child, but the relation of both to the state. He does not love the child because of the ceremony of adoption, but because of something in the nature of the child. If that child's nature were different he would not love it and would not adopt it.

What is Sonship?

Why does God love man and treat him as a child, in the Christian sense? Because of a ceremony he has performed? Then anything of any nature good, bad, human or animal—might perform the ceremony and be treated as a child. That was the point in my analogy of the manlike ape and Gladstone. A certain kind of nature or being is necessary before you can ever perform the marriage ceremony, or the ceremony of naturalization or adoption. In legal, political relationships, the possession of the right kind of nature or being is not enough to entitle one to citizenship or marriage. A legal ceremony, a formal authorization is necessary to enjoy the legal benefits.

But in the Kingdom of God, the one thing that constitutes

Sunday School Lesson

THE LORD'S DEPARTURE.*

With the opening of the year the International lessons pass from the Old to the New Testament. The entire year 1909 is to be spent in the study of the Apostolic Church. In another column will be found a brief statement regarding the Book of Acts, which forms the basis of the year's work.

Our present study is concerned with the dedication of the book to the author's friend, Theophilus, who seems to have been a Gentile Christian, like Luke himself; and with Jesus' farewell interview with the disciples. The author first refers to his former work, the Gospel, which, like this, was dedicated to Theophilus. He indicates that in the present work he is narrating the story of what Jesus continued to do through the ministry of the apostles after his departure form them. The narrative then takes up the last period of Jesus' earthly life between the resurrection and his departure. There were forty days of this presence with them. The total time that elapsed between the resurrection of the Lord and the Day of Pentecost was fifty days. Whether the forty days of this passage is to be taken in its literal sense, leaving ten days between the Ascension and Pentecost, or whether forty days is to be understood in the general Jewish sense of a somewhat long period, is left to conjecture. But from this testimony, from that contained in the Gospel and from Paul's words in I Corinthians 15, we know that the Lord appeared on different occasions to different groups and individuals among his followers, assuring them of his conquest of death and of their own hopes through him.

The Commission.

In all four of the Gospels and in this Book of Acts we have the record of Jesus' commission to the disciples to go out and evangelize the world after his departure. In each account of this command of the Lord, there is some individual feature given by the writer. Luke's particular contribution to the great commission is the injunction to remain in Jerusalem until the signal shall be given for their departure upon this evangel. In harmony with that Lukan idea, we have the author speaking here of the fact that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for God's promise, which Jesus had conveyed to them. This refers to his words in reference to the Divine Spirit, which should endow them with power, and give them courage and wisdom for their task. This he called the baptism of the Holy Spirit, such a saturation with the spirit of Jesus, such complete absorption in the program of the Kingdom, that they should count life and its allurements as nothing in comparison with the work to which they were called.

The Political Hope.

It must have been one of the discouraging experiences of Jesus that he found the disciples never quite ready to abandon their materialistic messianic hopes. They could only think of the kingdom in terms of national political expectations. To have a king who should deliver them from the Roman yoke, and rule with the splendor of a Solomon or a Herod, was to them the consummation of desire. They pressed the question evermore upon the Lord as to when this happy realization would come. He had tried in every way to shatter these worldly hopes. His quiet submission to death at the hands of the Jews and the Romans was the severest blow he could deal to such vain ambitions. And, yet, even after his resurrection, when they should have begun to understand more truly the nature of his work, they made of him this same inquiry, "Are you about ready to set up the kingdom which is to allow us the offices we have so long desired?"

The Work of Witnessing.

It must have been trying even to the patient nature of our Lord to have thus constantly obtruded upon his higher purposes this dream of empire. But he answered them gently that they must not concern themselves with times or seasons, with human ambitions and material hopes, for the Father would take care of all these matters. What really was of chief importance was the fact that after the signal was given, when they found themselves aroused by that divine presence and power which he had promised them, they were to be his witnesses throughout the world, and this was their highest glory. They were not to be officers nor ecclesiastes, but simply witnesses. They had no authority of any sort which would not grow out of the message he had given them. Even their priority was not that of station, but of time. They were the first of the witnesses among the great host who should bear testimony to the work of Christ.

The natural order of the missionary work is perfectly plain and informing. It was home missions first and then outside missions. They were to preach in Jerusalem and then in Judea; then to the half-Gentile people of Samaria, and then to the furthest parts of the earth. Home missions and foreign missions ever go together, and the last have their basis and function in the first.

The Departure.

This, then, was the content of that final interview which Jesus had with the disciples. When he had thus spoken to them, he disappeared from their sight. He had told them that it was expedient he should go away. As long as he remained visibly with them, they would wait his commands and take up no work on their own responsibility. With the physical problems in this narrative of the ascension we need not be troubled. If it were to be taken literally as physical ascent, it would be very easy to raise the usual sceptical questions, "Is, then, heaven upward from Judea? If so, what is its direction from the opposite of the world?" and, "If Jesus' physical body ascended into heaven, what became of it and where is it now?" We know too little of the life of Jesus to be troubled by these questions. He appeared in a form which confirmed the disciples in the knowledge that he was alive, the survivor of death, and its conqueror. Whether this body was the physical organism he had used in the days of his flesh or a body of another sort we have no means of knowing. We know that in some convincing way Jesus assured the disciples of his resurrection and of his departure from them, only in order that he might convince them the more fully that he was actually with them for evermore.

The Return.

The testimony of the closing verses is interesting as showing not only the early Christian belief that Jesus was soon to return to take possession of his kingdom, but as emphasizing that deeper truth, now coming to clearer comprhension than ever, that he is not only to return, but that he is coming daily and hourly as his people make place and room for him in their hearts and homes and institutions. The disciples were told that as surely as they had seen him go, so he would come again. The phrase does not mean in the same form that he had gone nor in the same visible manner. Its use in other parts of the scriptures confirms us in understanding it as referring not to the manner, but to the certainty of his return. And in that certainty we abide, knowing as far as we are willing, he is already with us, and that his promise remains true that he will come to us in such fullness of power as we permit and desire. And so our prayer is ever the prayer of the early church, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

The Prayer-Meeting

PROF. SILAS JONES.

Topic December 30: The Last Promise and the Last Prayer of the Bible. Rev. 22:20-21.

It has been said by a recent writer that "The books of Daniel and Revelation are rather a perplexity than a comfort to the average reader of the Bible. Some, indeed, in ever yage have taken delight in these books above all others just because of their mystery, but for the majority, apart from the impressive admonition in the latter's at the beginning of Revelation, and the glowing pictures of the New Jerusalem at the end, these have been sealed books." For one whose delight is in mystery, the last promise of the Bible is an invitation to speculate concerning the end of the world and the final judgment. If anybody has his faith increased and his efficiency in the service of the Master multiplied by curious inquiries into the purposes of God, I must honor him for the good he does, but when he tries to convince me that he knows the date of the Lord's coming, I beg the privilege of getting into an obscure corner of the church and reading a book or taking a nap. There is work in our immediate neighborhood to do. We may trust to the Lord for the general management of the universe. The command is, "Watch," and that means that we are to be awake to our duty, not officious with respect to things that belong to God alone.

"I Come Quickly."

The coming of Jesus into the lives of men may well be the subject of our meditation as the year is drawing to a close. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself." "Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in unto him, and will sup with him, and he with me." The Lord of life is seeking admission to the hearts of men. He will not delay to come in if the door is opened. He is asking for a place in the halls of legislation and in the councils of executives. Already some authority has been given to him in these places. Men heard his voice and abolished the gladiatorial fights. Again he spoke, and slavery was destroyed. When men listen to him, the sacredness of human life is recognized, and the sophistries of politicians and mammon worshippers who would traffic in human happiness and virtue are swept aside and justice and mercy are exalted. The awakening of China, of Persia, of India, of Turkey, the unrest of the peoples and the fears of rulers tell us that the souls of men are climbing to "the awful verge of manhood." As the disciple of Jesus looks abroad upon the nations, he sees signs of the coming of his Master among them all.

"Amen: Come, Lord Jesus."

The Christian is an actor in the events that are changing history. He prays for the coming of his Lord. He ought to pray more than he does. The cry of the market and the sound of revelry should not drown hte voice of prayer. "Let us pray," is a call much needed in times of bitter dissention. Prayer in the name of Jesus Christ will help us to understand what are the essentials of our faith. It is not a substitute for Bible study nor for friendly discussion of differences; it brings us into the presence of God and gives us the true spirit of investigation. It wars against all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, and railing. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." The peace of our Jerusalem is the discomfiture of her enemies. For her peace is agreement on a plan of campaign against wickedness of every kind; it unites men of faith and men of action in the wars of the Lord. The successes of the past year are sufficient for abundant thanksgivings. With the thanksgiving we must join petitions for the coming year that other victories may be won for our king. May the Lord come to his church and teach it to strike at the great wrongs that afflict society and not to waste its time in debating about trifles. May he give it wise leadership. May he come into the hearts of all and casting out all rivals reign there supreme. The closing year admonishes us that the time is short. We have not even minutes to spend in senseless conflicts and idle pleasures. We must follow him who was ever about his Father's business.

CHRISTIAN UNION.

citizenship and sonship is the possession of a kind of nature or being, and that is enough. God needs nothing, and cares for nothing but what a man is in his inner being. That is the difference between God and a political sovereign. The political sovereign, the state, does not know what a man is in his inner being, whether moral or immoral, and does not take account of the spiritual states of citizens; but the spiritual states of citizens of the Kingdom of heaven is just what God does take account of, and nothing more.

Brother Perkins asks: "Am I a mere legalist when I use the illustrations of marriage and naturalization and of the Fatherhood of God in illustrating conversion to Christ?" That depends upon what point or feature of the analogy you select to make a point of resemblance to religious things. "If you take all features and make it go on all fours," you are likely to go wrong. It is your duty, first of all to understand conversion and the religion of Christ, and then select points in the analogy to illustrate what you think. The fatal use made of marriage is to settle upon the legal ceremony and see nothing else. If in the use of these analogies you make the essential nature of them illustrate the essential nature of the union between the Christian and Christ, you will not go far wrong. For, what is the essential nature of marriage? The marriage ceremony, or love? What is the essential nature of citizenship? The naturalization ceremony, or loyalty and patriotism? What is the essential nature of sonship? The ceremony of adoption, or filial love and obedience? The ceremony is, no doubt, the legal element in them, but it is not the essential, or real element. If you make the essential nature of marriage to consist in the ceremony, and of citizenship to consist in the act of naturalization, and of sonship to consist in the act of adoption, and see nothing else, and then go on to make the essential nature of conversion, like these analogies, to consist in a legal ceremony—baptism—it is my opinion that you are a legalist. In doing so you make a ceremony necessary in conversion, by selecting for illustration an institution in which a ceremony is necessary, and saying that conversion and marriage are alike in these respects. You need to prove first of all that conversion is such that a ceremony is necessary to it.

But some one will say: "The rights of marriage, and of citizenship, and of sonship, depend upon the legal recognition of them." So is it with the rights of Christians.

What are the rights of true Christians? The right to love God with all the heart, and their neighbors as themselves; the right to do unto others as they would that others should do unto them; the right to be perfeet as their Father in heaven; the right to have a pure heart and see God; the right to make peace and be called the children of God; the right to love and be born of God; the right to love their brethren and pass from darkness to light; the right to believe that Jesus is the Christ, and be born of God; the right to give a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple and in nowise lose the reward; the right to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and have pure religion and undefiled before God; the right to visit the sick and those in prison, to feed the hungry, and clothe the naked, and have the judge in the last day say to them: "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

Any man who wants to avail himself of these rights and privileges, can have them regardless of any law or ceremony, for nothing can prevent the pure in heart, having all the blessedness of purity. Just as well try to prevent the fire from having warmth, or the light from having brightness.

The rights of the Christian! Likeness to Christ! What ceremony stands between the soul and Christlikeness? What law can prevent the soul having it if it wills it? Who can forbid the Christlike having Christ? That is a personal, spiritual transaction between Christ and the Christian. The Christian can have all the likeness to Christ he can bear, and with it all it brings. Jesus said: "I know mine own, and mine own know me; and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand."

Analogies never prove anything; but how much they do convey of meaning, either true or false!

THE GENTIAN.

As one late wakened to the call of Love,
Whose eager youth ran by nor yielded toll,
Withheld aloof beneath a cold control,
Disdaining Heart and throning Mind above;

Yet in mid-life, at flood-tide of success,
Lays power and honors down before Her feet,
Compelled to mighty love by love as meet,
Unselfed, unswerving, final, measureless;

So wakes the Gentian with November near,
Nor answers aught to sweet June's fervid breath,
But as late love, with passion unto death,
Outlives the summer and the flaming year.

—The Atlantic.

There is no failure. God's immortal plan
Accounts no loss a lesson learned for man.
Defeat is oft the discipline we need
To save us from the wrong, or teaching heed
To error which would else more dearly cost—
A lesson learned is ne'er a battle lost.
Whene'er the cause is right, be not afraid;
Defeat is then but victory delayed;
And e'en the greatest viet'ries of the world
Are often won when battle flags are furled.

So in our Christmas antiphonal:
Earth Complains:
Of God being far off.
Of enmity possessing the world.
Of the slavery and sin.
Heaven answers:
By giving Immanuel, God with us.
By singing, "Peace on earth, good will to men."
By Jesus, Savior.

George A. Campbell.

Wretchedness—Salvation.

There is a third stanza to our antiphonal song.

Earth's individual cries, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of death."

Heaven answers with the cry of the babe.

His name shall be called Jesus because he shall save the people from their sins.

The cry for forgiveness, the cry for purity, has been the cry of every aspiring soul in all ages. We are passing from the age of mere sentiment, from the age of a crust of charity, from that of Salvation Army Christmas dinners, from that of mere charity in any form. We are passing to a demand for justice.

Home and the Children

SOME OF THE CHILDREN.

A is for apt little Annie,
Who lives down in Maine with her grannie.
Such pies she can make!
And such doughnuts and cakes!
O, we like to make visits to grannie!

D is for dear little Dinah,
Whose manners grow finer and finer,
She smiles and she bows
To the pigs and the cows,
And she calls the old cat Angelina.

G is for glad little Gustave,
Who says that a monkey he must have;
But his mother thinks not,
And says that they've got
All the monkeys they care for in Gustave.

I is for ignorant Ida,
Who doesn't know rhubarb from cider,
Once she drank up a quart,
Which was not what she ought,
And it gave her queer feelings inside her.

N is for naughty young Nat,
What sat on his father's best hat.
When they asked if he thought
He had done as he ought,
He said he supposed 'twas the cat!

O's for operatic Olivia,
Who visits her aunt in Bolivia.
She can sing to high C—
But between you and me,
They don't care for that in Bolivia.

P is for poor little Paul,
Who doesn't like study at all,
But he's learning to speak,
In Hebrew and Greek,
And is going to take Sanskrit next fall.

BEFORE AND AFTER CHRISTMAS.

By Caroline Benedict Burrell.

It is not so much the presents we receive at Christmas as the way they come to us that makes them delightful. A gift from the ten-cent store, done up with red ribbons and holly and presented with a clever speech or a jingle is remembered when a gold watch or a set of teaspoons are forgotten. With grown people, quite as much as with children, it is the unexpected that counts. This makes it worth our while to try and give in the interchange of gifts at this holiday time something of interest, of novelty, and if there happens this year to be a little less money spent on them than usual, it will never be noticed, and if they are expensive, they will be valued not alone for their visible costliness.

One of the ways in which surprises are lost on us at Christmas time lies in our habit of inspecting the parcels the postman and expressman bring to us a day or more ahead of time. We take in a bundle rich in stamps and exclaim, scrutinizing the address: "Oh this is from Aunt Mary! It is soft and light, too, so I am sure it is the table cover she was making last summer." Or the expressman hands in a package which the least experienced person sees at once is a book, and easily identifies the giver. Too often recipients are not content to stop even here, but actually open the Christmas gifts at once. The keen edge of delight over the gift vanishes in thin air on the spot, and the joyful feeling of surprise which keeps us ever young at Christmas time has been irreparably lost.

Last year a clever family devised a plan to prevent this sort of thing. They placed in the front hall near the door a large clothes hamper tied up with holly, and each person in the house was put on honor to deposit in it everything that came in the door, without examining the name on the parcel. The evening before Christmas all packages holding the family presents were brought down and put in the hamper also, and the next morning it was placed under the tree and Santa Claus himself appeared to hand the gifts to each.

In a family where there were any number of children, the mother, one year, made an enormous stocking, reaching from the top of a doorway to the floor. It was decorated with greens and filled to overflowing with presents; of course some of these proved to be only bundles of paper, put in to fill up the huge receptacle, but as no one could guess which was a real present and which a make-believe, the fun was all the greater, especially as Santa Claus suddenly appeared when the stocking was found by the children, and with a speech declaring it had been too heavy to carry on his back, so he had been obliged to hang it up, he mounted a stepladder and from there reached into the stocking and tossed the gifts down to the children below.

A custom in vogue in most families where there are grown-ups only, at Christmas time, is to place the presents on chairs, one for each person, in the sitting-room the night before. A girl with a gift for sketching altered this a little. She made huge posters, caricaturing each of the circle in turn. The mother wore a gown donned only on stateliest occasions, and each of its good points was sufficiently emphasized to raise a laugh at sight. The daughter was drawn with hair done in the extreme of style, and with eyes and eyelashes of amazing proportions and a charming ball dress; the schoolboy was in football costume; and so on, down to the least. These posters were hung up after the family had left the room for the night, over the proper chairs.

When children are of the sort who like thrilling and sensational things—and most modern children do—there is a way of giving presents which is sure to delight them. The usual tree is lighted Christmas morning, but not a gift is to be seen anywhere. All hunt, Father and Mother exclaiming and wondering with the rest. Suddenly the doorbell rings and Santa Claus appears, in a great hurry, with a few packages only—one for each—hastily handed in at the door, with a "Merry Christmas!" as he dashes out of sight. Almost before these are opened, and certainly before there is time for the chill of genuine disappointment, the bells rings again and, with hurried apologies for his mistake this busy day, more packages are presented and again he disappears. The process is repeated at intervals, longer or shorter, till his pack is really empty. With a good-sized family, and a judicious selection of the gifts so that no one has too many at once and no one is quite forgotten, the fun can be kept up a long time.

Small families of sober-minded people may have their gifts in still another fashion. Some one may make mail bags of brown denim, trimmed with imitation leather in a lighter shade of the same thing, with U. S. M. painted on the side in white. All the gifts may be put in these by this same person, so that the secret of the bags themselves is kept, and Christmas morning a mail carrier dressed for the occasion may hand them in at the door; or they may be laid by the plates at breakfast in place of the usual supply of letters and papers.

As to the after-Christmas presents, there are two new ones for this year. One is for the solitary woman who keeps house in a small way. A market basket, with covers, is decorated with holly and ribbon and filled with jars of different sizes, all carefully tied up in white paper. One may hold spiced fruit, another pickles, a third mince meat, a fourth jam or compote and half a dozen small ones may have jellies and other good things, all meant to help out the possibly monotonous little table-for-one.

The other after-Christmas present is even more of a delight. It is a large envelope, sometimes as large as a small pillowcase, with initials on it, the date, 1909, and the words, "Love for a Year." In it, tied up with ribbons of different colors, are twelve gifts, one for the first day of each month. For a young girl, perhaps away from home, there may be a veil, a party bag, a piece of bureau silver, a pretty calendar and so on. For a boy there might be alternating neckties, handkerchiefs and brilliant socks. But the best of all is the envelope for the invalid; in this there should be twelve letters from far-away friends; and with these, twelve small gifts to be looked over in sober or tired hours.

But Christmas once past and presents put away, there remain the greens on the walls and in the windows, too full of association to be carelessly put in the ash barrel. One more festivity may, perhaps, close the holiday season and dispose of them appropriately. January sixth is the feast of the Epiphany, the visit of the Wise Men to the Child. In England on that day they have the custom of a children's party, with a great cake baked with a bean in it. This is cut and divided, and the child who gets the bean acts as king or queen, choosing a consort and directing the games through the evening. This may be prettily carried out in any family where there are young people, and at the close of the gayeties, the greens are taken down and put in a pile near an open fireplace. While some one reads aloud the Christmas Carol these are laid on the flames, a few at a time, and the holiday season ends when the last one is in ashes, as the words of Tiny Tim are read—"God bless us, every one.!"—The Congregationalist.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

I have seen the following definition of miracle in a recent article on the subject:

"A miracle is an event produced by a special act of the divine will, but without the use of natural means, and is thus distinguishable from a providential event. Both emanate from special divine agency, and are, therefore, equally supernatural. But they differ in that co-operation with the forces of nature is involved in the latter case and not in the former. And it is clear that the definition of the miraculous, as here given, is comprehensive enough to embrace all miracles; such, for example, as the act of creation, which, so far from involving the use of natural means, was the divine act by which the whole machinery of nature was brought into existence."

Would you be good enough to say whether you would regard this as satisfactory?

St. Louis, Mo. Reader.

It is one of the definitions of miracle which has in some periods of Christian teaching been held as the best view. That it is no longer so held is due to the change that has come over religious thought by closer study of God's relation to the universe. It will be noticed that the statement quoted emphasizes the arbitrary and contra-natural character of miracles, as produced directly by the divine will and irrespective of natural means. In other words, it is a fracture of nature's methods which are simply God's methods of working.

There was a time in the history of Christian thinking when men believed that to depart as far as possible from the ordinary processes of life and growth in one's thought of miracle was to exhibit a satisfying reverence for the divine power. The theory was that the greater the contrast that could be discovered between God's ways of working in nature and those which he uses in the education of man for immortality, the greater was the value of the evidence thus given. This view of the question has largely ceased to have force. The reason for it is that it seems contrary to the very revelation God has given us of himself as the source of order and harmony, not of disorder and caprice. Moreover there is no word in the Scriptures which sanctions such a view of miracle as an intervention in the realm of nature which disarranges the machinery of the universe in response to a higher will. Still further it is impossible to see where either ethical or spiritual ends are served by such abrogation of the usual laws of life.

Miracle would seem rather such a use of law as produces marvelous but not unnatural results. It needs to be said with emphasis that if by the word "supernatural" one means to signify the world of spiritual laws by which God is governing the universe, then all phenomena which deal with God's education of man are supernatural. Man is himself, a supernatural being, in the sense that he is not limited to the visible order of nature. But if the phenomena of miracle are considered, as these phenomena appeared for example in the life of our Lord, then we are in the realm of the marvelous, the unusual, the unique manifestation of power, but not in any realm which invites or permits the word "supernatural." Indeed that word itself is wholly unbiblical, and is merely a device of metaphysics to explain the marvelous work of Christ. Rather is it better to abide by the terms of Scripture and understand miracle as the impressive manifestation of power by one able to employ that power at altitudes beyond the reach of the fragmentary and partial lives we live.

Such a definition of miracle as is quoted by "Reader" shows a singular lack of sympathy with the whole field of scientific study, which is doing so much to interpret God's laws and methods to us. It is becoming daily less possible for men to believe that the Father destroys in one form of revelation (the Scriptures) what he is so elaborately teaching us in another form (the study of nature). Rather, as nature is constantly manifesting new and surprising disclosures of divine power in perfect accord with law, so may we expect the Scriptures to reveal that which we actually find, the divine power, constantly used to forward the ends of the Kingdom of God, but in such surprising manner that no term less than "wonder" or "sign" or "miracle" could rightly describe it. The miracle is unquestioned. It is the definition that fails.

Dear Brother Willett:—In the "Century" of Nov. 7 you say, "In the earliest chapters of Genesis we have the use of Semitic world-stories of creation and primitive times as "vehicles of religious instruction, etc." What is your best evidence for the Semitic origin of these narratives and where can I get them?

Truly,

Rocky Ford, Colo. W. B. Harter.

It was in 1875 that the Assyriologist, George Smith, discovered among the tablets from the library of Ashurbanipal fragments of the Babylonian hymn of creation. "The Chaldean Account of Genesis," which he published in the following year, was the first of many works dealing with this remarkable literature. The poem of creation was written on seven tablets. In its present form it dates from the seventh century, B. C., but goes back to a period many centuries earlier. The five leading motives of the poem are: (1) The birth of the gods; (2) the legend of Ga and Apsu; (3) the dragon-myth; (4) the account of creation, and (5) the hymns to the great god Marduk. It is this Babylonian creation epic with which the narrative in Genesis 1 is seen to have definite relations. A shorter poem, usually known as the Sumero-Babylonian account of the creation of the world by Marduk is strikingly like the second narrative of the origin of the world, found in Genesis 2. The most noticeable difference between the Babylonian and the Hebrew narratives is the total elimination from the latter of that polytheism which predominates in the former from which they were taken. Similar parallels to the story of the Garden of Eden, and the account of the flood are found also in the Babylonian literature.

The entire subject is discussed, with full citation of the texts, in Lenormant's "Beginnings of History." S. R. Driver discusses the subject at length in "Authority and Archaeology," and in his "Genesis" (Gorham). Prof. Kent gives brief extracts from the Babylonian poems in his "Beginnings of Hebrew History" (Students' Old Testament, Scribner.)

Will you be good enough to suggest the names of a few books or essays on the subject of healing as related to Christianity?

Grand Rapids, Mich. C. H. J.

Public interest in the work of healing in connection with Christianity has grown rapidly through the past few years. This is in some sense due to the growth of Christian Science and related theories of healing, all of which go back to the fundamental principle of suggestion as applied to the control of the mind over the body. The Roman Catholic Church has long used this principle in its healings at certain shrines, such as that of Lourdes in southern France. In some regards, Emil Zola's novel "Lourdes," is one of the best treatments of the success and failure of this sort of emotional and suggestive therapeutics. Most recently the Emmanuel movement in the East has attracted wide attention. This and related phases of the subject are considered in Bishop Samuel Fallows' recently published book, Health and Happiness. (McClurg, Chicago, $1.50). The Law of Christian Healing, by David V. Fitzgerald, (Revell), is a recent volume on the same theme. A volume called Religion and Health, by MacDonald, (Funk & Wagnalls); Christian Sanity, by Scoville; and an anonymous work, The Christ that Is To Be, are all suggestive. An admirable article by R. J. Ryle in the Hibbert Journal for April, 1907, has the title "The Neurotic Theory of the Miracles of Healing."

The American Institute of Sacred Literature has prepared a new course on "The Origin and Religious Teaching of the Old Testament books." Regarding it Professor John E. McFadyan, of Toronto, one of the best known biblical teachers of the present time, writes as follows:

Toronto, Ont., Oct. 16, 1908.

I have examined your book, which you were kind enough to send me, with unusual pleasure and profit. In many ways, I think it a remarkable performance. Only one to whom the ground was very familiar could have written such a book at all; and I hardly know whether to admire more the wisdom of your selections—and from experience I know what an exceedingly hard task this must have been—or the wonderful combination of delicate tact and candor with which you have presented some of the reasonably certain results of Old Testament criticism: e. g. your treatment of Elijah, Deuteronomy, Jonah and many other knotty points.

This volume gives a splendid conception of the Old Testament as a whole, and those who read it will have nothing to unlearn when they extend their studies. They will find that history has been respected; and religion is then most safe.

The perspective has, as it seems to me, been admirably observed You give e. g. the Chronicler all the space he deserves, and your division of books like Psalms, and Proverbs is eminently clear.

The volume must, I feel sure, do an immense amount of good. Quite unostentatiously it will dissipate untenable conceptions and old prejudice and it will do this in the best of all ways by exhibiting something sure and fruitful in their place. I congratulate the Institute on what seems to me the admirable execution of a very difficult piece of work.

John E. McFadyan.

CHICAGO

CHICAGO FOLLOWS THE LEAD OF LOS ANGELES IN FEDERATING THE CITY MISSION INTEREST—THE DAY OF SECTARIAN INDEPENDENCE IN MISSION WORK GONE AT LAST—O. F. JORDAN, SECRETARY OF DISCIPLES' MISSION WORK, HAS A PART IN THE NEW ORGANIZATION AND REPORTS THE MEETING.

Last week, the board of the Coöperating Council of City Missions met for discussion of their problems. As their organization is so recent, much of the time was spent in defining policies, though some definite matters were taken up for consideration. This organization is a federated effort to secure comity in City Missions.

Previous to last summer, five great religious bodies have had city superintendents of missions and most of them with downtown offices, each working in a perfectly independent way. Charges of sharp practice in the occupancy of new territory were frequent. It often happened that certain desirable resident neighborhoods were badly overchurched while the more needy parts of the city were entirely over-looked.

Brotherhood vs. Survival of the Fittest.

Last summer a call was made at the personal initiative of Prof. Shailer Mathews, of the University of Chicago, for a meeting of men from the different denominations to look toward some co-operative effort. The call was not particularly welcome to some of the more aggressive leaders of the denominations, for the denomination that succeeds on a mission field is ever ready to insist that the fate of missions be left "to the survival of the fittest." The spirit of brotherhood and unity has so far pervaded the atmosphere, however, as to render it impolitic any longer for the representatives of any great denomination to repel any effort that looks in the direction of unity.

The result of the meetings was the organization of the Coöperating Council of City Missions. The small expense of the organization is met by annual assessments of $25 levied on Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists and Disciples. Each of these bodies have five men on the general board and one man each on the executive committee. The superintendents of each body constitute the committee to look into alleged violations of comity and to advise with groups over the establishment of new churches. Dr. Mathews is the president of the organization and the newly elected secretary is a Presbyterian.

One of the first questions that arose was that of an independent colored mission in the worst and most criminal part of the "black belt." It had been supported by a charitably inclined woman for years but this lady had suddenly transferred her affections to a settlement in some other part of the city. The mission was doing a great deal of good and the preacher showed his sincerity by earning his own living in a laundry. This mission was referred to the Baptist society for aid as the preacher is a Baptist, though the Baptists had once refused aid for lack of funds. In case they are not able to raise the funds, it will probably be turned over to some organization that has funds. It was proposed by some members of the council to turn the mission over to the Disciples in case the Baptists could not father it.

Denominational Trespassing.

From this discussion of independent missions, wherein the frauds of some independent missions were laid bare, the meeting turned to the question of alleged violation of comity. A certain small suburb that already had two churches, was invaded by a certain great and aggressive denomination and a new church planted. This denomination had members in the churches already on the field. Because the new church immediately became self-supporting, it was argued that its establishment was right. The council could go no farther than its members go in their sentiments. The matter was dismissed by the superintendents of the two denominations involved getting together in an agreement.

In another case a group of ardent denominational adherents were wishing to organize in a neighborhood. This case was kindly referred to the superintendent's committee for investigation. This committee meets soon. In case it reports adversely, it will be interesting to see whether its decision will be accepted by the denomination involved. If these decisions are not always accepted now, there will come more and more odium in rejecting the wisdom of the federated church. More and more it will become apparent that enterprises established against the best judgment of the committee will fail and that enterprises that have the approval of all will succeed. Thus, while the Coöperating Council will never have more than an advisory capacity, its decisions will have the authority that comes from experience and successful service.

Work Among Foreigners.

Another fruitage of the Coöperating Council will be the providing of accurate statistics of the city's problems for the first time in its history. The first installment was given last week, only a meager group of facts that have a tremendous significance to the whole Protestant program.

Slips were passed around and the five organizations asked to state the amount of their foreign work. Now ninety per cent of Chicago is either foreign born, or composed of the children of the foreign born. Of the five organizations, the Disciples were the only ones that had no preaching in any of the forty-three foreign languages of Chicago. This was humiliating and depressing to the Disciples present, but when the results of the foreign work of the different denominations was read, we felt that perhaps we had saved much money by never undertaking the problem at all. We would have undoubtedly done the thing by just as fundamentally wrong a principle as the other great religious bodies had done. It is ungracious to say that no good has been done or that no permanent results have been achieved. The fact remains, however, that outside the Germans and Scandinavians, few self-supporting foreign Protestant organizations exist in Chicago.

The Baptists have eleven stations with seven different languages. The Congregationalists have thirteen stations with three different languages. The Presbyterians have ten stations with ten different languages. We shall be able to present other interesting and significant statistics when they are fully compiled.

Difficulties of the Work.

That this foreign work has proven difficult, is to be seen in the report of one denomination concerning its Polish work. The mission was founded fourteen years ago. A property costing four thousand dollars was purchased and devoted to the work. Appropriations were made from year to year aggregating a total of over ten thousand dollars. The mission had one preacher desert to the Roman Catholics and take with him a considerable following. At one time they imported a preacher from Poland already trained for work among his people. At the present time there are fourteen members to this mission church. The denomination contemplates turning over the work to the Chicago Tract Society on the theory they better than any one else understand work in the foreign populations of the great cities.

The above is a sample case that has been duplicated many times in the work of Protestant missions in Chicago. If some disciple of the older order arises and tells us that it is because the poor Poles did not get the "pure old gospel" let him reflect on what the denominations have done in the English populations of Chicago. In 1882 the Congregationalists had seventeen churches in and around Chicago. Now they have eighty-four. Then they had 5,000 members. Now they have 15,000. Such growth as this indicates that church growth at least, is not dependent upon a particular brand of theology.

Religious Forms Should Not Be Grafted.

In the reports of unsuccessful missions, it developed incidentally that in these Polish, Bohemian and Italian missions, they had prayer-meetings, and all the other institutions of the American church life. It may be the conceit of inexperience, but it seems to us that the very secret of failure was in the fact that the denominations were trying to graft the American religious experience on to foreign stock. A Polander will never be aught else all his life in his essential make-up. For centuries he has chosen the formal religious services of the Roman Catholic church. He was unaffected by the Protestant reformation. He is now unaffected by the Protestant missionary. The religion that will appeal to him will be a religion that meets his own religious needs. A foreign religious institution cannot be successfully grafted on to him. Roman Catholicism had to be "reformed" by every nation for itself. The Scotch became Presbyterians, the English Episcopalians, and the Germans Lutherans. The same forces produced in different countries different types of a "reformed" church. A "reformed" church for the Polanders will be one in keeping with their national character. A Disciple cannot hope to make simon-pure Disciples out of Polanders, though he can hope to be of tremendous service to the Polander in doing the "reforming" work if he work with his foreign brother intelligently. The broader principles of the Disciples' movement can be taken to these foreign populations, but they must be allowed to develop their own institutions and types of worship according to their needs.

NOTES.

The event of the winter in and around Chicago in religious circles is the coming of the Religious Education Association, Feb. 9-11. This is the sixth annual convention and already the organization has become a commanding figure in the American church life. It is the product of the constructive genius of William Rainey Harper, President of the University of Chicago. He conceived that there should be an organization like the National Teachers' Association which should devote itself to the task of religious education. This organization has no publications except the bound volumes of the annual addresses and the bi-monthly magazine "Religious Education." These go to all the members with a membership fee of three dollars per annum. The leading speakers will be President Francis G. Peabody, President Benjamin I. Wheeler, President Eliot of Harvard, President C. E. Mitchell, Professor George A. Coe, President Henry C. King, Miss Jane Addams, Professor Charles R. Henderson and Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts. With such an array of great names as this it is useless to exhort attendance. Every man

WITH THE WORKERS

John W. Marshall is in a good meeting at Martinsville, Ind.

The church at Chapin, Ill., is arranging to install the individual communion service.

A. W. Taylor and F. E. Truckess will lead the church at Normal, Ill., in an evangelistic meeting in January.

A. L. Ward of the First Church, Boulder, Colo. preached on a recent Sunday morning for the Highland Church of that city.

The First Church at McKinney, Texas, is just completing a $4,000 home for their pastor, J. M. Bell, who is doing an excellent work with the church.

The church at Brasher, Mo., wishes a pastor to begin work the first of next month. They can pay $900 salary. Those interested may address Dr. James Hanks, Brasher, Mo.

The Ross Avenue Church, Dallas, Texas, has shown its appreciation of the work of their pastor, Leroy L. Anderson, by increasing his salary. There is no better way to keep a preacher at his best.

Owing to some changes in dates, Evangelist Joel Brown, has March and April open for meetings. He will go to any church, and bear the responsibility for the financial success of the meeting. He may be addressed at Lancaster, Mo.

The Elyria, Ohio, Church, with which the State convention meets next May, is enjoying a season of prosperity. There are frequent conversions. The church hopes to close the year by paying a $2,000 mortgage. John P. Sala is the pastor.

At the Des Moines Ministers' meeting, Dec. 14, the following additions were reported: Central, (Idleman), one confession, two by letter; University Place, (Medbury), three by letter, one confession; Capitol Hill, (Van Horne), four confessions.

W. A. Harp is getting a "grip on things" at the "Lenox Avenue Union Church," New York. The church has contributed to New York Missions, and to New York City work, within the past few weeks. The pastor is organizing a men's Bible class.

J. P. Myers, Shelbyville, Ind., reports a meeting just closed, with E. L. Day, of Brazil, Ind., evangelist, and J. J. Tapp, of Lagoda, leader of song. In the fifteen days of the meeting there were twenty-two accessions to the church, and others have since been received by the pastor.

The Sunday-school at Warren, Ohio, is in a membership campaign. The church paper, "The Christian Monitor," Dec. 1, says: "Attendance last Sunday, 482; offering, $12.69; every officer present; four classes with an attendance of over thirty each"—one of them is taught by the pastor's wife. The young men's class had an attendance of thirty-one.

H. H. Peters, Eureka, Ill., State Superintendent of Christian Endeavor, has sent out a special appeal to our societies urging their coöperation; in giving three dollars each to the support of C. E. work among our own people in the state, in holding meetings for consideration of plans for promoting Christian Unity, to make January and February rallying months for Christian Endeavor, and by each society helping to make "Illinois Day" a success in their church. Let our societies remember they can secure a visit from Mr. Peters by simply paying his traveling expense to and from Eureka.

TELEGRAMS.

Logansport, Ind., Dec. 20-21, 1908.—Signal victory. Closed tonight with 140 and great audience. No meeting could have been more difficult. Railroad town. Audiences shifting nightly. Hard to get people to definite acceptance, confession and baptism. For local reasons the board thought best not to announce the meetings until just beginning. This always a mistake. It leads to lack of proper introduction of Evangelist and prevents effective preparation. Spite of it wonders accomplished in the month. Meeting talk of entire city. Raised nearly thousand dollars in a few minutes today. Joseph Crag ideal pastor and greatly beloved. LeRoy St.-John fine musical director and soloist.

Herbert Yeuell.

Anderson, Ind., Dec. 21, 1908.—61 converts yesterday, 182 last week, 608 in 27 days. Had 595 in 27 days in our great meeting here three years ago with same pastor, T. W. Grafton. Overflow meeting last night, 37 converts at night. This great meeting could surpass the other which reached 1281 if we ran this as long, but our other dates begin Jan. 1st. I must have a few days rest. School teachers, professional men and merchants among converts. Number of strong men and heads of families is most remarkable. Brother Grafton is one of America s very greatest pastors. This is the greatest second meeting that we have any knowledge of. We have had unlimited joy in this great meeting and have aroused the whole country round about. Pastors and delegations have come from near and far. Vancamp and Rockwell singers, Mrs. Rockwell pianist, Mrs. Scoville soloist and our most successful personal worker. Chas. Reign Scoville.

The Texas Ministerial Institute will meet at Waco, Jan. 26 to 29. The following week the Texas Lectureship will be held at the same place.

O. D. Maple of Ontario says his Sunday-school has trebled in two months. C. W. B. M. Day was fittingly and helpfully observed. All lines of church work are prosperous.

In twenty-two years the National Benevolent Association has nursed and healed 600 of the world's sick, graduated twelve nurses, has furnished home comfort for 102 aged dependent Disciples, aided to self-support 700 destitute women, temporarily aided 896 widowed parents, has fathered and mothered 4,794 parentless children, placed 3,000 homeless children in childless homes. Keep these facts in mind when reaching in the pocket for an offering to missions.

Austin Hunter, after seven years of service with his church, in Indianapolis, has resigned and will close his work the last of February. Bro. Hunter's seven years in Indianapolis have been in every way such as to ever be gratifying both to himself and to the church, which has under his ministry grown from a mission to first rank among February. Mr. Hunter's seven years in In- be available for one meeting in March or April. His address is 2912 Kenwood avenue.

Read carefully our great premium offer in the advertising pages. Now is certainly the time to subscribe to the Christian Century. The books offered are in some cases worth the price paid for both paper and book. Besides, you can depend on it the Christian Century will be the most interesting paper published in our brotherhood during this our Centennial year.

The church at Akita, Japan, has just put in a beautiful baptistery.

The church at Amarilla, Texas, is undertaking to build a $20,000 house of worship.

T. J. Thompson will close his three years' pastorate at Pekin, Ill., Dec. 31. They have been successful years of work.

Excavation is in progress for the new church at Moline, Ill. R. E. Henry is the enthusiastic leader and pastor.

G. Webster Moore's congregation at Ionia, Mich., will celebrate a Home Coming Festival Jan. 17-24. Una Dell Berry will lead in song.

Dr. C. L. Pickett reports an epidemic of cholera to be sweeping through the district about Laoag, Philippine Islands.

Evangelist Geo. L. Snively will dedicate the new church house for the Winders, Ga., Disciples, first Sunday in February. Jno. H. Woods is pastor.

C. M. Kreidler and the West End Church, Chicago, will hold a meeting in January. They have called to their assistance G. W. Thomas of Lynville.

The West Side Church, Springfield, has called J. R. Golden of Gibson City, to become their pastor, succeeding F. M. Rogers, who has removed to California.

The church at Hill City, Kan., dedicated its new building Dec. 20. The dedicatory service was conducted by the "Veteran Dedicator," L. L. Carpenter, of Wabash, Ind.

H. O. Pritchard of the University Church, Bethany, Neb., preached the C. W. B. M. day sermon at the First Church. Twenty new members were added to the First Church auxiliary.

E. J. Willis, late of Carlisle, Ky., has entered enthusiastically upon his work with the church at Kirksville, Mo. He is confident that the splendid record of that church can be maintained.

J. H. Gilliland, of Bloomington, Ill., recently held a meeting with the church at Marshalltown, Ia. There were forty-eight accessions and $15,000 was raised as the beginning of a fund for a new building.

Evangelist George L. Snively of Greenville, Ill., and Chas. Altheisch are in a meeting in Washington, Penn, assisting Pastor E. A. Cole. Twenty-one additions yesterday; sixty-four to date. Shall continue right through holidays.

The Forest Avenue Church, Buffalo, dedicated its large, new basement Dec. 20. The pastors from Tonawanda, Niagara Falls, Richmond avenue and Jefferson street churches were present, to rejoice with Bro. Hayden and his people.

The program committee for the state convention to be held in Eureka, Ill., next September is O. W. Lawrence, Decatur, and J. I. Gunn, Arcola. Those wishing to make suggestions regarding the program are invited to write the committee.

Charles E. McVay is leading the singing in a union meeting at Palmyra, Ill. In the two weeks, during which the meeting has been in progress there have been eighty-nine accessions to the various churches, nearly all by confession. McVay goes next to Atlantic, Iowa.

WITH THE WORKERS

I. H. Teel report eight additions in last two Lord's Days at the South Berkeley Church, Berkeley, Calif.

The University of Michigan has conferred the degree of M. A. upon Prof. A. C. Gray, of Eureka College.

Rochester Irwin has closed a successful two years' ministry at Washburn, Ill. He will give some time to evangelistic work.

W. L. Fisher, recently returned from Oxford, England, has accepted a call to the Fifty-sixth Street Church, New York City.

J. J. Setliff, Pastor of the East Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo., has resigned, to take effect Jan. 1st. His successor has not been chosen.

The Brooklyn Eagle printed in full a recent sermon on "The Abundant Life" by Dr. Herbert Martin, Pastor of the Sterling Place Church.

Dean W. J. Lhamon of the Bible College, Columbia, Missouri, has resigned and will remove to Des Moines, Ia. He expects to devote himself to lecturing.

C. M. Day, of St. Francisville, Ill., has been holding a short meeting at the Band Mill school house in Knox County, Ind. A good interest is being awakened there.

Beginning Jan. 1st, the Committee on Men's Work, with P. C. Mcfarlane as chairman, will publish a monthly magazine, dealing with all that is of common interest to men and the church. The subscription price will be fifty cents.

The meeting held in the Second Christian Church, Vincennes, Ind., by P. C. Cauble, the pastor of the church, lasted for three weeks and resulted in seventeen accessions to the church. Seven of these were by baptism. Bro. Cauble has done a good work for this church.

Mrs. Frank Wells, vice-president of the C. W. B. M., of Indiana, recently delivered an address to the Young Ladies' Mission Circle of the First Church in Vincennes. Her address was much appreciated by all that heard her. Mrs. Wells has a message and knows how to deliver it with telling effect.

Teacher Training graduating exercises took place at the Main Street Christian Church, Mason City, Ia., the 15th inst., at which sixteen young ladies received their diplomas. The class was directed throughout the year by Dr. L. E. Newcomer. The address was delivered by Chas. S. Medbury of Des Moines. The church begins a meeting with Shearer and McVay first Lord's Day in February. G. E. Roberts is the pastor.

The Nelsonville, Ohio, church is enjoying a season of prosperity since entering their new building last July. The Bible School is the largest in the history of the church averaging for the last eight Sundays 428. Sunday, Dec. 20, there were 475 present and an offering of nearly $12. On Dec. 13th fifteen were graduated in the Teacher Training course. L. L. Faris, Ohio State S. S. Superintendent, made the address. A new class is being formed, which we hope to bring up to fifty. An advanced class will also be organized. In the past four Lord's Days there have been eleven added to the church—three Dec. 20th. The church will begin a meeting the first Sunday in January, in which W. H. Boden of Athens will do the preaching, and Ida May Hanna of Cincinnati will sing. W. S. Cook, the minister, is in his third year of work.

The First Christian Church at Lincoln, Neb., will be ready for occupancy by Jan. 1.

J. N. Harker, of Eureka, has accepted a call to the church at Montgomery, Alabama.

A friend in Illinois sends a direct gift of $100 to the Foreign Society for the Vigan, Philippine Islands, Bible College.

C. P. Hedges reached Bolenge, Africa, October 9th. At last accounts he was helping in the printing office and in the school.

Last week the Foreign Society received $1,000 from a friend in Missouri on the Annuity Plan. This is his third gift on that plan, and he is contemplating still others.

Giving money to missions is an investment. In every church there are those who feel they are stewards of the Lord's money. With them the Master has funds laid by.

John L. Brandt and wife expect to make a circuit of the globe immediately following the Centennial Convention. Their most important purpose is to study our missions in different fields.

Chas. Scrivens of Eureka will take charge of the work at Gridley, Ill. Mr. Scrivens is one of the coming men and is completing his studies at Eureka after a two years' pastorate in Canada.

Breeden and Saxton will hold a meeting for the Cedar Rapids, Ia., church in April. George B. Van Arsdall is the pastor. Dr. Breeder spoke for the Cedar Rapids church recently and the preparations are begun for a great ingathering in the spring.

PRESIDENT McLEAN'S NEW BOOK FREE.

To any new subscriber to the Christian Century we will send a copy of A. McLean's "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher," free upon receipt of $1.50. To ministers upon receipt of $1.20. This offer will not hold beyond January 2.

L. G. Murray, of Decker, Ind., who has been preaching occasionally in school houses around Decker will enter Vincennes University the first of the year. He will do school work and preach for churches on Sundays. William Oeschger, the pastor of the Vincennes Church, will aid him in his theological studies.

Evangelists Snively and Altheide are holding a splendid meeting for the Warrensburg, Mo., church, of which Geo. B. Stewart is pastor. The auditorium of the church, seating twelve hundred people, is filled on Sunday nights. The forty-one additions represent but one element of achievement in the meeting. The prospects for this historic church were never more bright.

J. Harry Bullock, State Bible School Supt. of Wisconsin, reports that the work in his charge is carried on under peculiar difficulties. The majority of the schools are located in small towns or in isolated country communities. At present, more than half of the churches are without ministers. Each school struggles along independently as best it can. Milwaukee, Chippewa Falls and Beloit are the only cities of any size where the Disciples have schools, and two of these are without pastoral oversight. In spite of these deplorable facts, at the last state convention seventeen schools reported an enrollment of less than two thousand. The Bible School's aim is to increase the enrollment to three thousand.

Pres. E. V. Zollars and Wm. Le May held an Educational Rally at the Enid, Oklahoma, church, Dec. 20th.

Roy E. Deadman of Cincinnati, Ohio, will take up his work with the Kerr Street Mission, Buffalo, New York, Jan. 3, 1909.

W. A. Harp, who has recently begun his work in the Lenox Avenue Mission Church of New York City, reports the work as prospering.

E. H. Williams will take up the work again at Springfield, Mo., in January, after spending the last year and a half in evangelistic work.

The First Church at Berkeley, Cal., is in a meeting with Wm. J. Lockhart and his assistants. Sixty-eight have been added in the first two weeks.

The church at Cheney, Kan., is planning to enlarge its building. Evangelist Edward Clutter has just closed a meeting there, resulting in 100 additions.

Ira A. Engle, after three years' work in Oklahoma, has returned to Illinois and taken up the work at Chandlerville. Mr. Engle is a native of Illinois and was educated at Eureka College.

Allen T. Shaw, pastor at Pontiac, Ill., has just closed a three weeks' meeting, resulting in eight additions. John Lappin of Armington, Ill., did the preaching, assisted by a large chorus choir.

The Central Church at Warren, Ohio, of which Jay Elwood Lynn is pastor, is crowding its calendar full of interesting things. The C. W. B. M. Auxiliary will meet its apportionment of $100 before December closes.

Eureka College has closed down until after the holidays. The students are going to their homes enthusiastic for the school. There will be an increase in attendance after the holidays. Loyal students make a great college.

Pres. and Mrs. Aylesworth of the Agricultural College at Ft. Collins, Colo., were recently the recipients of a magnificent set of silver of fifty pieces, a gift from the faculty in remembrance of their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary. Pres. Aylesworth has recently met and vanquished strong political opposition to his presidency of this important state institution.

Two Annuity gifts have just been received by the American Christian Missionary Society—the Home Board—one of $500 and one of $100. This is a hopeful sign and we should be glad to be able to report many such gifts to the "Old Mother Society" during our Centennial Year. Such gifts enable the Home Board to answer the appeals that constantly come to them from the new fields opening up in all parts of our country. The Society holds the money in trust during the life of the donor, paying six per cent interest. At the death of the donor the gift is employed in the active evangelistic work of the society, establishing new churches and Bible-schools. Secretary Wright would be glad to correspond with those who desire to use their money in building up the Kingdom.

MY MORNING THOUGHTS.

I thank thee, Lord, for having kept
My soul and body while I slept.
I pray thee, Lord, that through this day
In all I do and think and say—
I may be kept from harm and sin
And made both pure and good within.

According to our announcement it requires $100 per week to send the Century to all our ministers not on our list. We have done better than we promised: the present is the third issue we have sent. Whether we shall be able to continue this plan further depends upon the response we receeive in the next few days. We join with the ministers who are receiving the Century in this gratuitous way in thanking our good friends for their generous gifts.

A RED CROSS LESSON.

Newspapers and department stores, drug stores and post-offices throughout the country are co-operating with the American Red Cross in the sale of Christmas stamps for the benefit of the fight against Tuberculosis. These will carry the holly wreath of cheer and the red eross of merey into every nook and corner of the world, for people in general are cheerfully responding to the call and paying one cent for these little emblems of pity.

Leaders in Church and Bible School may well give heed to the suggestion and offer an opportunity to all who are interested to give something at Christmas to assist the National Benevolent Assoeiation in its orphanages, hospitals and old peoples' homes. The fitness of this season for this work is attested by the inereasing offerings that are spontaneously pouring into these institutions every year. The Centennial year ought to see them at high tide.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

BOULDER, COLORADO.

Professor T. D. Thomas, who had charge of the musie of the First Christian Church, Lincoln, Neb., is now choir master at Boulder. He is a fine leader.

My work in the Boulder church continues to prosper. Our C. E. has made a wonderful growth in every way. About 35 have joined the church since my pastorate began April last.

I am leeturing each week to two classes of university students. Subject "The Life of Christ."

On December 6 I preached to the C. W. B. M. of the Highland Church, Denver. Subjeet, "The Place and Power of Women in the Church."

Dr. B. B. Tyler, of Denver, will preach to the C. W. B. M. of the Boulder Church Sunday evening, December 13.

THE APOSTLE OF THE CONGO.

On Friday, Dec. 18, the church at Vineennes, Ind., was visited by the Apostle of the Congo, Dr. Royal J. Dye. The spirit of Christ constrains us to speak of him as an apostle. He bears in his soul the same unction of grace that was given by Jesus to his early disciples. His apostolic succession is vouched for by the fact that he belongs to that class of men of whom it was said long ago, "Men who have hazarded their lives for the name of the Lord Jesus Christ." His visit was one of great blessing to the church, and above all, was it such to the pastor, the writer of these lines.

Bro. Dye has a wonderful story to tell. It everywhere borders on the miraculous. It is a challenge to our faith. The work that God has done at Bolengi through the messengers of the cross is almost too marvelous to believe. But to hear Dr. Dye tell it, is to believe it. He compels faith in it. If all of our organized missionary work would have given us only one such man as Dr. Dye, it would be an adequate reimbursement for all of our outlay. The influence of Dr. Dye upon the life of our churches at home will be nothing short of a baptism of power. He brings vision and grace.

These lines are not written for the purpose of passing a eulogy upon Dr. Dye. He needs no such words from me. His work speaks for itself. These words are written for the purpose of saying a word to those who are to have Dr. Dye with them for an address. Do all in your power to have every member of your church present to hear Dr. Dye. Men and women who hear this Apostle of The Congo tell the wonderful story of Bolengi will forever thereafter believe in missions. His message possesses, "Irresistable Missionary Graee." Personally, I bless the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ that we were privileged to have with us Dr. Royal J. Dye, whose work at Bolengi, Africa, will forever christen him as The Apostle of The Congo. At the throne of graee we shall make remembranee of him daily.

William Oeschger.

Read carefully our great premium offer in the advertising pages. Now is certainly the time to subscribe to the Christian Century. The books offered are in some cases worth the price paid for both paper and book. Besides, you can depend on it the Christian Century will be the most interesting paper published in our brotherhood during this our Centennial year.

Boils, Pimples And Blackheads

Are caused By Blood Impurity Which May Be Removed In A Few Days By Stuart's Calcium Wafers.

Trial Package Sent Free.

Why suffer boils, pimples, blackheads, tetter, eczema, rash, seabby skin and eruptions of all sorts, when you may by the simple act of letter writing bring to you proof that blood may be purified in a few days or weeks at the latest?

Stuart's Calcium Wafers contain the most powerful blood purifier known to science—Calcium Sulphide. They contain other known purifiers each having a distinct and peculiar office to perform.

Instead of a face full of pimples, or a body which is assailed with boils or eruptions, you may enjoy, if you will, a skin normally clean and clear, by the simple use of Stuart's Calcium Wafers.

They act almost like magic, so rapid is their work of purity done.

You know the blood is pumped through the lungs every breath. The air purifies it.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers help the lungs do their work by segregating the impurities so that the lungs may enrich the blood.

Then they carry off the waste poisons and decay through the bowels. There is no need for months and years of treatment. Calcium Sulphide is so powerful, yet so harmless, that the blood feels its beneficial influence immediately.

Printed words are cold praise, especially when you praise your own product and offer it for sale, but here is an opportunity of proving this praise by your own judgment without cost. Send us your name and address, no matter how serious your skin trouble may be, and we will send you a trial package of Stuart's Calcium Wafers by mail free. It is wholly a matter for your approval. Thousands of people have passed these little wafers with success, and their praise is our testimonial. Every druggist carries them in stock. Every physician knows what Calcium Sulphide will do. He will prescribe it as a blood purifier and charge for the prescription. Here is the best method of using Calcium Sulphide, and you may test it free. Go to your druggist today and buy a package of Stuart's Calcium Wafers, price 50c., or write us and we will send you a trial package free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

OUR GREAT EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY IN AFRICA.

By Royal J. Dye, M. D.

Africa has been one of the problems of the ages. Well it has been called the "Dark Continent," for it has been closed to civilization not only on account of its climatic conditions but also because of the wild fierceness of its aboriginal tribes. It has been the "Dark Continent" indeed because of its dark-skinned inhabitants, but it is doubly "dark" in its degredation and ignorance. The depths of that "darkness" have scarcely been appreciated even by those who have lived a decade amongst them. There is a moral degeneracy, a social degradation and a spiritual despair and darkness that is simply appalling. This constitutes the need for the Gospel and for the "light" and "life" that it brings. "They that walked in darkness have seen a great light; they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined."

The marvel to students of Africal philology is the accuracy of the native languages; their precise diction; their systematic formation, where one had looked, considering their moral and social condition, for crude, unorganized language. Its purity of diction, its poetry of expression, its richness of vocabulary and its wealth of folk-lore and historical tales astonish one as he delves more and more into the great Bantu tongues. Their intellectual keenness and capacity, their excellent memories and their logical sequence of argument show them to be no inferior race in the realm of intellect. The fact that all this obtains among a people with no, as yet discovered, written or sculptured characters to express thought, places in our hands a tremendous opportunity, that of giving to them their literature and of molding and guiding a Nation in whatever of enlightenment and civilization we will. It also leaves the same opportunity for the atheistic Government officials, the nominally catholic, to propagate their vile and stultifying influence in a system of infidel education, if they will and if we give them the opportunity.

So far the Government has contented itself with the Catholic schools of the Priesthood, but these attempt no systematical educational propaganda. They barely teach French, the official language of the Government, and the subsidy that is given them on the supposition of educational work has been removed in many instances and the Government disgusted at their miserable pretense and inefficiency. This leaves the educational feature of our entire district in OUR hands. We have the making of the educational standards of a Nation and the molding of the thought and life of this great Nkundo Nation. This is an opportunity we must not fail to sieze. It will not always be left this way. The one who gets in on the ground floor is the man who wields the greatest influence, and who will guide that awakening Nation into the light of civilization and modern education, tempered with the one thing that has made us a superior nation, viz.: Christianity.

All the civilization they now have a knowledge of is that brought by the heralds of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, whom you have sent out. This is a unique situation and gives an inestimable influence. For they are looking to us for their enlightenment. OUR OPPORTUNITY IS STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL. Let us not delay and come in at the end of the procession, with all the hard grind that will mean. TODAY IS OUR GREAT DAY IN CENTRAL AFRICA BOTH IN EDUCATION AND EVANGELIZATION. We have the moulding of a NATION IN OUR hands, a God-given task and opportunity. We have the setting of the standards of modern education and the pace of modern civilization, if we but will. Shall we be recreant to our trust and idle in the great hour of our opportunity?

The remarkable heroism and consecration of the native evangelists of Bolenge is a token of the spirit of the nation. Their exceptional powers as Preachers of the Word of the Living God, places upon us an added responsibility to give them the very best training we can, for the evangelization of Africa depends, under God on these transformed children of darkness and cannibalism. THEY have not proven recreant. They rather challenge us to better qualify them for their great work, the work of the ministry. They can travel and WILL, the great forest regions and swamps of the jungle. We cannot keep it up and live to do a long service. They know the native mind as we can never know it. They have the native language perfectly at their eloquent command. We, at best, speak an alien tongue imperfectly. We must make of them the workmen perfectly furnished, "rightly dividing the word of Truth."

Ours is the task of a wise master-builder laying a foundation. The Missionaries from America will be needed for a generation to come yet and longer. The very fact of this tremendous awakening demands the hastening of more of them to that land of golden opportunity. Ours is the task of teaching them the "way more perfectly." To us they look for inspiration and guidance. They are but children as yet in the Christian life and it would be criminal to shorten our force from the Home Land. We, as a people, are under obligation, having started this work of regeneration and uplift, to complete it. The present development of the work under our hands, places upon us the task of perfecting and developing these faithful Evangelists and heralds of the Gospel of Peace into men who not only "need not to be ashamed," but who can lead their Nation to the highest levels of civilization. Only the most thorough education will do this. We must have a College to do this. They are the finest Evangelists, but have no preparation for Pastoral work. Permanency demands the best we can give them as Shepherds of the Flock. A college will make this preparation possible. Every reason for a College here in Christian America is doubly forceful there.

The sum asked for is Twenty-Five Thousand Dollars. Think of it, hardly a Church in one of our large towns and smaller cities but builds itself a building costing more than that, for its congregation of a few hundred. THIS is to furnish a Nation with its highest educational opportunities. To mould the thought of an entire race of people, to give Christian tone to the civilization of a Nation.

I have not the least doubt about the raising of this money. It is the Lord's work. The advancement of His Kingdom demands it. The question is, are YOU going to have a share in it? Why not memorialize a loved one or perpetuate your own influence, in the building of this college. Make this a New Year's dedication to your Lord. Do it at once. Do it worthily, as unto God.

ST. LOUIS MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION ADDS ITS PROTEST.

The St. Louis Christian Ministers' Association, at its regular meeting, Dec. 14th, with thirteen resident preachers present and several visitors, unanimously passed the following resolutions:—

Deeply regretting the strife that has arisen over the proposed Centennial program, while not at this time either defending or assailing the opinions, theories, or teachings of anyone personally concerned in the controversy, we respectfully submit the following Resolutions:

First. That we believe the Program Committee to be a representative one and that in their selection of speakers its members acted as they deemed wise and right, and that the Committee alone, and not our Missionary Societies, should be held responsible for its work.

Second. That we entreat our brethren everywhere to withhold further criticism on the Centennial program (as yet incompletely published), and we particularly protest against allowing any difference of opinion to be made a reason for withholding support from our Missionary Organizations.

Third. That loyalty to our fathers and our plea demands that our brethren,—editors and correspondents alike,—refrain from all further acrimonious discussion of these matters. Thus, with the exercise of forbearance and charity, which are among the first principles of our holy religion, we shall preserve, unsoiled, the platform on which the apostles long ago and our fathers of more recent times fought their splendid battles for Truth and Christian Unity, so that the Pittsburgh Convention of 1909 may be to our great and beloved Brotherhood the glorious crowning of the past eventful century.

L. W. McCreary, President.
G. E. Ireland, Secretary.

EVANGELISTIC MUSIC.

With the revival comes the little book of gospel songs. Why do evangelists use them? "Musicians frequently say to me," said Mr. Alexander (Dr. Chapman's associate in evangelistic work), 'Why don't you use classical music—tunes above the style of gospel songs?' I reply: 'When you can show me similar effects following such high-class music in moving the hearts of men and women, I will use it fast enough. Until then, I shall keep to gospel songs, which have a wonderful way of reaching everybody because they touch the soul.'

That is a pretty fair answer. But there is an abysmal distance between such gospel songs as "I gave My life for thee" and the riff-raff which are nothing but sound and noise.

Herbert A. Carpenter and wife, who work with the good people at White Hall, Ill., were very pleasantly surprised by some of their members last week. They made the occasion very pleasant by Bible games and refreshments and in the end left substantial evidence of their regard. This is the second time in six months that this pastor has been so agreeably surprised.

Encouraging reports reach us from Children's Day for Home Missions. The receipts up to December 10th show an increase over the same period of last year of $1,421.38. The returns from the states of Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas and Iowa show that ninety-one schools sent larger offerings this year, fifty-six sent smaller offerings, fourteen sent the same as last year and one hundred and eighty-one schools which sent nothing last year have lined up with good offerings this year. Nearly all of the old reliable schools are yet to be heard. So far, Kentucky leads in the number of contributing schools and the amount contributed. Kansas is second, and Illinois third. Ohio is said to be on a still hunt for the State Banner, now held by Kentucky.

PRESIDENT McLEAN'S NEW BOOK FREE.

To any new subscriber to the Christian Century we will send a copy of A. McLean's "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher," free upon receipt of $1.50. To ministers upon receipt of $1.20. This offer will not hold beyond January 2.

COUNTY CAMPAIGNS IN MISSOURI.

Clay and Lincoln Counties Conduct Campaigns for the Sunday Schools.

During the past two months J. H. Bryan, our field worker and the Superintendent of our Adult Department, has visited the following places in his campaigns in Clay and Lincoln Counties; Antioch, Barry, Excelsior Springs, Holt, Kearney, Liberty, Missouri City, Mt. Olive, Mt. Gilead, Smithville, and Woodland in Clay County, and Troy, Hawk Point, Old Alexandria, Davis, Silex, Louisville, Olney, Moscow Mills, Old Monroe, Corinth, Foley, Linn Knoll and Ellsberry, in Lincoln County.

In each church the work done was that which was the most needed, and best suited to the field. At Woodland and Old Alexandria, new schools were started where there had been none for several years. At Foley a new school of forty-four members was started. At a number of places the attendance was materially increased; at some, contests were started, at others the Adult Bible Classes were organized and set to work, and still at other places Teacher-Training classes were organized, and at every place the importance of the Bible School and the obligations of grown up disciples to be disciples was emphasized. In a number of conferences instruction in better methods was given, and higher ideals of efficiency and service presented. Several schools were taken out of winter quarters and others prevented from going in. Lincoln County's new aim is for 1,000 new pupils by the Convention next August.

The success of the campaign was largely due to the prepartion for, and the co-operation of the County Board, under the leadership of their presidents, C. F. Ward of Libertyand W. A. Dudley, of Troy.

The words of appreciation of the work of Bro. Bryan which have come to us, show that he is a workman who can fit into almost any situation and be helpful in almost any school. The county campaign plan is a new one among us, and these two instances demonstrated that the largest results with the least expenditure of time and money can thus be secured.

The County Boards are also confident that they can spend their missionary money in no more beneficial way than to have a county Sunday-school campaign. If your county is interested, write me.

Professor C. R. Travis, who can be addressed at Havelock, Nebraska, R. F. D. 2, can be secured as singing evangelist for the next three months. He was with me several years in charge of the music at Centerville, Iowa. He is a good soloist (tenor voice) and a good chorus leader. Pastors would do well to secure him.

Advice.

"You's got to put a certain amount of dependence on yohself," said Uncle Een. "De man dat goes aroun' lookin' foh so much advice is liable to find hisself in de position of de gemman dat gits so interestd readin' de time-table dat he misses his train."—Washington Star.

CHICAGO

among the Disciples will be there if he can. Our whole view of the Sunday-school and other institutions of the church are undergoing change for the better under the continual efforts of this association.

The Rally of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society will be held in Chicago at the Jackson Boulevard church on Monday, January 11. The meeting of the Ministers' Association will be held in the forenoon and the rally will be held in the afternoon and evening. In the evening the unique feature will be a lecture on our foreign stations illustrated by moving pictures. The lecture is given by Stephen J. Corey and is arousing the greatest enthusiasm everywhere. The Chicago churches have always been hospitable to these rallies but the holding of them at a time of day more congenial to Chicago habits will doubtless greatly increase the attendance. The church will serve meals both noon and evening.

The date for the next quarterly rally of the C. C, M. S. is set for January 24. The program is in the process of making. It ought to be our greatest rally.

The pulpit committee of the Irving Park church has renewed its quest for A. W. Taylor of Eureka. It recently met with the official board in Eureka and laid the case before them, asking for A. W. Taylor's release. The board members gave way to their feelings and for a time it was a sort of farewell event with many an expressed regret. With tears and best wishes, the board gave a reluctant consent. It seems probable at this writing that Mr. Taylor will accept the call. If he does, he will have the warmest of welcomes in Chicago. His gifts peculiarly fit him for service here. With him as pastor, Irving Park would become one of our strongest and most aggressive churches.

A SUCCESSFUL RING.

One-half a century engaged in manufacturing Bells that are ringing to the satisfaction of thousands of pleased customers is the successful record of the celebrated STEEL ALLOY CHURCH and SCHOOL BELL manufacturers, The C. S. Bell Co., Hillsboro, Ohio.

This is a record of which they are justly proud. The vast number of STEEL ALLOY BELLS they are distributing from year to year throughout this country and foreign lands, making satisfied purchasers, attests to the popularity of their Bells. Churches and Schools now needing a Bell would do well to write them. They will send you, for the asking, a beautiful catalogue of their STEEL ALLOY BELLS together with their unique plan of helping a church or school secure a Bell.

EVERY CHURCH SHOULD USE OUR

Individual Communion Cups

The best way to prove the merits of this cleanly method is to use a service at a communion on trial. We will send your church a complete outfit to use before purchasing, to be returned to us at our expense if not found perfectly satisfactory. To receive service give us number of communicants usually in attendance and we will send an outfit. Over 5,000 churches use our cups. We furnish bread plates and collection plates in several styles. THE VIGAN BIBLE COLLEGE AT VIGAN, P. I.

During the past week, the Foreign Society has received $950 in cash for the Vigan Bible College, and $1,300 in pledges. Progress is being made, and we are hoping the full $25,000 will be assured soon, that we may clear the way for other tasks.

Remember, we have 3,000 converts in the Province of Luzon, 34 churches, 41 groups of believers not yet organized, and 171 raw native evangelists. This has all been accomplished, and more, in about seven years! Almost 1,000,000 people in the province, depending upon us alone for the gospel.

Every dollar expended in this enterprise, will buy its full worth in a college plant, a self-supporting ministry, and in industrial thrift among the people. Our missionaries cannot furnish the money, but with money, they will soon capture the land for our Lord. We are ready to give full information, and to act upon any suggestion looking to the consummation of the hopes of the missionaries in this enterprise.

AN EVENING WITH J. M. KERSEY.

A union meeting of the eighteen training classes of Greater Kansas City was held under the direction of the Bible School Union of Greater Kansas City, on Tuesday evening, November 24th, 1908.

Prior to the eight o'clock meeting, a number of the Teachers of the Training Classes, and other Bible School Workers, met Rev. J. M. Kersey, of Parsons, Kans., in an informal luncheon, served by the King's daughters of the First Christian Church.

The Adult Bible Class of the South Prospect Bible School furnished orchestra music for the evening.

Brother Kersey is teacher of the largest Training class in the world, and great interest was shown in his work and his manner of teaching by the splendid audience that greeted him in the evening meeting.

He gave a most interesting address on the Teacher Training Work, the Open Book, and demonstrated his manner of teaching his great class by drilling the Union meeting for several minutes. He said: "Don't open the class for questions; don't lecture; it wastes time. Drill the class by repetition." He asked for responses in sections, as he does n his large class at home, requesting that very one in the section respond as one voice.

Every one was delighted with Brother Kerey and his address, and his practical demstration of teaching.

The meeting was an evidence of the keen, ide-awake interest being taken all over the ty, in this work of Training for Service, this great crusade for the "Open Book."

D. P. Gribben, President.

Abby Downing, Secretary,
Bible School Union of Kansas City.

Grounds for Complaint.

"Any complaints, corporal?" said the colel, making one morning a personal inspectn.

"Yes, sir. Taste that, sir," said the corpal promptly.

The colonel put the liquid to his lips.

"Why," he said, "that's the best soup I er tasted!"

"Yes, sir," said the corporal, "and the cook wits to call it coffee."—Argonaut.
